

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE

THE EDITOR.

As Tragedy sprung from the Dithyrambic Hymns, so did Comedy from the Phallic Songs, of early Greece. But the history of its infancy is not so well preserved, nor its progressive improvements so distinctly marked, as those of the sister art. This obscurity may perhaps be attributed to the greater difficulty attendant on comic writings; which rendered them slower in arriving at perfection, and, consequently, later in attracting the notice of critics, and historians. For, while the tragedian borrowed the ground-work of his plot from the chronicles of kings, or the legends of warriors, the comic poet is constrained to draw on fancy for the fable of his piece, and to inculcate his moral through the medium of fictitious characters and created incidents. Nor is this the only difference. To exhibit the operation of the Passions, is the aim of Tragedy, while Manners are the great object of Comedy. Thus, the tragic writer has only to look within himself for natural description, and to adjust the sentiments of the speakers by the emotions of his own heart: but it is the more arduous province of the comic poet to look abroad, amid the boundless diversity of human manners, for features, appropriate to the personages of his drama; to delineate numerous traits of character, not visible to vulgar eyes; to seize the evanescent forms of fashion; and to give to the "airy nothings" of whim and caprice, "a local habitation, and a name."

In the operation of these causes we see an ample reason, why the comic poets of antiquity are fewer, and of much less celebrity, than the early tragedians. Indeed, history does not enable us to mention, with certainty, any writers of this class before the time of Aristophanes, who may be considered as the parent of Ancient Comedy. The characteristic of this species of dramatic composition, is the introduction of living persons on the stage by their proper names: and we have no specimens of this style, but a few plays from the pen of the Rhodian Dramatist, all of which are stained by the grossest extravagancies, ribaldry, personal abuse, and profaneness; poets and philosophers, generals and magistrates, priests, and even the deities themselves, were indiscriminately attacked by this unsparing satirist, and undeservedly held up to general derision. Socrates, Euripides, and Pericles, were all made to pass, in ludicrous review, before the Athenian populace. And when no actor could be found, hardy enough to personate Cleon, Aristophanes himself put on the sock, and, assuming the name and habit of that general, successfully exposed him to the shafts of public ridicule.

It was impossible, that this condition of the stage could be of any long duration. No state could long exist, where talents, virtue, government, and religion, might be derided with impunity. A law was accordingly enacted by Alcibiades, to check this dangerous licentiousness of the Athenian theatre. But, as it is not the nature of human inventions to pass, at once, from rude infancy to mature perfection, a period intervened between the early barbarism, and final improvement, of Comedy; in which it experienced a salutary change, that gradually led the way to a more finished style of composition. This state is known by the appellation of the Middle Comedy, in which the dramatist was obliged to omit the name of the person he intended to satyrise: But all the peculiarities of his person and dress might still be preserved, and these were generally so successfully copied, that it was impossible to mistake the magistrate in his robes, and the general in his uniform, especially as voice and gesture, age and gait, were called in as auxiliaries to identify the prototype, and contributed to render the picture a perfect likeness of the individual. Among the moderns, Moliere is a distinguished cultivator of this species of comedy. His Misanthrope is acknowledged as the portrait of the Duke de Montaunsier, and Oronte as that of the Duke de St Aignan. The first President sat for the Tartuffe, and Monsieur Rohart for the Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Even our own stage has been disgraced by this species of comedy. Of this kind was the Poetaster of Ben Jonson, the Satiro-Mastix of Decker, the Rehearsal of Buckingham, and many of Foote's pieces. But, happily, this licentious style has been for many years obsolete in this country; and it is to be hoped, that we shall never witness its revival.

At last Menander arose, the parent of legitimate comedy, who, disdaining to seek applause by the description of individuals, looked abroad among the various classes of mankind for those general traits, which characterize human nature, or pervade whole societies of men. Thus, avoiding personality, which irritates without amending, and wounds without discriminating, Menander held up the mirror to his whole audience, lashed the general follies of common life, and ennobled the moral purpose of the stage. It is generally regretted; that the founder of the New Comedy, as it is called, is only known to us by the works of his admirer and imitator, Terence, whose plays are still considered as models of elegant composition, and just representations of human life.

It is on the model of the Roman Menander, that the moderns construct their comedies; amplified, indeed, and enriched by a wider scope of plot, and a greater variety of character. The improved civilization of Europe has very much enlarged the sphere of the Comic Muse. For the diffusion of wealth and knowledge through the various classes of society encourages the growth of eccentricities, and leads the Promethean spark to foibles yet unanimated. Poverty cannot indulge her whims, and gross ignorance has none to gratify. But in no respect is our pre-eminence over the ancients so remarkable, as in the variety and spirit of our female characters, which afford such an additional interest to theatrical exhibitions, and constitute so great a part of their charm. In vain do we look on the Greek and Roman stage for the sprightly coquetry of a Millamant, the solemn prudery of a lady Graveairs, for the fashion and elegance of a lady Townly, or the rustic simplicity of a Miss Hoyden. The whole range of female character, in the ancient drama, is confined to concubines and procuresses. It is obvious, from this defect, that the fair sex had not, at that time, attained their proper ascendancy in society; but at the present day, they hold that just and elevated rank, which makes them principal parties in all the complex occurrences of real life, and gives them a corresponding place in the dramatic representations of it. The multiplicity of our female characters may also be owing to the admission of female performers, which were not allowed on the Roman stage. It is impossible, that a lady's part could be acted, with any effect, by a man in petticoats; while, on the other hand, it will be readily admitted, that the inimitable comic powers of a Clive, a Farren, and a Jordan, did not merely give a temporary zest to the character represented, but animated the pen of the dramatist to fresh attempts and new exhibitions of female foible.

In following the steps of the ancients in dramatic composition, the English have not servilely copied them in every particular, but have added and rescinded, according to the alteration in the customs of society, and in the improved canons of criticism. But the French stage has not been so judicious. Moliere has eternally loaded his scene with the impertinence of abigails and valets; not reflecting, that the familiarity, to which the Romans admitted their servants, or their freedmen, who generally superintended the education of their children, unavoidably connected them in all their domestic concerns, and accounts for their share in the Drama. But these are not the manners of France. It is on the stage alone, that the Le Fleurs and the Scapins are on such intimate terms with their masters. In common life, the same distinction is observed as with us; or, at least, that was the case in the time of Moliere. This, it must be confessed, was also the fault of some of our early comedies, but has since been laid aside, while the successors of Moliere have continued the error of the great comic master. This, and other errors of more or less importance, sinks the French far below the English comedy.

But it is not only to the French, that we boast ourselves superior in comic writing, but to all our contemporaries. The Comic Muse flourishes most under a free government. Despotism compels uniformity of character; but in this favoured isle every whim may be indulged. No laws operate to restrain caprice; no tyrant watches to punish private folly, controul inconsistencies, or revenge fickleness. In the land of Freedom grows the legitimate food of Comedy; and comic characters, in such a country, arrive at maturity, while, in a more ungenial region, they would have been checked, if not eradicated, in their earliest infancy. If we look to the Spanish, or Portuguese, or Russian theatre, we see the dramatic genius of the country kept down by the iron rod of despotism. The follies of the nobles must not be lashed; courtiers must not be exposed; and, if you touch upon religious hypocrisy, the doors of the Inquisition are open to receive you. Such is the state of comedy in tyrannic countries; and it is with pride, that we contemplate the cause of its excellence in our own.

It was this conviction of the high character of true English comedy, which (among other reasons) induced the Editor to undertake this publication; and he has followed a plan, which, he trusts, will be generally approved. As many of our early comedies were, like the ancients, stained with gross indecency, he has endeavoured to avoid admitting into this volume whatever might be strictly detrimental to good morals. Since the Restoration, a distinguished amendment has taken place in this particular; indeed a new species of drama has been introduced, called Sentimental Comedy, directly the reverse of the licentious style that formerly prevailed. The Editor has not, however; pushed the principle of omission so far as the censors of the Portuguese stage, who rejected a translation of the Suspicious Husband, on account of the supposed immoral tendency of the character of Ranger. Furthermore, he conceived an advantage would be derived, by a chronological arrangement, and new classification, of plays. The dramatic collections, hitherto made, have too much resembled a cabinet in confusion; where shells and fossils, metals and gems, have been jumbled together without discrimination. The Editor has endeavoured to retrieve the theatrical cabinet from this disorder, and has distributed its various productions into the three classes of Tragedy, Comedy, and Farce, forming three separate volumes. Each volume may be considered as a whole to persons, exclusively attached to one particular line of reading, while the general scholar will find, in the entire work, a complete, though select, BRITISH DRAMA.

ACT I

SCENE I.—A court-yard before KNO'WELL'S house.

Enter KNO'WELL and BRAINWORM.

Kno. A GOODLY day toward! and a fresh morning! Brain-worm, Call up young master. Bid him rise, sir. Tell him, I have some business to employ him.

Brain. I will, sir, presently.

Kno. But hear you, sirrah! If he be at his book, disturb him not.

VOL. II.

Brain. Well, sir.

[Exit.

Kno. How happy, yet, should I esteem myself, Could I, by any practice, wean the boy From one vain course of study he affects. He is a scholar, if a man may trust The liberal voice of fame in her report, Of good account in both our universities; Either of which have favoured him with graces. But their indulgence must not spring in me A fond opinion that he cannot err. Myself was once a student; and, indeed,

A

Fed with the self-same humour, he is now,
 Dreaming on nought but idle poetry,
 That fruitless, and unprofitable art,
 Good unto none, but least to the professors,
 Which, then, I thought the mistress of all knowledge :

But since, time and the truth have waked my judgment,
 And reason taught me better to distinguish
 The vain from the useful learnings——

Enter Master STEPHEN.

Cousin Stephen !

What news with you, that you are here so early ?

Step. Nothing, but e'en come to see how you do, uncle.

Kno. That's kindly done, you are welcome, coz.

Step. Ay, I know that, sir. I would not ha' come else. How doth my cousin Edward, uncle ?

Kno. O, well, coz, go in and see : I doubt he be scarce stirring yet.

Step. Uncle, after I go in, can you tell me an'
 he have e'er a book of the sciences of hawking and hunting ? I would fain borrow it.

Kno. Why, I hope you will not a hawking now, will you ?

Step. No wosse, but I'll practise against the next year, uncle. I have bought me a hawk, and a hood, and bells, and all ; I lack nothing but a book to keep it by.

Kno. O, most ridiculous !

Step. Nay, look you now, you are angry, uncle. Why, you know, an' a man have not skill in the hawking and hunting languages now-a-days, I'll not give a rush for him. They are more studied than the Greek, or the Latin. He is for no gallant's company without them. And by Gad's lid I scorn it, I, so I do, to be a consort for every hum-drum ; hang them scroyles, there's nothing in them, in the world. What do you talk on it ? Because I dwell at Hogsden. I shall keep company with none but the archers of Finsbury ! or the citizens, that come a ducking to Islington ponds ! A fine jest i'faith ! sli^t, a gentleman mun show himself like a gentleman.—
 Uncle, I pray you be not angry. I know what I have to do ; I trow, I am no novice.

Kno. You are a prodigal, absurd coxcomb : go to !

Nay, never look at me, 'tis I that speak.

Take it as you will, sir, I'll not flatter you.

Have you not yet found means enow to waste
 That, which your friends have left you, but you must

Go cast away your money on a kite,
 And know not how to keep it, when you've done ?
 O, 'tis comely ! this will make you a gentleman !
 Well, cousin, well ! I see you are e'en past hope
 Of all reclaim. Ay, so, now you're told on it,
 You look another way.

Step. What would you ha' me do !

Kno. What would I have you do ! I'll tell you, kinsman ;

Learn to be wise, and practise how to thrive ;
 That would I have thee do : and not to spend
 Your coin on every bauble, that you fancy,
 On every foolish brain, that humours you.
 I would not have you to invade each place,
 Nor thrust yourself on all societies,
 Till men's affections, or your own desert,
 Should worthily invite you to your rank.
 He, that is so disrespectful in his courses,
 Oft sells his reputation at cheap market.
 Nor would I you should melt away yourself
 In flashing bravery, lest, while you affect
 To make a blaze of gentry to the world,
 A little puff of scorn extinguish it,
 And you be left like an unsavoury snuff,
 Whose property is only to offend.
 I'd have you sober and contain yourself :
 Not, that your sail be bigger than your boat :
 But moderate your expences now (at first),
 As you may keep the same proportion still.
 Nor stand so much on your gentility,
 Which is an airy, and mere borrowed thing,
 From dead men's dust and bones : and none of yours
 Except you make, or hold it. Who comes here ?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Save you, gentlemen:

Step. Nay, we do not stand much on our gentility, friend ; yet, you are welcome ; and I assure you mine uncle here is a man of a thousand a-year, Middlesex land ; he has but one son in all the world ; I am his next heir (at the common law) master Stephen, as simple as I stand here ; if my cousin die (as there is hope he will.) I have a pretty living o' my own too, beside, hard by here.

Serv. In good time, sir.

Step. In good time, sir ! why ? and in very good time, sir. You do not flout, friend, do you ?

Serv. Not I, sir.

Step. Not you, sir ! you were best not, sir ;
 an' you should, here be them can perceive it, and that quickly too : go to. And they can give it again soundly too, an' need be.

Serv. Why, sir, let this satisfy you : good faith,
 I had no such intent.

Step. Sir, an' I thought you had, I would talk with you, and that presently.

Serv. Good master Stephen, so you may, sir, at your pleasure.

Step. And so I would, sir, good my saucy companion, an' you were out of my uncle's ground, I can tell you ; though I do not stand upon my gentility neither in it.

Kno. Cousin ! cousin ! Will this ne'er be left ?

Step. Whoreson, base fellow ? a mechanical serving man ? By this cudgel, an' 'twere not for shame, I would——

Kno. What would you'do, you peremptory gull?

If you cannot be quiet, get you hence.

You see, the honest man demeans himself

Modestly towards you, giving no reply

To your unseasoned, quarrelling, rude fashion :

And still you huff it, with a kind of carriage,

As void of wit, as of humanity.

Go, get you in ! 'fore Heaven, I am ashamed

Thou hast a kinsman's interest in me.

[Exit STEPHEN.

Serv. I pray you, sir, is this master Kno'well's home?

Kno. Yes, marry, is it, sir.

Serv. I should inquire for a gentleman here, one master Edward Kno'well : do you know any such, sir, I pray you?

Kno. I should forget myself else, sir.

Serv. Are you the gentleman? cry your mercy, sir : I was required by a gentleman in the city, as I rode out at this end of the town, to deliver you this letter, sir.

Kno. To me, sir? [To his most selected friend, Master Edward Kno'well.] What might the gentleman's name be, sir, that sent it?

Serv. One Master Well-bred, sir.

Kno. Master Well-bred! A young gentleman, is he not?

Serv. The same, sir; Master Kitley married his sister: the rich merchant in the Old Jewry.

Kno. You say very true. Brain-worm!

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

Brain. Sir.

Kno. Make this honest friend drink here.— Pray you go in.

[Exit BRAINWORM and Servant.

This letter is directed to my son :

Yet I am Edward Kno'well too, and may,

With the safe conscience of good manners, use The fellow's error to my satisfaction.

Well, I will break it ope (old men are curious)

Be it but for the style's sake, and the phrase,

To see if both do answer my son's praises,

Who is almost grown the idolater

Of this young Well-bred : What have we here?

What's this?

[The letter.]

'Why, Ned, I beseech thee, hast thou fore-sworn all thy friends i' the Old Jewry? or dost thou think us all Jews, that inhabit there? Leave thy vigilant father alone, to number over his green apricots, evening and morning, o' the north-west wall : an' I had been his son, I had saved him the labour long since ; if taking in all the young wenches that pass by, at the back-door, and coddling every kernel of the fruit for them would have served. But prithee, come over to me, quickly, this morning : I have such a present for thee ! Our Turkey company never

'sent the like to the Grand Signior. One is a rhimer, sir, o' your own batch, your own leaven ; but doth think himself poet-major o' the town ; willing to be shewn, and worthy to be seen.— The other—I will not venture his description with you till you come, because I would have you make hither with an appetite. If the worst of them be not worth your journey, draw your bill of charges, as unconscionable as any Guild-hall verdict will give it you, and you shall be allowed your Viaticum.

From the Windmill.'

From the Burdello, it might come as well ;

The Spittal : is this the man,

My son hath sung so, for the happiest wit,

The choicest brain, the times have sent us forth?

I know not what he may be in the arts ;

Nor what in schools : but, surely, for his manners,

I judge him a profane and dissolute wretch :

Worse, by profession of such great good gifts,

Being the master of so loose a spirit.

Why, what unhallowed ruffian would have writ

In such a scurrilous manner to a friend ?

Why should he think, I tell my apricots?

Or play the Hesperian dragon with my fruit,

To watch it? Well, my son, I thought

You'd had more judgment to have made election

Of your companions, than to have taken on trust Such petulant, jeering gamesters, that can spare No argument, or subject from their jest.

But I perceive, affection makes a fool

Of any man, too much the father. Brain-worm!

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

Brain. Sir.

Kno. Is the fellow gone, that brought this letter?

Brain. Yes, sir, a pretty while since.

Kno. And where's your young master?

Brain. In his chamber, sir.

Kno. He spake not with the fellow, did he?

Brain. No, sir, he saw him not.

Kno. Take you this letter, seal it, and deliver it to my son ;

But with no notice, that I have opened it, on your life.

Brain. O lord, sir, that were a jest indeed !

Kno. I am resolved I will not stop his journey ;

Nor practise any violent means to stay

The unbridled course of youth in him : for that, Restrained, grows more impatient.

There is a way of winning, more by love,

And urging of the modesty, than fear :

Force works on servile natures, not the free.

He, that's compelled to goodness, may be good ;

But, 'tis but for that fit : where others, drawn

By softness, and example, get a habit.

Then, if they stray, but warn them; and the same
 They would for virtue do, they will do for shame.
 [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Young KNO'WELL's Study.

Enter EDWARD KNO'WELL and BRAIN-WORM.

E. Kno. Did he open it, say'st thou?

Brain. Yes, o' my word, sir, and read the contents.

E. Kno. That's bad. What countenance, pray thee, made he in the reading of it? Was he angry, or pleased?

Brain. Nay, sir, I saw him not read it, nor open it, I assure your worship.

E. Kno. No! how know'st thou, then, that he did either?

Brain. Marry, sir, because he charged me, on my life, to tell nobody that he opened it: which, unless he had done, he would never fear to have revealed.

E. Kno. That's true: well, I thank thee, Brain-worm.
 [Exit.]

Enter Master STEPHEN.

Step. Oh! Brain-worm, did'st thou not see a fellow here, in a what sha'-call him doublet? He brought mine uncle a letter e'en now.

Brain. Yes, master Stephen, what of him?

Step. Oh! I ha' such a mind to beat him—where's he? can'st thou tell?

Brain. Faith, he is not of that mind: he is gone, master Stephen.

Step. Gone! which way? when went he? how long since?

Brain. He is rid hence. He took horse at the street door.

Step. And I staid i' the fields! whoreson, scanderberg rogue! O that I had but a horse to fetch him back again!

Brain. Why, you may ha' my master's gelding, to save your longing, sir.

Step. But I ha' no boots, that's the spite on't.

Brain. Why, a fine wisp of hay, rolled hard, master Stephen.

Step. No, faith, it's no boot to follow him now; let him e'en go and hang. Prithee, help to truss me a little. He does so vex me—

Brain. You'll be worse vexed, when you are trussed, master Stephen. Best keep unbraced, and walk yourself till you be cold; your choler may founder you else.

Step. By my faith, and so I will, now thou tell'st me on't. How dost thou like my leg, Brain-worm?

Brain. A very good leg, master Stephen; but the woollen stocking does not commend it so well.

Step. Foh, the stockings be good enough, now summer is coming on, for the dust: I will have a pair of silk against winter, that I go to dwell in the town. I think my leg would shew in a silk hose.

Brain. Believe me, master Stephen, rarely well.

Step. In sadness, I think it would; I have a reasonable good leg.

Brain. You have an excellent good leg, master Stephen; but I cannot stay to praise it longer now; I am very sorry for't.
 [Exit.]

Step. Another time will serve, Brain-worm.—Gra-mercy, for this,

Enter Young KNO'WELL.

E. Kno. Ha, ha, ha!

Step. 'Slid! I hope he laughs not at me; an' he do—

E. Kno. Here was a letter, indeed, to be intercepted by a man's father! He cannot but think most virtuously both of me and the sender, sure, that make the careful coster-mouger of him in our familiar epistles. I wish I knew the end of it, which now is doubtful, and threatens—what! my wise cousin! nay, then, I will furnish our feast with one gull more toward the mess. He writes to me of a brace, and here's one, that's three: O, for a fourth! Fortune! if ever thou'lt use thine eyes, I entreat thee—

Step. O, now I see who he laughs at. He laughs at somebody in that letter. By this good light, an' he had laughed at me—

E. Kno. How now, cousin Stephen, melancholy?

Step. Yes, a little. I thought you had laughed at me, cousin.

E. Kno. Why, what an' I had, coz, what would you ha' done?

Step. By this light, I would ha' told mine uncle.

E. Kno. Nay, if you would ha' told your uncle, I did laugh at you, coz.

Step. Did you, indeed?

E. Kno. Yes, indeed.

Step. Why, then—

E. Kno. What then?

Step. I am satisfied; it is sufficient.

E. Kno. Why, be so, gentle coz. And I pray you, let me entreat a courtesy of you. I am sent for, this morning, by a friend i' the Old Jewry, to come to him: 'tis but crossing o'er the field to Moor-gate: will you bear me company? I protest, it is not to draw you into bond, or any plot against the state, coz.

Step. Sir, that's all one, an' 'twere; you shall command me, twice so far as Moor-gate, to do you good, in such a matter. Do you think I would leave you? I protest—

E. Kno. No, no, you shall not protest, coz.

Step. By my sackins, but I will, by your leave; I will protest more to my friend, than I will speak of at this time.

E. Kno. You speak very well, coz.

Step. Nay, not so, neither; you shall pardon me: but I speak to serve my turn.

E. Ksa. Your turn, coz! Do you know what you say? A gentleman of your sort, parts, carriage, and estimation, to talk of your turn in this company, and to me, alone, like a water-bearer at a conduit! fie! a wight, that, hitherto, his every step hath left the stamp of a great foot behind him, at every word the savour of a strong spirit; and he! this man, so graced, so gilded, or, as I may say, so tinfoyled by nature! Come, come, wrong not the quality of your desert, with looking downward, coz; but hold up your head, so; and let the idea of what you are be portrayed in your face, that men may read in your physiognomy, 'here, within this place, is to be seen the true and accomplished monster, or miracle of nature,' which is all one. What think you of this, coz!

Step. Why, I do think of it; and I will be more proud, and melancholy, and gentleman-like, than I have been, I'll assure you.

E. Ksa. Why, that's resolute, master Stephen! Now, if I can hold him up to his height, as it is happily begun, it will do well for a suburb-humour: we may hap have a match with the city, and play him for forty pounds. Come, coz.

Step. I'll follow you.

E. Ksa. Follow me; you must go before.

Step. Nay, an' I must, I will. Pray you, shew me, good cousin. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The street before Cob's house.

Enter Master MATTHEW.

Mat. I think this be the house. What, hoa!

Enter Cob, from the House.

Cob. Who is there? O, Master Matthew! give your worship good morrow.

Mat. What, Cob! How dost thou, good Cob? Dost thou inhabit here, Cob?

Cob. Ay, sir, I and my lineage ha' kept a poor house here in our days.

Mat. Cob, canst thou shew me of a gentleman, one Captain Bobadil, where his lodging is?

Cob. O, my guest, sir, you mean?

Mat. Thy guest! Alas! ha, ha.

Cob. Why do you laugh, sir? Do you not mean Captain Bobadil?

Mat. Cob, pray thee, advise thyself well: do not wrong the gentleman and thyself too. I dare be sworn he scorns thy house. He! he lodge in such a base, obscure place as thy house! Tut, I know his disposition so well, he would not lie in thy bed, if thou would'st give it him.

Cob. I will not give it him, though, sir. Mass, I thought somewhat was in it we could not get him to-bed, all night! Well, sir, though he lies not on my bed, he lies on my bench. And if it please you to go in, sir, you shall find him with two cushions under his head, and his cloak wrapped about him, as though he had neither won nor lost; and yet, I warrant, he never cast better in his life, than he has done to-night.

Mat. Why, was he drunk?

Cob. Drunk, sir! you hear not me say so. Perhaps he swallowed a tavern-token, or some such device, sir: I have nothing to do withal. I deal with water, and not with wine. Give me my bucket there, hoa. God be with you, sir, it is six o'clock: I should have carried two turns by this. What hoa! my stopple! come.

Mat. Lie in a water-bearer's house! A gentleman of his havings! Well, I will tell him my mind.

Cob. What, Tib! shew this gentleman up to the captain.—[Tib shews Master Mat. into the house.] You should have some now, would take this Mr Matthew to be gentleman at the least. His father is an honest man, a worshipful fishmonger, and so forth; and now does he creep, and wriggle into acquaintance with all the brave gallants about the town, such as my guest is. O, my guest is a fine man! he does swear the legiblest of any man christened: by St. George—the foot of Pharaoh—the body o' me,—as I am a gentleman and a soldier; such dainty oaths! and withall, he does take this same filthy roguish tobacco, the finest and cleanliest! it would do a man good to see the fume come forth out at's tonnels! Well, he owes me forty shillings, my wife lent him out of her purse by six-pence a time, besides his lodging. I would I had it! I shall ha' it, he says, the next action. Helter skelter, hang sorrow, care'll kill a cat, up-tails all, and a louse for the hangman! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A Room in Cob's House. BOBADIL discovered upon a bench. TIB enters to him.

Bob. Hostess, hostess!

Tib. What say you, sir?

Bob. A cup o' thy small-beer, sweet hostess.

Tib. Sir, there's a gentleman below would speak with you.

Bob. A gentleman! 'ods so, I'm not within.

Tib. My husband told him you were, sir.

Bob. What a plague—what meant he?

Mat. [Within.] Captain Bobadil!

Bob. Who's there!—Take away the bason, good hostess. Come up, sir.

Tib. He would desire you to come up, sir. You come into a cleanly house here.

Enter Master MATTHEW.

Mat. 'Save you, sir; 'save you, captain.

Bob. Gentle Master Matthew! is it you, sir? Please you, sit down.

Mat. Thank you, good captain; you may see I am somewhat audacious.

Bob. Not so, sir. I was requested to supper, last night, by a sort of gallants, where you were wished for, and drank to, I assure you.

Mat. Vouchsafe me by whom, good captain.

Bob. Marry, by young Well-bred, and others. Why, hostess! a stool here for this gentleman.

Mat. No haste, sir, 'tis very well.

Bob. Body of me! It was so late ere we parted last night, I can scarce open my eyes yet: I was but new risen as you came. How passes the day abroad, sir? can you tell?

Mat. Faith, some half hour to seven. Now trust me, you have an exceeding fine lodging here, very neat, and private!

Bob. Ay, sir: sit down. I pray you, Master Matthew, in any case, possess no gentleman of our acquaintance with notice of my lodging.

Mat. Who? I, sir? No.

Bob. Not that I need to care who know it, for the cabin is convenient; but in regard I would not be too popular and generally visited, as some are.

Mat. True, captain, I conceive you.

Bob. For, do you see, sir, by the heart of valour in me, except it be to some peculiar and choice spirits, to whom I am extraordinarily engaged, as yourself, or so, I could not extend thus far.

Mat. O lord, sir, I resolve so.

[Pulls out a paper, and reads.]

Bob. I confess, I love a cleanly and quiet privacy, above all the tumult and roar of fortune. What new piece ha' you there? Read it.

Mat. [Reads.] 'To thee, the purest object of my sense,

'The most refined essence Heaven covers,
'Send I these lines, wherein I do commence
'The happy state of turtle-billing lovers.'

Bob. 'Tis good; proceed, proceed. Where's this?

Mat. This, sir? a toy o' mine own, in my non-age: the infancy of my muses. But, when will you come and see my study? Good faith, I can shew you some very good things, I have done of late—That boot becomes your leg, passing well, captain, methinks.

Bob. So, so; it's the fashion gentlemen now use.

Mat. Troth, captain, and now you speak o' the fashion, Master Well-bred's elder brother and I are fallen out exceedingly: this other day, I happened to enter into some discourse of a hanger, which I assure you, both for fashion and workmanship, was most peremptory-beautiful, and gentleman-like; yet he condemned, and cried it down, for the most pied and ridiculous that ever he saw.

Bob. 'Squire Downright, the half-brother, was't not?

Mat. Ay, sir, George Downright.

Bob. Hang him, rook! He! why, he has no more judgment than a malt-horse. By St. George, I wonder you'd lose a thought upon such an animal! the most peremptory absurd clown of Christendom, this day, he is bolden. protest to you, as I am a gentleman and a soldier, I ne'er changed words with his like. In his discourse, he should eat nothing but ha. He was born for the manger, pannier or pack saddle! He has not so much as a good phrase in his belly, but all old iron and rusty proverbs! good commodity for some smith to make holden nails of.

Mat. Ay, and he thinks to carry it away with his manhood still, where he comes. He brags he will gi' me the bastinado, as I hear.

Bob. How! he the bastinado! how came he by that word, trow?

Mat. Nay, indeed, he said cudgel me; I termed it so, for my more grace.

Bob. That may be: for I was sure, it was none of his word. But when? when said he so?

Mat. Faith, yesterday, they say: a young gallant, a friend of mine, told me so.

Bob. By the foot of Pharaoh, an' 'twere my case now, I should send him a challenge, presently. The bastinado! A most proper, and sufficient dependence, warranted by the great Caranza. Come hither, you shall challenge him. I'll shew you a trick or two, you shall kill him with, at pleasure: the first stoccata, if you will, by this air.

Mat. Indeed, you have absolute knowledge in the mystery, I have heard, sir.

Bob. Of whom? Of whom ha' you heard it, I beseech you?

Mat. Troth, I have heard it spoken of by divers, that you have very rare and un-in one-breath-utterable skill, sir.

Bob. By Heaven, no, not I; no skill in the earth! some small rudiments in the science, as to know my time, distance, or so. I have profest it more for noblemen and gentlemen's use than mine own practice, I assure you. I'll give you a lesson. Look you, sir. Exalt not your point above this state, at any hand; so, sir, Come on! O, twine your body more about, that you may fall to a more sweet, comely, gentleman-like guard. So, indifferent. Hollow your body more, sir, thus. Now, stand fast o' your left leg; note your distance; keep your due proportion of time—Oh, you disorder your point most irregularly! Come, put on your cloak, and we'll go to some private place, where you are acquainted; some tavern or so—and have a bit—What money ha' you about you, Master Matthew?

Mat. Faith, I have not past a two shillings, or so.

Bob. 'Tis somewhat with the least: but come, we will have a bunch of raddishes, and salt, to taste our wine; and a pipe of tobacco, to close the orifice of the stomach: and then we will call upon young Wellbred. Perhaps we shall meet the Corydon, his brother, there, and put him to the question. Come along, Master Matthew.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A warehouse belonging to KITELY.

Enter KITELY, CASH, and DOWNRIGHT.

Kite. THOMAS, come hither.

There lies a note within, upon my desk;
Here, take my key.—It is no matter, neither.
Where is the boy?

Cash. Within, sir, in the warehouse.

Kite. Let him tell over, straight, that Spanish gold,
And weigh it, with the pieces of eight. Do you
See the delivery of those silver stuffs
To Mr Lucar. Tell him, if he will,
He shall have the grograms at the rate I told him,
And I will meet him, on the Exchange, anon.

Cash. Good, sir. [Exit.

Kite. Do you see that fellow, brother Downright?

Down. Ay, what of him?

Kite. He is a jewel, brother.—

I took him of a child, up, at my door,
And christened him; gave him my own name,
Thomas;

Since bred him, at the hospital; where proving
A toward imp, I called him home, and taught him
So much, as I have made him my cashier,
And find him, in his place, so full of faith,
That I durst trust my life into his hands.

Down. So would not I in any bastard's, brother,
As it is like, he is, although I knew Myself his father. But you said you'd somewhat
To tell me, gentle brother; what is't? what is't?

Kite. Faith, I am very loth to utter it,
As fearing it may hurt your patience:
But that, I know, your judgment is of strength,
Against the nearness of affection—

Down. What need this circumstance? Pray you be direct.

Kite. I will not say how much I do ascribe
Unto your friendship; nor, in what regard
I hold your love; but, let my past behaviour,
And usage of your sister, but confirm
How well I've been affected to your—

Down. You are too tedious; come to the matter, the matter.

Kite. Then, without further ceremony, thus.
My brother Well-bred, sir, I know not how,
Of late, is much declined in what he was,
And greatly altered in his disposition.
When he came first to lodge, here, in my house,
Ne'er trust me, if I were not proud of him:
Methought he bare himself in such a fashion,
So full of man, and sweetness in his carriage.
And, what was chief, it shewed not borrowed in
him,

But all he did became him as his own,
And seemed as perfect, proper, and possest,
As breath with life, or colour with the blood:

But now his course is so irregular,
So loose, affected, and deprived of grace,
And he himself, withal, so far fallen off
From that first place, as scarce no note remains,
To tell men's judgments where he lately stood.
He's grown a stranger to all due respect;
Forgetful of his friends; and, not content
To stale himself in all societies,
He makes my house, here, common as a mart,
A theatre, a public receptacle
For giddy humour, and diseased riot:
And here, as in a tavern or a stew,
He and his wild associates spend their hours
In repetition of lascivious jests:
Swear, leap, drink, dance, and revel night by night,

Controul my servants; and, indeed, what not!

Down. 'Sdains, I know not what I should say to him in the whole world! he values me at a cracked three-farthings, for aught I see. It will never out of the flesh, that's bred in the bone! I have told him enough, one would think, if that would serve. Well! he knows what to trust to, for George. Let him spend and spend, and domineer, till his heart ach; an' he think to be relieved by me, when he is got into one of your city-ponds, the counters, he has the wrong sow by the ear, i' faith, and claps his dish at a wrong man's door. I'll lay my hand o' my halfpenny, ere I part with it, to fetch him out, I'll assure
him.

Kite. Nay, good brother, let it not trouble you,
thus.

Down. 'Sdeath, he made me—I could eat my very spur-leathers, for anger! But, why are you so tame? Why do not you speak to him, and tell him how he disquiets your house?

Kite. O, there are divers reasons to dissuade, brother;

But, would yourself vouchsafe to travail in it,
Though but with plain and easy circumstance,
It would both come much better to his sense,
And savour less of stomach, or of passion.
You are his elder brother, and that title
Both gives and warrants you authority;
Whereas, if I should intimate the least,
It would but add contempt to his neglect,
Heap worse on ill, make up a pile of hatred,
That, in the rearing, would come tottering down,
And in the ruin bury all our love.
Nay, more than this, brother; if I should speak,
He would be ready, from his heat of humour,
And over-flowing of the vapour in him,
To blow the ears of his familiars
With the false breath of telling what disgraces
And low disparagements I had put upon him.
Whilst they, sir, to relieve him in the fable,
Make their loose comments upon every word,

Gesture, or look, I use; mock me all o'er;
And, out of their impetuous rioting phantasies,
Beget some slander that shall dwell with me.
And what would that be, think you? Marry, this:
They would give out, because my wife is fair,
Myself but newly married, and my sister,
Here sojourning a virgin in my house,
That I were jealous! Nay, as sure as death,
That they would say. And how that I had quarrelled

My brother purposely, thereby to find
An apt pretext to banish them my house.

Down. Mass, perhaps so: they're like enough to do it.

Kite. Brother, they would, believe it: so should I,
Like one of these penurious quack-salvers,
But set the bills up to mine own disgrace,
And try experiments upon myself:
Lend scorn and envy opportunity
To stab my reputation and good name.

Enter MATTHEW and BOBADIL.

Mat. I will speak to him——

Bob. Speak to him! Away! by the foot of Pharoah, you shall not; you shall not do him that grace.

Kite. What's the matter, sirs?

Bob. The time of day to you, gentleman of the house. Is Mr Well-bred stirring?

Down. How, then? what should he do?

Bob. Gentleman of the house, it is you: is he within, sir?

Kite. He came not to his lodgings to-night, sir,
I assure you.

Down. Why, do you hear? you!

Bob. The gentleman-citizen hath satisfied me.
I'll talk to no scavenger.

[Ereunt BOBADIL and MATTHEW.

Down. How, scavenger! stay, sir, stay!

Kite. Nay, brother Downright!

Down. 'Heart! stand you away, an' you love
me.

Kite. You shall not follow him now, I pray you, brother; good faith you shall not: I will overrule you.

Down. Ha! scavenger! Well, go to, I say little: but, by this good day, (God forgive me I should swear) if I put up so, say, I am the rank-est coward ever lived. 'Sdains, and I swallow this, I'll ne'er draw my sword in the sight of Fleet-street again, while I live; I'll sit in a barn with Madge Howlet, and catch mice first. Scavenger!

Kite. Oh, do not fret yourself thus! never think on it.

Down. These are my brother's consorts, these!
these are his comrades, his walking mates! he is a gallant, a cavaliero, too, right hangman cut!
Let me not live, an' I could not find in my heart to swinge the whole gang of them, one after another, and begin with him first. I am grieved it should be said he is my brother, and take these courses. Well, as he brews, so he shall drin for George again. Yet, he shall hear on it, an that tightly, too, an' I live, in faith.

Kite. But, brother, let your reprehension, the Run in any easy current, not o'er high
Carried with rashness, or devouring choler;
But rather use the soft persuading way,
More winning than enforcing the consent.

Down. Ay, ay, let me alone for that, I warrant
you. [Bell rings]

Kite. How now! Oh, the bell rings to breakfast.

Brother, I pray you, go in, and bear my wife
Company till I come; I'll but give order
For some dispatch of business to my servant—

Down. I will—Scavenger! Scavenger!

[Erit DOWNRIGHT

Kite. Well, though my troubled spirit's somewhat eased,

'Tis not reposed in that security
As I could wish: but, I must be content.
Howe'er I set a face on't to the world,
Would I had lost this finger, at a venture,
So Well-bred had ne'er lodged within my house.
Why it cannot be, where there is such resort
Of wanton gallants, and young revellers,
That any woman should be honest long.
Is't like, that factious beauty will preserve
The public weal of chastity unshaken,
When such strong motives muster, and make head

Against her single peace? No, no. Beware.

When mutual appetite doth meet to treat,
And spirits of one kind and quality
Come once to parley, in the pride of blood,
It is not slow conspiracy that follows.

Well, to be plain, if I but thought the time
Had answered their affections, all the world
Should not persuade me, but I were a cuckold!
Marry, I hope they have not got that start;
For opportunity hath balked them yet,
And shall do still, while I have eyes and ears
To attend the impositions of my heart.
My presence shall be as an iron-bar,
'Twixt the conspiring motions of desire:
Yea, every look or glance mine eye ejects,
Shall check occasion, as one doth his slave,
When he forgets the limits of prescription.

Enter Dame KITELY.

Dame. Sister Bridget, pray you fetch down the rose-water above in the closet. Sweetheart, will you come in to breakfast?

Kite. An' she have overheard me now! [Aside.

Dame. I pray thee, good muss, we stay for you.

Kite. By Heaven, I would not for a thousand angels. [Aside.

Dame. What ails you, sweetheart? are you not well? Speak, good muss.

Kite. Troth, my head aches extremely, on a sudden.

Dame. Ob, the lord!

Kite. How now! what!

Dame. Alas, how it burns! Muss, keep you warm; good truth it is this new disease! there's a number are troubled withal! For love's sake, sweetheart, come in, out of the air.

Kite. How simple, and how subtle are her answers!

A new disease, and many troubled with it!
Why true! she heard me, all the world to nothing.

Dame. I pray thee, good sweetheart, come in; the air will do you harm, in truth.

Kite. I'll come to you presently; 'twill away, I hope.

Dame. Pray Heaven it do. [Exit Dame.

Kite. A new disease! I know not new or old, But it may well be called poor mortals' plague: For, like a pestilence, it doth infect The houses of the brain. First, it begins Solely to work upon the phantasy, Filling her seat with such pestiferous air As soon corrupts the judgment, and from thence Sends like contagion to the memory; Still to each other giving the infection, Which, as a subtle vapour, spreads itself Confusedly through every sensitive part, Till not a thought, or motion in the mind, Be free from the black poison of suspect. Ah, but what misery it is to know this! Or, knowing it, to want the mind's direction In such extremes! Well, I will once more strive, In spite of this black cloud, myself to be, And shake the fever off, that thus shakes me.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—Moorfields.

Enter BRAINWORM, disguised like a Soldier.

Brain. 'Slid, I cannot choose but laugh to see myself translated thus. Now must I create an intolerable sort of lies, or my present profession loses the grace; and yet the lie to a man of my coat, is as ominous a fruit as the Fico. O, sir, it holds for good polity ever, to have that outwardly in vilest estimation, that inwardly is most dear to us. So much for my borrowed shape.—Well, the truth is, my old master intends to follow my young, dry-foot, over Moorfields to London this morning: now I, knowing of this hunting match, or rather conspiracy, and to insinuate with my young master (for so must we, that are blue-waiters, and men of hope and service do), have got me afore in this disguise, determining here to lie in ambuscade, and intercept him in the mid-way. If I can but get his cloak, his purse, his hat, nay, any thing to cut him off, that is, to stay his journey—Veni, vidi, vici, I may say with captain Cæsar; I am made for ever, i'faith. Well, now must I practise to get the true garb of one of those lance-knights, my arm here, and my—Young master! and his cousin, Master Stephen, as I am a true counterfeit man of war, and no soldier!

VOL. II.

[Retires.

Enter ED. KNO'WELL and Master STEPHEN.

E. Kno. So, sir, and how then, coz?

Step. S'foot, I have lost my purse, I think.

E. Kno. How! lost your purse! Where?—When had you it?

Step. I cannot tell: stay.

Brain. 'Slid, I am afraid they will know me! Would I could get by them!

E. Kno. What! ha' you it?

Step. No, I think I was bewitched, I—

E. Kno. Nay, do not weep the loss; hang it, let it go.

Step. Oh, 'tis here—No, an' it had been lost, I had not cared, but for a jet ring Miss Mary sent me.

E. Kno. A jet ring! oh, the poesy, the poesy!

Step. Fine, i'faith! 'Though fancy sleep, my love is deep;' meaning, that though I did not fancy her, yet she loved me dearly.

E. Kno. Most excellent!

Step. And, then, I sent her another, and my poesy was: 'The deeper the sweeter, I'll be judged by St Peter.'

E. Kno. How by St Peter? I do not conceive that.

Step. Marry, St Peter, to take up the metre.

E. Kno. Well, there the saint was your good patron; he helped you at your need: thank him, thank him.

Brain. I cannot take leave of them so; I will venture, come what will. Gentlemen, please you change a few crowns, for a very excellent good blade, here? I am a poor gentleman, a soldier, that, in the better state of my fortunes, scorned so mean a refuge, but now it is the humour of necessity to have it so. You seem to be, gentlemen, well affected to martial men, else I should rather die with silence than live with shame: however, vouchsafe to remember, it is my want speaks, not myself. This condition agrees not with my spirit.

E. Kno. Where hast thou served?

Brain. May it please you, sir, in all the late wars of Bohemia, Hungaria, Dalmatia, Poland; where not, sir? I have been a poor servitor by sea and land, any time these fourteen years, and followed the fortunes of the best commanders in Christendom. I was twice shot at the taking of Aleppo, once at the relief of Vienna; I have been at Marseilles, Naples, and the Adriatic Gulf; a gentleman-slave in the galleys thrice, where I was most dangerously shot in the head, through both the thighs, and yet being thus maimed, I am void of maintenance; nothing left me but my scars, the noted marks of my resolution.

Step. How will you sell this rapier, friend?

Brain. Generous sir, I refer it to your own judgment; you are a gentleman, give me what you please.

Step. True, I am a gentleman, I know that, friend: but what though? I pray you say, what would you ask?

Brain. I assure you the blade may become the side, or thigh, of the best prince in Europe.

E. Kno. Aye, with a velvet scabbard.

Step. Nay, an't be mine, it shall have a velvet scabbard, coz, that's flat: I would not wear it as 'tis, an' you would give me an angel.

Brain. At your worship's pleasure, sir; nay, 'tis a most pure Toledo.

Step. I had rather it were a Spaniard; but tell me, what shall I give you for it? An' it had a silver hilt—

E. Kno. Come, come, you shall not buy it; hold, there's a shilling, fellow; take the rapier.

Step. Why, but I will buy it now, because you say so; and there's another shilling, fellow, I scorn to be outbidden. What, shall I walk with a cudgel, like a higgibottom, and may have a rapier for money?

E. Kno. You may buy one in the city.

Step. Tut, I'll buy this i' the field, so I will; I have a mind to't, because 'tis a field rapier. Tell me your lowest price.

E. Kno. You shall not buy it, I say.

Step. By this money but I will, though I give more than 'tis worth.

E. Kno. Come away, you are a fool.

Step. Friend, I am a fool, that's granted: but I'll have it for that word's sake. Follow me for your money.

Brain. At your service, sir. [Exeunt.]

Enter KNO'WELL.

Kno. I cannot lose the thought yet of this letter,

Sent to my son; nor leave to admire the change
Of manners, and the breeding of our youth
Within the kingdom, since myself was one.
When I was young, he lived not in the stews,
Durst have conceived a scorn, and uttered it,
On a grey head: age was authority
Against a buffoon; and a man had then
A certain reverence paid unto his years,
That had none due unto his life.

But now we are fallen; youth from their fear,
And age from that, which bred it, good example.
Nay, would ourselves were not the first, even parents,

That did destroy the hopes in our own children;
The first words
We form their tongues with, are licentious jests.
Can it call whore? Cry bastard? O, then kiss it,
A witty child! Can't swear? The father's darling!

Give it two plums. Nay, rather than it shall learn

No bawdy song, the mother herself will teach it!
But this is in the infancy;

When it puts on the breeches,
It will put off all this. Ay, it is like;
When it is gone into the bone already!
No, no: this dye goes deeper than the coat,
Or shirt, or skin; it stains unto the liver
And heart, in some: and rather than it should not,

Note what we fathers do; look how we live;
What mistresss we keep; at what expence;
And teach them all bad ways to buy affliction!
Well, I thank Heaven, I never yet was he,
That travelled with my son before sixteen,
To shew him the Venetian courtezans,
Nor read the grammar of cheating, I had made,
To my sharp boy at twelve; repeating still
The rule, get money, still get money, boy,
No matter by what means.

These are the trades of fathers now. However,
My son, I hope, hath met within my threshold
None of these household precedents; which are strong

And swift, to rape youth to their precipice.
But let the house at home be never so clean
Swept, or kept sweet from filth,
If he will live abroad with his companions,
In riot and misrule, 'tis worth a fear.

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

Brain. My master! nay, faith, have at you; I am fleshed now, I have sped so well; though I must attack you in a different way. Worshipful sir, I beseech you, respect the state of a poor soldier! I am ashamed of this base course of life, (God's my comfort) but extremity provokes me to't: what remedy?

Kno. I have not for you.

Brain. By the faith I bear unto truth, gentleman, it is no ordinary custom in me, but only to preserve manhood. I protest to you, a man I have been, a man I may be, by your sweet bounty.

Kno. Prithee, good friend, be satisfied.

Brain. Good sir, by that hand you may do the part of a kind gentleman, in lending a poor soldier the price of two cans of beer, a matter of small value; the King of Heaven shall pay you, and I shall rest thankful: sweet worship—

Kno. Nay, an' you be so importunate—

Brain. Oh, tender sir, need will have his course! I was not made to this vile use! Well, the edge of the enemy could not have abated me so much. [He weeps.] It's hard, when a man hath served in his prince's cause, to be thus—honourable worship, let me derive a small piece of silver from you; it shall not be given in the course of time. By this good ground, I was fain to pawn my rapier last night for a poor supper; I had sucked the hilts long before, I am a pagan else: sweet honour!

Kno. Believe me, I am taken with some wonder,
To think a fellow of thy outward presonce,

Should, in the frame and fashion of his mind,
Be so degenerate and sordid base!
Art thou a man, and sham'st thou not to beg?
To practise such a servile kind of life?
Why, were thy education never so mean,
Having thy limbs, a thousand fairer courses
Offer themselves to thy election.
Either the wars might still supply thy wants,
Or service of some virtuous gentleman,
Or honest labour: nay, what can I name,
But would become thee better than to beg!
But men of thy condition feed on sloth,
As doth the beetle on the dung she breeds in,
Not caring how the metal of your minds
Is eaten with the rust of idleness.
Now, afore me, whate'er he be, that should Relieve a person of thy quality,
While thou insist in this loose desperate course,
I would esteem the sin not thine, but his.

Brain. Faith, sir, I would gladly find some other course, if so—

Kno. Aye, you would gladly find it, but you will not seek it.

Brain. Alas! sir, where should a man seek? in the wars there's no ascent by desert in these days, but—and for service, would it were as soon purchased as wished for! (the air's my comfort) I know what I would say—

Kno. What's thy name?

Brain. Please you, Fitz-Sword, sir.

Kno. Fitz-Sword,
Say that a man should entertain thee now,
Would'st thou be honest, humble, just, and true?

Brain. Sir, by the place and honour of a soldier—

Kno. Nay, nay, I like not those affected oaths! Speak plainly, man: what think'st thou of my words?

Brain. Nothing, sir, but wish my fortunes were as happy, as my service should be honest.

Kno. Well, follow me; I will prove thee, if thy deeds will carry a proportion to thy words.

[Exit.]

Brain. Yes, sir, straight: I will but garter my hose. Oh! that my belly were hooped now, for I am ready to burst with laughing! Never was a bottle or bag-pipe fuller. S'lid! was there ever seen a fox in years to betray himself thus? Now I shall be possessed of all his counsels! and by that conduct my young master. Well, he is resolved to prove my honesty; faith, and I am resolved to prove his patience. Oh, I shall abuse him intolerably! This small piece of service will bring him clean out of love with the soldier for ever. He will never come within the sight of a red coat, or a musket-rest again. It's no matter; let the world think me a bad counterfeit, if I cannot give him the slip at an instant. Why, this is better than to have staid his journey! Well, I will follow him. Oh, how I long to be employed!

With change of voice, these scars, and many an oath,

I'll follow son and sire, and serve them both.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Stocks-Market.

Enter MATTHEW, WELL-BRED, and BOBADIL.

Mat. Yes, faith, sir! we were at your lodging to seek you too.

Well. Oh, I came not there to-night.

Bob. Your brother delivered us as much,

Well. Who? My brother, Down-right?

Bob. He. Mr Well-bred, I know not in what kind you hold me; but let me say to you this: as sure as honour, I esteem it so much out of the sunshine of reputation, to throw the least beam of regard upon such a—

Well. Sir, I must bear no ill words of my brother.

Bob. I protest to you, as I have a thing to be saved about me, I never saw any gentleman-like part—

Well. Good captain, [faces about.] to some other discourse.

Bob. With your leave, sir, an' there were no more men living upon the face of the earth, I should not fancy him, by St George.

Mat. Troth, nor I; he is of a rustical cut, I know not how: he doth not carry himself like a gentleman of fashion—

Well. Oh, Master Matthew, that is a grace peculiar but to a few, quos æquus amavit Jupiter.

Mat. I understand you, sir.

Enter Young KNO'WELL and STEPHEN.

Well. No question you do, or you do not, sir. Ned! By my soul, welcome! How dost thou, sweet spirit, my genius? 'Slid, I shall love Apollo and the mad Thespian girls the better while I live for this, my dear fury. Now I see there's some love in thee! Sirrah, these be the two I writ to thee of. Nay, what a drowsy humour is this now! Why dost thou not speak?

E. Kno. Oh, you are a fine gallant; you sent me a rare letter.

Well. Why, was it not rare?

E. Kno. Yes, I'll be sworn; I was never guilty of reading the like. Match it in all Pliny's epistles, and I'll have my judgment burned in the ear for a rogue: make much of thy vein, for it is inimitable. But I marvel what camel it was that had the carriage of it, for, doubtless, he was no ordinary beast that brought it.

Well. Why?

E. Kno. Why, sayest thou? Why, dost thou think that any reasonable creature, especially in the morning, the sober time of the day too, could have mistaken my father for me?

Well. 'Slid, you jest, I hope.

E. Kno. Indeed, the best use we can turn it to, is to make a jest on't now; but I'll assure you, my father had the full view of your flourishing style, before I saw it.

Well. What a dull slave was this! But, sirrah, what said he to it, i'faith?

E. Kno. Nay, I know not what he said: but I have a shrewd guess what he thought.

Well. What, what?

E. Kno. Marry, that thou art some strange, dissolute young fellow, and I not a grain or two better, for keeping thee company.

Well. Tut! that thought is like the moon in her last quarter, 'twill change shortly. But, sirrah, I pray thee be acquainted with my two hang-bys here; thou wilt take exceeding pleasure in them, if thou hearest them once go: my wind-instruments. I'll wind them up——But what strange piece of silence is this? The sign of the dumb man?

E. Kno. Oh, sir, a kinsman of mine, one that may make your music the fuller, an' he please; he has his humour, sir.

Well. Oh, what is't, what is't?

E. Kno. Nay, I'll neither do your judgment, nor his folly, that wrong, as to prepare your apprehension. I'll leave him to the mercy of your search, if you can take him so.

Well. Well. Captain Bobadil, Master Matthew, I pray you know this gentleman here; he is a friend of mine, and one, that will deserve your affection. I know not your name, sir, but shall be glad of any occasion to render me more familiar to you.

Step. My name is Master Stephen, sir; I am this gentleman's own cousin, sir: his father is mine uncle, sir; I am somewhat melancholy, but you shall command me, sir, in whatsoever is incident to a gentleman.

Bob. Sir, I must tell you this, I am no general man; but for Mr Well-bred's sake (you may embrace it at what height of favour you please) I do communicate with you; and conceive you to be a gentleman of some parts. I love few words.

E. Kno. And I fewer, sir. I have scarce enow to thank you.

Mat. But are you indeed, sir, so given to it?

[To Master STEPHEN.

Step. Ay, truly, sir, I am mightily given to melancholy.

Mat. Oh, it is your only fine humour, sir; your true melancholy breeds your perfect fine wit, sir: I am melancholy myself, divers times, sir; and then do I no more but take a pen and paper presently, and overflow you half a score or a dozen of sonnets at a sitting.

Step. Cousin, it is well; I am melancholy enough?

E. Kno. O, ay, excellent!

Well. Captain Bobadil, why muse you so?

E. Kno. He is melancholy too.

Bob. Faith, sir, I was thinking of a most honourable piece of service was performed, to-morrow, being St Mark's day, shall be some ten years now.

E. Kno. In what place, captain?

Bob. Why, at the beleaguering of Strigonium, where, in less than two hours, seven hundred resolute gentlemen, as any were in Europe, lost their lives upon the breach. I'll tell you, gentlemen; it was the first, but the best leagure, that ever I beheld with these eyes, except the taking of——what do you call it, last year, by the Genoese; but that (of all others) was the most fatal and dangerous exploit that ever I was ranged in, since I first bore arms before the face of the enemy, as I am a gentleman and a soldier.

Step. 'So, I had as lief as an angel, I could swear as well as that gentleman!

E. Kno. Then you were a servitor at both, it seems; at Strigonium, and what do you call it?

Bob. Oh, lord, sir! by St George, I was the first man that entered the breach; and had I not effected it with resolution, I had been slain, if I had had a million of lives.

E. Kno. It was a pity you had not ten; a cat's, and your own, i'faith. But was it possible?

Mat. Pray you, mark this discourse, sir.

Step. So I do.

Bob. I assure you, upon my reputation, it is true, and yourself shall confess.

E. Kno. You must bring me to the rack first.

Bob. Observe me judicially, sweet sir: they had planted me three demi-culverins, just in the mouth of the breach: now, sir, as we were to give on, their master-gunner (a man of no mean skill and mark, you must think) confronts me with his linstock, ready to give fire: I, spying his intendment, discharged my petrionel in his bosom, and with these single arms, my poor rapier, ran violently upon the Moors that guarded the ordnance, and put them all, pell-mell, to the sword.

Well. To the sword! to the rapier, captain!

E. Kno. Oh, it was a good figure observed, sir! but did you all this, captain, without hurting your blade?

Bob. Without any impeach o' the earth: you shall perceive, sir. It is the most fortunate weapon that ever rid on poor gentleman's thigh. Shall I tell you, sir? You talk of Morglay, Excalibar, Durindana, or so? Tut, I lend no credit to what is fabled of them; I know the virtue of mine own, and therefore I dare the bolder maintain it.

Step. I marvel whether it be a Toledo, or no.

Bob. A most perfect Toledo, I assure you, sir.

Step. I have a countryman of his here.

Mat. Pray you, let's see, sir. Yes, faith, it is!

Bob. This a Toledo! pish.

Step. Why do you pish, captain?

Bob. A Fleming, by Heaven! I'll buy them for a guilder a piece, an' I would have a thousand of them.

E. Kno. How say you, cousin? I told you thus much.

Well. Where bought you it, Master Stephen?

Step. Of a scurvy rogue soldier (a hundred of 'em go with him); he swore it was a Toledo.

Bob. A poor provant rapier, no better.

Mat. Mass, I think it be, indeed! now I look on't better.

E. Kno. Nay, the longer you look on't the worse. Put it up, put it up!

Step. Well, I will put it up, but by——(I have forgot the captain's oath, I thought to have sworn by it) an' e'er I meet him——

Well. O, 'tis past help, now, sir; you must have patience.

Step. Whoreson rascal! I could eat the very bits for anger.

E. Kno. A sign of good digestion; you have an ostrich stomach, consin.

Step. A stomach! I would I had him here! you should see an' I had a stomach.

Well. It is better as it is. Come, gentlemen, shall we go?

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

E. Kno. A miracle, cousin! look here! look here!

Step. O, god'slid, by your leave, do you know me, sir?

Brain. Ay, sir, I know you by sight.

Step. You sold me a rapier, did you not?

Brain. Yes, marry, did I, sir.

Step. You said it was a Toledo, ha?

Brain. True, I did so.

Step. But it is none!

Brain. No, sir, I confess it is none.

Step. Do you confess it? Gentlemen, bear witness, he has confessed it. By God's will, an' you had not confessed it——

E. Kno. Oh, cousin, forbear, forbear.

Step. Nay, I have done, cousin.

Well. Why, you have done like a gentleman; he has confessed it, what would you more?

Step. Yet, by his leave, he is a rascal, under his favour, do you see.

E. Kno. Ay, by his leave, he is, and under favour. Pretty piece of civility! Sirrah, how dost like him?

Well. Oh, it's a most precious fool, make much of him. I can compare him to nothing more happily, than a drum; for every one may play upon him.

E. Kno. No, no, a child's whistle were far the fitter.

Brain. Sir, shall I entreat a word with you?

E. Kno. With me, sir! You have not another Toledo to sell, have you?

Brain. You are conceited, sir; your name is Mr Kno'well, as I take it?

E. Kno. You are in the right. You mean not to proceed in the catechism, do you?

Brain. No, sir, I am none of that coat.

E. Kno. Of as bare coat, though! Well say, sir?

Brain. Faith, sir, I am but a servant to the drum extraordinary, and indeed, this smoky varnish being washed off, and three or four patches removed, I appear your worship's in reversion, after the decease of your good father—Brain-worm.

E. Kno. Brain-worm! 'Slight, what breath of a conjurer hath blown thee hither in this shape?

Brain. The breath o' your letter, sir, this morning: the same, that blew you to the wind-mill, and your father after you.

E. Kno. My father!

Brain. Nay, never start; 'tis true; he has followed you over the fields by the foot, as you would do a hare i' the snow.

E. Kno. Sirrah, Well-bred, what shall we do, sirrah? My father is come over after me.

Well. Thy father! Where is he?

Brain. At justice Clement's house, here, in Coleman-street, where he but stays my return; and then——

Well. Who's this? Brain-worm?

Brain. The same, sir.

Well. Why, how, i' the name of wit, comest thou transmuted thus?

Brain. Faith, a device! a device! Nay, for the love of reason, gentlemen, and avoiding the danger, stand not here; withdraw, and I'll tell you all.

E. Kno. Come, cousin.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Warehouse.

Enter KITELY and CASH.

Kite. What says he, Thomas? Did you speak with him?

Cash. He will expect you, sir, within this half hour.

Keit. Has he the money ready? Can you tell?

Cash. Yes, sir, the money was brought in last night.

Kite. O, that's well: fetch me my cloak, my cloak.

Stay, let me see; an hour to go and come;
Ay, that will be the least; and then 'twill be
An hour before I can dispatch him,
Or very near: well, I will say two hours.
Two hours! ha! things, never dreamt of yet,
May be contrived, ay, and effected too,
In two hours absence. Well, I will not go.
Two hours! No, fleeing opportunity!
I will not give your subtlety that scope.
Who will not judge him worthy to be robbed,
That sets his doors wide open to a thief,

And shews the felon where his treasure lies ?
 Again, what earthly spirit but will attempt
 To taste the fruit of beauty's golden tree,
 When leaden sleep seals up the dragon's eyes ?
 I will not go. Business, go by for once.
 No, beauty, no ; you are too, too precious
 To be left so, without a guard, or open !
 You must be then kept up close, and well watched !

For, give you opportunity, no quick-sand
 Devours or swallows swifter ! He, that lends
 His wife, if she be fair, or time, or place,
 Compels her to be false. I will not go.
 The dangers are too many. I am resolved for that.

Carry in my cloak again. Yet, stay. Yet do,
 too.

I will defer going on all occasions.

Cash. Sir, Snare, your scrivener, will be there with the bonds.

Kite. That's true ! fool on me ! I had clean forgot it ! I must go. What's o'clock ?

Cash. Exchange time, sir.

Kite. 'Heart ! than will Well-bred presently be here too,

With one or other of his loose consorts.
 I am a knave, if I know what to say,
 What course to take, or which way to resolve.
 My brain, methinks, is like an hour-glass,
 Wherein my imagination runs, like sands,
 Filling up time ; but then are turned and turned ;

So that I know not what to stay upon,
 And less to put in act. It shall be so.
 Nay, I dare build upon his secrecy ;
 He knows not to deceive me. Thomas !

Cash. Sir.

Kite. Yet now, I have bethought too, I will not—

Thomas, is Cob within ?

Cash. I think he be, sir.

Kite. But he'll prate too—there's no speech of
 him.

No, there were no man o' the earth to Thomas,
 If I durst trust him ; there is all the doubt.
 But should he have a chink in him, I were gone,
 Lost in my fame for ever : talk for the Exchange.
 The manner he hath stood with, 'till this present,

Doth promise no such change ; what should I fear then ?

Well, come what will, I'll tempt my fortune once.
 Thomas—you may deceive me, but I hope—
 Your love to me is more—

Cash. Sir, if a servant's

Duty, with faith, may be called love, you are
 More than in hope, you are possessed of it.

Kite. I thank you heartily, Thomas ; give me your hand.

With all my heart, good Thomas. I have,
 Thomas,

A secret to impart to you—but

When once you have it, I must seal your lips u
 So far I tell you, Thomas.

Cash. Sir, for that—

Kite. Nay, hear me out. Think, I esteem you, Thomas,

When I will let you in thus to my private.

It is a thing sits nearer to my crest,
 Than thou art aware of, Thomas. If thou should'st

Reveal it, but—

Cash. How ! I reveal it !

Kite. Nay,

I do not think thou would'st ; but if thou
 should'st,

'Twere a great weakness.

Cash. A great treachery.

Give it no other name.

Kite. Thou wilt not do it, then ?

Cash. Sir, if I do, mankind disclaim me ever !

Kite. He will not swear ; he has some reservation,

Some concealed purpose, and close meaning sure,

Else, being urged so much, how should he choose
 But lend an oath to all this protestation ?

He's no fanatic, I have heard him swear.

What should I think of it ? Urge him again,

And by some other way ? I will do so.

Well, Thomas, thou hast not sworn to disclose ;
 Yes, you did swear ?

Cash. Not yet, sir, but I will,

Please you—

Kite. No, Thomas, I dare take thy word ;

But if thou wilt swear, do—as thou think'st good ;
 I am resolved without it : at thy pleasure.

Cash. By my soul's safety then, sir, I protest
 My tongue shall ne'er take knowledge of a word,
 Delivered me in nature of your trust.

Kite. It is too much, these ceremonies need not ;
 I know thy faith to be as firm as rock.

Thomas, come hither, near ; we cannot be Too private in this business. So it is,— (Now he has sworn, I dare the safer venture)

I have of late, by divers observations—

But whether his oath can bind him, there it is !

I will bethink me ere I do proceed.

Thomas, it will be now too long to stay ;

I'll spy some fitter time soon, or to-morrow.

Cash. Sir, at your pleasure.

Kite. I will think. Give me my cloak. And,
 Thomas,

I pray you search the books, 'gainst my return,
 For the receipts 'twixt me and Traps.

Cash. I will, sir.

Kite. And, hear you, if your mistress's brother,
 Well-bred,

Chance to bring hither any gentlemen,

Ere I come back, let one straight bring me word.

Cash. Very well, sir.

Kite. To the Exchange ; do you hear ?

Or here in Coleman-Street, to Justice Clement's.
 Forget it not, nor be out of the way.

Cash. I will not, sir.

Kite. I pray you have a care on't.
Or whether he come or no, if any other
Stranger, or else, fail not to send me word.

Cash. I shall not, sir.

Kite. Be it your special business
Now to remember it.

Cash. Sir, I warrant you.

Kite. But, Thomas, this is not the secret,
Thomas,
I told you of.

Cash. No, sir, I do suppose it.

Kite. Believe me, it is not.

Cash. Sir, I do believe you.

Kite. By Heaven! it is not, that's enough.

But, Thomas,
I would not you should utter it, do you see,
To any creature living; yet I care not.
Well, I must hence. Thomas, conceive thus much;

It was a trial of you, when I meant
So deep a secret to you: I mean not this,
But that I have to tell you. This is nothing, this.
But, Thomas, keep this from my wife, I charge you.
Locked up in silence, midnight, buried here—
No greater hell than to be slave to fear. [Erit.

Cash. Locked up in silence, midnight, buried here!

Whence should this flood of passion, trow, take head? ha!

Best dream no longer of this running humour,
For fear I sink! the violence of the stream
Already hath transported me so far,
That I can feel no ground at all! But soft,
Here is company: now must I— [Erit.

Enter WELL-BRED, EDW. KNO'WELL, BRAIN-WORM, BOBADIL, STEPHEN.

Well. Beshrew me, but it was an absolute good jest, and exceedingly well carried.

E. Kno. Ay, and our ignorance maintained it as well, did it not?

Well. Yes, faith! but was it possible thou should'st not know him? I forgive Master Stephen, for he is stupidity itself.

E. Kno. Fore Heaven, not I. He had so written himself into the habit of one of your poor infantry, your decayed, ruinous, worm-eaten gentlemen of the round.

Well. Why, Brain-worm, who would have thought thou had'st been such an artificer?

E. Kno. An artificer! an architect! Except a man had studied begging all his life-time, and been a weaver of language from his infancy, for the clothing of it—I never saw his rival.

Well. Where got'st thou this coat, I marvel!

Brain. Of a Houndsditch man, sir, one of the devil's near kinsmen, a broker.

Enter CASH.

Cash. Francis! Martin! ne'er a one to be found now? What a spite's this?

Well. How now, Thomas, is my brother Kitley within?

Cash. No, sir; my master went forth e'en now; but master Downright is within. Cob!
what, Cob! Is he gone too?

Well. Whither went your master, Thomas, can'st thou tell?

Cash. I know not; to Justice Clement's, I think, sir. Cob! [Erit Cash.

E. Kno. Justice Clement! What's he?

Well. Why, dost thou not know him? He is a city magistrate, a justice here; an excellent good lawyer, and a great scholar; but the only mad and merry old fellow in Europe! I shewed you him the other day.

E. Know. Oh, is that he? I remember him
now. Good faith! and he has a very strange presence, methinks; it shews as if he stood out of the rank from other men. I have heard many of his jests in the university. They say, he will commit a man for taking the wall of his horse.

Well. Ay, or wearing his cloak on one shoulder, or serving of God. Any thing, indeed, if it come in the way of his humour.

Enter CASH.

Cash. Gasper, Martin, Cob! 'Heart! where should they be, trow?

Bob. Master Kitley's man, prithee vouchsafe us the lighting of this match.

Cash. Fire on your match, no time but now to vouchsafe! [Aside.] Francis! Cob!

Bob. Body of me! Here's the remainder of seven pound since yesterday was seven-night.
It is your right Trinidado! Did you never take any, Master Stephen?

Step. No, truly, sir! but I'll learn to take it now, since you commend it so.

Bob. Sir, believe me, upon my relation; for what I tell you, the world shall not reprove. I have been in the Indies, where this herb grows, where neither myself, nor a dozen gentlemen more, of my knowledge, have received the taste of any other nutriment in the world, for the space of one and twenty weeks, but the fume of this simple only. Therefore, it cannot be, but 'tis most divine, especially your Trinidado. Your Nicotian is good too. I do hold it, and will affirm it before any prince in Europe, to be the most sovereign and precious weed, that ever the earth tendered to the use of man.

E. Know. This speech would have done decently in a tobacco-trader's mouth.

Enter CASH and COB.

Cash. At Justice Clement's he is, in the middle of Coleman-Street.

Cob. O, ho!

Bob. Where's the match I gave thee, Master
Kitley's man?

Cash. Here it is, sir.

Cob. By God's me! I marvel what pleasure or felicity they have in taking this roguish tobacco! it is good for nothing but to choke a man, and to fill him full of smoke and embers.

[BOBADIL beats him with a cudgel, MATTHEW runs away.]

All. Oh, good captain! hold! hold!

Bob. You base scullion, you.

Cash. Come, thou must need be talking too; thou'rt well enough served.

Cob. Well, it shall be a dear beating; an' I live, I will have justice for this.

Bob. Do you prate? Do you murmur?

[BOBADIL beats him off.]

E. Kno. Nay, good captain, will you regard the humour of a fool?

Bob. A whoreson filthy slave, a dung-worm, an excrement! Body o' Cæsar, but that I scorn to let forth so mean a spirit, I'd have stabbed him to the earth.

Well. Marry, the law forbid, sir.

Bob. By Pharaoh's foot, I would have done it.

[Exit.]

Step. Oh, he swears admirably! By Pharaoh's foot, body of Cæsar! I shall never do it, sure; upon mine honour, and by St George! no, I have not the right grace.

Well. But soft, where is Mr Matthew? gone!

Brain. No, sir; they went in here.

Well. O, let us follow them: Master Matthew is gone to salute his mistress in verse. We shall have the happiness to hear some of his poetry now. He never comes unfurnished. Brain-worm!

Step. Brain-worm? Where is this Brainworm?

E. Kno. Ay, cousin, no words of it, upon your gentility.

Step. Not I, body of me! by this air, St George, and the foot of Pharaoh!

Well. Rare! your cousin's discourse is simply drawn out with oaths.

E. Kno. 'Tis larded with them. A kind of French dressing, if you love it. Come, let us in. Come, cousin.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A hall in Justice CLEMENT'S house.

Enter KITELY and COB.

Kite. Ha! How many are there, say'st thou?

Cob. Marry, sir, your brother, Master Wellbred—

Kite. Tut, beside him: what strangers are there, man?

Cob. Strangers! let me see; one, two—mass, I know not well, there are so many.

Kite. How, so many!

Cob. Ay, there is some five or six of them, at the most.

Kite. A swarm, a swarm!

Spite of the devil! how they sting my head With forked stings, thus wide and large! E

Cob,

How long hast thou been coming hither, Cob?

Cob. A little while, sir.

Kite. Didst thou come running?

Cob. No, sir.

Kite. Nay, then I am familiar with thy haste. Bane to my fortunes! What meant I to marry I, that before was ranked in such content, My mind at rest too in so soft a peace, Being free master of my own free thoughts, And now become a slave? What, never sigh!

Be of good cheer, man, for thou art a cuckold. 'Tis done, 'tis done! Nay, when such flowin store,

Plenty, itself, falls into my wife's lap, The cornucopia will be mine, I know. Bu

Cob,

What entertainment had they? I am sure My sister and my wife would bid them welcome

Ha!

Cob. Like enough, sir; yet I heard not a word of it.

Kite. No; their lips were sealed with kisses and the voice,

Drowned in a flood of joy at their arrival, Had lost her motion, state, and faculty.

Cob, which of them was't that first kissed my wife?

My sister, I should say, my wife, alas! I fear not her. Ha! Who was it, say'st thou?

Cob. By my troth, sir, will you have the truth of it?

Kite. Ay, good Cob, I pray thee heartily.

Cob. Then I am a vagabond, and fitter for Bridewell than your worship's company, if I saw any body to be kissed, unless they would have kissed the post in the middle of the warehouse; for there I left them all, at their tobacco, with a pox!

Kite. How! were they not gone in then, ere thou cam'st?

Cob. O, no, sir!

Kite. Spite of the devil! What do I stay here then? Cob, follow me. [Exit.]

Cob. Nay, soft and fair, I have eggs on the spit. Now am I, for some five and fifty reasons, hammering, hammering revenge! Nay, an' he had not lain in my house, 'twould never have grieved me; but, being my guest, one that, I'll be sworn, I loved and trusted; and he, to turn monster of ingratitude, and strike his lawful host! Well, I hope to raise up an host of fury for it. I'll to justice Clement for a warrant. Strike his lawful host! [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A room in KITELY's house.

Enter DOWNRIGHT and Dame KITELY.

Dow. WELL, sister, I tell you true; and you will find it so, in the end.

Dame. Alas, brother, what would you have me to do? I cannot help it. You see my brother brings them in here; they are his friends.

Dow. His friends! his friends! 'Slud they do nothing but haunt him up and down, like a sort of unlucky spirit, and tempt him to all manner of villany, that can be thought of. Well, by this light, a little thing would make me play the devil with some of them. An' 'twere not more for your husband's sake, than any thing else, I'd make the house too hot for the best of them. They should say, and swear, hell were broken loose, ere they went hence. But, by God's will, 'tis nobody's fault but yours; for an' you had done as you might have done, they should have been parboiled, and baked too, every mother's son, ere they should ha' come in e'er a one of them.

Dame. God's my life! did you ever hear the like? What a strange man is this! Could I keep out all them, think you? I should put myself against half a dozen men, should I? Good faith, you'd mad the patient'st body in the world to hear you talk so without any sense or reason!

Enter Mrs BRIDGET, Master MATTHEW, WELL-BRED, STEPHEN, EDWARD KNO'WELL, BOBADIL, and CASH.

Bridget. Servant, in troth, you are too prodigal

Of your wit's treasure, thus to pour it forth
Upon so mean a subject as my worth.

Mat. You say well, mistress; and I mean as well.

Dow. Hey-day, here is stuff!

Well. O, now stand close. Pray Heaven she can get him to read; he should do it of his own natural impudence.

Bridg. Servant, what is this same, I pray you?

Mat. Marry, an elegy! an elegy! an odd toy—I'll read it, if you please.

Bridg. Pray you do, servant.

Dow. O, here's no foppery! Death! I can endure the stocks better.

E. Kno. What ails thy brother? Can he not bear the reading of a ballad?

Well. O, no; a rhyme to him is worse than cheese, or a bag-pipe. But, mark, you lose the protestation.

Bob. Master Matthew, you abuse the expectation of your dear mistress, and her fair sister. Fir, while you live, avoid this prolixity.

Mat. I shall, sir.

Rare creature, let me speak without offence,
Would Heaven my rude words had the influence

VOL. II.

To rule thy thoughts, as thy fair looks do mine,
Then shouldst thou be his prisoner, who is thine.

[Master STEPHEN answers with shaking his head.]

E. Kno. 'Slight, he shakes his head like a bottle, to feel an' there be any brain in it!

Well. Sister, what ha' you here? Verses?—Pray you, let us see. Who made these verses? They are excellent good.

Mat. O, Master Well-bred, 'tis your disposition to say so, sir. They were good in the morning; I made them extempore this morning.

Well. How, extempore!

Mat. I would I might be hanged else; ask Captain Bobadil. He saw me write them at the——(pox on it) the Star yonder.

Step. Cousin, how do you like this gentleman's verses?

E. Kno. O, admirable! the best that ever I heard, coz!

Step. Body of Cæsar! they are admirable! The best, that ever I heard, as I am a soldier.

Dow. I am vext! I can hold ne'er a bone of me still! Heart, I think they mean to build and breed here.

Well. Sister Kately, I marvel you get you not a servant, that can rhyme, and do tricks too.

Dow. Oh, monster! Impudence itself, tricks! Come, you might practise your ruffian tricks somewhere else, and not here, I wusa. This is no tavern, nor drinking-school, to vent your exploits in.

Well. How now! whose cow has calved?

Dow. Marry, that has mine, sir. Nay, boy, never look askance at me for the matter; I will tell you of it; aye, sir, you and your companions; mend yourselves when I ha' done.

Well. My companions!

Dow. Yes, sir, your companions, so I say: I am not afraid of you nor them neither, your hangbys here. You must have your poets, and your potlings, your soldados and foolados, to follow you up and down the city, and here they must come to domineer and swagger. Sirrah, you ballad-singer; and Slops, your fellow there, get you out; get you home; or, by this steel, I'll cut off your ears, and that presently.

Well. 'Slight, stay, let us see what he dare do. Cut off his ears! cut a whetstone. You are an ass, do you see; touch any man here, and by this hand, I'll run my rapier to the hilts in you.

Dow. Yea, that would I fain see, boy.

[They all draw, and they of the house make out to part them.]

Dame. O, Jesu! murder! Thomas, Gasper!

Bridg. Help, help, Thomas.

E. Kno. Gentlemen, forbear, I pray you.

Bob. Well, sirrah! you Holofernes! by my hand, I will pink your flesh full of holes with my rapier, for this; I will, by this good Heaven.—

Nay, let him come, gentlemen, by the body of St George, I'll not kill him.

[They offer to fight again, and are parted.]

Cash. Hold, hold, good gentlemen.

Dow. You whoreson, bragging coistril!

Enter KITELY.

Kite. Why, how now, what's the matter?—
What's the stir here?

Put up your weapons, and put off this rage.

My wife and sister, they're the cause of this.

What, Thomas! where is the knave?

Cash. Here, sir.

Well. Come, let us go; this is one of my brother's ancient humours, this. [Exit.]

Step. I am glad nobody was hurt by his ancient humour. [Exit.]

Kite. Why, how now, brother, who enforced this brawl?

Dow. A sort of lewd rake-hells, that care neither for God nor the devil. And they must come here to read ballads, and roguery, and trash! I'll mar the knot of them ere I sleep, perhaps; especially Bob there: he that is all manner of shapes; and songs and sonnets, his fellow. But I'll follow them. [Exit.]

Bridg. Brother, indeed you are too violent, Too sudden in your humour.

There was one a civil gentleman,
And very worthily demeaned himself.

Kite. O, that was some love of yours, sister.

Bridg. A love of mine! I would it were no worse, brother! You'd pay my portion sooner than you think for. [Exit.]

Dame. Indeed, he seemed to be a gentleman of exceeding fair disposition, and of very excellent good parts. What a coil and stir is here! [Exit.]

Kite. Her love, by Heaven! my wife's mission!

Death, these phrases are intolerable!

Well, well, well, well, well, well!

It is too plain, too clear. Thomas, come hither. What, are they gone?

Cash. Ay, sir, they went in.

My mistress, and your sister——

Kite. Are any of the gallants within?

Cash. No, sir, they are all gone.

Kite. Art thou sure of it?

Cash. I can assure you, sir.

Kite. What gentleman was it that they praised so, Thomas?

Cash. One, they call him Master Kno'well, a handsome young gentleman, sir.

Kite. Aye, I thought so. My mind gave me as much.

I'll die but they have hid him in the house
Somewhere; I will go and search. Go with me,

Thomas,

Be true to me, and thou shalt find me a master. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—Moorfields.

Enter E. KNO'WELL, WELL-BRED, and BRAIN-WORM.

E. Kno. Well, Brain-worm, perform this business happily, and thou makest a purchase of love for ever.

Well. In faith, now let thy spirits use their best faculties; but at my hand, remember the message to my brother; for there is no other means to start him out of his house.

Bruin. I warrant you, sir, fear nothing. My nimble soul has waked all forces of imagination by this time, and put them in true motion. What you have possessed me withal, I discharge it amply, sir. Make it no question. [Ereunt.]

Well. Forth, and prosper, Brain-worm. Faith, Ned, how dost thou approve of my abilities in this device?

E. Kno. Troth, well, howsoever: but it will come excellent, if it take.

Well. Take, man! Why, it cannot choose but take, if the circumstances miscarry not. But tell me ingenuously, dost thou affect my sister Bridget as thou pretendest?

E. Kno. Friend, am I worth belief?

Well. Come, do not protest. In faith, she is a maid of good ornament, and much modesty; and except I conceived very worthily of her, thou should'st not have her.

E. Kno. Nay, that, I am afraid, will be a question yet, whether I shall have her or no.

Well. 'Slid thou shalt have her; by this light thou shalt.

E. Kno. Nay, do not swear.

Well. By this hand, thou shalt have her. I will go fetch her presently. Point but where to meet, and, as I am an honest man, I will bring her.

E. Kno. Hold, hold, be temperate.

Well. Why, by ——, what shall I swear by? thou shalt have her, as I am ——

E. Kno. Pray thee, be at peace; I am satisfied; and do believe thou wilt omit no offered occasion to make my desires complete.

Well. Thou shalt see, and know I will not. [Ereunt.]

Enter FORMAL and KNO'WELL.

Form. Was your man a soldier, sir?

Kno. Aye, a knave; I took him begging o' the way,

This morning, as I came over Moorfields.

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

Oh, here he is! you have made fair speed, believe me.

Where, in the name of sloth, could you be thus——

Brain. Marry, peace be my comfort, where I thought I should have had little comfort of your worship's service.

Kno. How so?

Brain. Oh, sir! your coming to the city, your entertainment of me, and your sending me to watch—indeed, all the circumstances either of your charge, or my employment, are as open to your son, as to yourself.

Kno. How should that be! unless that villain, Brain-worm,

Have told him of the letter, and discovered All that I strictly charged him to conceal! 'Tis so!

Brain. I am partly o' that faith; 'tis so, indeed.

Kno. But how should he know you to be my man?

Brain. Nay, sir, I cannot tell; unless it be by the black art! Is not your son a scholar, sir?

Kno. Yes, but I hope his soul is not allied Unto such hellish practice; if it were, I had just cause to weep my part in him, And curse the time of his creation.

But where didst thou find them, Fitz-Sword?

Brain. You should rather ask, where they found me, sir; for I will be sworn I was going along in the street, thinking nothing, when (of a sudden) a voice calls, 'Mr Kno'well's man;' another cries, 'soldier;' and thus, half a dozen of them, till they had called me within a house, where I no sooner came, but out flew all their rapiers at my bosom, with some three or four-score oaths to accompany them, and all to tell me, I was a dead man, if I did not confess where you were, and how I was employed, and about what; which, when they could not get out of me, (as I protest they must have dissected me, and made an anatomy of me first, and so I told them), they locked me up into a room i' the top of a high house, whence, by great miracle, having a light heart, I slid down by a bottom of pack-thread into the street, and so escaped. But, sir, thus much I can assure you; for I heard it while I was locked up; there were a great many rich merchants, and brave citizens' wives with them, at a feast, and your son, Mr Edward, withdrew with one of them, and has appointed to meet her anon, at one Cob's house, a water-bearer, that dwells by the wall. Now, there your worship shall be sure to take him; for there he preys, and fail he will not.

Kno. Nor will I fail to break his match, I doubt not.

Go thou along with justice Clement's man, And stay there for me. At one Cob's house, say'st thou?

Brain. Aye, sir, there you shall have him. [Erit Kno'well.] Yes! invisible! much wench, or much son! Slight, when he has staid there three or four hours, travailling with the expectation of wonders, and at length be delivered of air! O, the sport that I should then take to look on him, if I durst! But now I mean to appear no more before him in this shape. I have another trick to act yet. [To FORMAL.] Sir, I make you stay somewhat long.

Form. Not a whit, sir;

You have been lately in the wars, sir, it seems?

Brain. Marry have I, sir, to my loss, and expence of all, almost—

Form. Troth, sir, I would be glad to bestow a bottle of wine on you, if it please you to accept it—

Brain. O, sir—

Form. But to hear the manner of your services, and your devices, in the wars; they say they be very strange, and not like those a man reads in the Roman histories, or sees at Mile-End.

Brain. No, I assure you, sir; why, at any time, when it please you, I shall be ready to discourse with you all I know; and more too, somewhat.

Form. No better time than now, sir. We will go to the Windmill, there we shall have a cup of neat grist, as we call it. I pray you, sir, let me request you to the Windmill.

Brain. I will follow you, sir, and make grist of you, if I have good luck. [Exeunt.]

Enter MATTHEW, EDWARD KNO'WELL, BOBADIL, and STEPHEN.

Mat. Sir, did your eyes ever taste the like clown of him, where we were to-day, Mr Well-bred's half brother? I think the whole earth cannot shew his parallel, by this day-light.

E. Kno. We are now speaking of him. Captain Bobadil tells me he is fallen foul of you too.

Mat. O aye, sir! he threatened me with the bastinado.

Bob. Aye, but I think I taught you prevention this morning for that—You shall kill him beyond question, if you be so generously minded.

Mat. Indeed, It is a most excellent trick!

Bob. O, you do not give spirit enough to your motion; you are too tardy, too heavy! O, it must be done like lightning; hey!

[He practises at a post.]

Mat. Rare captain!

Bob. Tut, 'tis nothing, an't be not done in a—punto!

E. Kno. Captain, did you ever prove yourself upon any of our masters of defence here?

Mat. O, good sir! yes, I hope he has.

Bob. I will tell you, sir. They have assaulted me some three, four, five, six of them together, as I have walked alone in divers skirts of the town, where I have driven them before me the whole length of a street, in the open view of all our gallants, pitying to hurt them, believe me. Yet all this lenity will not overcome their spleen; they will be doing with the pismire, raising a hill, a man may spurn abroad with his foot at pleasure. By myself, I could have slain them all; but I delight not in murder. I am loth to bear any other than this bastinado for them; yet I hold it good policy not to go disarmed; for, though I be skilful, I may be oppressed with multitudes.

E. Kno. Aye, believe me, may you, sir; and, in my conceit, our whole nation should sustain the loss by it, if it were so.

Bob. Alas, no! What's a peculiar man to a nation? Not seen.

E. Kno. O, but your skill, sir!

Bob. Indeed, that might be some loss; but who respects it? I will tell you, sir, by the way of private, and under seal, I am a gentleman, and live here obscure, and to myself: but were I known to his majesty, and the lords, observe me, I would undertake, upon this poor head and life, for the public benefit of the state, not only to spare the entire lives of his subjects in general, but to save the one half, nay, three parts of his yearly charge in holding war, and against what enemy soever. And how would I do it, think you?

E. Kno. Nay, I know not, nor can I conceive.

Bob. Why thus, sir. I would select nineteen more to myself, throughout the land; gentlemen they should be, of good spirit, strong and able constitution; I would chuse them by an instinct, a character that I have; and I would teach these nineteen the special rules, as, your Punto, your Reverso, your Stoccata, your Imbroccata, your Passada, your Montanto; till they could all play very near, or altogether, as well as myself. This done, say the enemy were forty thousand strong; we twenty would come into the field the tenth of March, or thereabouts; and we would challenge twenty of the enemy; they could not, in their honour, refuse us! Well, we would kill them; challenge twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them; twenty more, kill them too; and thus would we kill every man his twenty a day, that's twenty score; twenty score, that's two hundred; two hundred a day, five days a thousand; forty thousand; forty times five, five times forty, two hundred days, kill them all up by computation. And this I will venture my poor gentleman-like carcase to perform, provided there be no treason practised upon us, by fair and discreet manhood, that is, civilly, by the sword.

E. Kno. Why are you so sure of your hand, captain, at all times?

Bob. Tut, never miss thrust, upon my reputation with you.

E. Kno. I would not stand in Downright's state, then, an' you meet him, for the wealth of any one street in London.

Bob. Why, sir, you mistake! If he were here now, by this welkin, I would not draw my weapon on him! Let this gentleman do his mind: but I will bastinado him, by the bright sun, wherever I meet him.

Mat. Faith, and I'll have a fling at him, at my distance.

Enter DOWNRIGHT, walking over the stage.

E. Kno. God's so! look ye where he is; yonder he goes.

Dow. What peevish luck have I, I cannot meet with these bragging rascals!

Bob. It's not he, is it?

E. Kno. Yes, faith, it is he!

Mat. I'll be hanged then, if that were he.

E. Kno. I assure you that was he.

Step. Upon my reputation, it was he.

Bob. Had I thought it had been he, he must not have gone so: but I can hardly be induced to believe it was he yet.

E. Kno. That I think, sir. But see, he is coming again!

Dow. O, Pharaoh's foot! have I found you! Come, draw; to your tools. Draw, gipsy, or I'll thresh you.

Bob. Gentleman of valour, I do believe in thee hear me—

Dow. Draw your weapon, then.

Bob. Tall man, I never thought on't till now; body of me! I had a warrant of the peace served on me even now, as I came along, by a water-bearer; this gentleman saw it, Master Matthew.

[He beats him, and disarms him. MATTHEW runs away.]

Dow. 'Sdeath, you will not draw, then?

Bob. Hold, hold, under thy favour, forbear.

Dow. Prate again, as you like this, you whore-son foist you. You will controul the point, you! Your consort is gone; had he staid, he had shared with you, sir. [Erit DOWNRIGHT.]

E. Kno. Twenty, and kill them; twenty more, kill them too. Ha, ha!

Bob. Well, gentlemen, bear witness, I was bound to the peace, by this good day.

E. Kno. No, faith, it's an ill day, captain; never reckon it other: but say you were bound to the peace; the law allows you to defend yourself; that will prove but a poor excuse.

Bob. I cannot tell, sir. I desire good construction, in fair sort. I never sustained the like disgrace, by Heaven. Sure I was struck with a planet thence, for I had no power to touch my weapon.

E. Kno. Aye, like enough, I have heard of many that have been beaten under a planet. Go, get you to a surgeon. 'Slid, an' these be your tricks, your passados, and your montantos, I'll none of them.

Bob. I was planet-struck, certainly. [Erit.]

E. Kno. O, manners! that this age should bring forth such creatures! that nature should be at leisure to make them! Come, coz.

Step. Mass, I'll have this cloak.

E. Kno. God's will, 'tis Downright's.

Step. Nay, it is mine now; another might have taken it up as well as I. I'll wear it, so I will.

E. Kno. How, an' he see it? He'll challenge it, assure yourself.

Step. Aye, but he shall not have it; I'll say I bought it.

E. Kno. Take heed you buy it not too dear, coz. [Ereunt.]

SCENE III.—A chamber in KITELY's House.

Enter KITELY and CASH.

Kite. Art thou sure, Thomas, we have pryed into all and every part throughout the house? Is there no by-place, or dark corner, has escaped our searches?

Cash. Indeed, sir, none; there's not a hole or nook unsearched by us, from the upper loft unto the cellar.

Kite. They have conveyed him, then, away, or had him in some privacy of their own—Whilst we were searching of the dark closet by my sister's chamber, didst thou not think thou heard'st a rustling on the other side, and a soft tread of feet?

Cash. Upon my truth, I did not, sir; or if you did, it might be only the vermin in the wainscot; the house is old, and over-run with them.

Kite. It is, indeed, Thomas—we should bane these rats—Dost thou understand me—we will—they shall not harbour here; I'll cleanse my house from them, if fire or poison can effect it—I will not be tormented thus—They gnaw my brain, and burrow in my heart—I cannot bear it.

Cash. I do not understand you, sir! Good now, what is it disturbs you thus? Pray, be composed; these starts of passion have some cause, I fear, that touches you more nearly.

Kite. Sorely, sorely, Thomas—it cleaves too close to me—Oh, me—[Sighs.] Lend me thy arm—so, good Cash.

Cash. You tremble, and look pale! Let me call assistance.

Kite. Not for ten thousand worlds—Alas! alas! it is not in medicine to give me ease—here, here it lies.

Cash. What, sir?

Kite. Why,—nothing, nothing—I am not sick, yet more than dead; I have a burning fever in my mind, and long for that, which, having, would destroy me.

Cash. Believe me, 'tis your fancy's imposition; shut up your generous mind from such intruders—I'll hazard all my growing favour with you; I'll stake my present, my future welfare, that some base whispering knave—nay, pardon me, sir—bath, in the best and richest soil, sown seeds of rank and evil nature! O, my master, should they take root—

[Laughing within.]

Kite. Hark! hark! dost thou not hear! what think'st thou now? Are they not laughing at me? They are, they are. They have deceived the virtuous, and thus they triumph in their infamy—This aggravation is not to be borne. [Laughing again.] Hark, again!—Cash, do thou, unseen, seal in upon them, and listen to their wanton conference.

Cash. I shall obey you, though against my will. [Exit.]

Kite. Against his will! Ha! it may be so—He's young, and may be bribed for them—they've various means to draw the unwary in; if it be so, I'm lost, deceived, betrayed, and my bosom, my full-fraught bosom is unlocked and opened to mockery and laughter! Heaven forbid! He cannot be that viper; sting the hand, that raised and cherished him! Was this stroke added, I should be cursed—But it cannot be—no, it cannot be.

Enter CASH.

Cash. You are musing, sir.

Kite. I ask your pardon, Cash—ask me not why—I have wronged you, and am sorry—'tis gone.

Cash. If you suspect my faith—

Kite. I do not—say no more—and, for my sake, let it die and be forgotten—Have you seen your mistress, and heard—whence was that noise?

Cash. Your brother, Master Well-bred, is with them, and I found them throwing out their mirth on a very truly ridiculous subject; it is one Formal, as he stiles himself, and he appertains, so he phrases it, to Justice Clement, and would speak with you.

Kite. With me! Art thou sure it is the justice's clerk? Where is he?

Enter BRAIN-WORM, as FORMAL.

Who are you, friend?

Brain. An appendix to Justice Clement, vulgarly called his clerk.

Kite. What are your wants with me?

Brain. None.

Kite. Do you not want to speak with me?

Brain. No, but my master does.

Kite. What are the justice's commands?

Brain. He doth not command, but entreats Master Kite to be with him directly, having matters of some moment to communicate unto him.

Kite. What can it be? Say, I'll be with him instantly, and if your legs, friend, go no faster than your tongue, I shall be there before you.

Brain. I will. Vale! [Exit.]

Kite. 'Tis a precious fool, indeed!—I must go forth—But first, come hither, Thomas—I have admitted thee into the close recesses of my heart, and shewed thee all my frailties, passions, every thing—

Be careful of thy promise, keep good watch. Wilt thou be true, my Thomas?

Cash. As truth's self, sir—

But be assured you're heaping care and trouble Upon a sandy base; ill-placed suspicion Recoils upon yourself—She's chaste as comely! Believe it, she is—Let your not note your humour;

Disperse the gloom upon your brow, and be As clear as her unsullied honour.

Kite. I will then, Cash—thou comfortest me—
I'll drive these
Fiend-like fancies from me, and be myself again.
Think'st thou, she has perceived my folly? 'Twere
Happy, if she had not—She has not—
They, who know no evil, will suspect none.

Cash. True, sir, nor has your mind a blemish
now.
This change has gladdened me—Here's my mistress,

And the rest; settle your reason to accost them.

Kite. I will, Cash, I will—

Enter WELL-BRED, Dame KITELY, and BRIDGET.

Well. What are you plotting, brother Kiteley,
That thus of late you muse alone, and bear
Such weighty care upon your pensive brow?

[Laughs.

Kite. My care is all for you, good sneering
brother;

And well I wish, you'd take some wholesome counsel,

And curb your headstrong humours; trust me,
brother,

You were to blame to raise commotions here,
And hurt the peace and order of my house.

Well. No harm done, brother, I warrant you.
Since there is no harm done, anger costs
A man nothing, and a brave man is never
His own man, till he be angry—To keep
His valour in obscurity, is to keep himself,
As it were, in a cloak-bag. What's a brave
Musician unless he play?

What's a brave man unless he fight?

Dame. Aye, but what harm might have come of it, brother?

Well. What, schooled on both sides! Pr'ythee,
Bridget, save me from the rod and lecture.

[BRIDG. and WELL. retire.

Kite. With what a decent modesty she rates
him!

My heart's at ease, and she shall see it is—

How art thou, wife? Thou look'st both gay and comely.

In troth thou dost—I'm sent for out, my dear,
But I shall soon return—Indeed, my life,
Business, that forces me abroad, grows irksome.
I could content me with less gain and 'vantage,
To have thee more at home; indeed I could.

Dame. Your doubts, as well as love, may breed these thoughts.

Kite. That jar untunes me.

[Aside.

What dost thou say? Doubt thee!

I should as soon suspect myself—No, no,

My confidence is rooted in thy merit,

So fixed and settled, that, wert thou inclined

To masks, to sports, and balls, where lusty youth

Leads up the wanton dance, and the raised pulse

Beats quicker measures, yet I could with joy,

With heart's ease and security—not but

I had rather thou should'st prefer thy home,

And me, to toys and such like vanities.

Dame. But sure, my dear,

A wife may moderately use these pleasures,
Which numbers and the time give sanction to,
Without the smallest blemish on her name.

Kite. And so she may—And I'll go with thee
child;

I will indeed—I'll lead thee there myself,
And be the foremost reveller. I'll silence
The sneers of envy, stop the tongue of slander;
Nor will I more be pointed at, as one
Disturbed with jealousy—

Dame. Why, were you ever so?

Kite. What!—Ha! never—ha, ha, ha!
She stabs me home. [Aside.] Jealous of thee?
No, do not believe it—Speak low, my love,
Thy brother will overhear us—No, no, my dear.
It could not be, it could not be—for—for—
What is the time now?—I shall be too late—
No, no, thou may'st be satisfied
There's not the smallest spark remaining—Remaining! What do I say? There never was,
Nor can, nor ever shall be—so be satisfied—
Is Cob within there? Give me a kiss,
My dear; there, there, now we are reconciled—
I'll be back immediately—Good-bye, good-bye—Ha! ha! jealous, I shall burst my sides with laughing,

Ha, ha! Cob, where are you, Cob? Ha, ha!—

[Exit.

[WELL-BRED and BRIDGET come forward.

Well. What have you done to make your husband part so merry from you? He has of late been little given to laughter.

Dame. He laughed indeed, but seemingly without mirth. His behaviour is new and strange.
He is much agitated, and has some whimsy in his head, that puzzles mine to read it.

Well. 'Tis jealousy, good sister, and writ so largely, that the blind may read it; have you not perceived it yet?

Dame. If I have, 'tis not always prudent, that my tongue should betray my eyes; so far my wisdom tends, good brother, and little more I boast—But what makes him ever calling for Cob so? I wonder how he can employ him.

Well. Indeed, sister, to ask how he employs Cob, is a necessary question for you, that are his wife, and a thing not very easy for you to be satisfied in—But this I'll assure you, Cob's wife is an excellent bawd, sister, and oftentimes your husband haunts her house; marry, to what end
I cannot altogether accuse him. Imagine you, what you think convenient. But I have known fair hides have foul hearts ere now, sister.

Dame. Never said you truer than that, brother;
so much I can tell you for your learning. O, ho! is this the fruit of his jealousy? I thought some game was in the wind, he acted so much tenderness but now; but I'll be quit with him.—
Thomas!

Enter CASH.

Fetch your hat, and go with me: I'll get my hood, and out the backward-way. I would to fortune I could take him there! I'd return him his own, I warrant him! I'd fit him for his jealousy!

[Exeunt.]

Well. Ha, ha! so e'en let them go; this may make sport anon—What, Brain-worm?

Enter BRAIN-WORM.

Brain. I saw the merchant turn the corner, and came back to tell you, all goes well; wind and tide, my master.

Well. But how got'st thou this apparel of the justice's man?

Brain. Marry, sir, my proper fine penman would needs bestow the grist o' me at the Wind-mill, to hear some martial discourse, where I so marshalled him, that I made him drunk with admiration; and because too much heat was the cause of his distemper, I stript him stark naked, as he lay along asleep, and borrowed his suit to deliver this counterfeit message in, leaving a rusty armour, and an old brown bill, to watch him 'till my return; which shall be, when I have pawned his apparel and spent the better part of the money, perhaps.

Well. Well, thou art a successful merry knave, Brain-worm; his absence will be subject for more mirth. I pray thee return to thy young master, and will him to meet me and my sister Bridget at the Tower instantly; for here, tell him, the house is so stored with jealousy, there is no room for love to stand upright in. We must get our fortunes committed to some large prison, say: and then the Tower, I know no better air, nor where the liberty of the house may do us more present service. Away.

[Erit BRAIN.]

Bridg. What, is this the engine, that you told me of? What farther meaning have you in the plot?

Well. That you may know, fair sister-in-law, how happy a thing it is to be fair and beautiful.

Bridg. That touches not me, brother.

Well. That's true; that's even the fault of it; for, indeed, beauty stands a woman in no stead, unless it procure her touching—Well, there's a dear and well-respected friend of mine, sister, stands very strongly and worthily affected towards you, and hath vowed to inflame whole bonfires of zeal at his heart, in honour of your perfections. I have already engaged my promise to bring you, where you shall hear him confirm much more. Ned Kno'well is the man, sister.—There's no exception against the party; you are ripe for a husband, and a minute's loss to such an occasion is a great trespass in a wise beauty. What say you, sister? On my soul, he loves you; will you give him the meeting?

Bridg. Faith, I had very little confidence in my own constancy, brother, if I durst not meet a man: but this motion of yours savours of an old knight adventurer's servant a little too much, methinks.

Well. What's that, sister!

Bridg. Marry, of the go-between.

Well. No matter if it did; I would be such a one for my friend. But see, who is returned to hinder us.

Enter KITELY.

Kite. What villany is this? Called out on a false message! This was some plot; I was not sent for. Bridget, where's your sister?

Bridg. I think she be gone forth, sir.

Kite. How! is my wife gone forth? Whither, for Heaven's sake?

Bridg. She's gone abroad with Thomas.

Kite. Abroad with Thomas! Oh, that villain cheats me!

He hath discovered all unto my wife; Beast that I was to trust him! Whither, I pray You, went she?

Bridg. I know not, sir.

Well. I'll tell you, brother, whither I suspect she's gone.

Kite. Whither, good brother?

Well. To Cob's house, I believe; but keep my counsel.

Kite. I will, I will. To Cob's house! Does she haunt there?

She's gone on purpose now to cuckold me, With that lewd rascal, who, to win her favour, Hath told her all—Why would you let her go?

Well. Because she's not my wife: if she were, I'd keep her to her tether.

Kite. So, so; now 'tis plain. I shall go mad With my misfortunes; now they pour in torrents.

I'm bruted by my wife, betrayed by my servant, Mocked at by my relations, pointed at by my neighbours,

Despised by myself.—There is nothing left, now, But to revenge myself first, next hang myself; And then—all my cares will be over. [Erit.]

Bridg. He storms most loudly; sure you have gone too far in this.

Well. 'Twill all end right, depend upon it.—But let us lose no time; the coast is clear; away, away; the affair is worth it, and cries haste.

Bridg. I trust me to your guidance, brother, and so fortune for us. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Stocks-Market.Enter MATTHEW and BOBADIL.

Mat. I WONDER, captain, what they will say of my going away? ha!

Bob. Why, what should they say? but as of a discreet gentleman; quick, wary, respectful of nature's fair lineaments, and that is all.

Mat. Why so! but what can they say of your beating?

Bob. A rude part, a touch with soft wood, a kind of gross battery used, lain on strongly, borne most patiently, and that is all. But wherefore do I wake their remembrance? I was fascinated, by Jupiter! fascinated; but I will be unwitched, and revenged by law.

Mat. Do you hear? Is it not best to get a warrant, and have him arrested, and brought before justice Clement?

Bob. It were not amiss; would we had it!

Mat. Why, here comes his man; let us speak to him.

Bob. Agreed. Do you speak.

Enter BRAIN-WORM as FORMAL.

Mat. Save you, sir.

Brain. With all my heart, sir!

Mat. Sir, there is one Downright hath abused this gentleman and myself, and we determine to make ourselves amends by law; now, if you would do us the favour to procure a warrant to bring him before your master, you shall be well considered of, I assure you, sir.

Brain. Sir, you know my service is my living; such favours as these, gotten of my master, is his only preferment, and therefore you must consider me, as I may make benefit of my place.

Mat. How is that, sir?

Brain. Faith, sir, the thing is extraordinary, and the gentleman may be of great account. Yet, be what he will, if you will lay me down a brace of angels in my hand, you shall have it; otherwise not.

Mat. How shall we do, captain? He asks a brace of angels; you have no money?

Bob. Not a cross, by fortune.

Mat. Nor I, as I am a gentleman, but two-pence left of my two shillings in the morning for wine and raddish. Let us find him some pawn.

Bob. Pawn! we have none to the value of his demand.

Mat. O, yes, I can pawn my ring here.

Bob. And harkee, he shall have my trusty Toledo too. I believe I shall have no service for it to-day.

Mat. Do you hear, sir? We have no store of money at this time, but you shall have good pawns; look you, sir, I will pledge this ring, and that gentleman his Toledo, because we would have it dispatched.

Brain. I am content, sir; I will get you the warrant presently. What is his name, say you Downright?

Mat. Ay, ay, George Downright.

Brain. Well, gentlemen, I will procure you the warrant presently; but who will you have to serve it?

Mat. That is true, captain, that must be considered.

Bob. Body of me, I know not! 'Tis service a danger!

Brain. Why, you were best get one of the varlets of the city, a serjeant; I'll appoint you one if you please.

Mat. Will you, sir? Why we can wish no better.

Bob. We'll leave it to you, sir.

[Exeunt BOB. and MAT]

Brain. This is rare! Now will I go pawn this cloak of the justice's man's, at the broker's, for a varlet's suit, and be the varlet myself, and so get money on all sides. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The street before Cob's house.Enter KNO'-WELL.

Kno. O here it is; I have found it now—Hoa, who is within here? [Tib appears at the window.]

Tib. I am within, sir, what is your pleasure?

Kno. To know who is within besides yourself.

Tib. Why, sir, you are no constable, I hope?

Kno. O, fear you the constable? Then I doubt not you have some guests within deserve that fear—I'll fetch him straight.

Tib. For Heaven's sake, sir—

Kno. Go to, come tell me, is not young Kno'-well here?

Tib. Young Kno'-well! I know none such, sir, on my honesty.

Kno. Your honesty, dame! It flies too lightly from you. There is no way but fetch the constable.

Tib. The constable; the man is mad, I think.

Enter CASH and Dame KITELY.

Cash. Hoa! who keeps house here?

Kno. O, this is the female copesmate of my son. Now shall I meet him straight. [Aside.]

Dame. Knock, Thomas, hard.

Cash. Hoa! good wife.

Tib. Why, what is the matter with you?

Dame. Why, woman, grieves it you to ope the door? Belike you get something to keep it shut.

Tib. What mean these questions, pray you?

Dame. So strange you make it! Is not my husband here!

Kno. Her husband !

[Aside.

Dame. My tried and faithful husband, Master Kately.

Tib. I hope he needs not be tried here.

Dame. Come hither, Cash—I see my turtle coming to his haunts ; let us retire. [They retire.

Kno. This must be some device to mock me withal.

Soft—who is this !—Oh ! 'tis my son disguised. I'll watch him and surprise him.

Enter KITELY, muffled in a cloak.

Kite. 'Tis truth, I see ; there she skulks. But I will fetch her from her hold—I will—I tremble so, I scarce have power to do the justice

Her infamy demands.

[As KITELY goes forward, Dame KITELY and KNO'WELL lay hold of him.]

Kno. Have I trapped you, youth ? You cannot 'scape me now.

Dame. O, sir ! have I forestalled your honest market !

Found your close walks ! You stand amazed Now, do you ? Ah, hide, hide your face, for shame ! Faith, I am glad I have found you out at last. What is your jewel, trow ? In, come let's see her ; fetch Forth the wanton dame—If she be fairer, In any honest judgment, than myself, I'll be content with it : but she is change ; She feeds you fat, she soothes your appetite, And you are well. Your wife, an honest woman, Is meat twice sod to you, sir. O, you traitor !

Kno. What mean you, woman ? Let go your hold.

I see the counterfeit—I am his father, and claim him as my own.

Kite. [Discovering himself.] I am your cuckold, and claim my vengeance.

Dame. What, do you wrong me, and insult me too ?

Thou faithless man !

Kite. Out on thy more than strumpet's impudence !

Steal'st thou thus to thy haunts ? And have I taken

The bawd and thee, and thy companion, This hoary-headed letcher, this old goat, Chase at your villany, and would'st thou 'scuse it With this stale harlot's jest, accusing me ?

O, old incontinent, dost thou not shame To have a mind so hot ; and to entice, And feed the enticement of a lustful woman ?

Dame. Out, I defy thee, thou dissembling wretch !

Kite. Defy me, strumpet ! Ask thy pander here ;

Can he deny it, or that wicked elder ?

Kno. Why, hear you, sir——

Cash. Master, 'tis in vain to reason, while these passions blind you—I'm grieved to see you thus.

VOL. II.

Kite. Tut, tut, never speak ; I see through every Veil you cast upon your treachery : but I have. Done with you, and root you from my heart for ever.

For you, sir, thus I demand my honour's due ; Resolved to cool your lust, or end my shame.

[Drama.

Kno. What lunacy is this ! Put up your sword, and undeceive yourself—No arm, that e'er poised weapon, can affright me. But I pity folly, nor cope with madness.

Kite. I will have proofs—I will—so you, good wife-bawd, Cob's wife ; and you, that make your husband such a monster ; and you, young pander, and old cuckold maker, I'll have you every one before the justice—Nay, you shall answer it ; I charge you go. Come forth, thou bawd.

[Goes into the house and brings out TIB.

Kno. Marry, with all my heart, sir ; I go willingly.

Though I do taste this as a trick upon me, To punish my impertinent search ; and justly ; And half forgive my son for the device.

Kite. Come, will you go ?

Dame. Go ! to thy shame, believe it.

Kite. Though shame and sorrow both my heart betide,

Come on—I must, and will be satisfied. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.—Stocks Market.

Enter BRAINWORM.

Brain. Well, of all my disguises yet, now am I most like myself ; being in this serjeant's gown. A man of my present profession never counterfeits, till he lays hold upon a debtor, and says, he arrests him ; for then he brings him to all manner of unrest. A kind of little kings we are, bearing the diminutive of a mace, made like a young artichoke, that always carries pepper and salt in itself. Well, I know not what danger I undergo by this exploit ; pray Heaven I come well off !

Enter BOBADIL and Master MATTHEW.

Mat. See, I think, yonder is the varlet, by his gown. Save you, friend ; are not you here by appointment of justice Clement's man ?

Brain. Yes, an't please you, sir, he told me two gentlemen had willed him to procure a warrant from his master, which I have about me, to be served on one Downright.

Mat. It is honestly done of you both ; and see where the party comes you must arrest. Serve it upon him quickly, before he be aware——

Enter Master STEPHEN, in DOWNRIGHT's cloak.

Bob. Bear back, master Matthew.

Brain. Master Downright, I arrest you i' the queen's name, and must carry you before a justice, by virtue of this warrant.

Step. Me, friend, I am no Downright, I. I am

D

Master Stephen; you do not well to arrest me, I tell you truly. I am in nobody's bonds or books, I would you should know it. A plague on you heartily, for making me thus afraid before my time.

Brain. Why now are you deceived, gentlemen?

Bob. He wears such a cloak, and that deceived us. But see, here he comes, indeed! this is he, officer.

Enter DOWNRIGHT.

Down. Why, how now, Signor Gull! are you turned filcher of late? Come, deliver up my cloak.

Step. Your cloak, sir! I bought it even now in open market.

Brain. Master Downright, I have a warrant I must serve upon you, procured by these two gentlemen.

Down. These gentlemen! these rascals!

Brain. Keep the peace, I charge you, in her majesty's name.

Down. I obey thee. What must I do, officer?

Brain. Go before Mr Justice Clement, to answer what they can object against you, sir. I will use you kindly, sir.

Mat. Come, let us before, and make the justice captain—

[Erit.

Bob. The varlet is a tall man, before heaven!

[Erit.

Down. Gull, you'll gi' me my cloak?

Step. Sir, I bought it, and I'll keep it.

Down. You will?

Step. Aye, that I will.

Down. Officer, there is thy fee, arrest him.

Brain. Master Stephen, I must arrest you.

Step. Arrest me! I scorn it; there, take your cloak, I'll none on it.

Down. Nay, that shall not serve your turn, now, sir. Officer, I'll go with thee to the justice's. Bring him along.

Step. Why, is not here your cloak? what would you have?

Down. I'll ha' you answer it, sir.

Brain. Sir, I'll take your sword, and this gentleman's too, for his appearance.

Down. I'll ha' no words taken. Bring him along.

Brain. So, so, I have made a fair mash on't.

Step. Must I go?

Brain. I know no remedy, master Stephen.

Down. Come along before me here. I do not love your hanging look behind.

Step. Why, sir, I hope you cannot hang me for it. Can he, fellow?

Brain. I think not sir. It is but a whipping matter, sure!

Step. Why, then, let him do his worst, I am resolute.

[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—A hall in Justice CLEMENT's house.

Enter CLEMENT, KNO'WELL, KITELY, Dame KITELY, TIB, CASH, COB, and Servants.

Clem. Nay, but stay, stay, give me leave. My chair, sirrah. You, master Kno'well, say you went thither to meet your son.

Kno. Aye, sir.

Clem. But who directed you thither?

Kno. That did mine own man, sir.

Clem. Where is he?

Kno. Nay, I know not now; I left him with your clerk; and appointed him to stay for me.

Clem. My clerk! About what time was this?

Kno. Marry, between one and two, as I take it.

Clem. And what time came my man with the false message to you, master Kitley?

Kite. After two, sir.

Clem. Very good: but, Mrs Kitley, how chance it that you were at Cob's? Ha!

Dame. An' please you, sir, I'll tell you. My brother Well-bred told me, that Cob's house was a suspected place—

Clem. So it appears, methinks: but on.

Dame. And that my husband used thither daily.

Clem. No matter, so he used himself well, mistress.

Dame. True, sir; but you know what grows by such haunts, oftentimes.

Clem. I see rank fruits of a jealous brain, mistress Kitley. But, did you find your husband there, in that case, as you suspected?

Kite. I found her there, sir.

Clem. Did you so? That alters the case.—Who gave you knowledge of your wife's being there?

Kite. Marry, that did my brother Well-bred.

Clem. How! Well-bred first tell her, than tell you after? Where is Well-bred?

Kite. Gone with my sister, sir, I know not whither.

Clem. Why, this is a mere trick, a device; you are gulled in this most grossly, all! Alas, poor wench, wert thou suspected for this?

Tib. Yes, an' it please you.

Clem. I smell mischief here, plot and contrivance, master Kitley. However, if you will step into the next room with your wife, and think coolly of matters, you'll find some trick has been played you—I fear there have been jealousies on both parts, and the wags have been merry with you.

Kite. I begin to feel it—I'll take your counsel—Will you go in, dame?

Dame. I will have justice, Mr Kitley.

[Erit KITELY and Dame.

Clem. You will be a woman, Mrs Kitley, that I see—How now, what's the matter?

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, there's a gentleman i' the court without, desires to speak with your worship.

Clem. A gentleman! What is he?

Serv. A soldier, sir, he says.

Clem. A soldier! My sword, quickly. A soldier speak with me! Stand by, I will end your matters, anon—Let the soldier enter. Now, sir, what ha' you to say to me?

Enter BOBADIL and MATTHEW.

Bob. By your worship's favour—

Clem. Nay, keep out, sir, I know not your pretence; you send me word, sir, you are a soldier. Why, sir, you shall be answered here; here be them have been among soldiers. Sir, your pleasure?

Bob. Faith, sir, so it is, this gentleman and myself have been most uncivilly wronged and beaten by one Downright, a coarse fellow about the town here; and, for my own part, I protest, being a man in no sort given to this filthy humour of quarrelling, he hath assaulted me in the way of my peace; despoiled me of mine honour; disarmed me of my weapons; and rudely hid me along in the open streets; when I not so much as once offered to resist him.

Clem. O, god's precious! Is this the soldier? Lie there, my sword, 'twill make him swoon, I fear; he is not fit to look on't, that will put up a blow.

Mat. An't please your worship, he was bound to the peace.

Clem. Why, an' he were, sir, his hands were not bound, were they?

Serv. There's one of the varlets of the city, sir, has brought two gentlemen here, one upon your worship's warrant.

Clem. My warrant!

Serv. Yes, sir, the officer says, procured by these two.

Clem. Bid him come in. Set by this picture. What, Mr Downright! are you brought at Mr Freshwater's suit here?

Enter DOWNRIGHT, STEPHEN, and BRAIN-WORM.

Dow. I'faith, sir. And here's another, brought at my suit.

Clem. What are you, sir?

Step. A gentleman, sir. O, uncle!

Clem. Uncle! Who, Mr Kno'well?

Kno. Aye, sir, this is a wise kinsman of mine.

Step. God's my witness, uncle, I am wronged here monstrously; he charges me with stealing of his cloak, and would I might never stir, if I did not find it in the street by chance.

Dow. O, did you find it, now? You said you bought it ere-while.

Step. And you said I stole it. Nay, now my uncle is here, I will do well enough with you.

Clem. Well, let this breathe a-while. You that have cause to complain there, stand forth. Had you my warrant for this gentleman's apprehension?

Bob. Aye, an't please your worship.

Clem. Nay, do not speak in passion so. Where had you it?

Bob. Of your clerk, sir.

Clem. That's well, an' my clerk can make warrants, and my hand not at them! Where is the warrant? officer, have you it?

Brain. No, sir, your worship's man, master Formal, bid me do it for these gentlemen, and he would be my discharge.

Clem. Why, Mr Downright, are you such a novice to be served, and never see the warrant!

Dow. Sir, he did not serve it on me.

Clem. No, how then?

Dow. Marry, sir, he came to me, and said he must serve it, and he would use me kindly, and so—

Clem. O, God's pity, was it so, sir? He must serve it? Give me a warrant, I must serve one too—you knave, you slave, you rogue, do you say you must, sirrah? Away with him to the goal! I will teach you a trick for your must, sir.

Brain. Good sir, I beseech you be good to me,

Clem. Tell him, he shall go to the goal; away with him, I say.

Brain. Aye, sir, if you will commit me, it shall be for committing more than this. I will not lose by my travel any grain of my fame certain.

[Throws off his disguise.]

Clem. How is this!

Kno. My man, Brain-worm!

Step. O, yes, uncle, Brain-worm has been with my cousin Edward and I, all this day.

Clem. I told you all there was some device.

Brain. Nay, excellent Justice, since I have laid myself thus open to you, now stand strong for me, both with your sword and your balance.

Clem. Body o' me, a merry knave! Give me a bowl of sack. If he belongs to you, Master Kno'well, I bespeak your patience.

Brain. That is it I have most need of. Sir, if you will pardon me only, I will glory in all the rest of my exploits.

Kno. Sir, you know I love not to have my favours come hard from me. You have your pardon; though I suspect you shrewdly for being of counsel with my son against me.

Brain. Yes, faith, I have, sir; though you retained me doubly this morning for yourself; first, as Brain-worm, after, as Fitz-Sword. I was your reformed soldier. 'Twas I sent you to Cob's upon the errand without end.

Kno. Is it possible? Or that thou should'st disguise thyself so as I should not know thee?

Brain. O, sir! this has been the day of my metamorphoses; it is not that shape alone, that I have run through to-day. I brought Master Kitley a message too, in the form of Master Justice's man here, to draw him out of the way, as well as your worship; while Master Well-bred might make a conveyance of Mrs Bridget to my young master.

Kno. My son is not married, I hope?

Brain. Faith, sir, they are both as sure as love, a priest, and three thousand pounds, which is her portion, can make them; and by this time are ready to bespeak their wedding supper at the Windmill, except some friend here prevents them, and invite them home.

Clem. Marry, that will I; I thank thee for putting me in mind on't. Sirrah, go you and fetch them hither upon my warrant. Neither's friends have cause to be sorry, if I know the young couple aright. But I pray thee, what hast thou done with my man Formal?

Brain. Faith, sir, after some ceremony past, as making him drunk, first with story, and then with wine, but all in kindness, and stripping him to his shirt; I left him in that cool vein, departed, sold your worship's warrant to these two, pawned his livery for that varlet's gown to serve it in; and thus have brought myself, by my activity, to your worship's consideration.

Clem. And I will consider thee in a cup of sack. Here's to thee; which having drank off, this is my sentence, pledge me. Thou hast done, or assisted to nothing, in my judgment, but deserves to be pardoned for the wit of the offence. Go into the next room; let Master Kately into this whimsical business, and, if he does not forgive thee, he has less mirth in him than an honest man ought to have. How now, who are these?

Enter EDWARD KNO'WELL, WELL-BRED, and BRIDGET.

O, the young company. Welcome, welcome. Give you joy. Nay, Mrs Bridget, blush not! you are not so fresh a bride, but the news of it has come hither before you. Master Bridegroom, I have made your peace, give me your hand. So will I for the rest, ere you forsake my roof.

All. We are the more bound to your humanity, sir.

Clem. Only these two have so little of man in them, they are no part of my care.

Step. And what shall I do?

Clem. Oh! I had lost a sheep, an' he had not bleated. Why, sir, you shall give Mr Downright his cloak; and I will entreat him to take it. A trencher and a napkin you shall have in the buttery, and keep Cob and his wife company here: whom I will entreat first to be reconciled; and you to endeavour with your wit to keep them so.

Step. I will do my best.

Clem. Call Master Kately, and his wife, there.

Enter KITELY and DAME KITELY.

Did I not tell you there was a plot against you? Did I not smell it out, as a wise magistrate ought? Have not you traced, have you not found it, eh, Master Kately?

Kite. I have—I confess my folly, and own I have deserved what I have suffered for it. The trial has been severe, but it is past. All I have to ask now, is, that, as my folly is cured, and my persecutors forgiven, my shame may be forgotten.

Clem. That will depend upon yourself, Master Kately; do not you yourself create the food for mischief, and the mischievous will not prey upon you. But come, let a general reconciliation go round, and let all discontents be laid aside. You, Master Downright, put off your anger. You, Master Kno'well, your cares. And do you, Master Kately, and your wife, put off your jealousies.

Kite. Sir, thus they go from me: kiss me, my wife.

See, what a drove of horns fly in the air,
Winged with my cleansed, and my credulous breath;
Watch them, suspicious eyes, watch where they fall!

See, see, on heads, that think they have none at all.

O, what a plenteous world of this will come!
When air rains horns, all may be sure of some.

Clem. 'Tis well, 'tis well. This night we will dedicate to friendship, love, and laughter. Master Bridegroom, take your bride, and lead every one a fellow. Here is my mistress, Brain-worm! to whom all my addresses of courtship shall have their reference: whose adventures this day, when our grand-children shall hear to be made a table, I doubt not but it shall find both spectators and applause.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter FACE, SUBTLE, and DOL COMMON.

FACE. BELIEVE it, I will.

SUB. Do thy worst. I dare thee.

FACE. Sirrah, I'll strip you out of all your sleights.

DOL. Nay, look ye, sovereign, general, are you madmen?

SUB. O, let the wild sheep loose. I'll gum your silk

With good strong water, an' you come.

DOL. Will you have

The neighbours hear you? Will you betray all?

FACE. Sirrah!

SUB. I shall mar

All that the taylor has made, if you approach.

FACE. You most notorious whelp, you insolent slave,

Dare you do this?

Sub. Yes faith, yes faith.

Face. Why, who

Am I, my mungrel? Who am I?

Sub. I'll tell you,

Since you know not yourself—

Face. Speak lower, rogue.

Sub. Yes, you were once (time not long passed) the good,

Honest, plain, livery-man, that kept
Your master's worship's house here in the Friars,
For the vacations.

Face. Will you be so loud?

Sub. Since, by my means, translated suburb-captain.

Face. By your means, doctor Dog?

Sub. Within man's memory,

All this I speak of.

Face. Why, I pray you, have I

Been countenanced by you, or you by me?

Do but collect, sir, where I met you first.

Sub. I do not hear well.

Face. Not of this, I think it:

But I shall put you in mind, sir; at Pyc-corner,
Taking your meal of steam in, from cooks' stalls;
Where, like the father of hunger, you did walk
Piteously costive, with your pinched-horn nose,
And your complexion of the Roman wash,
Stuck full of black and melancholic worms,
Like powder corn shot at the Artillery-yard.

Sub. I wish you could advance your voice a little.

Face. When you went pinned up in the several rags

You had raked and picked from dunghills before day;

Your feet in mouldy slippers, for your kibes;
A felt of rug, and a thin threaden cloak,
That scarce would cover your no-buttocks—

Sub. So, sir!

Face. When all your alchymy, and your algebra,

Your minerals, vegetables, and animals,
Your conjuring, cozening, and your dozen of trades,

Could not relieve your corpse with so much linen
Would make you tinder but to see a fire;

I gave you count'nance, credit for your coals,
Your stills, your glasses, your materials;
Built you a furnace, drew you customers,
Advanced all your black arts, lent you, beside,
A house to practice in—

Sub. Your master's house?

Face. Where you have studied the more thriving skill

Of bawdry since.

Sub. Yes, in your master's house.

You and the rats here kept possession.

Make it not strange.

Face. You might talk softlier, rascal.

Sub. No, you Scarabe;

I'll thunder you in pieces: I will teach you
How to beware to tempt a fury again,
That carries tempest in his hand and voice.

Dol. Nay, general, I thought you were civil.

Face. I shall turn desperate, if you grow thus loud.

Sub. And hang thyself, I care not.

Face. Hang thee, collier,

And all thy pots and pans, in picture, I will,
Since thou hast moved me—

Dol. Oh, this will o'erthrow all.

Face. Write thee up bawd in Paul's, have all thy tricks

Of cozening with a hollow coal, dust, scrapings,
Searching for things lost with a sieve and sheers,
Erecting figures in your rows of houses,
And taking in of shadows with a glass,
Told in red letters; and a face cut for thee,
Worse than Gamaliel Ratsey's.

Dol. Are you sound?

Have you your senses, masters?

Face. I will have

A book, but barely reckoning thy impostures,
Shall prove a true philosopher's stone to printers.

Sub. Away, you trencher-rascal!

Face. Out, you dog-leech,
The vomit of all prisons!

Dol. Will you be
Your own destructions, gentlemen?

Sub. Cheater!

Face. Bawd!

Sub. Cow-herd!

Face. Conjurer!

Sub. Cut-purse!

Dol. We are ruined! lost! Have you no more regard

To your reputations? Where's your judgment?
'Slight,

Have yet some care of me, of your republic—

Face. Away, this brach. I'll bring the rogue within

The statute of sorcery, tricesimo tertio

(If Harry the eighth; ay, and, perhaps, thy neck Within a noose for laundering gold, and barbing
it.

Dol. You'll bring your head within a cockscomb, will you?

[*She catches out FACE's sword, and breaks
SUBTLE's glass.*]

And you, sir, with your menstree, gather it up.

'Sdeath! you abominable pair of stinkards,
Leave off your barking, and grow one again,
Or, by the light that shines, I'll cut your throats.

I'll not be made a prey unto the marshal,

For ne'er a snarling dog-bolt o' you both.

Have you together cozened all this while,

And all the world? and shall it now be said,

You've made most courteous shift to cozen yourselves?

You will accuse him! You will bring him in Within the statute! Who shall take your word?

A whoreson, upstart, apocryphal captain,
Whom not a puritan in Black-Friars will trust

So much as for a feather! And you too

Will give the cause, forsooth! You will insult,

And claim a primacy in the divisions!

You must be chief! As if you only had

The powder to project with, and the work

Were not begun out of equality?

The venture tripartite? All things in common;
Without priority.

Face. It is his fault;

He ever murmurs, and objects his pains;

And says, the weight of all lies upon him.

Sub. Why, so it does.

Dol. How does it? Do not we Sustain our parts?

Sub. Yes, but they are not equal.

Dol. Why, if your part exceed to-day, I hope
Ours may to-morrow match it.

Sub. Ay, they may.

Dol. May, murmuring mastiff! Ay, and do.

Death on me!

Help me to throttle him.

Sub. Dorothy, mistress Dorothy!
O's precious, I'll do any thing. What do you mean?

Dol. Because of your fermentation and cibation—

Sub. Not I, by Heaven—

Dol. Your Sol and Luna—help me.

Sub. Would I were hanged then. I'll conform myself.

Dol. Will you, sir? Do so, then, and quickly: swear.

Sub. What shall I swear?

Dol. To leave your faction, sir,
And labour kindly in the common work.

Sub. Let me not breathe, if I meant ought beside.

I only used those speeches as a spur
To him.

Dol. I hope we need no spurs, sir. Do we?

Face. 'Slid, prove to-day, who shall shark best.

Sub. Agreed.

Dol. Yes, and work close and friendly.

Sub. 'Slight, the knot

Shall grow the stronger for this breach, with me.

Dol. Why so, my good baboons! Shall we go make

A sort of sober, scurvy, precise, neighbours, (That scarce have smiled twice since the king came in)

A feast of laughter at our follies? No, agree.

And may Don Provost ride a feasting long,

In his old velvet jerkin,

(My noble sovereign, and worthy general)

Ere we contribute a new crewel garter

To his most worsted worship.

Sub. Royal Dol!

Spoken like Claridiana and thyself.

Face. For which, at supper, thou shalt sit in triumph,

And not be stiled Dol Common, but Dol Proper, Dol Singular—

[One knocks.]

Sub. Who's that? [Knocks.] To the window.

Pray Heaven

The master do not trouble us this quarter!

Face. Oh, fear not him. While there dies one a week

O' the plague, he's safe from thinking toward London.

Beside, he's busy at his hop-yards now:

I had a letter from him. If he do,

He'll send such word, for airing o' the house,

As you shall have sufficient time to quit it:

Though we break up a fortnight, 'tis no matter.

Sub. Who is it, Dol?

Dol. A fine young quodling.

Face. Oh!

My lawyer's clerk, I lighted on last night

In Holborn, at the Dagger. He would have

(I told you of him) a familiar,

To ride with at horses, and win cups.

Dol. Oh, let him in.

Face. Get you

Your robes on: I will meet him, as going out.

Dol. And what shall I do?

Face. Not be seen. Away.

Seem you very reserved.

Sub. Enough.

Face. God be with you, sir.

I pray you let him know, that I was here.

His name is Dapper. I would gladly have staid, but—

Enter DAPPER.

Dap. Captain, I am here.

Sub. Who's that?

Face. He's come, I think, doctor.

Good faith, sir, I was going away.

Dap. In truth,

I am very sorry, captain.

Face. But I thought,

Sure I should meet you.

Dap. Aye, I am very glad,

I had a scurvy writ or two to make,

And I had lent my watch last night to one,

That dines to-day at the sheriff's, and so was robbed

Of my past-time. Is this the cunning man?

Face. This is his worship.

Dap. Is he a doctor?

Face. Yea.

Dap. And ha' you broke with him, captain?

Face. Ay.

Dap. And how?

Face. Faith, he does make the matter, sir, so dainty,

I know not what to say.

Dap. Not so, good captain.

Face. Would I were fairly rid on't, believe
me.

Dap. Nay, now you grieve me, sir. Why should you wish so?

I dare assure you I'll be not ungrateful.

Face. I'll tell the doctor so.

Dap. Do, good sweet captain.

Face. Come, noble doctor, pray thee, let's prevail;

This is the gentleman, and he is no Chiause.

Sub. Captain, I have returned you all my answer.

I would do much, sir, for your love—but this
I neither may, nor can.

Face. Tut, but do not say so.

You deal now with a noble fellow, doctor.

One that will thank you richly, and he's no Chiause.

Let that, sir, move you.

Sub. Pray you, forbear.

Face. He has Four angels here.

Sub. You do me wrong, good sir.

Face. Doctor, wherein? To tempt you with these spirits?

Sub. To tempt my art and love, sir, to my peril.

'Fore Heaven. I scarce can think you are my friend,

That so would draw me to apparent danger.

Face. I draw you! a horse draw you, and a halter.

You and your flies together.

Dap. Nay, good captain!

Face. That know no difference of men.

Sub. Good words, sir.

Face. Good deeds, sir, doctor Dogs-meat.

Dap. Nay, dear captain,

Use master doctor with some more respect.

Face. Hang him, proud stag, with his broad velvet head!

But for your sake, I would choak, ere I would change

An article of breath with such a puck-foist—
Come, let's be gone.

Sub. Pray you, let me speak with you.

Dap. His worship calls you, captain.

Face. I am sorry

I e'er embarked myself in such a business.

Dap. Nay, good sir, he did call you.

Face. Will he take, then?

Sub. First hear me—

Face. Not a syllable, unless you take.

Sub. Pray ye, sir—

Face. Upon no terms, but an assumpsit.

Sub. Your humour must be law.

[He takes money.]

Face. Why now, sir, talk.

Now I dare hear you with mine honour. Speak.
So may this gentleman too.

Sub. Why, sir—

Face. No whispering.

Sub. 'Fore Heaven, you do not apprehend the loss

You do yourself in this.

Face. Wherein? For what?

Sub. Marry, to be so importunate for one,
That, when he has it, will undo you all!
He'll win up all the money i' the town,
If it be set him.

Face. How?

Sub. Yes, and blow up gamester after gamester,

As they do crackers in a puppet-play.

If I do give him a familiar,

Give you him all you play for: never set him;
For he will have it.

Face. You are mistaken, doctor.

Why, he does ask one but for cups and horses,
A rising fly; none of your great familiars.

Dap. Yes, captain, I would have it for all games.

Sub. I told you so.

Face. 'Slight, that's a new business!
I understood you, a tame bird, to fly
Twice in a term, or so, on Friday nights,
When you had left the office, for a nag
Of forty or fifty shillings.

Dap. Aye, 'tis true, sir;

But I do think now I shall leave the law,
And therefore—

Face. Why, this changes quite the case!
Do you think that I dare move him?

Dap. If you please, sir;

All's one to him, I see.

Face. What! for that money?

I cannot with my conscience: nor should you
Make the request, methinks.

Dap. No, sir, I mean

To add consideration.

Face. Why, then, sir,

I'll try. Say that it were for all games, doctor.

Sub. He'll draw you all the treasure of the realm,

If it be set him.

Face. Speak you this from art?

Sub. Aye, sir, and reason too, the ground of art.

He is o' the only best complexion

The queen of Fairy loves.

Face. What! is he!

Sub. Peace!

He'll over-hear you. Sir, should she but see him—

Face. What?

Sub. Do not you tell him.

Face. Will he win at cards too?

Sub. He will, he will.

Face. Indeed! a strange success, that some men should be born to!

Sub. He hears you, man!

Dap. Sir, I'll not be ungrateful.

Face. Faith, I have confidence in his good nature:

You hear, he says he will not be ungrateful.

Sub. Why, as you please; my venture follows yours.

Face. Troth, do it, doctor; think him trusty, and make him.

He may make us both happy in an hour;
Win some five thousand pound, and send us two on't.

Dap. Believe it, and I will, sir.

Face. And you shall, sir.

You have heard all?

Dap. No, what was't? Nothing, I, sir.

Face. Nothing? [FACE takes him aside.]

Dap. A little, sir.

Face. Well, a rare star

Reigned at your birth.

Dap. At mine, sir! No.

Face. The doctor

Swears that you are—

Sub. Nay, captain, you'll tell all now.

Face. Allied to the queen of Fairy.

Dap. Who! that I am?

Believe it, no such matter.—

Face. Yes, and that

You were born with a cawl o' your head.

Dap. Who says so?

Face. Come,

You know it well enough, though you dissemble it.

Dep. I fac, I do not; you are mistaken.

Face. How?

Swear by your fac! and in a thing so known
To the doctor! How shall we, sir, trust you
In the matter? Can we ever think,
When you have won five or six thousand pound,
You'll send us shares in't, by this rate?

Dep. By Jove, sir,
I'll win ten thousand pound, and send you half.
I-fac's no oath.

Sub. No, no, he did but jest.

Face. Go to. Go thank the doctor. He's your friend,
To take it so.

Dep. I thank his worship.

Face. Do you think that will do? No, no;
Give him another angel.

Dep. Must I?

Face. Must you! 'Slight,
What else is thanks? Will you be trivial? Doctor,

When must he come for his familiar?

Dep. Shall I not ha' it with me?

Sub. Oh, good sir!
There must a world of ceremonies pass;
You must be bathed and fumigated first;
Besides, the queen of Fairy does not rise
Till it be noon.

Face. Not if she danced to-night.

Sub. And she must bless it.

Face. Did you never see
Her royal grace yet?

Dep. Whom?

Face. Your aunt of Fairy.

Sub. Not since she kissed him in the cradle, captain;

I can resolve you that.

Face. Well, see her grace,
What'er it cost you, for a thing that I know.
It will be somewhat hard to compass; but,
However, see her. You are made, believe it,
If you can see her. Her grace is a lone woman,
And very rich; and if she take a phantasy,
She will do strange things. See her, at any hand.

'Sid, she may hap to leave you all she has!
It is the doctor's fear.

Dep. How will't be done, then?

Face. Let me alone, take you no thought. Do
you

But say to me, captain, I'll see her grace.

Dep. Captain, I'll see her grace.

Face. Enough.

Sub. Who's there? [One knocks without.

anon. Conduct him forth by the back way.

At about one o'clock prepare yourself;

Till then, you must be fasting; only take

Three drops of vinegar in at your nose,

Two at your mouth, and one at either ear;

Then bathe your finger's ends, and wash your eyes,

Vol. II.

To sharpen your five senses, and cry hum
Thrice, and buz as often; and then come.

Face. Can you remember this?

Dep. I warrant you.

Face. Well, then, away. 'Tis but your bestowing

Some twenty nobles 'mong her grace's servants,
And put on a clean shirt; you do not know
What grace her grace may do you in clean linen.

Dep. Hum—buz.

[Erit.

Face. Hum—buz.

[Erit.

Sub. Come in.

Enter DRUGGER.

Drug. [Within.] I will see the doctor.

Sub. Good wives, I pray you forbear me now:
Troth, I can do you no good till afternoon.

What is your name, say you? Abel Drugger?

Drug. Yes, sir.

Sub. A seller of tobacco?

Drug. Yes, sir.

Sub. Umh.

Free of the grocers?

Drug. Yes, I'm free of the grocers.

Sub. Well—

Your business, Abel?

Drug. This, an't please your worship.
I am a young beginner, and am building
Of a new shop, an't like your worship, just
At corner of a street (here is the plot on't);
And I would know, by art, sir, of your worship,
Which way I should make my door, by necro-mancy,

And where my shelves; and which should be for boxes,

And which for pots. I would be glad to thrive, sir,
And I was wished to your worship by a gentleman,

One captain Face, that says you know men's planets,

And their good angels, and their bad.

Sub. I do,

If I do see them.

Enter FACE.

Face. What! my honest Abel!

Thou art well met here.

Drug. Troth, sir, I was speaking,
Just as your worship came here, of your worship.

I pray you speak for me to master doctor.

Face. He shall do any thing. Doctor, do you hear?

This is my friend, Abel, an honest fellow:
He lets me have good tobacco, and he Does not sophisticate it.

Drug. No, I never sophisticate.

Face. He's a neat, spruce, honest fellow, and no goldsmith.

Drug. No, I am no goldsmith.

E

Sub. He's a fortunate fellow, that I am sure on—

Face. Already, sir, have you found it! Look thee, Abel!

Sub. And in right way towards riches—

Face. Sir?

Sub. This summer

He will be of the clothing of his company,
And next spring called to the scarlet, spend what he can.

Face. What, and so little beard?

Sub. You must think,

He may have a receipt to make hair come:
But he'll be wise, preserve his youth, and fine
for it;

His fortune looks for him another way.

Face. 'Sld, dostor, how canst thou know this so soon?

I am amazed at that!

Sub. By a rule, captain,

In metaposcopy, which I do work by;
A certain star in the forehead, which you see not.
Your chesnut, or your olive-coloured face,
Does never fail: and your long ear doth promise.

I knew it, by certain spots too, in his teeth,
And on the nail of his mercurial finger.

Face. What finger's that?

Sub. His little finger. Look,

You were born upon a Wednesday?

Drug. Yes, indeed sir, and so I was.

Sub. The thumb, in chiromancy, we give Venus;

The fore-finger, to Jove; the midst to Saturn;
The ring, to Sol; the least, to Mercury;
Who was the lord, sir, of his horoscope,
His house of life being Libra; which foreshewed
He should be a merchant, and should trade with balance.

Face. Why this is strange? Is it not, honest
Nab?

Drug. Yes, very strange.

Sub. There is a ship now, coming from Ormus,
That shall yield him such a commodity
Of drugs—Come hither, Abel;
This is the west, and this is the south.

[Looking at the plan.

Drug. Yes, sir.

Sub. And those are your two sides?

Drug. Aye, sir.

Sub. Make me your door, then, south; your broadside, west:

And, on the east side of your shop, aloft,
Write Mathlai, Tasmael, and Baraborat:
Upon the north-part, Rael, Velel, Thiel.
They are the names of those mercurial spirits,
That do fright flies from boxes.

Drug. Yes, sir.

Sub. And

Beneath your threshold, bury me a loadstone;
To draw in gallants, that wear spurs; the rest
They'll seem to follow.

Face. That's a secret, Nab.

Sub. And, on your stall, a puppet, with a vice,
And a court-fucus to call city-dames.
You shall deal much with minerals.

Drug. Sir, I have
At home already.

Sub. Ay, I know, you have arsnike,
Vitriol, salt-tartre, argale, alkaly,
Cinoper: I know all. This fellow, captain,
Will come, in time, to be a distiller,
And give a say (I will not say directly,
But very fair) at the Philosopher's Stone.

Face. Why, how now, Abel! is this true?

Drug. Good captain,
What must I give?

Face. Nay, I'll not counsel thee.

Thou hear'st what wealth (he says spend what thou canst)

Thou art like to come to.

Drug. I would give him a crown.

Face. A crown! and towards such a fortune?
Heart,

Thou shalt rather give him thy shop. No gold about thee?

Drug. Yes, I have a Portague, I have kept this half year.

Face. Out on thee, Nab. 'Slight, there was such an offer!

'Shalt keep it no longer, I'll gi' it him for thee.

Drug. Will ye?

Face. Doctor, Nab prays your worship to drink this, and swears

He will appear more grateful, as your skill
Does raise him in the world.

Drug. I would intreat
Another favour of your worship.

Face. What is it, Nab?

Drug. But to look over, sir, my almanack,
And cross out my ill days, that I may neither
Bargain nor trust upon them.

Face. That he shall, Nab.

Leave it; it shall be done, 'gainst afternoon.

Sub. And a direction for his shelves.

Face. Now, Nab,

Art thou well pleased, Nab?

Drug. Thank, sir, both your worships.
I am a made man.

[Exit.

Face. Away.

Why, now you smoaky prosecutor of nature!
Now do you see, that something's to be done,
Beside your beech-coal, and your cor'sive waters,

Your crosslets, crucibles, and cucurbites?

You must have stuff brought home to you, to work on?

And yet, you think, I am at no expence
In searching out these veins, then following them,
Then trying them out. 'Fore God, my intelligence

Costs me more money than my share oft comes to
In these rare works.

Sub. You are pleasant, sir. How now?

Enter Dol.

Face. What says my dainty Dolkin?

Dol. Yonder fishwife

Will not away. And there's your giantess,
The bawd of Lambeth.

Sub. Heart, I cannot speak with them.

Dol. Not afore night, I have told them, in a voice,

Through the trunk, like one of your familiars.
But I have spied sir Epicure Mammon.

Sub. Where?

Dol. Coming along, at far end of the lane,
Slow of his feet, but earnest of his tongue,

To one, that's with him.

Sub. Face, go you, and shift.

Dol. you must presently make ready too——

Dol. Why, what's the matter?

Sub. Oh, I did look for him

With the sun's rising: marvel, he could sleep!

This is the day I am to perfect for him

The Magisterium, our great-work, the stone;

And yield it, made, into his hands; of which

He has this month talked, as he were possessed.

He's in belief of chemistry so bold,

If his dream last, he'll turn the age to gold.

[Ereunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter MAMMON and SURLY.

Mam. COME on, sir. Now you set your foot on shore

In novo orbe; here's the rich Peru:

And there within, sir, are the golden mines,

Great Solomon's Ophir! He was sailing to't

Three years, but we have reached it in ten months.

This is the day, wherein, to all my friends,

I will pronounce the happy word, Be rich.

This day you shall be spectatissimi,

And have your punques, and punquettees, my Surly,

And unto thee, I speak it first, Be rich. Face,

Where is my Subtle, there! Within, ho!

Face. [Within.] Sir, he'll come to you, by and by.

Mam. That's his fire-drake,

His lungs, his Zephyrus; he, that puffs his coals,
Till he firk Nature up in her own centre.

You are doubtful, sir. This night, I'll change

All that is metal, in my house, to gold.

And, early in the morning, will I send

To all the plumbers, and the pewterers,

And buy their tin, and lead up; and to Lothbury,

For all the copper.

Sur. What, and turn that too?

Mam. Yes, and I'll purchase Devonshire and Cornwall,

And make them perfect Indies! you admire now?

Sur. No, faith.

Mam. But when you see the effects of the great medicine,

You will believe me?

Sur. Yes, when I see it, I will.

Mam. Why,

Do you think, I fable with you? I assure you,

He that has once the flower of the sun,

The perfect ruby, which we call Elixir,

Not only can do that, but by its virtue,

Can confer honour, love, respect, long life,

Give safety, valour, yea, and victory,

To whom he will. In eight and twenty days,

I'll make an old man of fourscore a child.

Sur. No doubt; he's that already.

Mam. Nay, I mean,

Restore his years, renew him, like an eagle,

To the fifth age; make him get sons and daughters,

Become stout Marses, and beget young cupids.

Sur. The decayed vestals of Drury-Lane would thank you,

That keep the fire alive there.

Mam. 'Tis the secret

Of Nature, naturized 'gainst all infections,

Cures all diseases coming of all causes;

A month's grief in a day; a year's in twelve;

And of what age soever, in a month.

Past all the dozes of your drugging doctors.

You're still incredulous?

Sur. Faith I have a humour,

I would not willingly be gulled. Your stone
Cannot transmute me.

Mam. Surly,

Will you believe antiquity? Records?

I'll shew you a book, where Moses, and his sister,

And Solomon, have written of the art;

Aye, and a treatise penned by Adam.

Sur. How!

Mam. Of the philosopher's stone, and in high Dutch.

Sur. Did Adam, write, sir, in high Dutch?

Mam. He did.

Which proves it was the primitive tongue. How now?

Enter FACE.

Do we succeed; Is our day come? and holds it?

Face. The evening will set red upon you, sir:

You have colour for it, crimson: the red ferment

Has done his office; three hours hence, prepare
you

To see projection.

Mam. My Surly,

Again, I say to thee, aloud, be rich;

This day, thou shalt have ingots; and, to-morrow,
Give lords the affront. Is it, my Zephyrus, right?
Blushes the bolt's-head?

Face. Like a wench with child, sir,

That were, but now, discovered to her master.

Mam. Excellent witty, Lungs! My only care is,

Where to get stuff enough now, to project on.
This town will not half serve me.

Face. No, sir? Buy

The covering off o' churches.

Mam. That's true.

Face. Yes,

Let them stand bare, as do their auditory;
Or cap them new with shingles.

Mam. No, good thatch:

Thatch will lie light upon the rafters, Lungs.
Lungs, I will manumit thee from the furnace;
I will restore thee thy complexion, Puffe,
Lost in the embers; and repair this brain,
Hurt wi' the fume o' the metals.

Face. I have blown, sir,
Hard for your worship; these bleared eyes
Have waked, to read your several colours, sir;
Of the pale citron, the green lion, the crow,
The peacock's tail, the plumed swan.

Mam. And lastly,
Thou hast descryed the flower?

Face. Yes, sir.

Mam. Where's master?

Face. At his prayers, sir: he,
Good man, he's doing his devotions,
For the success.

Mam. Lungs, I will set a period
To all thy labours: thou shalt be the master
Of my seraglio.

For I do mean

To have a list of wives and concubines,
Equal with Solomon, who had the stone
Alike with me:

Thou art sure thou saw'st it, blood?

Face. Both blood and spirit, sir.

Mam. I will have all my beds blown up; not stuffed;

Down is too hard.

(Is it arrived at ruby?)—Where I spy
A wealthy citizen, or a rich lawyer,
Have a sublimed pure wife, unto that fellow
I'll send a thousand pounds, to be my cuckold.

Face. And shall I carry it?

Mam. No, I'll have no bawds,
But fathers and mothers. They will do it best,
Best of all others. And my flatterers
Shall be the pure, and gravest of divines,
That I can get for money. My meet fools,
Eloquent burgesses.

We will be brave, Puffe, now we have the medicine.

My meat shall all come in, in Indian shells.
Dishes of agate set in gold, and studded
With emeralds, sapphirs, hyacinths, and rubies.

My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calvered sal-mons,

Knots, godwits, lampreys: I myself will have
The beards of barbels served instead of sallads;
Oiled mushrooms,
Dressed with an exquisite and poignant sauce;
For which, I'll say unto my cook, there's gold,
Go forth, and be a knight.

Face. Sir, I'll go look

A little, how it heightens.

[Erit.

Mam. Do. My shirts

I'll have of taffata-sarsnet, soft and light
As cob-webs; and for all my other raiment,
It shall be such as might provoke the Persian,
Were he to teach the world riot anew.

My gloves of fishes and birds-skins, perfumed
With gums of paradise and eastern air—

Sur. And do you think to have the stone with this?

Mam. No, I do think to have all this with the stone.

Sur. Why, I have heard, he must be homo frugi,

A pious, holy, and religious man,
One free from mortal sin, a very virgin.

Mam. That makes it, sir; he is so. But I buy
it.

My venture brings it me. He, honest wretch,
A notable, superstitious, good soul,
Has worn his knees bare, and his slippers bald,
With prayer and fasting for it; and, sir, let him
Do it alone, for me, still. Here he comes.
Not a prophane word, afore him! 'tis poison.

Enter SUBTLE.

Good-morrow, father.

Sub. Gentle son, good-morrow!

And to your friend there. What is he is with
you?

Mam. An heretic that I did bring along,
In hope, sir, to convert him.

Sub. Son, I doubt

You are covetous, that thus you meet your time
I' the just point: prevent your day, at morning!
This argues something, worthy of a fear
Of importune, and carnal appetite;
Take heed, you do not cause the blessing leave
you,

With your ungoverned haste. I should be sorry
To see my labours, now c'en at perfection,
Got by long watching, and large patience
Not prosper, where my love and zeal hath placed them.

Which, in all my ends,
Have looked no way, but unto public good,
To pious uses, and dear charity,
Now grown a prodigy with men. Wherein
If you, my son, should now prevaricate,
And to your own particular lusts employ
So great and catholic a bliss, be sure,
A curse will follow, yea, and overtake
Your subtle, and most secret ways,

Mam. I know, sir.
 You shall not need to fear me. I but come,
 To have you to confute this gentleman.
Sur. Who is,
 Indeed, sir, somewhat costive of belief
 Toward your stone; would not be gulled.
Sub. Well, son.
 All, that I can convince him in, is this:
 The work is done; bright Sol is in his robe.
 We have a medicine of the triple soul;
 Thanks be to Heaven,
 And make us worthy of it! Ulen Spigel!
Face. [Within.] Anon, sir.
Sub. Look well to the register,
 And let your heat still lessen by degrees,
 To the Aludels.
 And bring me the complexion of glass B.
Face. I will, sir.
Sur. What a brave language here is! next to canting!
Sub. I have another work, you never saw, son,
 That three days since passed the philosopher's wheel,
 In the lent heat of Athanor; and is become Saphur of Nature.
Mam. But 'tis for me?
Sub. What need you?
 You have enough, in that is perfect.
Mam. Oh, but—
Sub. Why, this is covetous!
Mam. No, I assure you.
 I shall employ it all in pious uses,
 Founding of colleges and grammar schools,
 Marrying young virgins, building hospitals,
 And now and then a church.
 How now? What colour says it?

Enter FACE.

Face. The ground black, sir.
Mam. That's your crow's head?
Sur. Your cocks-comb's, is't not?
Sub. No, 'tis not perfect, would it were the crow.
 The work wants something.
Sur. Oh, I looked for this.
 The lay's a pitching.
Sub. Are you sure you loosed them
 In their own menstrual ruc?
Face. Yes, sir, and then married them
 And put them in a bolt's head, nipped to digestion,
 According as you bade me, when I set
 The liquor of Mars to circulation,
 In the same heat.
Sub. The process then was right?
Face. Yes, by the token, sir, the retort brake,
 And what was saved was put into the pellicane,
 And signed with Hermes' seal.
Sub. I think 'twas so.
 We should have a new amalgama.
Sur. Oh, this ferret
 Is rank as any pole-cat!

Sub. But I care not.
 Let him e'en die; we have enough beside,
 In embrion. H has his whit shirt on?
Face. Yes, sir.
 He's ripe for inceration: he stands warm
 In his ash fire. I would not, you should let Any die now, if I might counsel, sir,
 For luck's sake to the rest. It is not good.
Mam. He says right.
Face. Nay, I know it, sir.
Sur. Ay, are you bolted?
 I have seen the ill fortune. What is some three ounces
 Of fresh materials?
Mam. Is't no more?
Face. No more, sir,
 Of gold, & amalgame, with some six of mercury.
Mam. Away, here's money. What will serve?
Face. Ask him, sir.
Mam. How much?
Sub. Give him nine pounds: you may give him ten.
Sur. Yes. Twenty, and be cozened; do.
Mam. There 'tis.
Sub. This needs not. But that you will have it so,
 To see conclusions of all.
 Go your ways.
 Have you set the oil of Luna in Kemia?
Face. Yes, sir.
Sub. And the philosopher's vinegar?
Face. Ay. [Exit.
Sur. We shall have a sallad.
Mam. When do you make projection?
Sub. Son, be not hasty. I exalt our medicine,
 By hanging him in balneo vaporoso,
 And giving him solution, then congeal him,
 And then dissolve him, then again congeal him:
 For look, how oft I iterate the work,
 So many times I add unto his virtue.
 Get you your stuff here against afternoon,
 Your brass, your pewter, and your andirons.
Mam. Not those of iron?
Sub. Yes, you may bring them too.
 We'll change all metals.
Sur. I believe you in that.
Mam. Then I may send my spits?
Sub. Yes, and your racks.
Sur. And dripping-pans, and pot-hangers, and hooks,
 Shall he not?
Sub. If he please.
Sur. To be an ass.
Sub. How, sir!
Mam. This gentleman you must bear withal.
 I told you, he had no faith.
Sur. And little hope, sir;
 But much less charity, should I gull myself.
Sub. Why, what have you observed, sir, in our art,
 Seems so impossible?
Sur. But your whole work, no more.
 That you should hatch gold in a furnace, sir,
 As they do eggs in Egypt!

Sub. Sir, do you
Believe, that eggs are hatched so?

Sur. If I should?

Sub. Why, I think that the greater miracle;
No egg but differs from a chicken more
Than metals in themselves.

Sur. That cannot be.
The egg's ordained by Nature to that end,
And is a chicken in potentia.

Sub. The same we say of lead, and other metals,
Which would be gold, if they had time.

Mam. And that
Our art doth further.

Sub. Ay, for 'twere absurd
To think, that nature in the earth bred gold
Perfect in the instant. Something went before.
There must be remote matter.

Sur. Ay, what is that?

Enter DOLL.

Sub. Marry, we say—
God's precious—What do you mean? Go in, good lady.
Let me intreat you.—Where's this varlet?

Enter FACE.

Face. Sir.

Sub. You very knave! Do you use me thus?

Face. Wherein, sir?

Sub. Go in, and see, you traitor. Go.
[Exit FACE.]

Mam. Who is it, sir?

Sub. Nothing, sir. Nothing.

Mam. What's the matter, good sir?
I have not seen you thus distempered? Who is't?

Sub. All arts have still had, sir, their adversaries;
But ours the most ignorant. What now?

[FACE returns.]
Face. 'Twas not my fault, sir; she would speak with you.

Sub. Would she, sir? Follow me.
[Exit SUBTLE.]

Mam. Stay, Lungs.

Face. I dare not, sir.

Mam. How! Pray thee stay.

Face. She's mad, sir, and sent hither—

Mam. Stay, man, what is she?

Face. A lord's sister, sir.
He'll be mad too.

Mam. I warrant thee.
Why sent hither?

Face. Sir, to be cured.

Sur. Why, rascal?

Face. Lo you. Here, sir. [He goes out.]

Mam. 'Fore heaven, a bradamante, a brave piece.

Sur. Heart, this is a bawdy-house! I'll be burnt else.

Mam. Oh, by this light, no, do not wrong him.
He's

Too scrupulous that way. It is his vice.

No, he's a rare physician, do him right;
An excellent Paracelsian, and has done
Strange cure with mineral physic. He deals all
With spirits, he. He will not hear a word
Of Galen, or his tedious recipes.

Enter FACE.

How now, Lungs?

Face. Softly, sir, speak softly. I meant
To have told your worship all. This must not hear.

Mam. No, he will not be gulled! let him alone.

Face. You are very right, sir; she is a most rare scholar,
And is gone mad with studying Broughton's works.
If you but name a word touching the Hebrew,
She falls into her fit, and will discourse
So learnedly of genealogies,

As you would run mad too, to hear her, sir.

Mam. How might one do to have conference with her, Lungs?

Face. Oh, divers have run mad upon the conference.

I do not know, sir: I am sent in haste,
To fetch a viol. [Exit.]

Sur. Be not gulled, sir Mammon.

Mam. Wherein? Pray ye, be patient.

Sur. Yes, as you are,
And trust confederate knaves, and bawds, and whores.

Mam. You are too foul, believe it.

Enter FACE.

Come here, Ulen, one word.

Face. I dare not, in good faith.

Mam. Stay, knave.

Face. He is extreme angry, that you saw her,
sir.

Mam. Drink that. [Gives him money.] What is she, when she's out of her fit.

Face. Oh, the most affablest creature, sir, so merry!

So pleasant! she'll mount you up, like quick-silver,

Over the helm; and circulate, like oil,

A very vegetal; discourse of state,

Of mathematics, bawdry, any thing—

Mam. Is she no ways accessible? No means,
No trick to give a man a taste of her—wit—
Or so?

Sub. [Within.] Ulen!

Face. I'll come to you again, sir. [Exit.]

Mam. Surly, I did not think one of your breeding

Would traduce personages of worth.

Sur. Sir Epicure,

Your friend to use: yet, still loth to be gulled.

I do not like your philosophical bawds.

Their stone is enough to pay for,
Without this bait.

Mam. 'Heart, you abuse yourself.

*I know the lady, and her friends, and means,
The original of this disaster. Her brother
Has told me all.*

Ser. And yet you never saw her
Till now?

Mam. Oh, yes! but I forgot: I have, believe
it,
One of the treacherousest memories, I do think,
Of all mankind.

Ser. What call you her brother?

Mam. My lord—
He will not have his name known, now I think on't.

Ser. A very treacherous memory!

Mam. O' my faith!

Ser. Tut, if you ha' it not about you, pass it,
Till we meet next.

Mam. Nay, by this hand, 'tis true:
He's one I honour, and my noble friend,
And I respect his house.

Ser. Heart! can it be,
That a grave sir, a rich, that has no need,
A wise sir, too, at other times, should thus,
With his own oaths and arguments, make hard means
To gull himself!

Enter FACE.

Face. Here's one from captain Face, sir,
[To SURLY.]
Desires you to meet him in the Temple Church,
Some half hour hence, and upon earnest business.

Ser. if you please to quit us now, and come
[He whispers MAMMON.]

Again within two hours, you shall have
My master busy examining of the works;
And I will steal you in unto the party,
That you may see her converse. Sir, shall I say
You'll meet the captain's worship?

Ser. Sir, I will. [Exit FACE.]

Now, I am sure it is a bawdy-house;
I'll swear it, were the marshall here to thank me;
The naming this commander doth confirm it.
Doe FACE! why 'tis the most authentic dealer
In these commodities—The superintendant
To all the quainter traffickers in town.
Him will I prove, by a third person, to find
The subtleties of this dark labyrinth;
Which, if I do discover, dear sir MAMMON,
You'll give your poor friend leave, though no philosopher,
To laugh; for you that are, 'tis thought, shall weep.

Enter FACE.

Face. Sir, he does pray, you'll not forget.

Ser. I will not, sir.

Ser. Epicure, I shall leave you. [Exit.]

Mam. I follow you, straight.

Face. But do so, good sir, to avoid suspicion:
This gentleman has a parlous head.

Mam. But wilt thou, Ulen,
Be constant to thy promise?

Face. As my life, sir.

Mam. And wilt thou insinuate what I am, and praise me,

And say I am a noble fellow?

Face. Oh, what else, sir?

And that you'll make her royal, with the stone,
An empress, and yourself king of Bantam.

Mam. Wilt thou do this?

Face. Will I, sir!

Mam. Lungs, my Lungs!
I love thee.

Face. Send your stuff, sir, that my master
May busy himself about projection.

Mam. Thou hast witched me, rogue! Take, go.

Face. Your jack and all, sir.

Mam. Thou art a villain—I will send my jack,
And the weights too. Slave, I could bite thine ear!
Away; thou dost not care for me.

Face. Not I, sir.

Mam. Come, I was born to make thee, my good weasel;
Set thee on a bench, and have thee twirl a chain,
With the best lord's vermin of them all.

Face. Away, sir.

Mam. A count, nay, a count-palatine—

Face. Good sir, go.

Mam. Shall not advance thee better; no, nor faster. [Exit MAMMON.]

Enter SUBTLE and DOL.

Sub. Has he bit?

Face. And swallowed too, my Subtle.
I have given him line, and now he plays, i'faith.

Sub. And shall we twitch him!

Face. Through both the gills.
A wench is a rare bait.

Sub. Dol, my lord What'sbom's sister, you must now
Bear yourself stately.

Dol. Oh, let me alone.

I'll not forget my race, I warrant you.
I'll keep my distance, laugh, and talk aloud:
Have all the tricks of a proud scurvy lady,
And be as rude as her woman.

Face. Well said, Sanguine,

Sub. But will he send his andirons?

Face. His jack too;
And's iron shoeing-horn; I have spoken to him.
Well,

I must not lose my wary gamester, yonder.

Sub. Oh, monsieur Caution, that will not be gulled?

Face. Ay; if I can strike a fine hook into him,
now!

The Temple Church, there I have cast mine angle.
Well, pray for me; I'll about it. [One knocks.]

Sub. What, more gudgeons?

Dol. scout, scout! stay, Face, you must go to the door. [Exit FACE.]

Pray Heaven it be my Anabaptist. Who is't,
Dol?

Dol. I know him not. He looks like an end of gold and silver-man.

Sub. God's-so! 'tis he; he said he would send—
What call you him?

The sanctified elder, that should deal
For Mammon's jack and andirons—Let him in.
Stay,

And help me off with my gown—Away,
Madam, to your withdrawing chamber. Now,
[Exit Dol.]

In a new tune, new gesture, but old language.
This fellow is sent from one negotiates with me
About the stone too; for the holy brethren
Of Amsterdam, the exiled saints, that hope
To raise their discipline by it. I must use him
In some strange fashion now, to make him admire me.

Enter FACE and ANANIAS.

Where is my drudge?

Face. Sir.

Sub. Take away the recipient,
And rectify your menstrue from the phlegma.
Then pour it o' the sol, in the cucurbite,
And let them macerate together.

Face. Yes, sir;
And save the ground?

Sub. No; terra damnata
Must not have entrance in the work.

Who are you? [To ANANIAS.]

Ana. A faithful brother, if it please you.

Sub. What's that?

Or what is homogeneous, or heterogeneous?

Ana. I understand no heathen language, truly.

Sub. Heathen, you knipper-doling! Is ars sa- cra,

Or chrysopëia, or spagyrica,
Of the pamphysick or panarchick knowledge,
A heathen language?

Ana. Heathen Greek, I take it.

Sub. How! Heathen Greek?

Ana. All's heathen but the Hebrew.

Enter FACE.

Sub. Sirrah, my varlet, stand you forth, and speak to him
Like a philosopher: answer i' the language,
Name the vexations, and the martyrizations
Of metals in the work.

Face. Sir, putrefaction,
Solution, ablution, sublimation,
Cohobation, calcination, ceration, and Fixation.

Ana. Oh, oh!—

Sub. This is heathen Greek to you still. What is Your lapis philosophicus?

Face. 'Tis a stone, and not
A stone; a spirit, a soul, and a body;
Which, if you dissolve, it is dissolved;

If you coagulate, it is coagulated;
If you make it to fly, it flieth.

Sub. Enough.

[Exit FACE.]

This is heathen Greek to you—
What are you, sir?

Ana. Please you, a servant of the exiled brethren,

That deal with widows' and with orphans' goods,
And make a just account unto the saints;
A deacon.

Sub. Oh, you are sent from master Wholsome,
Your teacher?

Ana. From Tribulation Wholsome,
Our very zealous pastor.

Sub. Good. I have
Some orphans' goods to come here.

Ana. Of what kind, sir?

Sub. Pewter and brass, andirons and kitchen-ware;

Metals that we must use our medicine on;
Wherein the brethren may have a penn'orth,
For ready money.

Ha' you brought more money,
To buy more coals?

Ana. No, surely.

Sub. No! How so?

Ana. The brethren bid me say unto you, sir,
Surely, they will not venture any more,
Till they may see projection.

Sub. How!

Ana. You have had
For the instruments, as bricks, and loam, and glasses,
Already thirty pounds; and for materials,
They say, some ninety more: and they have heard since,

That one at Heidelberg made it of an egg,
And a small paper of pin-dust.

Sub. What's your name?

Ana. My name is Ananias.

Sub. Out! the varlet

That cozened the apostles! Hence, away!
Flee, mischief! Had your holy consistory
No name to send me of another sound
Than wicked Ananias? Send you your elders
Hither, to make atonement for you, quickly,
And give me satisfaction; or out goes
The fire, and down the alembicks, and the furnace,
If they stay threescore minutes. The acquity,
Terreity, and sulphureity,
Shall run together again, and all be annulled,
Thou wicked Ananias! [Exit ANANIAS.]

This will fetch them,
And make them haste towards their gulling more.
A man must deal like a rough nurse, and fright
Those, that are froward, to an appetite.

Enter FACE and DRUGGER.

Face. He's busy with his spirits; but we'll upon him.

Sub. How now? What mates, what baiards have we here?

Abel. I told you he would be furious. Sir, here's Nab,
He's brought ye another piece of gold to look on.

(We must appease him. Give it me.) and prays
you,

You would devise—What is it, Nab?

Drug. A sign, sir.

Face. Ay, a good lucky one; a thriving sign, doctor.

Sub. I was devising now.

Face. Slight, do not say so;
He will repent he gave you any more.

[Aside to SUBTLE.

What say you to his constellation, doctor?
The Balance?

Sub. No, that way is stale and common.
A townsman born in Taurus, gives the bull,
Or the bull's head; in Aries, the ram;
A poor device. Come hither, Abel.
No, I will have his name
Formed in some mystic character, whose radii,
Striking the senses of the passers by,
Still, by a virtual influence, breed affections,
That may result upon the party owns it:
As thus—

Drug. I don't understand it.

Face. Nab!

Sub. He shall have a bell, that's Abel.

Drug. And so it is.

Sub. And by it standing one whose name is Dee,

In a rug gown; there's D, and rug, that's Drug;
And right against him a dog snarling er:
There's Drugger, Abel Drugger.

Drug. My name!

Sub. That's his sign.

And here's now mystery and hieroglyphic!

Face. Abel, thou art made.

Drug. I do thank his worship.

Face. Six o' thy legs more will not do it, Nab.
What's got there, Nab?

Drug. A pipe of tobacco.

Face. A pipe of tobacco! Give it me.

He has brought you a pipe of tobacco, doctor.

Drug. Yes, sir—Captain Face, captain Face, your worship!

Face. What dost say, Nab?

Drug. I have another thing I would impart—

Face. Out with it, Nab.

Drug. Sir, there is lodged hard by me,
A rich young widow—

Face. Good; a bona roba!

Drug. But nineteen at the most.

Face. Very good, Abel.

Drug. Marry, she's not in fashion yet; she wears
A hood; but it stands acop.

Face. No matter, Abel.

Drug. And I do now and then give her a fucus—

Face. What! dost deal, Nab?

Sub. I did tell you, captain.

VOL. II.

Drug. And physic too, sometimes, sir; for which she trusts me
With all her mind. She's come up here of purpose

To learn the fashion.

Face. Good; on, Nab.

Drug. And she does strangely long to know her fortune.

Face. God'slid, Nab, send her to the doctor hither.

Drug. Yes, I have spoken to her of his worship already:

But she's afraid it will be blown abroad,
And hurt her marriage.

Face. Hurt it! 'Tis the way

To heal it, if 'twere hurt; to make it more Followed and sought. Nab, thou shalt tell her
this:

She'll be more known, more talked of; and your widows

Are ne'er of any price till they be famous;
Their honour is the multitude of suitors.

Send her, it may be thy good fortune. What,
Thou dost not know?

Drug. No, sir, she'll never marry
Under a knight. Her brother has made a vow.

Face. What, and dost thou despair, my little
Nab,

Knowing what the doctor has set down for thee,
And seeing so many of the city dubbed?

One glass o' thy water, with a madam, I know
Will have it done, Nab. What's her brother?
A knight?

Drug. No, sir, a gentleman, newly warm in his land, sir.

Scarce cold in his one-and-twenty, that does govern

His sister here, and is a man himself
Of some three thousand a year, and is come up
To learn to quarrel, and to live by his wits,
And go down again, and die i' the country,
When he can't live any longer here.

Face. How! to quarrel?

Drug. Yes, sir, to carry quarrels,
As gallants do; to manage them by line.

Face. 'Slid, Nab, the doctor is the only man
In Christendom for him.

Drug. Is he?

Face. He has made a table,
With mathematical demonstrations,
Touching the art of quarrels.

Drug. Has he?

Face. He will give him
An instrument to quarrel by.

Drug. Will he?

Face. Go, bring them both,
Him and his sister. And for thee, with her
The doctor haply may persuade. Go to.
Sha't give his worship a new damask suit
Upon the premises.

Sub. Oh, good captain—

Face. He shall:

F

He is the honestest fellow, doctor——Stay not;
No offers; bring the damask and the parties.

Drug. I'll try my power, sir.

Face. And thy will, too, Nab.

Sub. 'Tis good tobacco, this. What is't a pound?

Drug. I'll sell your worship a hogshhead of it.

Face. He'll send you a hogshhead, doctor.

[ABEL runs out, and FACE brings him back.

Sub. Oh, no!

Face. He will do't:

It is the gooddest soul——Abel, about it.

Thou shalt know more anon. Away, begone.

Drug. I'll give him a pound.——I'll give him two pound. [Exit.

Face. A miserable rogue, and lives with cheese,
And has the worms. That was the cause, indeed,

Why he came now. He dealt with me in private,

To get a medicine for them.

Sub. And shall, sir. This works.

Face. A wife, a wife for one of us, my dear Subtle:

We'll e'en draw lots,

But Dol must have no breath on't.

Sub. Muin.

Away you to your Surly, yonder; catch him.

Face. Pray Heaven, I have not staid too long.

Sub. I fear it. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter TRIBULATION and ANANIAS.

Trib. THESE chastisements are common to the saints;

And such rebukes we of the separation
Must bear with willing shoulders, as the trials
Sent forth to tempt our frailties.

Ana. In pure zeal,
I do not like the man. He is a Heathen,
And speaks the language of Canaan, truly.

Trib. I think him a prophane person, indeed.

Ana. Let us call on him, then.

Trib. The motion's good,
And of the spirit; I will knock first. Peace be within.

Enter SUBTLE.

Sub. Oh, are you come? 'Twas time. Your three score minutes
Were at the last thread, you see. Wicked Ananias!

Art thou returned? Nay, then, it goes down yet.

Trib. Sir, be appeased; he is come to humble
Himself in spirit, and ask your patience,
If too much zeal hath carried him aside
From the due path.

Sub. Why, this doth qualify.

Trib. The brethren had no purpose, verily,
To give you the least grievance; but are ready
To lend their willing hands to any project
The spirit and you direct.

Sub. This qualifies more.

Trib. And for the orphans' goods, let them be valued,

Or what is needful else to the holy work,
It shall be numbered. Here, by me, the saints
Throw down their purse before you.

Sub. This qualifies most!

Why, thus it should be; now you understand.
Have I discovered so unto you of our stone,
And of the good that it shall bring your cause?
Nature's miracle,
The divine secret, that doth fly in clouds

From east to west; and whose tradition
Is not from men, but spirits.

Ana. I hate traditions:

I do not trust them——

Trib. Peace.

Ana. They are popish, all.

I will not peace. I will not——

Trib. Ananias!

Ana. Please the profane, to grieve the godly.
I may not.

Sub. Well, Ananias, thou shalt overcome.

Trib. It is an ignorant zeal, that haunts him, sir:
But, truly, else, a very faithful brother.

Sub. Has he a competent sum there i' the bag,
To buy the goods within? I am made guardian,
And must for charity and conscience sake,
Now see the most be made for my poor orphans:
Though I desire the brethren too, good gainers.
There they are within. When you have view'd and bought them,

And ta'en the inventory of what they are,
They are ready for projection; there's no more
To do; cast on the medicine, so much silver
As there is tin there, so much gold as brass,
I'll give't you in by weight.

Trib. But how long time,
Sir, must the saints expect yet?

Sub. Let me see——

How's the moon now? Eight, nine, ten days
hence,

He will be silver potato; then, three days
Before he citronise: some fifteen days
The majisterium will be perfected.

Ana. About the second day of the third week
In the ninth month?

Sub. Yes.

Trib. What will the orphans' goods arise to, think you?

Sub. Some hundred marks: as much as filled three cars

Unladen now; you'll make six millions of them.
But I must ha' more coals laid in.

Trib. How?

Sub. Another load,

And then we have finished. If the holy purse Should, with this draught, fall low, and that the saints

Do need a present sum, I have a trick
To melt the pewter you shall buy now, instantly,
And, with a tincture, make you as good Dutch dollars

As any are in Holland.

Trib. Can you so?

Sub. Ay, and shall 'bide the third examination.

Ana. It will be joyful tidings to the brethren.

Sub. But you must carry it secret.

Trib. Aye; but stay:

This act of coining, is it lawful?

Ana. Lawful!

We know no magistrate; or if we did,
This is foreign coin.

Sub. It is no coining, sir;
It is but casting,

Trib. Ha! you distinguish well:
Casting of money may be lawful.

Ana. 'Tis, sir.

Trib. Truly, I take it so.

Sub. There is no scruple,
Sir, to be made of it: believe Ananias;
This case of conscience he is studied in.

Trib. I'll make a question of it to the brethren.

[Knock without.

Sub. There is some to speak with me. Go in,
I pray you,
And view the parcels. That is the inventory.
I'll come to you straight. [Exeunt TRIBULATION and ANANIAS.] Who is it? Face?
Appear.

Enter FACE.

How now? Good prize?

Face. Good pox! Yond' costive cheater Never came on.

Sub. How, then?

Face. I have walked the round
Till now, and no such thing.

Sub. And have you quit him?

Face. Quit him! an' hell would quit him too, he were happy.

'Slight! would you have me stalk like a mill-jade
All day, for one, that will not yield us grains?
I know him of old.

Sub. Oh, but to have gulled him,
Had been a mastery.

Face. Let him go, black boy!
And turn thee, that some fresh news may possess thee.

A noble court, a don of Spain,
Furnished with pistolets and pieces of eight,
Will straight be here, my rogue, to have thy bath,

(That is the colour) and to make his battery
Upon our Dol, our castle, our Cinque-port,
Our Dover-pier, our what thou wilt.
Where is the doxy?

Sub. I will send her to thee;
And but dispatch my brace of little John Ley-dens,

And come again myself.

Face. Are they within; then?

Sub. Numbering the sum.

Face. How much?

Sub. A hundred marks, boy. [Erit.

Face. Why, this is a lucky day! Ten pounds of Mammon;

Three of my clerk; a portague of my grocer;
This of the brethren; beside reversions,
And estates to come i' the widow, and my count.
My share to-day will not be bought for forty—

Enter DOL.

Dol. What?

Face. Pounds, dainty Dorothy—Art thou so near?

Dol. Yes—say, lord general, how fares our camp?

Face. This dear hour
A dainty Don is taken with my Dol;
And thou may'st make his ransom what thou wilt,
My Dousabel.

Dol. What is he, general?

Face. An Adalontado,
A Grandee, girl. Was not my Dapper here yet?

Dol. No.

Face. Nor my Druggier?

Dol. Neither.

Face. A pox on them!
They are so long a furnishing!

Enter SUBTLE.

How now? Ha' you done?

Sub. Done! They are gone. The sum
Is here in bank, my Face. I would we knew Another champion now would buy them outright.

Face. 'Slid, Nab shall do it against he have the widow,
To furnish household.

Sub. Excellent well thought on.
Pray heaven he come!

Face. I pray he keep away,
Till our new business be o'erpast.

Sub. But, Face,
How cam'st thou by this secret Don?

Face. A spirit
Brought me the intelligence in a paper here,
As I was conjuring yonder in my circle
For Surly. I ha' my flies abroad. Your bath
Is famous, Subtle, by my means. Sweet Dol,
You must go tune your virginal: no losing
O' the least time. And do you hear? His great Verdugoship has not a jot of language:
So much the easier to be cozened, my Dolly;
He will come here in a hired coach, obscure,
And our own coachman, whom I have sent to guide;

No creature else. Who's that? [One knocks.]

Sub. It is not he!

Face. Oh, no, not yet, this hour.

Sub. Who is't?

Dol. Dapper,
Your clerk.

Face. God's will! then, queen of fairy,
On with your tire; and, doctor, with your robes.
Let us dispatch him, for God's sake.

Sub. 'Twill be long.

Face. I warrant you: take but the cues I give
you,
It shall be brief enough. 'Slight, here are more!
Abel, and, I think, the angry boy, the heir,
That fain would quarrel.

Sub. And the widow?

Face. No;
Not that I see. Away.

[Ereunt SUBTLE and DOL.]

O, sirs, you are welcome!

Enter DAPPER, DRUGGER, and KASTRIL.

The doctor is within, moving for you.
I have had the most ado to win him to it.
He swears you'll be the darling of the dice.

Dap. Shall see her grace?

Face. See her, and kiss her too—What, honest Nab!

Hast brought the damask?

Drug. No, sir, here's tobacco.

Face. 'Tis well done, Nab. Thou'lt bring the damask, too?

Drug. Yes. Here's the gentleman, captain;
master Kastril,

I have brought to see the doctor.

Face. Where's the widow? [Whispers.]

Drug. Sir, as he likes, his sister (he says) shall come.

Face. Oh, is it so?

Drug. I'll introduce him. Master Kastril, captain Face.

Face. Good time. Is your name Kastril, sir?

Kas. Aye, and the best of the Kastrils; I'd be sorry else,

By fifteen hundred a-year. Where is the doctor?
My mad tobacco boy, here, tells me of one
That can do things. Has he any skill?

Face. Wherein, sir?

Kas. To carry a business, manage a quarrel fairly,

Upon fit terms.

Face. It seems, sir, you are but young
About the town, that can make that a question.

Kas. Sir, not so young, but I have heard some speech

Of the angry boys, and seen them take tobacco,
And in his shop; and I can take it too:
And I would fain be one of them, and go down
And practise in the country.

Face. Sir, for the duello,
The doctor, I assure you, shall inform you,
To the least shadow of a hair; and, then, rules

To give and take the lie by.

Kas. How! to take it?

Face. Yes, in oblique, he'll shew you, or in circle,

But never in diameter. I'll tell you his method:
First, he will enter you at some ordinary.

Kas. No, I'll come not there. You shall pardon me.

Face. For why, sir?

Kas. There's gaming there, and tricks.

Face. Why, would you be
A gallant, and not game?

Kas. Aye, 'twill spend a man.

Face. Spend you! it will repair you, when you are spent.

How do they live by their wits there, that have vented

Six times your fortune?

Kas. What, three thousand a year?

Face. Aye, forty thousand.

Here's a young gentleman

Is born to nothing, forty marks a year,
Which I count nothing. He is to be initiated,
And have a fly o' the doctor. He will win you,
By irresistible luck, within this fortnight,
Enough to buy a barony.

Kas. Do you not gull one?

Face. 'Ods my life! do you think it?

Why, Nab here knows it.

And then for making matches for rich widows,
Young gentlewomen, heirs, the fortunatest man!
He's sent to, far and near, all over England,
To have his counsel, and to know their fortunes.

Kas. Adzooks! my sister shall see him.

Face. I'll tell you, sir,

What he did tell me of Nab.

It's a strange thing;

(By the way, you must eat no cheese, Nab; it breeds melancholy,

And that same melancholy breeds worms) but pass it;

He told me, honest Nab, he was ne'er at tavern
But once in's life!

Drug. Troth, and no more I was not—

Face. And then he was so sick—

Drug. Could he tell you that too?

Face. How should I know it?

Drug. In troth, I'll tell you the whole story:
We had been a shooting,

And had a piece of fat ram mutton to supper,
That lay so heavy o' my stomach—

Face. And he has no head

To bear any wine: for what with the noise of the fidlors,

And care of his shop; for he dares keep no servant—

Drug. My head did so ache—

Face. As he was fain to be brought home,
The doctor told me. And then a good old woman—

Drug. (Yes, faith, she dwells in Sea coal-lane)
did cure me

With sudden ale, and pellitory o' the wall;
Cost me but two-pence. I had another sickness,
Was worse than that——

Face. Aye, that was the grief
Thou took'st for being 'sessed at eighteen pence,
For the water-work.

Drug. In truth, and it was like
To have cost me almost my life.

Face. Thy hair went off.

Drug. Yes;
Twas done for spite.

Face. Nay, so says the doctor.

Kas. Pray thee, tobacco boy, go fetch my sister;
I'll see this learned boy before I go;

And so shall she.

Face. Sir, he is busy now;
But if you have a sister to fetch hither,
Perhaps your own pains may command her sooner,
And he by that time will be free.

Kas. I go.

Face. Drugger, she's thine—the damask.

[Exeunt DRUGGER and KASTRIL

Subtle and I

Must wrestle for her. [Aside.] Come on, Master Dapper;

You see how I turn clients here away,
To give your cause dispatch. Have you performed

The ceremonies were enjoined you?

Dap. Yes, o' the vinegar,
And the clean shirt.

Face. 'Tis well; that shirt may do you
More worship than you think.

Ha' you provided for her grace's servants?

Dap. Yes, here are six-score Edward's shillings.

Face. Good.

Dap. And an old Harry's sovereign.

Face. Very good.

Dap. And three James's shillings, and an Elizabeth's groat;
Just twenty nobles.

Face. Oh, you are too just!
I would you had the other noble in Mary's.

Dap. I have some Philip and Mary's.

Face. Aye, those same
Are best of all. Where are they? Hark! the doctor.

Enter SUBTLE.

Sub. Is her grace's cousin come?

Face. He is come.

Sub. And is he fasting?

Face. Yes.

Sub. And hath cried hum?

Face. Thrice, you must answer.

Dap. Thrice.

Sub. And as oft, buz?

Face. If you have, say.

Dap. I have.

Sub. Then, to her coz,
Hoping that he hath vinegared his senses,
As he was bid, the fairy queen dispenses,
By me, this robe, the petticoat of fortune;
Which that he straight put on, she doth importune,

And though to fortune near be her petticoat,
Yet nearer is her smock, the queen doth note:
And therefore, even of that a piece she has sent,
Which, being a child, to wrap him in, was rent;
And prays him for a scarf, he now will wear it
(With as much love as then her grace did tear it)
About his eyes, to shew he is fortunate.

[They blind him with a rag.

And, trusting unto her to make his state,
He'll throw away all worldly pelf upon him:
Which, that he will perform, she doth not doubt him.

Face. She need not doubt him, sir. Alas! he has nothing

But what he will part withal as willingly,
Upon her grace's word (throw away your purse),
As she should ask it.

She cannot bid that thing, but he'll obey.
If you have a ring about you, cast it off,
Or a silver seal at your wrist: her grace will send
Her fairies here to search you; therefore deal Directly with her highness. If they find
That you conceal a mite, you are undone.

[He throws away as they bid him.

Dap. Truly, there's all.

Face. All what!

Dap. My money, truly.

Face. Keep nothing that is transitory about
you.

Look, the elves are come
To pinch you, if you tell not truth. Advise you.

Dap. Oh, I have a paper with a spur-ryal in't.

Face. Ti, ti,

They knew it, they say.

Dap. By this good light, I ha' nothing
But a half crown

Of gold, about my wrist, that my love gave me.
And a leaden heart I wore, sin' she forsook me.

Face. I thought 'twas something. And would you incur

Your aunt's displeasure for these trifles? Come,
I had rather you had thrown away twenty half-crowns.

You may wear your leaden heart still. [Knock.]
How now?

Enter DOL.

Sub. What news, Dol?

Dol. Yonder's your knight, sir Mammon.

Face. God's lid, we never thought of him till now.

Where is he?

Dol. Here, hard by. He's at the door.

Sub. And you are not ready now.

Dol. He must be sent back.

Face. Oh, by no means.

What shall we do with this same puffing here,
Now he's o' the spit?

Sub. Why, lay him back awhile,
With some device. Ti, ti, ti, ti. Would her grace speak with me? [Knock.

I come. Help, Dol.

Face. Who's there? Sir Epicure?

[He speaks through the key-hole, the other knocking.]

My master's i' the way. Please you to walk
Three or four turns, but till his back be turned,
And I am for you. Quickly, Dol. [Erit Dol.

Sub. Her grace
Commends her kindly to you, Master Dapper.

Dap. I long to see her grace.

Sub. She now is set

At dinner in her bed, and she has sent you,
From her own private trencher, a dead mouse,
And a piece of gingerbread, to be merry withal,
And stay your stomach, lest you faint with fast-
ing:

Yet, if you could hold out, till she saw you, (she says)

It would be better for you.

Face. Sir, he shall Hold out, an' 'twere this two hours, for her highness;

I can assure you that. We will not lose
All we ha' done——

Sub. He must not see, nor speak
To any body, till then.

Face. For that we'll put, sir,
A stay in's mouth.

Sub. Of what?

Face. Of gingerbread.
Make you it fit.

Gape, sir, and let him fit you.

Sub. Where shall we now
Bestow him?

Dol. I' the privy.

Sub. Come, along, sir,
I now must shew you fortune's privy lodgings.

Face. Are they perfumed, and his bath ready?

Sub. All.

Only the fumigation's somewhat strong.

Face. Sir Epicure, I am yours, sir, by and by.
[Excunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

FACE and MAMMON meet.

Face. Oh, sir, you are come i' the only finest time.

Mam. Where's master?

Face. Now preparing for projection, sir.
Your stuff will be all changed shortly.

Mam. Into gold?

Face. To gold and silver, sir.

Mam. Silver I care not for.

Face. Yes, sir, a little to give beggars.

Mam. Where's the lady?

Face. At hand here. I ha' told her such brave things of you,
Touching your bounty, and your noble spirit——

Mam. Hast thou?

Face. As she is almost in her fit to see you.
But, good sir, no divinity i' your conference,
For fear of putting her in a rage——

Mam. I warrant thee.

Face. The very house, sir, would run mad.—
You know it,
How scrupulous he is, and violent
'Gainst the least act of sin,

Mam. I am schooled, good Ulen.

Face. And you must praise her house, remember that,
And her nobility.

Mam. Let me alone;
No herald, nor no antiquary, Lungs,
Shall do it better. Go.

Enter Dol.

Here she comes.

Face. To him, Dol, suckle him. This is the noble knight
I told your ladyship. [Erit FACE.

Mam. Madam, with your pardon,
I kiss your vesture.

Dol. Sir, I were uncivil
If I would suffer that; my lip to you, sir.

Mam. I hope my lord, your brother, be in health, lady.

Dol. My lord, my brother is, though I no lady,
sir.

Mam. 'Tis your prerogative.

Dol. Rather your courtesy.

Mam. Were there nought else to enlarge your virtues to me,
These answers speak your breeding and your blood.

Dol. Blood we boast none, sir; a poor baron's daughter.

Mam. Poor! and gat you? Profane not. Had your father
Slept all the happy remnant of his life,
After that act,

He had done enough to make himself
And his posterity noble.

Sweet madam, let me be particular——

Dol. Particular, sir? I pray you, know your distance.

Mam. In no ill sense, sweet lady, but to ask
How your fair graces pass the hours? I see

You are lodged here i' the house of a rare man,
An excellent artist ; but what's that to you ?

Dol. Yes, sir, I study here the mathematics,
And distillation.

Mam. Oh, I cry your pardon.
He's a divine instructor.

Dol. Aye, and for his physick, sir——

Mam. Above the art of Æsculapius,
That drew the envy of the thunderer !
I know all this, and more.

Dol. Troth, I am taken, sir,
Whole with these studies, that contemplate nature.

Mam. It is a noble humour : but this form
Was not intended to so dark a use.
I muse, my lord, your brother, will permit it !
You should spend half my land first, were I he.
Does not this diamond look better on my finger
Than i' the quarry ?

Dol. Yes.

Mam. Why, you are like it.
You were created, lady, for the light !
Here, you shall wear it ; take it, the first pledge
Of what I speak, to bind you to believe me.

Dol. In chains of adamant ?

Mam. Yes, the strongest bands.
And take a secret, too : here, by your side,
Doth stand, this hour, the happiest man in Europe.

Dol. You are contented, sir ?

Mam. Nay, in true being,
The envy of princes, and the fear of states.

Dol. Say you so, sir Epicure ?

Mam. Yes, and thou shalt prove it,
Daughter of honour. I have cast mine eye
Upon thy form, and I will rear this beauty
Above all stiles.

Dol. You mean no treason, sir ?

Mam. No : I will take away that jealousy.
I am the lord of the philosopher's stone,
And thou the lady.

Dol. How, sir ! ha' you that ?

Mam. I am the master of the mastery.
This day the good old wretch here, o' the house,
Has made it for us ; now he's at projection.
Think, therefore, thy first wish now ; let me hear
it ;

And it shall rain into thy lap, no shower,
But floods of gold, whole cataracts, a deluge——

Enter FACE.

Face. Sir, you're too loud ; I hear you every word
Ino the laboratory. Some fitter place ;
The garden, or great chamber above. How like you her ?

Mam. Excellent ! Lungs. There's for thee.
[Gives money.]

Face. But do you hear ?
Good sir, beware no mention of the Rabbins.

Mam. We think not on them.

[Exit MAMMON and DOL.]

Face. Oh, it is well, sir. Subtle !

Enter SUBTLE.

Face. Dost thou not laugh !

Sub. Yes. Are they gone ?

Face. All's clear.

Sub. The widow is come.

Face. And your quarrelling disciple ?

Sub. Aye.

Face. I must to my captainship again, then.

Sub. Stay, bring them in first.

Face. So I meant. What is she ?
A bonny belle ?

Sub. I know not.

Face. We'll draw lots.

You'll stand to that ?

Sub. What else ?

To the door, man.

Face. You'll have the first kiss, 'cause I am not ready.

Sub. Yes, and perhaps hit you through both the nostrils.

Enter KASTRIL and PLIANT.

Face. Who would you speak with ?

Kas. Where's the captain ?

Face. Gone, sir,
About some business.

Kas. Gone !

Face. He'll return straight.
But, master doctor, his lieutenant, is here.

Sub. Come near, my worshipful boy, my Terra Fili.

That is, my boy of land ; make thy approaches.
Welcome : I know thy lust, and thy desires,
And I will serve and satisfy them. Begin ;
Charge me from thence, or thence, or in this line ;

Here is my centre : ground thy quarrel.

Kas. You lie !

Sub. How, child of wrath and anger ! the loud lie !

For what, my sudden boy ?

Kas. Nay, that look you to,
I am afore-hand.

Sub. O, this is no true grammar,
And as ill logick ! You must render causes,
child,

Your first and second intentions, know your canons,
And your divisions, moods, degrees, and differences,

And ha' your elements perfect——

Kas. What, is this
The angry tongue he talks in ?

Sub. That false precept
Of being afore-hand, has deceived a number,
And made them enter quarrels, oftentimes,
Before they were aware ; and afterward
Against their wills.

Kas. How must I do then, sir ?

Sub. I cry this lady mercy : she should first
Have been saluted.

I do call you lady, [Kisses her.]
 Because you are to be one, ere't be long,
 My soft and buxom widow. [He kisses her.]

Kas. Is she, i' faith?

Sub. Yes, or my heart is an egregious liar.

Kas. How know you?

Sub. By inspection on her forehead,
 And subtilty of her lip, which must be tasted
 Often, to make a judgment. [He kisses her again.]

Here is yet a line,
 In rivo frontis, tells me, he is no knight.

Pli. What is he, sir?

Sub. Let me see your hand.

Oh, your linea Fortunæ makes it plain;
 He is a soldier, or a man of art, lady;
 But shall have some great honour shortly.

Pli. Brother,
 He's a rare man, believe me!

Kas. Hold your peace.
 Here comes the other rare man.

Enter FACE.

'Save you, captain.

Face. Good master Kastril, is this your sister?

Kas. Ay, sir,
 Please to kuss her, and be proud to know her.

Face. I shall be proud to know you, lady.

Pli. Brother, he calls me lady too.

Kas. Ay, peace, I heard it.

Face. The count is come.

Sub. Why, you must entertain him.

Face. What'll you do
 With these the while?

Sub. Why have them up, and shew them
 Some fustian book, or the dark glass.

Face. 'Fore god,
 She is a delicate dab-chick! I must have her. [Exit.]

Sub. Must you? Ay, if your fortune will, you must.

Come, sir, the captain will come to us presently:
 I'll have you to my chamber of demonstrations,
 Where I'll shew you my instrument,
 That hath the several scales upon't, shall make
 you

Able to quarrel, at a straw's breadth by moonlight.

And, lady, I'll have your look in a glass,
 Some half an hour, but to clear your eye-sight,
 Against you see your fortune; which is greater
 Than I may judge upon the sudden, trust me.

[Exit.]

Enter FACE.

Face. Where are you, doctor?

Sub. [within.] I'll come to you presently.

Face. I will have this same widow, now I have seen her,
 On any composition.

Enter SUBTLE.

Sub. What do you say?

Face. Have you disposed of them?

Sub. I have sent them up.

Face. Subtle, in troth, I needs must have this widow.

Sub. Is that the matter?

Face. Nay, but hear me.

Sub. Go to,

If you rebel once, Dol shall know it all.
 Therefore be quiet, and obey your chance.

Face. Nay,

But understand: I'll give you composition.

Sub. I will not treat with thee. What, sell my fortune?

'Tis better than my birth-right. Do not murmur.
 Win her, and carry her. If you grumble, Dol Knows it directly.

Face. Well, sir, I am silent.

Will you go help to fetch in Don in state?

Sub. I follow you, sir. We must keep Face in awe,

Or he will overlook us like a tyrant. [Aside.]
 Brain of a taylor! Who comes here? Don John?

Enter SURLY like a Spaniard.

Sur. Sennores, beso las manos, a vuestras mer- cedes.

Sub. Don, your scurvy, yellow, Madrid face is welcome.

Sur. Gratia.

Sub. He speaks out of a fortification.

Pray god, he ha' no squibs in those deep sets.

Sur. Por dios, sennores, muy linda casa!

Sub. What says he?

Face. Praises the house, I think;
 I know no more but's action.

Sub. Yes, the Casa,

My precious Diego, will prove fair enough
 To cozen you in. Do you mark? You shall Be cozened, Diego.

Face. Cozened, do you see?

My worthy Donzel, cozened.

Sur. Entiendo.

Sub. Do you intend it? So do we, dear Don.
 Have you brought pistolets, or portagues,
 My solemn Don? Dost thou feel any?

Face. Full. [He feels his pockets.]

Sub. You shall be emptied, Don, pumped and drawn

Dry, as they say.

Face. 'Slid, Subtle, how shall we do!

Sub. For what?

Face. Why Dol's employed, you know.

Sub. That's true.

'Fore Heaven, I know not:
 Mammon must not be troubled.

Face. Mammon? in no case.

Think; you must be sudden.

Sur. Entiendo, qua la senhora es tan hermosa, que codicio tan a ver la, como la bien aventuranza de mi vida.

Face. Mi vida? 'Slid, Subtle, he puts me in mind of the widow.

What dost thou say to draw her to't? Ha!
And tell her it is her fortune?

Sub. Dispatch, and call her brother, too.
[Exit FACE.]

Sur. Tengo, duda, sennores, que no me hagan alguna traycion.

Sub. How, issue on? Yes, prasto sennor. Please you Eathratha the Chambratha, worthy Don?
Where, if you please the fates, in your Bathada,
You shall be soaked, and stroaked, and tubbed,
and rubbed,
And scrubbed, and fubbed, dear Don, before you go.
You shall, in faith, my scurvy baboon Don,
Be curried, clawed, and flawed, and tawed, indeed.

[Exit SURLY.]

I will the heartlier go about it now,
And make the widow a punk so much the sooner,
To be revenged on this impetuous Face:
The quickly doing of it is the grace.

Enter FACE, KASTRIL, and PLIANT.

Face. Come, lady; I knew the doctor would not leave,
Till he had found the very nick of her fortune.
Kas. To be a countess, say you? A Spanish countess, sir?

Pl. Why, is that better than an English countess?

Face. Better! 'Slight, make you that a question, lady?

Enter SUBTLE.

Here comes the doctor.

Sub. My most honoured lady,
(For so I am now to stile you, having found,
By this my scheme, you are to undergo
An honourable fortune, very shortly)
What will you say now, if some——

Face. I have told her all, sir;
And her right worshipful brother here, that she shall be
A countess; do not delay them, sir; a Spanish countess.

Sub. Still, my scarce worshipful captain, you can keep
No secret. Well, since he has told you, madam,
Do you forgive him, and I do.

Kas. She shall do that, sir;
I'll look to't, 'tis my charge.

Sub. Well, then, nought rests
But that she fit her love now to her fortune.

Pl. Truly, I shall never brook a Spaniard.

Sub. No?

Pl. Never since eighty-eight could I abide them.

Vol. II.

And that was some three year afore I was born, in truth.

Sub. Come, you must love him, or be miserable.

Kas. Gods'lid you shall love him, or I'll kick you.

Pl. Why?

I'll do as you will ha' me, brother.

Kas. Do.

Or by this hand you are not my suster,
If you refuse.

Pl. I will not refuse, brother.

Enter SURLY.

Sur. Que es esto, sennores, que non se venga? Esta tardanza me mata!

Face. It is the count come;
The doctor knew he would be here, by his art.

Sub. En gallanta madama, don! gallantissima!

Sur. Par todos los dioses, le mas acabada Hermosura, que he visto en mi vida!

Face. Is't not a gallant language, that they speak?

Kas. An admirable language! Is't not French?

Face. No, Spanish, sir.

Kas. It goes like law-French;
And that, they say, is the courtliest language.

Face. List, sir.

Sur. Valga me dios.

Face. He admires your sister.

Kas. Must not she make a cartsy?

Sub. Od's will, she must go to him, man, and kiss him!

It is the Spanish fashion for the women
To make first court. Sir?

Sur. Por el amor de dios, que es esto, que se tarda?

Kas. Nay, see; she will not understand him! Gull!

Noddy!

Pl. What say you, brother?

Kas. Ass, my suster!

Go kuss him, as the cunning man would ha' you,

Sur. Sennora, si sera servida, entremus.

Kas. Where does he carry her?

[Exeunt SURLY and PLIANT.]

Face. Into the garden, sir;

Take you no thought; I must interpret for her.

Sub. Give Dol the word. [Exit FACE.] Come, my fierce child, advance.

We'll to our quarrelling lesson again.

Kas. Agreed.

I love a Spanish boy with all my heart.

Sub. Nay, by this means, sir, you shall be brother

To a great count.

Kas. Ay, I knew that at first.

This match will advance the house of the Kastrels.

Sub. Pray God your sister prove but pliant.

Kas. Why,

Her name is so by her other husband.

G

Sub. How !
Kas. The widow Pliant. Knew you not that ?
Sub. Yes, yes, I knew it by my art.
 Come, let's go to practise.
Kas. Yes ; but do you think, doctor,
 I e'er shall quarrel well ?
Sub. I warrant you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Another Apartment.

Enter DOL and MAMMON.

Dol. For, after Alexander's death——
 [In her fit of talking.]
Mam. Good lady——
Dol. That Perdiccas and Antigonus were slain,
 The two that stood, Seleuc' and Ptolmee——
Mam. Madam.
Dol. Made up the two legs, and the fourth beast,
 That was Gog-north, and Egypt-south ; which after
 Was called Gog-iron-leg, and South-iron-leg——
Mam. La——
Dol. And then Gog-horned. So was Egypt,
 too.
 Then Egypt-clay-leg, and Gog-clay-leg.
Mam. Sweet madam.
Dol. And last Gog-dust, and Egypt-dust, which fall
 In the last link of the fourth chain. And these
 Be stars in story, which none see or look at——
Mam. What shall I do ?
Dol. For, as he says, except
 We call the rabins, and the heathen Greeks——
Mam. Dear lady !
Dol. To come from Salem, and from Athens,
 And teach the people of Great-Britain——

Enter FACE.

Face. What's the matter, sir.
Dol. To speak the tongue of Eber and Javan——
Mam. Oh, she's in her fit.
Dol. We shall know nothing——
Face. Death, sir,
 We are undone. My master will hear !
Sub. [within.] What's to do there ?
Face. Oh, we are lost. Now she hears him, she is quiet.
Mam. Where shall I hide me ?
 [Upon SUBTLE'S entry, they disperse.]
Sub. How, what sight is here !
 Close deeds of darkness, and that shun the light !
 Bring him again ; who is he ?—What, my son !
 Oh, I have lived too long.
Mam. Nay, good, dear father,
 There was no unchaste purpose.
Sub. No ? and flee me,
 When I come in ?
Mam. That was my error.
Sub. Error ?
 Guilt, guilt, my son. Give it the right name. No marvel

If I found check in our great work within,
 When such affairs as these were managing !
Mam. Why, have you so ?
Sub. It has stood still this half hour ;
 And all the rest of our less works gone back.
 Where is the instrument of wickedness,
 My lewd false drudge ?
Mam. Nay, good sir, blame not him ;
 Believe me, 'twas against his will or knowledge.
 I saw her by chance.
Sub. Will you commit more sin
 To excuse a varlet ?
Mam. By my hope, 'tis true, sir.
Sub. Nay, then, I wonder less, if you, for whom
 The blessing was prepared, would so tempt heaven,
 And lose your fortunes.
Mam. Why, sir ?
Sub. This will retard
 The work, a month at least.
Mam. Why, if it do,
 What remedy ? but think it not, good father :
 Our purposes were honest.
Sub. As they were,
 So the reward will prove.
 [A great crack, and noise within.]
 How now ! Ay me !
 God, and all saints be good to us ! What's that ?
Face. Oh, sir, we are defeated : all the works
 Are flown in fumo :
 Retorts, receivers, pellicanes, bolt-heads,
 All struck in shivers ! Help, good sir ! alas !
 [SUBTLE falls down as in a swoon.]
 Coldness and death invade him. Nay, sir Mammon,
 Do the fair office of a man ! You stand,
 As you were readier to depart than he.
 [One knocks.]
 Who's there ? My lord, her brother, is come !
Mam. Ha, Lungs ?
Face. His coach is at the door. Avoid his sight,
 For he's as furious as his sister is mad.
 [One knocks.]
Mam. Alas !
Face. My brain is quite undone with the fume,
 sir.
 I ne'er must hope to be mine own man again.
Mam. Is all lost, Lungs ? Will nothing be preserved,
 Of all our cost ?
Face. Faith, very little, sir :
 A peck of coals or so, which is cold comfort, sir.
Mam. Oh, my voluptuous mind ! I'm justly punished.
Face. And so am I, sir.
Mam. Cast from all my hopes——
Face. Nay, certainties, sir.
Mam. By mine own base affections.
Sub. Oh, the cursed fruits of vice and lust !
 [SUBTLE seems to come to himself.]
Mam. Good father,

It was my sin. Forgive it.
Sub. Hangs my roof
 Over us still, and will not fall, Oh justice!
 Upon us, for this wicked man?
Face. Nay, look, sir,
 You grieve him now with staying in his sight:
 Good sir, the nobleman will come too, and take
 you,
 And that may breed a tragedy.
Mam. I'll go.
Face. Aye, and repent at home, sir. It may be,
 For some good penance you may have it yet;
 A hundred pounds to the box at Bethlem.
Mam. Yes.
Face. For the restoring such as ha' lost their wits.
Mam. I'll do it.
Face. I'll send one to you to receive it.
Mam. Do.
 Is no projection left?
Face. All blown, or stinks, sir.
Mam. Will nought be saved that's good for medicine, think'st thou?
Face. I cannot tell, sir. There will be, perhaps,
 Something, about the scraping of the shards,
 Will cure the itch:
 It shall be saved for you, and sent home. Good
 sir,
 This way, for fear the lord should meet you.
 [Exit MAMMON.]

Sub. Face.
Face. Ay.
Sub. Is he gone?
Face. Yes, and as heavily
 As all the gold he hoped for were in his blood.
 Let us be light though.
Sub. Ay, as balls, and bound
 And hit our heads against the roof for joy:
 There's so much of our care now cast away.
Face. Now to our Don.
Sub. Yes, your young widow, by this time,
 Is made a countess. She's now in travail
 Of a young heir for you.
Face. Good, sir.
Sub. Off with your case,
 And greet her kindly, as a bridegroom should,
 After these common hazards.
Face. Very well, sir.
 Will you go fetch don Diego off the while?
Sub. And fetch him over, too, if you'll be pleased, sir.
 Would Dol were in her place to pick his pockets
 now.
Face. Why, you can do it as well, if you would set to it.
 I pray you prove your virtue.
Sub. For your sake, sir. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Alchymist's room.

Enter SURLY and DAME PLIANT.

Sur. Lady, you see into what hands you are fallen!
 'Mongst what a nest of villains! and how near
 Your honour was to have caught a certain ruin,
 (Through your credulity) had I but been
 So punctually forward, as place, time,
 And other circumstances would have made a
 man:
 For you're a handsome woman; would you were wise too!
 I am a gentleman come here disguised,
 Only to find the knaveries of this citadel,
 And, where I might have wronged your honour,
 and have not,
 I claim some interest in your love. You are,
 They say, a widow, rich; and I am a batchelor,
 Worth nought: your fortunes may make me a
 man,
 As mine have preserved you a woman. Think upon it,
 And whether I have deserved you, or no.
Pli. I will, sir.
Sur. And for these household-rogues, let me alone
 To treat with them.

Enter SUBTLE.

Sub. How doth my noble Diego?
 And my dear madam countess? Hath the count
 Been courteous, lady? liberal and open?
 Donsel, methinks you look melancholic,
 I do not like the dulness of your eye;
 Be lighter; I will make your pockets so.
 [He falls to picking of them.
Sur. Will you, don bawd, and pick-purse?
 How now? Reel you? [Strikes him.
 Stand up, sir; you shall find, since I am so heavy,
 I'll give you equal weight.
Sub. Help, murder!
Sur. No, sir, there's no such thing intended.
 A good cart,
 And a clean whip, shall ease you of that fear.
 I am the Spanish don, that should be cozened,
 Do you see? Cozened! Where's your captain Face?

Enter FACE.

Face. How, Surly!
Sur. Oh, make your approach, good captain.
 I have found, from whence your copper rings and spoons
 Come now, wherewith you cheat abroad in taverns.
 And this doctor,
 Your sooty, smoaky-bearded compeer, he

Kat. I'll return him, then.

Face. Dragger, this rogue prevented us; for thee,

We had determined that thou shouldst have come
In a Spanish suit, and have carried her so; and he,
A brokerly slave, goes, puts it on himself.

Hast brought the damask?

Drag. Yes, sir.

Face. Thou must borrow

A Spanish suit. Hast thou no credit with the players?

Drag. Yes, sir. Did you never see me play the fool?

Face. Thou shalt, if I can help it.

Hieronymo's old cloak, ruff, and hat will serve;

[SUBTLE hath whispered him this while.

I'll tell thee more when thou bring'st them.

[Erit DRUGGER.

Ana. Sir, I know

The Spaniard hates the brethren, and hath spies
Upon their actions: and that this was one,
I make no scruple.

And 'tis revealed no less to them than me,
That casting of money is most lawful.

Sub. True;

But here I cannot do it. If the house
Should chance to be suspected, all would out,
And we be locked up in the Tower for ever,
To make gold there for the state; never come out;

And then you are defeated.

Ana. I will tell

This to the elders, and the weaker brethren,
That the whole company of the separation
May join in humble prayer again.

Sub. And fasting.

Ana. Yea, for some fitter place. The peace of mind

Rest within these walls! [Erit ANANIAS.

Sub. Thanks, courteous Ananias.

Face. What did he come for?

Sub. About casting dollars,
Presently out of hand. And so I told him,
A Spanish minister came here to spy
Against the faithful.

Face. I conceive. Come, Subtle.

Thou art so down upon the least disaster!
How wouldst thou ha' done, if I had not helped thee out?

Sub. I thank thee, Face, for the angry boy,
I faith.

Face. Who would have looked it should have been that rascal, Surly?

Well, sir,

Here's damask come to make you a suit.

Sub. Where's Dragger?

Face. He's gone to borrow me a Spanish habit.
I'll be the count now.

Sub. But where's the widow?

Face. Within, with my lord's sister: madam
Dol

Is entertaining her.

Sub. By your favour, Face;

Now she is honest, I will stand again.

Face. You will not offer it?

Sub. Why?

Face. Stand to your word,
Or——here comes Dol; she knows——

Sub. You are tyrannous still.

Face. Strict for my right.

Enter DOL.

How now, Dol? Hast told her
The Spanish count will come?

Dol. Yes; but another is come
You little looked for.

Face. Who's that?

Dol. Your master;

The master of the house.

Sub. How, Dol!

Face. She lies.

This is some trick. Come, leave your quibblings, Dorothy.

Dol. Look out and see.

Sub. Art thou in earnest?

Dol. 'Slight!

Forty o' the neighbours are about him, talking.

Face. 'Tis he, by this good day!

Dol. 'Twill prove an ill day

For some of us.

Face. We are undone, and taken.

Dol. Lost, I'm afraid.

Sub. You said he would not come
While there died one a week, within the liberties.

Face. No; 'twas within the walls.

Sub. What shall we do now, Face?

Face. Be silent; not a word, if he call or knock.

I'll into mine old shape again, and meet him,
Of Jeremy the butler. In the mean time,
Do you two pack up all the goods and purchase,
That we can carry i' the two trunks. I'll help
him

Off for to day, if I cannot longer; and then,
At night, I'll ship you both away to Ratcliff,
Where we'll meet to-morrow, and there we'll share.

Let Mammon's brass and pewter keep the cellar——

We'll have another time for that. [Ereunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A Street.

Enter LOVEWIT and Neighbours.Love. Has there been such resort, say you?1 Nei. Daily, sir.2 Nei. And nightly, too.3 Nei. Ay, some as brave as lords.4 Nei. Ladies and gentlewomen.5 Nei. Citizens' wives, and knights in coaches.2 Nei. Yes, and oyster-women.1 Nei. Beside other gallants.3 Nei. Sailor's wives.4 Nei. Tobacco-men.5 Nei. Another Pimlico!

Love. What device should he bring forth now?
I love a teeming wit as I love my nourishment.
Pray, Heaven, he have not kept such open house,
That he hath sold my hangings and my bedding;
I left him nothing else. If he have eat them,
A plague o' the mouth, say I.

When saw you him?

1 Nei. Who, sir? Jeremy?2 Nei. Jeremy, butler?

We saw him not this month.

Love. How!4 Nei. Not these five weeks, sir.6 Nei. These six weeks, at the least.Love. Ye amaze me, neighbours!5 Nei. Sure, if your worship know not where he is,

He's slipped away.

6 Nei. Pray, Heaven, he be not made away.[He knocks.]Love. Ha! It is no time to question, then.6 Nei. AboutSome three weeks since, I heard a doleful cry,
As I sat up, a mending my wife's stockings.Love. This is strange, that none will answer!
Didst thou hear

A cry, say'st thou?

6 Nei. Yes, sir, like unto a manThat had been strangled an hour, and could not speak.2 Nei. I heard it, too, just this day three weeks, at two o'clock

Next morning.

Love. These be miracles, or you make them so.A man an hour strangled, and could not speak,
And you both heard him cry!3 Nei. Yes, downward, sir.Love. Thou art a wise fellow. Give me thy hand, I pray thee.

What trade art thou?

3 Nei. A smith, an't please your worship.Love. A smith! then lend me thy help to get this door open.3 Nei. That I will, presently, sir; but fetch my tools. [Exit.]1 Nei. Sir, best to knock again, afore you break it.Enter FACE.Love. I will.Face. What mean you, sir?All Nei. Oh, here's Jeremy!Face. Good sir, come, from the door.Love. Why, what's the matter?Face. Yet farther; you are too near yet.Love. In the name of wonder, what means the fellow?Face. The house, sir, has been visited.Love. Stand thou, then, farther.Face. No, sir, I had it not.Love. Who had it then? I left None else but thee i' the house.

Face. Yes, sir, my fellow,
The cat, that keeps the buttery, had it on her
A week before I spied it; but I got her Conveyed away i' the night. And so I shut
The house up for a month——

Love. How!

Face. Purposing then, sir,
To have burnt rose-vinegar, treacle, and tar,
And have made it sweet, that you should ne'er have known it.
Because I knew the news would but afflict you,
sir.

Love. Why, this is stranger!
The neighbours tell me all, here, that the doors
Have still been open——

Face. How, sir!

Love. Gallants, men, and women,
And of all sorts, tag-rag, been seen to flock here
In threaves, these ten weeks, as to a second hog'sden,

In days of Pimlico and Eye-bright.

Face. Sir,

Their wisdoms will not say so!

Love. To-day, they speak
Of coaches and gallants; one in a French hood
Went in, they tell me; and another was seen
In a velvet gown, at the window; divers more
Pass in and out

Face. They did pass through the doors, then,
Or walls, I assure their eye-sights, and their spectacles;

For here, sir, are the keys, and there have been,
In this my pocket, now above twenty days.
For, on my faith to your worship, for these three weeks,

And upwards, the door has not been opened.

Love. Strange!4 Nei. Good faith, I think I saw a coach.

Love. Do you but think it now?
And but one coach?

4 Nei. We cannot tell, sir; Jeremy
Is a very honest fellow.

Face. Did you see me at all?

1 Nei. No; that we are sure on.

Love. Fine rogues to have your testimonies built on!

Re-enter 3d Neighbour.

3 Nei. Is Jeremy come?

1 Nei. Oh, yes; you may leave your tools; We were deceived; he says he has had the keys, And the door has been shut these three weeks.

3 Nei. Like enough.

Love. Peace, and get hence, you changelings!

Face. [Aside.] Surly come! And Mammon made acquainted! They'll tell all. How shall I beat them off? What shall I do? Nothing's more wretched than a guilty conscience.

Enter SURLY and MAMMON.

Sur. No, sir, he was a great physician. This, It was no bawdy-house, but a mere chancel. You knew the lord and his sister.

Mam. Nay, good Surly—

Sur. The happy word, be rich—

Mam. Play not the tyrant.

Sur. Should be to-day pronounced to all your friends.

And where be your andirons, now, and your brass-pots, That should have been golden flaggons, and great wedges?

Mam. Let me but breathe. What, they have shut their doors,

Methinks.

Sur. Aye, now, 'tis holiday with them.

Mam. Rogues,

Cozeners, impostors, bawds!

Face. What mean you, sir?

[MAMMON and SURLY knock.]

Mam. To enter, if we can.

Face. Another man's house! Here is the owner, sir; turn to him, And speak your business.

Mam. Are you, sir, the owner?

Love. Yes, sir.

Mam. And are those knaves within your cheaters?

Love. What knaves, what cheaters?

Mam. Subtle, and his Lungs.

Face. The gentleman is distracted, sir. No Lungs,

Nor lights have been seen here these three weeks, sir,

Within these doors, upon my word.

Sur. Your word!

Groom arrogant.

Face. Yes, sir; I am the housekeeper, And know the keys have not been out of my hands.

Sur. This is a new face.

Face. You do mistake the house, sir. What sign was't at!

Sur. You rascal! this is one

O' the confederacy. Come, let's get officers, And force the door.

Love. Pray you, stay, gentlemen.

Sur. No, sir, we'll come with warrant.

Mam. Aye, and then

We shall have your doors open.

[Ereunt SURLY and MAMMON.]

Love. What means this?

Face. I cannot tell, sir.

1 Nei. These are two o' the gallants, That we do think we saw.

Face. Two of the fools!

You talk as idly as they. Good faith, sir, I think the moon hath crazed them all! Oh, me, The angry boy come too! He'll make a noise, And ne'er away till he have betrayed us all.

[Aside.]

Enter KASTRIL.

Kas. What rogues, bawds, slaves! you'll open the door anon. [KASTRIL knocks.]

Punk, cockatrice, my suster. By this light I'll fetch the marshall to you.

Face. Who would you speak with, sir?

Kas. The bawdy doctor, and the cozening captain,

And puss, my suster.

Love. This is something, sure!

Face. Upon my trust, the doors were never open, sir.

Kas. I have heard all their tricks told me twice over,

By the fat knight, and the lean gentleman.

Love. Here comes another.

Face. Ananias too!

And his pastor!

[Aside.]

Enter ANANIAS and TRIBULATION.

Ana. Come forth, you seed of sulphur, sons of fire;

Your stench is broke forth: abomination Is in the house.

Kas. Aye, my suster's there.

Ana. The place

Is become a cage of unclean birds.

Kas. Yes, I will fetch the scavenger and the constable.

Trib. You shall do well.

Ana. We'll join to weed them out.

Kas. You will not come, then, punk device, my suster?

Ana. Call her not sister. She's a harlot, verily.

Kas. I'll raise the street.

Love. Good gentlemen, a word—

Ana. Satan, avoid, and hinder not our zeal.

Love. The world's turned Bedlam!

Face. These are all broke loose Out of St Katharine's, where they use to keep The better sort of mad folks.

1 Nei. All these persons We saw go in and out here,

2 Nei. Yes, indeed, sir.

3 Nei. These were the parties.

Face. Peace, you drunkards. Sir,
I wonder at it! Please you to give me leave
To touch the door: I'll try an' the lock be changed.

Love. It amazes me!

Face. Good faith, sir, I believe
There's no such thing. 'Tis all deceptio visus.
Would I could get him away!

[DAPPER cries out within.]

Dap. Master captain, master doctor.

Love. Who's that?

Face. Our clerk within, that I forgot! [Aside.]
I know not, sir.

Dap. For God's sake, when will her grace be at leisure?

Face. Ha!

Illusions, some spirit o' the air!—His gag is melted,

And now he sets out the throat. [Aside.

Dap. I'm almost stifled.

Face. Would you were altogether! [Aside.

Love. 'Tis in the house.

Ha! list—

Face. Believe it, sir, in the air.

Love. Peace, you—

Dap. Mine aunt's grace does not use me well.

Sub. You fool,

Peace, you'll mar all.

Face. Or you will else, you rogue.

Love. Oh, is it so? Then you converse with spirits.

Come, sir, no more o' your tricks, good Jeremy;
The truth's the shortest way.

Face. Dismiss this rabble, sir.

What shall I do? I am caught. [Aside.

Love. Good neighbours,

I thank you all. You may depart. Come, sir,
You know, that I am an indulgent master;
And therefore conceal nothing. What's your medicine,

To draw so many several sorts of wild-fowl?

Face. Sir, you were wont to affect mirth and wit:

(But here's no place to talk on't in the street.)

Give me but leave to make the best of my fortune,

And only pardon me the abuse of your house;

'Tis all I beg. I'll help you to a widow,

In recompense, that you shall give me thanks
for,

Will make you seven years younger, and a rich
one.

'Tis but your putting on a Spanish cloak;

I have her within. You need not fear the house;
It was not visited.

Love. But by me, who came Sooner than you expected.

Face. It is true, sir.

Pray you, forgive me.

Love. Let's see your widow.

[Ereunt.

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter SUBTLE, DAPPER, and DOL.

Sub. How! ha' you eaten your gag?

Dap. Yes, faith, it crumbled
Away in my mouth.

Sub. You ha' spoiled all then.

Dap. No;

I hope my aunt of Fairy will forgive me.

Sub. Your aunt's a gracious lady; but, in troth,
You were to blame.

Dap. The fume did overcome me,
And I did do't to stay my stomach. Pray you,
So satisfy her grace.

Enter FACE.

Face. How now! Is his mouth down?

Sub. Ay, he has spoken.

Face. A pox! I heard him, and you too—He's undone, then—

I have been fain to say the house is haunted
With spirits, to keep churl back.

Sub. And hast thou done it?

Face. Sure, for this night.

Sub. Why, then, triumph and sing
Of Face so famous, the precious king
Of present wits!

Face. Did you not hear the coil
About the door?

Sub. Yes, and I dwindled with it.

Face. Shew him his aunt, and let him be dispatched:

I'll send her to you.

Druggier is at the door; go take his suit,

And bid him fetch a parson presently.

Say, he shall marry the widow.

[Ereunt DAPPER and SUBTLE.

Now, queen Dol,

Ha' you packed up all?

Dol. Yes.

Face. And how do you like
The lady Pliant?

Dol. A good dull innocent.

Re-enter SUBTLE.

Sub. Here's your Hieronymo's cloak and hat.

Face. Give me them.

Sub. And the ruff, too.

Face. Yes; I'll come to you presently. [Exit.

Sub. Now is he gone about his project, Dol,
I told you of, for the widow.

Dol. 'Tis direct
Against our articles.

Sub. Well, we'll fit him, wench.

Hast thou gulled her of her jewels, or her bracelets?

Dol. No, but I will do't.

Sub. Soon at night, my Dolly,
When we are shipped, and all our goods aboard,
Eastward for Ratcliff, we will turn our course
To Brainford, westward, if thou say'st the word,

And take our leave of this o'erweening rascal,
This peremptory Face.

Dol. Content; I'm weary of him.

Sub. We'll tickle it at the pigeons,
When we have all, and may unlock the trunks,
And say, this is mine and thine, and thine and mine. [They kiss.]

Enter FACE.

Face. What now, a billing?

Sub. Yes, a little exalted,
In the good passage of our stock affairs.

Face. Come, my venturers,
You ha' packed up all? Where be the trunks?
Bring forth.

Sub. Here.

Face. Let us see them. Where's the money?

Sub. Here.

Face. The brethren's money, this. Druggier's and Dapper's in this,
Mammon's ten pounds: eight score before.

Where be the French petticoats,
And girdles, and hangers?

Sub. Here i' the trunk,
And the bolts of lawn.

Face. Is Druggier's damask there?

Sub. Yes.

Face. Give me the keys.

Dol. Why you the keys?

Sub. No matter, Dol; because
We shall not open them, before he comes.

Face. 'Tis true, you shall not open them, indeed;
Nor have them forth. Do you see? Not forth,
Dol.

Dol. No!

Face. No, my smock-rampant. The right is, my master
Knows all, has pardoned me, and he will keep
them;

Doctor, 'tis true (you look) for all your figures:
I sent for him indeed. Wherefore, good partners,

Both he, and she, be satisfied: for here
Determines the indenture tripartite,
Twixt Subtle, Dol, and Face. All I can do,
Is to help you over the wall, o' the backside;
Or lend you a sheet to save your velvet gown,
Dol.

Here will be officers presently; bethink you
Of some course suddenly to 'scape the dock;
For thither you'll come else. Hark you! thunder.
[Some knock.]

Sub. You are a precious fiend!

Off. Open the door. [Outside.]

Face. Dol, I am sorry for thee i' faith. But, hear'st thou?

It shall go hard, but I will place thee somewhere:

Thou shalt have my letter to mistress Amo.

Dol. Hang you——

Face. Or madam Cæsarean.

VOL. II.

Dol. Pox upon you, rogue:

Would I had but time to beat thee! [Exit Dol.]

Face. Subtle,

Let's know where you set up next: I'll send you
A customer, now and then, for old acquaintance:

What new course have you?

Sub. Rogue, I'll hang myself,
That I may walk a greater devil than thou,
And haunt thee i' the flock-bed, and the buttery.
[Exit.]

SCENE III.—A street before Lovewit's house.

LOVEWIT above. *Enter Officers, MAMMON, SUB-
LY, FACE, KASTIL, ANANIAS, and TRIBU-LATION.*

Love. What do you mean, my masters?

Mam. Open your door,
Cheaters, tawds, conjurers.

Off. Or we'll break it open.

Love. What warrant have you?

Off. Warrant enough, sir, doubt not.

Love. Is there an officer there?

Off. Yes, two or three for failing.

Love. Have but patience,
And I will open it straight.

Face. Sir, have you done?
Is it a marriage? perfect?

Love. Yes, my brain.

Face. Off with your ruff, and cloak then; be yourself, sir.

Sur. Down with the door.

Kas. 'Slight, ding it open.

Love. Hold,

Hold, gentlemen! what means this violence?

Mam. Where is this collier?

Sur. And my captain Face?

Mam. These day-owls?

Sur. That are birding in men's purses.

Mam. Madam Suppository?

Kas. Doxey, my suster?

Ana. Locusts of the foul pit.

Trib. Prophane as Bell and the Dragon.

Ana. Worse than the grasshoppers, or the lice of Egypt.

Love. Good gentlemen, hear me. Are you officers,

And cannot stay this violence?

Off. Keep the peace.

Love. Gentlemen, what is the matter! Whom do you seek?

Mam. The chymical cozener.

Sur. And the captain pander.

Kas. The nun, my suster.

Mam. Madam Rabbi.

Ana. Scorpions and caterpillars.

Love. Fewer at once, I pray you.

Off. One after another, gentlemen, I charge
you.

By virtue of my staff.

Ana. They are the vessels

H

Of pride, lust, and the cart.

Love. Good zeal, lie still
A little while.

Trib. Peace, deacon Ananias.

Love. The house is mine here, and the doors are open:

If there be any such persons you seek for,
Use your authority;

I am but newly come to town, and finding
This tumult 'bout my door (to tell you true)
It somewhat 'mazed me; till my man here, fearing

My more displeasure, told me had done
Somewhat an insolent part, let out my house
To a doctor, and a captain; who, what they are,
Or where they be, he knows not.

Mam. Are they gone? [They enter.

Love. You may go in and search, sir. Here, I find

The empty walls worse than I left them, smoked,
A few cracked pots and glasses, and a furnace;
The ceiling filled with poesies of the candle:
Only one gentlewoman, I met here,

That is within, that said she was a widow——

Kas. Aye, that's my suster. I'll go thump her.
Where is she? [Erit.

Love. And should ha' married a Spanish count;
but he,

When he came to't, neglected her so grossly,
That I, a widower, am gone through with her.

Sur. How! Have I lost her, then?

Love. Were you the Don, sir!

Good faith, now, she does blame you extremely,
and says

You swore, and told her, you had taken the pains
To dye your beard, and umbre o'er your face,

Borrowed a suit and ruff all for her love,
And then did nothing. What an oversight,

And want of putting forward, sir, was this!

Well fare an old harquebuzier, yet!

Could prime his powder, and give fire, and hit,
All in a twinkling.

Enter MAMMON.

Mam. The whole nest are fled!

Love. What sort of birds were they?

Mam. A kind of choughs,

Or thievish daws, sir, that have picked my purse
Of eight score and ten pounds, within these five weeks,

Beside my first materials, and my goods,

That lie i' the cellar, which I am glad they ha' left.

I may have them home yet.

Love. Think you so, sir?

Mam. Aye.

Love. By order of law, sir, but not otherwise.

Mam. Not mine own stuff?

Love. Sir, I can take no knowledge,

That they are yours, but by public means.

If you can bring certificate, that you were gulled of them,

Or any formal writ out of a court,
That you did cozen yourself, I will not hold
them.

Mam. I'll rather lose them.

Love. That you shall not, sir,
By me, in troth. Upon these terms they are yours.

What should they ha' been, sir? turned into gold
all?

Mam. No.

I cannot tell. It may be they should. What then?

Love. What a great loss in hope have you sustained!

Mam. Not I, the commonwealth has.

I will go mount a turnip-cart, and preach
The end o' the world, within these two months,
Surly, what! in a dream?

Sur. Must I needs cheat myself,
With that same foolish vice of honesty!

Come, let us go, and hearken out the rogues.
That Face I'll mark for mine, if I e'er meet him.

[Exeunt.

Face. If you get off the angry child, now, sir——

Enter KASTRIL.

Kas. Come on, you ewe, you have matched most sweetly, ha' you not?

[To his sister.

Did I not say, I would never ha' you tupp'd
But by a dubbed boy, to make you a Lady-Tom?
'Slight, you are a mammet! Oh, I could touse you now!

Love. You lie, boy!

And I am before-hand with you.

Kas. Anon?

Love. Come, will you quarrel? I will seize you,
sirrah.

Why do you not buckle to your tools!

Kas. God's light!

This is a fine old boy, as e'er I saw!

Love. What! do you change your copy now?
Proceed.

Here stands my dove; stoop at her if you dare.

Kas. 'Slight, I must love him! I cannot chuse,
i' faith!

An' I should be hanged for't. Suster, I protest,
I honour thee for this match.

Love. Oh, do you so, sir?

Kas. Yes, an' thou canst take tobacco, and drink, old boy,

I'll give her five hundred pounds more, to her marriage,

Than her own 'state.

Love. Fill a pipe-full, Jeremy.

Face. Yes, but go in, and take it, sir.

Love. We will.

I will be ruled by thee in any thing, Jeremy.
That master,

That had received such happiness by a servant,
In such a widow, and with so much wealth,
Were very ungrateful, if he would not be

A ~~Kind~~ indulgent to that servant's wit,
And help his fortune, though with some small strain

Of his own candour.

Speak for thyself, knave.

Fac. So I will, sir. Gentlemen,
Though I am clean

Got off from Subtle, Surly, Mammon, Dol,
Hot Ananias, Dapper, Druggier, all

With whom I traded; yet I put myself

On you that are my country; and this pelf,

Which I have got, if you do quit me, rests

To feast you often, and invite new guests.

[Exeunt omnes.]

ACT I

SCENE I.—The outside of a village ale-house.

WELLBORN, TAPWELL, FROTH.

Well. No liquor! nor no credit?

Tap. None, sir;

Not the remainder of a single can,
Left by a drunken porter; all night palled, too.

Froth. Not the dropping of the tap for your morning's draught, sir:

'Tis verity, I assure you.

Well. Verity, you brach!

The devil turned precisian? Rogue, what am I?

Tap. Troth! durst I trust you with a lookingglass,

To let you see your trim shape, you would quit
me,

And take the name yourself.

Well. How! dog!

Tap. Even so, sir.

And I must tell you, if you but advance your voice,

There dwells, and within call, if it please your worship,

A potent monarch called the constable,
That does command a citadel, called the stocks;
Such as, with great dexterity, will hale
Your poor tattered——

Well. Rascal! slave!

Froth. No rage, sir.

Tap. At his own peril! Do not put yourself
In too much heat, there being no water near
To quench your thirst; and sure, for other liquor,
As mighty ale, or beer, they are things, I take it,
You must no more remember; not in a dream,
sir.

Well. Why, thou unthankful villain, dar'st thou talk thus?

Is not thy house, and all thou hast, my gift?

Tap. I find it not in chalk; and Timothy Tap-
well

Does keep no other register.

Well. Am I not he

Whose riots fed and cloathed thee? Wert thou
not

Born on my father's land, and proud to be
A drudge in his house?

Tap. What I was, sir, it skills not;
 What you are, is apparent. Now for a farewell:
 Since you talk of father, in my hope it will torment you,
 I'll briefly tell your story. Your dead father,
 My quondam master, was a man of worship;
 Old sir John Wellborn, justice of peace and quorum;
 And stood fair to be custos rotulorum;
 Bare the whole sway of the shire; kept a good house;

Relieved the poor, and so forth; but he dying,
 And the twelve hundred a-year coming to you,
 Late Mr Francis, but now forlorn Wellborn—

Well. Slave, stop! or I shall lose myself.

Froth. Very hardly,
 You cannot be out of your way.

Tap. But to my story; I shall proceed, sir:
 You were then a lord of acres, the prime gallant,
 And I your under-butler: note the change now.
 You had a merry time of't. Hawks and hounds;
 With choice of running horses: mistresses,
 And other such extravagancies;
 Which your uncle, sir Giles Overreach, observing,
 Resolving not to lose so fair an opportunity,
 On foolish mortgages, statutes, and bonds,
 For awhile supplied your lavishness, and then left you.

Well. Some curate has penned this invective, mongrel,

And you have studied it.

Tap. I have not done yet.
 Your lands gone, and your credit not worth a token,

You grew the common borrower; no man'scaped
 Your paper pellets, from the gentleman to the groom;

While I, honest Tim Tapwell, with a little stock,
 Some forty pounds or so, bought a small cottage;
 Humbled myself to marriage with my Froth here;
 Case entertainment—

Well. Yes, to whores and pickpockets.

Tap. True, but they brought in profit;
 And had a gift to pay what they called for;
 And stuck not like your mastership. The poor income

I gleaned from them hath made me in my parish
 Thought worthy to be scavenger! and, in time,
 May rise to be overseer of the poor;

Which, if I do, on your petition, Wellborn,
 I may allow you thirteen pence a quarter;

And you shall thank my worship.

Well. Thus, you dog-bolt—

And thus—

[Beats him.]

Tap. Cry out for help!

Well. Sir, and thou diest:
 Your potent prince, the constable, shall not save you.

Hear me, ungrateful bell-hound! did not I
 Make purses for you? then you licked my boots,
 And thought your holiday cloak too coarse to clean them.

'Twas I, that when I heard thee swear, if ever
 Thou could'st arrive at forty pounds, thou would'st

Live like an emperor: 'twas I that gave it,
 In ready gold. Deny this, wretch!

Tap. I must, sir.

For, from the tavern to the tap-house, all,
 On forfeiture of their licence, stand bound
 Never to remember who the best guests were,
 If they grow poor like you.

Well. They are well rewarded
 That beggar themselves to make such rascals rich.
 Thou viper, thankless viper!

But since you are grown forgetful, I will help
 Your memory, and kick thee into remembrance;
 Not leave one bone unbroken.

Tap. Oh!

Enter ALLWORTH.

Allw. Hold, for my sake, hold!
 Deny me, Frank? they are not worth your anger.

Well. For once thou hast redeemed them from this sceptre: [Shaking his cudgel.
 But let them vanish,
 For if they grumble, I revoke my pardon.

Froth. This comes of your prating, husband;
 you presumed
 On your ambling wit, and must use your glib tongue,

Though you are beaten lame for it.

Tap. Patience, Froth;
 There is no law to cure our bruises.

[They go off into the house.]

Well. Sent for to your mother?

Allw. My lady, Frank, my patroness! my all!
 She's such a mourner for my father's death,
 And, in her love to him, so favours me,
 That I cannot pay too much observance to her.
 There are few such stepdames.

Well. 'Tis a noble widow,
 And keeps her reputation pure, and clear
 From the least taint of infamy; her life,
 With the splendour of her actions, leaves no
 tongue

To envy or detraction. Pr'ythee, tell me;
 Has she no suitors?

Allw. Even the best of the shire, Frank,
 My lord excepted: such as sue, and send,
 And send, and sue again; but to no purpose.
 Their frequent visits have not gained her presence;

Yet she's so far from sullenness and pride,
 That I dare undertake you shall meet from her
 A liberal entertainment. I can give you
 A catalogue of her suitors' names.

Well. Forbear it,
 While I give you good counsel. I am bound to it;

Thy father was my friend; and that affection
 I bore to him, in right descends to thee:
 Thou art a handsome and a hopeful youth,

Nor will I have the least affront stick on thee,
If I with any danger can prevent it.

Allw. I thank your noble care; but, pray you, in what

Do I run the hazard?

Well. Art thou not in love?
Put it not off with wonder.

Allw. In love, at my years?

Well. You think you walk in clouds, but are transparent.

I have heard all, and the choice that you have made;

And, with my finger can point out the north star,

By which the load-stone of your folly's guided.

And, to confirm this true, what think you of Fair Margaret, the only child and heir

Of cormorant Overreach? Dost blush and start,

To hear her only named? Blush at your want

Of wit and reason.

Allw. You are too bitter, sir.

Well. Wounds of this nature are not to be cured

With balms, but corrosives. I must be plain:

Art thou scarce manumized from the porter's lodge,

And yet sworn servant to the pantoffle,

And darest thou dream of marriage?

Allw. Howe'er you have discovered my intents,

You know my aims are lawful; and if ever

The queen of flowers, the glory of the spring,

The sweetest comfort to our smell, the rose,

Sprang from an envious briar, I may infer,

There's such disparity in their conditions

Between the goddess of my soul, the daughter,

And the base churl, her father.

Well. Grant this true,

As I believe it; canst thou ever hope

To enjoy a quiet bed with her, whose father

Ruined thy state?

Allw. And yours too.

Well. I confess it, Allworth.

I must tell you as a friend, and freely,

That, where impossibilities are apparent,

'Tis indiscretion to nourish hopes.

Canst thou imagine (let not self-love blind thee)

That sir Giles Overreach (that to make her great

In swelling titles, without touch of conscience,

Will cut his neighbour's throat, and I hope his own too)

Will e'er consent to make her thine? Give o'er,

And think of some course suitable to thy rank,

And prosper in it.

Allw. You have well advised me;

But, in the mean time, you, that are so studious

Of my affairs, wholly neglect your own.

Remember yourself, and in what plight you are.

Well. No matter, no matter.

Allw. Yes, 'tis much material:

You know my fortune, and my means; yet something

I can spare from myself, to help your wants.

Well. How's this?

Allw. Nay, be not angry. There's eight pieces,
To put you in better fashion.

Well. Money from thee?

From a boy, a stipendary? one that lives

At the devotion of a step-mother,

And the uncertain favour of a lord?

I'll eat my arms first. Howsoe'er blind fortune

Hath spent the utmost of her malice on me;

Though I am vomited out of an alehouse,

And thus accoutred; know not where to eat,

Or drink, or sleep, but underneath this canopy;

Although I thank thee, I despise thy offer.

And as I, in my madness, broke my state

Without the assistance of another's brain,

In my right wits I'll piece it; at the worst,

Die thus, and be forgotten.

Allw. A strange humour! [Exeunt severally.]

SCENE II.—A Chamber in Lady ALLWORTH'S House.

Enter ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE.

Order. Set all things right, or, as my name is Order,

Whoever misses in his function,

For one whole week makes forfeiture of his breakfast,

And privilege in the wine cellar.

Amble. You are merry.

Good master steward.

Furn. Let him; I'll be angry.

Amble. Why, fellow Furnace, 'tis not twelve o'clock yet,

Nor dinner taking up; then 'tis allowed

Cooks, by their places, may be cholerick.

Furn. You think you have spoke wisely, good man Amble,

My lady's go-before.

Order. Nay, nay, no wrangling.

Furn. Twit me with the authority of the kitchen?

At all hours, and at all places, I'll be angry;

And, thus provoked, when I am at my prayers

I will be angry.

Amble. There was no hurt meant.

Furn. I am friends with thee, and yet I will be angry.

Order. With whom?

Furn. No matter whom: yet, now I think on't,
I am angry with my lady.

Amble. Heaven forbid, man!

Order. What cause has she given thee?

Furn. Cause enough, master steward:

I was entertained by her to please her palate,

And, till she forswore eating, I performed it.

Now, since our master, noble Allworth, died,

Though I crack my brains to find out tempting sauces,

When I am three parts roasted,

And the fourth part par-boiled, to prepare her viands,

She keeps her chamber, dines with a panada,
Or water-gruel; my skill never thought on.

Order. But your art is seen in the dining room.

Furn. By whom?

By such as pretend to love her; but come
To feed upon her. Yet, of all the harpies
That do devour her, I am out of charity
With none so much, as the thin-gutted squire,
That's stolen into commission.

Order. Justice Greedy?

Furn. The same, the same. Meat is cast away
upon him:

It never thrives. He holds his paradox,
Who eats not well, can ne'er do justice well.
His stomach's as insatiate as the grave.

Amb. One knocks.

[ALLWORTH knocks, and enters.

Order. Our late young master.

Amb. Welcome, sir.

Furn. Your hand:

If you have a stomach, a cold bake-meat's ready.

Order. His father's picture in little.

Furn. We are all your servants.

Allw. At once, my thanks to all;
This is yet some comfort. Is my lady stirring?

Enter the Lady ALLWORTH.

Order. Her presence answers for us.

Lady. Sort those silks well.

I'll take the air alone.

And, as I gave directions, if this morning
I am visited by any, entertain them
As heretofore: but say, in my excuse,
I am indisposed.

Order. I shall, madam.

Lady. Do, and leave me.

[Exeunt ORDER, AMBLE, and FURNACE.

Nay, stay you, Allworth.

Allw. I shall gladly grow here,
To wait on your commands.

Lady. So soon turned courtier!

Allw. Stile not that courtship, madam, which is duty,

Purchased on your part.

Lady. Well, you shall o'ercome;
I'd not contend in words. How is it with Your noble master?

Allw. Ever like himself;
No scruple lessened in the full weight of honour!

He did command me (pardon my presumption),
As his unworthy deputy, to kiss
Your ladyship's fair hands.

Lady. I am honoured in His favour to me. Does he hold his purpose
For the Low Countries?

Allw. Constantly, good madam:
But he will, in person, first present his service.

Lady. And how approve you of his course?
you are yet,

Like virgin parchment, capable of any
Inscription, vicious or honourable.

I will not force your will, but leave you free
To your own election.

Allw. Any form you please

I will put on: but, might I make my choice,
With humble emulation, I would follow
The path my lord marks to me.

Lady. 'Tis well answered,

And I commend your spirit: you had a father,
(Blessed be his memory) that some few hours
Before the will of Heaven took him from me,
Did commend you, by the dearest ties
Of perfect love between us, to my charge:
And, therefore, what I speak, you are bound to hear

With such respect, as if he lived in me.

Allw. I have found you,

Most honoured madam, the best mother tome;
And with my utmost strength of care and service,
Will labour that you never may repent
Your bounties showered upon me.

Lady. I much hope it.

These were your father's words: If e'er my son
Follow the war, tell him it is a school
Where all the principles, tending to honour,
Are taught, if truly followed: But for such
As repair thither, as a place in which They do presume they may, with license, practise

Their lusts and riots, they shall never merit
The noble name of soldiers. To dare boldly
In a fair cause, and, for the country's safety,
To run upon the cannon's mouth undaunted;
To obey their leaders, and shun mutinies;
To bear, with patience, the winter's cold,
And summer's scorching heat,
Are the essential parts make up a soldier:
Not swearing, dice, or drinking.

Allw. There's no syllable

You speak, but it is to me an oracle;
Which but to doubt were impious.

Lady. To conclude;

Beware ill-company; for often men
Are like to those with whom they do converse:
And from one man I warn you, and that's Well-
born:

Not 'cause he's poor; that rather claims your pity;

But that he's in his manners so debauched,
And hath to vicious courses sold himself.
'Tis true, your father loved him, while he was Worthy the loving; but, if he had lived
To have seen him as he is, he had cast him off,
As you must do.

Allw. I shall obey in all things.

Lady. Follow me to my chamber; you shall have gold

To furnish you like my son, and still supplied
As I hear from you.

Allw. I am still your creature.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.—A hall in Lady ALLWORTH'S House.

Enter OVERREACH, GREEDY, ORDER, AMBLE, FURNACE, and MARRALL.

Greedy. Not to be seen?

Over. Still cloistered up? her reason, I hope, assures her, though she makes herself Close prisoner ever for her husband's loss 'Twill not recover him.

Order. Sir, it is her will; Which we, that are her servants, ought to serve, And not dispute. However, you are nobly welcome:

And, if you please to stay, that you may think so, There came, not six days since, from Hull, a pipe Of rich canary; which shall spend itself For my lady's honour.

Greedy. Is it of the right race?

Order. Yes, Mr Greedy.

Amble. How his mouth runs over!

Furn. I'll make it run and run. Save your good worship!

Greedy. Honest Mr Cook, thy hand; again! How I love thee!

Are the good dishes still in being? speak, boy.

Furn. If you have a mind to feed, there is a chine Of beef well seasoned.

Greedy. Good.

Furn. A pheasant, larded.

Greedy. That I might now give thanks for it!

Furn. Other kick-shaws.

Besides, there came last night, from the forest of Sherwood,

The fattest stag I ever cooked.

Greedy. A stag, man?

Furn. A stag, sir; part of it is prepared for dinner, And baked in puff-paste.

Greedy. Puff-paste, too, Sir Giles! A ponderous chine of beef! a pheasant larded! And red deer, too, Sir Giles, and baked in puff-paste!

All business set aside, let us give thanks here.

Over. You know we cannot.

Mar. Your worships are to sit on a commission, And if you fail to come, you lose the cause.

Greedy. Cause me no causes; I'll prove it, for such a dinner, We may put off a commission; you shall find it Henrici decimo quarto.

Over. Fie, Mr Greedy! Will you lose me a thousand pounds for a dinner?

No more, for shame! We must forget the belly, When we think of profit.

Greedy. Well, you shall o'er-rule me. I could even cry now. Do you hear me, Mr Cook?

Send but a corner of that immortal pasty;

And I, in thankfulness, will, by your boy, Send you a brace of three-pences.

Furn. Will you be so prodigal?

Over. Remember me to your lady.

Enter WELLBORN.

Who have we here?

Well. Don't you know me?

Over. I did once, but now I will not; Thou art no blood of mine. Avaunt, thou beggar!

If ever thou presume to own me more, I'll have thee caged and whipped.

Greedy. I'll grant the warrant.

I do love thee, Furnace, E'en as I do malmsey in a morning.

Think of pye-corner, Furnace!

[Exit OVERREACH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Amble. Will you out, sir?

I wonder how you durst creep in.

Order. This is rudeness And saucy impudence.

Amble. Cannot you stay To be served among your fellows from the basket,

But you must press into the hall?

Furn. Prithee, vanish Into some out-house, though it be the pig-sty; My scullion shall come to thee.

Enter ALLWORTH.

Well. This is rare:

Oh, here is Tom Allworth! Tom!

Allw. We must be strangers; Nor would I have seen you here for a million.

[Erit.

Well. Better and better. He contemns me, too.

Furn. Will you know your way?

Amble. Or shall we teach it you, By the head and shoulders?

Well. No; I will not stir: Do you mark, I will not. Let me see the wretch That dares attempt to force me. Why, you slaves,

Created only to make legs, and cringe; To carry in a dish and shift a trencher; That have not souls only to hope a blessing Beyond your master's leavings; you that were born

Only to consume meat and drink, and batten Upon reversions; Who advances? who Shews me the way?

Order. Here comes my lady.

Enter LADY.

Lady. What noise is this?

Well. Madam, my designs bear me to you.

Lady. To me?

Well. And though I have met with But ragged entertainment from your grooms here, I hope from you to receive that noble usage,

As may become the true friend of 'your husband ;

And then I shall forget these.

Lady. I am amazed,
To see and hear this rudeness. Dar'st thou think,

Though sworn, that it can ever find belief ;
That I, who to the best men of this country
Denied my presence since my husband's death,
Can fall so low as to change words with thee ?

Well. Scorn me not, good lady ;
But as, in form, you are angelical,
Imitate the heavenly natures, and vouchsafe
At least a while to hear me. You will grant,
The blood, that runs in this arm, is as noble
As that which fills your veins. Your swelling titles,

Equipage, and fortune ; your mens' observance,
And women's flattery, are in you no virtues ;
Nor these rags, with my poverty, in me vices.
You have a fair fame, and, I know, deserve it ;
Yet, lady, I must say, in nothing more,
Than in the pious sorrow you have shewn
For your late noble husband.

Order. How she starts !

Well. That husband, madam, was once, in his fortune,

Almost as low as I. Want, debts, and quarrels,
Lay heavy on him : let it not be thought
A boast in me, though I say, I relieved him.

'Twas I, that gave him fashion ; mine, the sword
That did, on all occasions, second his ;
I brought him on and off, with honour, lady :
And, when in all men's judgments, he was sunk,

And in his own hopes not to be buoyed up,
I stepped unto him, took him by the hand,
And brought him to the shore.

Furn. Are not we base rogues,
That could forget this ?

Well. I confess, you made him
Master of your estate ; nor could your friends,
Though he brought no wealth with him, blame
you for it :

For he had a shape, and to that shape a mind,
Made up of all parts, either great or noble,

So winning a behaviour, not to be Resisted, madam.

Lady. 'Tis most true, he had.

Well. For his sake, then, in that I was his friend,

Do not contemn me.

Lady. For what's past excuse me ;
I will redeem it. [Offers him her pocket-book.]

Well. Madam, on no terms :

I will not beg nor borrow sixpence of you ;
But be supplied elsewhere, or want thus ever.
Only one suit I make, which you deny not
To strangers ; and 'tis this : pray, give me leave.
[Whispers to her.]

Lady. Fie ! nothing else ?

Well. Nothing ; unless you please to charge your servants

To throw away a little respect upon me.

Lady. What you demand is yours.

Well. I thank you, lady. [Exit LADY.]

Now, what can be wrought out of such a suit,
Is yet in supposition—[Servants bow.—]Nay, all's forgotten,

And for a lucky omen to my project,
Shake hands, and end all quarrels in the cellar.

Order. Agreed, agreed.

Furn. Still merry, Mr Well-born ?

[Exeunt Servants.]

Well. Well, faith, a right worthy, and a liberal lady,

Who can, at once, so kindly meet my purposes,
And brave the flouts of censure, to redeem
Her husband's friend ! When by this honest plot
The world believes she means to heal my wants
With her extensive wealth, each noisy creditor
Will be struck mute, and I be left, at large,
To practise on my uncle Overreach ;
Whose foul, rapacious spirit, (on the hearing
Of my encouragement from this rich lady)
Again will court me to his house of patronage.
Here, I may work the measure to redeem
My mortgaged fortune, which he stripped me of,
When youth and dissipation quelled my reason.
The fancy pleases—if the plot succeed,
'Tis a new way to pay old debts, indeed.

[Exit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—A landscape.

Enter OVERREACH and MARRALL.

Over. He's gone, I warrant thee ; this commission crushed him.

Mar. Your worship has the way on't, and ne'er miss

To squeeze these unthrifths into air ; and yet
The chap-fallen justice did his part, returning
For your advantage the certificate,
Against his conscience and his knowledge, too ;
(With your good favour) to the utter ruin

VOL. II.

Of the poor farmer.

Over. 'Twas for these good ends
I made him a justice. He, that bribes his belly,
Is certain to command his soul.

Mar. I wonder
(Still with your licence) why, your worship having

The power to put this thin gut in commission,
You are not in't yourself.

Over. Thou art a fool ;
In being out of office, I am out of danger ;
Where, if I were a justice, besides the trouble,

I might, or out of wilfulness or error,
Run myself finely into a premunire,
And so become a prey to the informer.
No, I'll have none of it; 'tis enough I keep Greedy at my devotion: so he serve
My purposes, let him hang, or damn, I care
not;

Friendship is but a word.

Mar. You are all wisdom.

Over. I would be worldly wise; for the other wisdom,
That does prescribe us a well governed life,
And to do right to others as ourselves,
I value not an atom.

Mar. What course take you,
(With your good patience) to hedge in the manor
Of your good neighbour, Mr Frugal? As 'tis said,
He will not sell, nor borrow, nor exchange;
And his land, laying in the midst of your many lordships,
Is a foul blemish.

Over. I have thought on't, Marrall;
And it shall take, I must have all men sellers,
And I the only purchaser.

Mar. 'Tis most fit, sir.

Over. I'll therefore buy some cottage near his manor;
Which done, I'll make my men break ope his fences,
Ride o'er his standing corn, and in the night
Set fire to his barns, or break his cattle's legs.
These trespasses draw on suits, and suits ex-pences;
Which I can spare, but will soon beggar him.
When I have harried him thus two or three years,
Though he sue forma pauperis, in spite
Of all his thrift and care, he'll grow behind-
hand.

Mar. The best I ever heard; I could adore
you.

Over. Then, with the favour of my man of law,
I will pretend some title; want will force him
To put it to arbitrement; then, if he sell
For half the value, he shall have ready money,
And I possess the land.

Mar. 'Tis above wonder.
Wellborn was apt to sell, and needed not
These fine arts, sir, to hook him in.

Over. Well thought on.
This varlet, Wellborn, lives too long to upbraid
me
With my close cheat put upon him. Will nor cold
Nor hunger kill him?

Mar. I know not what to think on't.
I have used all means; and the last night I caused

His host, the tapster, to turn him out of doors;

And have been since with all your friends and tenants,

And, on the forfeit of your favour, charged
them,

Though a crust of mouldy bread would keep him from starving,

Yet they should not relieve him. This is done,
sir.

Over. That was something, Marrall; but thou must go farther;

And suddenly, Marrall.

Mar. Where and when you please, sir.

Over. I would have thee seek him out; and,
if thou canst,
Persuade him, that 'tis better steal than beg:
Then, if I prove he has but robbed a hen-roost,
Not all the world shall save him from the gallows.

Do any thing to work him to despair,
And 'tis thy master-piece.

Mar. I will do my best, sir.

Over. I am now on my main work, with the lord Lovell;
The gallant-minded, popular lord Lovell,
The minion of the people's love. I hear
He's come into the country; and my aims are,
To insinuate myself into his knowledge,
And then invite him to my house.

Mar. I have you.
This points at my young mistress.

Over. She must part with
That humble title, and write honourable;
Right honourable, Marrall; my right honourable
daughter;

If all I have, or e'er shall get, will do it.
I will have her well attended; there are ladies
Of errant knights decayed, and brought so low,
That, for cast clothes, and meat, will gladly serve
her;

And 'tis my glory, though I came from the city,
To have their issue, whom I have undone,
To kneel to mine, as bond slaves.

Mar. 'Tis fit state, sir.

Over. And therefore, I'll not have a chamber-maid

That ties her shoes, or any meaner office,
But such whose fathers were right worshipful.
'Tis a rich man's pride! there having ever been
More than a feud, a strange antipathy
Between us and true gentry.

Enter WELLBORN.

Mar. See, who's here, sir!

Over. Hence, monster, prodigy!

Well. Call me what you will; I am your nephew, sir.

Over. Avoid my sight, thy breath's infectious, rogue!
I shun thee as a leprosy, or the plague.
Come hither, Marrall; this is the time to work
him.

[Erit OVERREACH.]

Mar. I warrant you, sir.

Well. By this light, I think he's mad.

Mar. Mad! had you took compassion on yourself,

You long since had been mad.

Well. You have took a course,
Between you and my venerable uncle,
To make me so.

Mar. The more pale-spirited you,
That would not be instructed. I swear deeply.

Well. By what?

Mar. By my religion.

Well. Thy religion!
The devil's creed; but what would you have done?

Mar. Had there been but one tree in all the shire,

Nor any hope to compass a penny halter,
Before, like you, I had outlived my fortunes,
A with had served my turn to hang myself.

I am zealous in your cause: pray you, hang yourself;

And presently, as you love your credit.

Well. I thank you.

Mar. Will you stay till you die in a ditch?
Or, if you dare not do the fate yourself,
But that you'll put the state to charge and trouble,

Is there no purse to be cut? house to be broken?

Or market-woman with eggs that you may murder,

And so dispatch the business?

Well. Here's variety,
I must confess; but I'll accept of none
Of all your gentle offers, I assure you.

Mar. Why, have you hope ever to eat again?
Or drink? or be the master of three farthings?
If you like not hanging, drown yourself; take some course

For your reputation.

Well. 'Twill not do, dear tempter,
With all the rhetoric the fiend hath taught you.
I am as far as thou art from despair.
Nay, I have confidence, which is more than hope,

To live, and suddenly, better than ever.

Mar. Ha! ha! these castles you build in the air,

Will not persuade me, or to give or lend
A token to you.

Well. I'll be more kind to thee.
Come, thou shalt dine with me.

Mar. With you?

Well. Nay, more, dine gratis.

Mar. Under what hedge, I pray you? or at whose cost?

Are they padders, or gypsies, that are your consorts?

Well. Thou art incredulous; but thou shalt dine,

Not alone at her house, but with a gallant lady;

With me, and with a lady.

Mar. Lady! what lady!

With the lady of the lake, or queen of fairies?
For I know it must be an enchanted dinner.

Well. With the lady Allworth, knave.

Mar. Now there's hope
Thy brain is cracked.

Well. Mark thee, with what respect
I am entertained.

Mar. With choice, no doubt, of dog-whips.
Why, dost thou ever hope to pass her porter?

Well. 'Tis not far off; go with me: trust thine own eyes.

Mar. Troth, in my hope, or my assurance, rather,

To see thee curvet, and mount like a dog in a blanket,

If ever thou presume to pass her threshold,
I will endure thy company.

Well. Come along.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A hall in LADY ALLWORTH'S house.

Enter ALLWORTH, ORDER, AMBLE, and FURNACE.

Allw. Your courtesies o'erwhelm me: I much grieve

To part from such true friends, and yet I find comfort;

My attendance on my honourable lord
Will speedily bring me back.

[Knocking at the gate. MARRALL and WELLBORN within.]

Mar. Dar'st thou venture farther?

Well. Yes, yes, and knock again.

Order. 'Tis he; disperse.

Amb. Perform it bravely.

Furn. I know my cue, ne'er doubt me. [Exit.]

Enter MARRALL and WELLBORN.

Order. Most welcome;
You were long since expected.

Well. Say so much
To my friend, I pray you.

Order. For your sake I will, sir.

[Exit.]

Mar. For his sake!

Well. Mum; this is nothing.

Mar. More than ever
I would have believed, though I had found it in my primmer.

Allw. When I have given you reasons for my late harshness,

You'll pardon and excuse me: for, believe me,
Though now I part abruptly in my service,
I will deserve it.

Mar. Service! with a vengeance!

Well. I am satisfied; farewell, Tom!

Allw. All joy stay with you.

[Exit ALLWORTH.]

Enter AMBLE.

Amble. You are happily encountered: I never yet
Presented one so welcome, as I know
You will be, to my lady.

Mar. This is some vision;
Or sure these men are mad, to worship a dung-hill;
It cannot be a truth.

Well. Be still a pagan,
An unbelieving infidel; be so, miscreant!
And meditate on blankets, and on dog-whips.

Enter FURNACE.

Furn. I am glad you are come; until I know your pleasure,
I knew not how to serve up my lady's dinner.

Mar. His pleasure! is it possible? [Aside.

Well. What's thy will?

Furn. Marry, sir, I have some growse and turkey chicken,
Some rails and quails; and my lady willed me
to ask you

What kind of sauces best affect your palate,
That I may use my utmost skill to please it.

Mar. The devil's entered this cook: sauce for his palate!
That, on my knowledge, for almost this twelve-
month,
Durst wish but cheese-parings, and brown bread on Sundays!

Well. That way I like them best.

Furn. It shall be done, sir. [Erit FURNACE.

Well. What think you of the hedge we shall dine under?

Shall we feed gratis?

Mar. I know not what to think:
Pray you, make me not mad.

Enter ORDER.

Order. This place becomes you not;
Pray you, walk, sir, to the dining-room.

Well. I am well here,
Till her ladyship quits her chamber.

Mar. Well, here, say you?
'Tis a rare change! but yesterday you thought Yourself well in a barn, wrapped up in pease straw.

Order. Sir, my lady. [Erit ORDER.

Enter Lady.

Lady. I come to meet you, and languished till
I saw you.

This first kiss for form; I allow a second,
As token of my friendship.

Well. I am wholly yours; yet, madam, if you please

To grace this gentleman with a salute——

Mar. Salute me at his bidding!

Well. I shall receive it
As a most high favour.

Lady. Sir, your friends are welcome to me.

Well. Run backward from a lady! and such a lady!

Mar. To kiss her foot, is, to poor me, a favour
I am unworthy of—— [Offers to kiss her foot.

Lady. Nay, pray you, rise;
And, since you are so humble, I'll exalt you;
You shall dine with me to-day, at mine own table.

Mar. Your ladyship's table! I am not good enough
To sit at your steward's board.

Lady. You are too modest;
I will not be denied.

Enter ORDER.

Order. Dinner is ready for your ladyship.

Lady. Your arm, Mr Wellborn:
Nay, keep us company.

Mar. I was never so graced. Mercy on me!
[Ereunt WELLBORN, LADY, AMBLE, and MARRALL.]

Enter FURNACE.

Order. So, we have played our parts, and are come off well.

But if I know the mystery, why my lady
Consented to it, or why Mr Wellborn
Desired it, may I perish!

Furn. Would I had
The roasting of his heart, that cheated him,
And forces the poor gentleman to these shifts.
By fire! (for cooks are Persians, and swear by it)
Of all the griping and extorting tyrants
I ever heard or read of, I never met
A match to sir Giles Overreach.

Order. What will you take
To tell him so, fellow Furnace?

Furn. Just as much
As my throat is worth; for that would be the price on't.

To have a usurer that starves himself,
And wears a cloak of one and twenty years
On a suit of fourteen groats, bought of the hang-
man,

To grow rich, is too common:
But this sir Giles feeds high, keeps many servants,

Who must, at his command, do any outrage;
Rich in his habit; vast in his expences;
Yet he to admiration still increases
In wealth and lordships.

Order. He frights men out of their estates,
And breaks through all law-nets, made to curb ill men,

As they were cobwebs. No man dares reprove-
him.

Such a spirit to dare, and power to do, were never

Lodged so unluckily.

Enter AMBLE.

Amb. Ha! ha! I shall burst.

Order. Contain thyself, man.

Furn. Or make us partakers
Of your sudden mirth.

Amb. Ha! ha! my lady has got
Such a guest at her table! this term-driver,
Marrall;

This scip of an attorney.

Furn. What of him, man?

Amb. The knave feeds so slovenly!

Furn. Is this all?

Amb. My lady
Drank to him for fashion's sake, or to please Mr
Wellborn.

As I live, he rises and takes up a dish,
In which there were some remnants of a boiled
capon,

And pledges her in white broth.

Furn. Nay, 'tis like

The rest of his tribe.

Amb. And when I brought him wine,
He leaves his chair, and after a leg or two
Most humbly thanks my worship.

Order. Ros! already!

Amb. I shall be chid.

Enter LADY, WELLBORN, and MARRALL.

Furn. My lady frowns.

Lady. You attended us well!

Let me have no more of this, I observed your leering.

Sarah. I'll have you know, whom I think worthy
To sit at my table, be he never so mean,
When I am present, is not your companion.

Order. Nay, she'll preserve what's due to her.

Furn. This refreshing
Favors your flux of laughter.

Lady. You are master
Of your own will. I know so much of manners
As not to enquire your purposes; in a word,
To me you are ever welcome, as to a house
That is your own.

Well. Mark that.

Mar. With reverence, sir,
And it like your worship.

Well. Trouble yourself no farther,
Dear madam; my heart's full of zeal and service,

However, in my language I am sparing.
Come, Mr Marrall.

Mar. I attend your worship.

[Exit WELLBORN, MARRALL, and AMBLE.]

Lady. I see in your looks you are sorry, and you know me

An easy mistress: be merry: I have forgot all.

Order and Furnace, come with me; I must give
you

Farther directions.

Order. What you please.

Furn. We are ready.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Country.Enter WELLBORN and MARRALL.

Well. I think I am in a good way.

Mar. Good, sir! the best way;
The certain best way.

Well. There are casualties,
That men are subject to.

Mar. You are above them.
As you are already worshipful,
I hope ere long you will increase in worship,
And be right worshipful.

Well. Pr'ythee do not flout me.
What I shall be, I shall be. Is't for your ease,
You keep your hat off?

Mar. Ease, and it like your worship!
I hope Jack Marrall shall not live so long,
To prove himself such an unmannerly beast,
Though it hail hazel nuts, as to be covered,
When your worship's present.

Well. Is not this a true rogue, [Aside.
That, out of mere hope of a future cozenage,
Can turn thus suddenly? 'tis rank already.

Mar. I know your worship's wise, and needs no counsel;

Yet if, in my desire to do you service,
I humbly offer my advice (but still Under correction) I hope I shall not Incur your high displeasure.

Well. No; speak freely.

Mar. Then, in my judgment, sir, my simple judgment,
(Still with your worship's favour) I could wish you
A better habit; for this cannot be
But much distasteful to the noble lady
That loves you: I have twenty pounds here,
Which, out of my true love, I presently Lay down at your worship's feet; 'twill serve to buy you

A riding suit.

Well. But where's the horse?

Mar. My gelding
Is at your service: nay, you shall ride me,
Before your worship shall be put to the trouble
To walk a-foot. Alas! when you are lord
Of this lady's manor, (as I know you will be)
You may with the lease of glebe-land, called Knave's Acre,

A place I would manute, requite your vassal.

Well. I thank thy love; but must make no use of it.

What's twenty pounds?

Mar. 'Tis all that I can make, sir.

Well. Dost thou think, though I want clothes,
I could not have them,
For one word to my lady?

Mar. As I know not that—

Well. Come, I'll tell thee a secret, and so leave thee.

I'll not give her the advantage, though she be
A gallant-minded lady, after we are married,
To hit me in the teeth, and say she was forced

To buy my wedding clothes.
No, I'll be furnished something like myself.
And so farewell; for thy suit, touching Knave's Acre,
When it is mine, 'tis thine.

Mar. I thank your worship.

[Erit WELLBORN.]

How was I cozened in the calculation
Of this man's fortune? my master cozened, too,
Whose pupil I am in the art of undoing men;
For that is our profession. Well, well, Mr
Wellborn,

You are of a sweet nature, and fit again to be cheated:

Which, if the fates please, when you are possessed
Of the land and lady, you sans question shall be.
I'll presently think of the means.

[Walks by, musing.]

Enter OVERREACH.

Over. Sirrah, order my carriage round;
I'll walk to get me an appetite. 'Tis but a mile;

And exercise will keep me from being pursey.
Ha! Marrall! is he conjuring? Perhaps
The knave has wrought the prodigal to do
Some outrage on himself, and now he feels Compunction in his conscience for't: no matter,
So it be done. Marrall!

Mar. Sir.

Over. How succeed we
In our plot on Wellborn?

Mar. Never better, sir.

Over. Has he hanged or drowned himself?

Mar. No, sir, he lives—

Lives once more to be made a prey to you;
And greater prey than ever.

Over. Art thou in thy wits?
If thou art, reveal this miracle, and briefly.

Mar. A lady, sir, is fallen in love with him.

Over. With him! What lady?

Mar. The rich lady Allworth.

Over. Thou dolt! how darest thou speak this?

Mar. I speak truth;

And I do so but once a year; unless
It be to you, sir. We dined with her ladyship;
I thank his worship.

Over. His worship!

Mar. As I live, sir,
I dined with him, at the great lady's table,
Simple as I stand here; and saw when she kissed
him;

And would, at his request, have kissed me too.

Over. Why, thou rascal,
To tell me these impossibilities!
Dine at her table! and kiss him! or thee!
Impudent varlet! Have not I myself,
To whom great countesses' doors have oft flown
open,

Ten times attempted, since her husband's death,
In vain to see her, though I came—a suitor?
And yet your good solicitorship, and rogue Well-
born,

Were brought into her presence, feasted with
her.

But that I know thee a dog that cannot blush,
This most incredible lie would call up one
On thy butter-milk cheeks.

Mar. Shall I not trust my eyes, sir?
Or taste? I feel her good cheer in my belly.

Over. You shall feel me, if you give not over,
sirrah;

Recover your brains again, and be no more gull-
ed

With a beggar's plot, assisted by the aids
Of serving men, and chambermaids; for, beyond these,

Thou never saw'st a woman; or I'll quit you
From my employments.

Mar. Will you credit this, yet?
On my confidence of their marriage, I offered
Wellborn

(I would give a crown, now, I durst say his worship) [Aside.

My nag, and twenty pounds.

Over. Did you so? [Strikes him down.
Was this the way to work him to despair,
Or rather to cross me?

Mar. Will your worship kill me?

Over. No, no; but drive the lying spirit out of you.

Mar. He's gone.

Over. I have done, then. Now, forgetting
Your late imaginary feast and lady,
Know, my lord Lovell dines with me to-morrow.
Be careful not be wanting to receive him;
And bid my daughter's women trim her up,
Though they paint her, so she catch the lord;
I'll thank them.

There's a piece, for my late blows.

Mar. I must yet suffer:

But there may be a time—

[Aside.

Over. Do you grumble?

Mar. No, sir.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—continued.Enter Lovell and Allworth.

Lov. DRIVE the carriage down the hill ; something in private
I must impart to Allworth.

Allw. O, my lord !
What danger, though in ne'er so horrid shapes,
Nay, death itself, though I should run to meet it,
Can I, and with a thankful willingness, suffer !
But still the retribution will fall short
Of your bounties showered upon me.

Lov. Loving youth,
Till what I purpose be put into act,
Do not o'er prize it ; since you have trusted me
With your soul's nearest, nay, her dearest secret,
Rest confident, 'tis in a cabinet locked,
Treachery shall never open. I have found you
More zealous in your love and service to me,
Than I have been in my rewards.

Allw. Still great ones,
Above my merit. You have been
More like a father to me than a master.
Pray you, pardon the comparison.

Lov. I allow it ;
And give you assurance I'm pleased in it.
My carriage and demeanour to your mistress,
Fair Margaret, shall truly witness for me,
I can command my passion.

Allw. 'Tis a conquest
Few lords can boast of, when they are tempted—Oh !

Lov. Why do you sigh ? can you be doubtful of me ?
By that fair name I in the wars have purchased,
And all my actions hitherto untainted,
I will not be more true to mine own honour,
Than to my Allworth.

Allw. As you are the brave lord Lovell,
Your bare word only given, is an assurance
Of more validity and weight to me,
Than all the oaths, bound up with imprecations,
Which, when they would deceive, most courtiers practise ;
Yet being a man—for, sure, to stile you more,
Would relish of gross flattery—I am forced,
Against my confidence of your worth and virtues,
To doubt, nay, more, to fear.

Lov. So young, and jealous !

Allw. Were you to encounter with a single foe,
The victory were certain : but to stand
The charge of two such potent enemies,
At once assaulting you, as wealth and beauty,
And those two seconded with power, is odds
Too great for Hercules.

Lov. Speak your doubts and fears,
Since you will nourish them, in plainer language,
That I may understand them.

Allw. What's your will,

Though I lend arms against myself, provided
They may advantage you, must be obeyed.
My much-loved lord, were Margaret only fair,
You might command your passion ;
But when you feel her touch, or hear her talk !
Hippolytus himself would leave Diana,
To follow such a Venus.

Lov. Love hath made you
Poetical, Allworth.

Allw. Grant all these beat off,
Which, if it be in man to do, you'll do it,
Mammon, in sir Giles Overreach, steps in
With heaps of ill-got gold, and so much land,
To make her more remarkable, as would tire
A falcon's wings in one day to fly over.
I here release your trust ;
'Tis happiness enough for me to serve you ;
And sometimes, with chaste eyes, to look on her.

Lov. Why, shall I swear ?

Allw. Oh, by no means, my lord !

Lov. Suspend
Your judgment till the trial. How far is it
To Overreach's house ?

Allw. At the most, some half hour's riding ;
You'll soon be there.

Lov. And you the sooner freed
From your jealous fears.

Allw. Oh, that I durst but hope it ! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A hall in Sir Giles's house.Enter Overreach, Greedy, and Marball.

Over. Spare for no cost, let my dressers crack with the weight
Of curious viands.

Greedy. Store, indeed, is no sore, sir.

Over. That proverb fits your stomach, Mr Greedy.

Greedy. It does, indeed, sir Giles.
I do not like to see a table ill spread,
Poor, meagre, just sprinkled o'er with sallads,
Sliced beef, giblets, and pig's pettitoes.
But the substantials—Oh ! sir Giles, the substantials !

The state of a fat turkey, now,
The decorum, the grandeur he marches in with.
O, I declare, I do much honour a chine of beef !
O, Lord ! I do reverence a loin of veal !

Over. And let no plate be seen but what's pure gold,

Or such, whose workmanship exceeds the matter
That it is made of ; let my choicest linen
Perfume the room ; and when we wash, the water
With precious powders mix, to please my lord,
That he may, with envy, wish to bathe so ever.

Mar. 'Twill be very chargeable.

Over. Avaunt, you drudge !
Now all my laboured ends are at the stake,
Is it time to think of thrift ? Call in my daughter.
[Exit MARRALL.]

And, master justice, since you love choice dishes,
And plenty of them——

Greedy. As I do, indeed, sir,
Almost as much as to give thanks for them——

Over. I do confer that province, with my power
Of absolute command to have abundance,
To your best care.

Greedy. I'll punctually discharge it,
And give the best direction.—[OVERREACH retires.]—Now am I,

In mine own conceit, a monarch; at the least
Arch-president of the boiled, the roast, the baked;
I would not change my empire for the great Mogul's.

I will eat often, and give thanks,
When my belly's braced up like a drum, and that's pure justice. [Exit.

Over. It must be so. Should the foolish girl prove modest,
She may spoil all; she had it not from me,
But from her mother: I was ever forward,
As she must be, and therefore I'll prepare her.

Enter MARGARET and MARRALL.

Alone, and let your women wait without, Margaret. [Exit MARRALL.

Marg. Your pleasure, sir?

Over. Ha, this is a neat dressing!
These orient pearls, and diamonds well placed,
too!

The gown affects me not; it should have been Embroidered o'er and o'er with flowers of gold;
But these rich jewels and quaint fashion help it.
How like you your new woman, the lady Down-
fallen?

Marg. Well, for a companion:
Not as a servant.

Over. Is she humble, Meg,
And careful, too? her ladyship forgotten?

Marg. I pity her fortune.

Over. Pity her, trample on her.
I took her up in an old tattered gown,
E'en starved for want of food, to serve thee;
And, if I understand she but repines
To do thee any duty, though ne'er so servile,
I'll pack her to her knight, where I have lodged
him,
Into the counter; and there let them howl together.

Marg. You know your own ways: but, for me,
I blush
When I command her, that was once attended
With persons not inferior to myself
In birth.

Over. In birth! Why, art thou not my daughter,
The blest child of my industry and wealth?
Why, foolish girl, was't not to make thee great,
That I have run, and still pursue those ways,
That hale down curses on me, which I mind not?
Part with these humble thoughts, and apt thyself
To the noble state I labour to advance thee;

Or, by my hopes to see thee honourable,
I will adopt a stranger to my heir,
And throw thee from my care; do not provoke
me.

Marg. I will not, sir; mould me which wa you please.

Enter GREEDY.

Over. How, interrupted?

Greedy. 'Tis matter of importance.
The cook, sir, is self-willed, and will not learn From my experience. There's a fawn brough in, sir,

And for my life, I cannot make him roast it
With a Norfolk dumpling in the belly of it:
And, sir, we wise men know, without the dumpling

'Tis not worth three pence.

Over. Would it were whole in thy belly,
To stuff it out! cook it any way; prithee, leave
me.

Greedy. Without order for the dumpling?

Over. Let it be dumped
Which way thou wilt; or, tell him, I will scald
him

In his own cauldron.

Greedy. I had lost my stomach,
Had I lost my mistress's dumpling; I'll give ye thanks for't. [Exit.

Over. But to our business, Meg; you have heard who dines here?

Marg. I have, sir.

Over. 'Tis an honourable man.
A lord, Meg, and commands a regiment
Of soldiers; and, what's rare, is one himself;
A bold and understanding one; and to be
A lord, and a good leader, in one volume,
Is granted unto few, but such as rise up,
The kingdom's glory.

Enter GREEDY.

Greedy. I'll resign my office,
If I be not better obeyed.

Over. 'Slight, art thou frantic?

Greedy. Frantic! 'twould make me frantic, and stark mad,

Were I not a justice of peace and quorum, too,
Which this rebellious cook cares not a straw for;
There are a dozen of woodcocks,
For which he has found out
A new device for sauce, and will not dish them
With toast and butter.

Over. Cook, rogue, obey him.
I have given the word; pray you, now, remove yourself

To a collar of brawn, and trouble me no farther.

Greedy. I will, and meditate what to eat for dinner. [Exit GREEDY.

Over. And, as I said, Meg, when this gull disturbed us,
This honourable lord, this colonel,
I would have thy husband.

Marg. There's too much disparity
Between his quality and mine to hope it.

Over. I more than hope it, and doubt not to effect it.

Be thou no enemy to thyself; my wealth
Shall weigh his titles down, and make you equals.
Now for the means to assure him thine, observe
me;

Remember he's a courtier and a soldier,
And not to be trifled with; and therefore, when
He comes to woo you, see you do not coy it.
This smiting modesty hath spoiled many a match

By a first refusal, in vain after hoped for.

Marg. You'll have me, sir, preserve the distance that

Confines a virgin?

Over. Virgin me no virgins.

I will have you lose that name, or you lose me;
I will have you private; start not, I say private;
If you are my true daughter, not a bastard,
Then wilt venture alone with one man, though he came

Like Jupiter to Semele, and come off too.

Marg. I have heard this is the wanton's fashion, sir,

Which I must never learn.

Over. Learn any thing,

And from any creature, to make thee great;
From the devil himself.

Stand not on for form:

Words are no substances.

Marg. Though you can dispense
With your honour, I must guard my own.

This is not the way to make me his wife.

My maiden honour yielded up so soon,

Nay, prostituted, cannot but assure him,

I, that am light to him, will not hold weight

When tempted by others: so, in judgment,

When to his will I have given up my honour,

He must and will forsake me.

Over. How! forsake thee?

Do I wear a sword for fashion? or is this arm

Shrunk up, or withered? does there live a man

Of that large list I have encountered with,

Can truly say I e'er gave inch of ground,

Not purchased with his blood, that did oppose
me?

Forsake thee when the thing is done! he dares
not.

Give me but proof he has enjoyed thy person,

Though all his captains, echoes to his will,

Sword armed by his side to justify his wrong,

And he himself in the head of his bold troop,

Spite of his lordship, I will make him render

A bloody and a strict account, and force him,

By marrying thee, to cure thy wounded honour.

I have said it.

Enter MARRALL.

Mr. Sir, the man of honour's come,
Nerly alighted.

VOL. II.

Over. In, without reply,
And do as I command, or thou art lost.

[Erit MARG.

Is the loud music I gave order for,

Ready to receive him?

Mar. 'Tis, sir.

Over. Let them sound

A princely welcome—[Erit MARRALL.]

Roughness awhile leave me;

For fawning, now, a stranger to my nature,

Must make way for me. [Loud music.

Enter LOVELL, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

Lov. Sir, you meet your trouble.

Over. What you are pleased to style so, is an honour

Above my worth and fortunes.

Alw. Strange! so humble!

Enter GREEDY.

Over. A justice of peace, my lord.

[Presents GREEDY to him.

Lov. Your hand, good sir.

Greedy. This is a lord; and some think this a favour;

But I had rather have my hand in my dumpling.
[Aside.

Over. Room for my lord.

Lov. I miss, sir, your fair daughter

To crown my welcome.

Over. May it please my lord

To taste a glass of Greek wine first; and suddenly

She shall attend, my lord.

Lov. You'll be obeyed, sir.

[Exeunt omnes, præter OVER.

Over. 'Tis to my wish; as soon as come, ask for her!

Why Meg! Meg Overreach!

Enter MARGARET.

How! tears in your eyes?

Hah! dry them quickly, or I'll dig them out.

Is this a time to whimper? Meet that greatness

That flies into thy bosom; think what 'tis

For me to say, my honourable daughter:

No more, but be instructed, or expect—

He comes.

Enter LOVELL, GREEDY, MARRALL, and ALL-WORTH.

A black-browed girl, my lord.

Lov. As I live, a rare one!

Alw. He's took already: I am lost.

Over. That kiss

Came twanging off, I like it; quit the room.

[Exeunt ALLWORTH, MARRALL, and GREEDY.

A little bashful, my good lord; but you,

I hope, will teach her boldness.

Lov. I am happy

In such a scholar: but—

K

Over. I am past learning,
And therefore leave you to yourselves; remember—
[To his daughter. Exit OVERREACH.

Lov. You see, fair lady, your father is solicitous

To have you change the barren name of virgin
Into a hopeful wife.

Marg. His haste, my lord,
Holds no power o'er my will.

Lov. But o'er your duty—

Marg. Which, forced too much, may break.

Lov. Bend, rather, sweetest:
Think of your years.

Marg. Too few to match with yours:
And choicest fruits, too soon plucked, rot and wither.

Lov. Do you think I am old?

Marg. I am sure I am too young.

Lov. I can advance you.

Marg. To a hill of sorrow;
Where every hour I may expect to fall,
But never hope firm footing. You are noble;
I of low descent, however rich.
O my good lord, I could say more, but that
I dare not trust these walls.

Lov. Pray you, trust my ear then.

Enter OVERREACH listening.

Over. Close at it! whispering! this is excellent!
And, by their postures, a consent on both parts.

Enter GREEDY.

Greedy. Sir Giles! Sir Giles!

Over. The great fiend stop that clapper!

Greedy. It must ring out, sir, when my belly rings noon.

The baked meats are ran out, the roast turned powder.

Over. Stop your insatiate jaws, or
I shall powder you.

Greedy. Beat me to dust, I care not;
In such a cause as this, I'll die a martyr.

Over. Disturb my lord, when he is in discourse?

Greedy. Is it a time to talk,
When we should be munching?

Over. Peace, villain! peace! shall we break a bargain

Almost made up? Vanish, I say.

[Thrusts GREEDY off.

Lov. Lady, I understand you:
And rest most happy in your choice. Believe it,
I'll be a careful pilot to direct
Your yet uncertain bark to a port of safety.

Marg. So shall your honour save two lives, and bind us
Your slaves for ever.

Lov. I am in the act rewarded,
Since it is good; howe'er you must put on
An amorous carriage towards me, to delude
Your subtle father.

Marg. I am bound to that.

Lov. Now break off our conference. Sir Giles
Where is sir Giles?

Enter OVERREACH, GREEDY, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.

Over. My noble lord! and how Does your lordship find her?

Lov. Apt, sir Giles, and coming,
And I like her the better.

Over. So do I, too.

Lov. Yet, should we take forts at the first assault,
'Twere poor in the defendant. I must confirm
her

With a love-letter or two, which I must have Delivered by my page, and you give way to it.

Over. With all my soul. A towardly gentleman!

Your hand, good Mr Allworth; know, my house
Is ever open to you.

Allw. 'Twas still shut till now. [Aside.

Over. Well done, well done, my honourable daughter!

Thou art so already: know this gentle youth,
And cherish him, my honourable daughter.

Marg. I shall, with my best care.

[Noise of a coach.

Over. What noise?

Greedy. More stops
Before we go to dinner! O my guts!

Enter LADY and WELLBORN.

Lady. If I find welcome,
You share in it; if not, I'll back again,
Now I know your ends; for I come armed for all
Can be objected.

Lov. How! the lady Allworth?

Over. And thus attended!

Mar. No, I am a dolt;
The spirit of lies had entered me.

[LOVELL salutes the Lady, who salutes MARGARET.

Over. Peace, patch!

'Tis more than wonder, an astonishment
That does possess me wholly.

Lov. Noble lady,
This is a favour to prevent my visit,
The service of my life can never equal.

Lady. My lord, I laid wait for you, and much hoped
You would have made my poor house your first inn:

And, therefore, doubting that you might forget me,
Or too long dwell here, having such ample cause,
In this unequalled beauty, for your stay;
And fearing to trust any but myself
With the relation of my service to you,
I borrowed so much from my long restraint,
And took the air in person to invite you.

Lov. Your bounties are so great, they rob me,
madam,

Of words to give you thanks.

Lady. Good sir Giles Overreach!

[Salutes him.

How dost thou, Marrall? Liked you my meat so ill,
You'll dine no more with me?

Greedy. I will when you please,
And it like your ladyship.

Lady. When you please, Mr Greedy;
If meat can do it, you shall be satisfied:
And now, my lord, pray take into your knowledge

This gentleman; howe'er his outside's coarse, [Presents WELLBORN.

His inward linings are as fine and fair
As any man's. Wonder not I speak at large:
And howsoe'er his humour carries him
To be thus accoutred; or what taint soe'er
For his wild life have struck upon his fame;
He may, ere long, with boldness, rank himself
With some that have condemned him. Sir Giles
Overreach,

If I am welcome, bid him so.

Over. My nephew!

He hath been too long a stranger: 'faith you have.

Pray, let it be mended.

[LOVELL conferring with WELLBORN.

Mar. Why, sir, what do you mean?
This is rogue Wellborn, monster, prodigy,
That should hang, or drown himself, no man of worship,
Much less your nephew.

Over. Well, sirrah, we shall reckon
For this hereafter.

Mar. I'll not lose my jeer,
Though I be beaten dead for it.

Will. Let my silence plead
In my excuse, my lord, till better leisure
Offer itself to hear a full relation
Of my poor fortunes.

Lee. I would hear and help them.

[Bell rings.

Over. Your dinner waits you.

Lee. Pray you lead, we follow.

Lady. Nay, you are my guest; come, dear Mr
Well-born. [Exeunt. Manet GREEDY.

Greedy. Dear Mr Wellborn! so she said;
Heaven! Heaven!

If my belly would give me leave, I could ruminate

All day on this: I have granted warrants
To have him committed, from all prisons in the shire,

To Nottingham jail! and now, dear Mr Well-
born!

And my good nephew! But I play the fool
To stand here prating, and forget my dinner.

Enter MARRALL.

Are they set, Marrall?

Mar. Long since; pray, you a word, sir.

Greedy. No wording now.

Mar. In troth, I must: my master,
Knowing you are his good friend, makes bold
with you,

And does intreat you, more guests being come in
Than he expected, especially his nephew,
The table being too full, you would excuse him,
And sup with him on the cold meat.

Greedy. How! no dinner
After all my care?

Mar. 'Tis but a penance for
A meal; besides, you have broke your fast.

Greedy. That was
But a bit to stay my stomach. A man in commission

Give place to a tatterdemallion!

Mar. No big words, sir;
Should his worship hear you—

Greedy. Lose my dumpling too?
And buttered toasts and woodcocks?

Mar. Come, have patience;
If you will dispense a little with your justiceship,
And sit with the waiting-women, you'll have dumpling,

Woodcock, and buttered toasts, too.

Greedy. This revives me:
I will gorge there sufficiently.

Mar. This is the way, sir. [Exeunt.

Enter OVERREACH, as from dinner.

Over. She's caught! O woman! she neglects my lord,

And all her compliments apply to Wellborn!
The garments of her widowhood laid by,
She now appears as glorious as the spring.
Her eyes fixed on him; in the wine she drinks,
He being her pledge, she sends him burning
kisses,

And sits on thorns till she be private with him.
She leaves my meat to feed upon his looks;
And, if in our discourse he be but named,
From her a deep sigh follows. But why grieve I
At this? It makes for me; if she prove his,
All that is hers is mine, as I will work him.

Enter MARRALL.

Mar. Sir, the whole board is troubled at your rising.

Over. No matter, I'll excuse it; prithee, Marrall,

Watch an occasion to invite my nephew
To speak with me in private.

Mar. Who? the rogue,
The lady scorned to look on?

Over. You are a wag.

Enter LADY and WELLBORN.

Mar. See, sir, she comes, and cannot be without him.

Lady. With your favour, sir,
I shall make bold to walk a turn or two
In your rare garden.

Over. There's another arbour, too,

If your ladyship please to use it.

Lady. Come, Mr Wellborn.

[Exit LADY and WELLBORN.]

Over. Grosser and grosser! My good lord,
Excuse my manhers.

Enter LOVELL, MARGARET and ALLWORTH.

Lov. There needs none, Sir Giles;
I may, ere long, say father, when it please
My dearest mistress to give warrant to it.

Over. She shall seal to it, my lord, and make me happy.

Marg. My lady is returned.

Enter WELLBORN and LADY.

Lady. Provide my coach,
I'll instantly away: my thanks, sir Giles,
For my entertainment.

Over. 'Tis your nobleness
To think it such.

Lady. I must do you a farther wrong,
In taking away your honourable guest.

Lov. I wait on you, madam: farewell, good sir Giles.

Lady. Nay, come, Mr Wellborn,
I must not leave you behind, in sooth, I must not.

Over. Rob me not, madam, of all joys at once.

Let my nephew stay behind: he shall have my coach,

And, after some small conference between us,
Soon overtake your ladyship.

Lady. Stay not long, sir.

Lov. This parting kiss. You shall every day hear from me,

By my faithful page. [To MARGARET.]

Allw. 'Tis a service I am proud of.

[Exit LOVELL, LADY, ALLWORTH, and MARRALL.]

Over. Daughter, to your chamber.

[Exit MARGARET.]

You may wonder, nephew,
After so long an enmity between us,
I shall desire your friendship.

Well. So I do, sir;

'Tis strange to me.

Over. But I'll make it no wonder;
And, what is more, unfold my nature to you.
We worldly men, when we see friends and kind
men

Past hope, sunk in their fortunes, lend no hand
To lift them up, but rather set our feet
Upon their heads, to press them to the bottom;
As, I must yield, with you I practised it:
But now I see you in a way to rise,
I can and will assist you. This rich lady
(And I am glad of it) is enamoured of you.

Well. No such thing:
Compassion rather, sir.

Over. Well, in a word,
Because your stay is short, I'll have you seen
No more in this base shape; nor shall she say,
'He married you like a beggar, or in debt.

Well. He'll run into the noose, and save my labour. [Aside.]

Over. You have a trunk of rich clothes, not far
hence,
In pawn; I will redeem them: and, that no clamour

May taint your credit for your debts,
You shall have a thousand pounds to cut them off,
And go a freeman to the wealthy lady.

Well. This done, sir, out of love, and no ends else—

Over. As it is, nephew.

Well. Binds me still your servant.

Over. No compliments: you are staid for:—
ere you've supped,
You shall hear from me. My coach, knaves, for my nephew!

To-morrow I will visit you.

Well. Here's an uncle
In a man's extremes! how much do they belie
you,

That say you are hard-hearted!

Over. My deeds, nephew,
Shall speak my love; what men report, I weigh not. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A chamber in LADY ALLWORTH'S house.

LOVELL and ALLWORTH discovered.

Lov. 'Tis well. Give me my hat: I now discharge you
From farther service. Mind your own affairs;
I hope they will prove successful.

Allw. What is blest
With your good wish, my lord, cannot but prosper.

Let after-times report, and to your honour,
How much I stand engaged; for I want language
To speak my debt: yet if a tear or two

Of joy, for your much goodness, can supply
My tongue's defects, I could—

Lov. Nay, do not melt:
This ceremonial of thanks to me is superfluous.

Over. [Within.] Is my lord stirring?

Lov. 'Tis he! Oh, here's your letter! let him in.

Enter OVERREACH, GREEDY, and MARRALL.

Over. A good day to my lord.

Lov. You are an early riser,
Sir Giles.

Over. And reason, to attend your lordship.

Lov. And you too, Mr Greedy, up so soon?

Greedy. In troth, my lord, after the sun is up
I cannot sleep; for I have a foolish stomach,
That croaks for breakfast. With your lordship's favour,

I have a serious question to demand
Of my worthy friend, sir Giles.

Lov. Pray you, use your pleasure.

Greedy. How far, sir Giles—and, pray you, answer me

Upon your credit—hold you it to be
From your manor-house to this of my lady Allworth's?

Over. Why, some four miles.

Greedy. How! four miles, good Sir Giles?
Upon your reputation think better;
For four miles riding
Could not have raised so huge an appetite
As I feel gnawing on me.

Mar. Whether you ride,
Or go a-foot, you are that way still provided,
And it please your worship.

Over. How now, sirrah! prating
Before my lord? no deference? Go to my nephew;
See all his debts discharged, and help his worship
To fit on his rich suit.

Mar. I may fit you, too. [Exit MARRALL.

Lov. I have writ this morning
A few lines to my mistress, your fair daughter.

Over. 'Twill fire her, for she's wholly yours already.

Sweet Mr Allworth, take my ring; 'twill carry
To her presence, I dare warrant you; and there plead

For my good lord, if you shall find occasion.
That done, pray ride to Nottingham; get a licence,

Still by this token. I'll have it dispatched,
And suddenly, my lord: that I may say
My honourable, nay, right honourable daughter.

Greedy. Take my advice, young gentleman;
get your breakfast.

'Tis unwholesome to ride fasting. I'll eat with
you,

And that abundantly.

Over. Some fury's in that gut:
Hungry again? Did you not devour, this morning,
A shield of brawn, and a barrel of Colchester oysters?

Greedy. Why, that was, sir, only to scour my stomach,

A kind of preparative. Come, gentlemen,
I will not have you feed alone, while I am here.

Lov. Haste your return.

Alth. I will not fail, my lord.

Greedy. Nor I, to line
My Christmas coffer.

[Exit GREEDY and ALLWORTH.

Over. To my wish, we're private.
I come not to make offer with my daughter
A certain portion; that were poor and trivial:
In one word, I pronounce all that is mine,
In lands, or leases, ready coin, or goods,

With her, my lord, comes to you; nor shall you
have

One motive to induce you to believe
I live too long, since every year I'll add Something unto the heap, which shall be yours
too.

Lov. You are a right kind father.

Over. You shall have reason
To think me such. How do you like this seat?
It is well wooded and well watered, the acres
Fertile and rich; would it serve for change
To entertain your friends in a summer's progress?
What thinks my noble lord?

Lov. 'Tis a wholesome air,
And well built; and she, that's mistress of it,
Worthy the large revenue.

Over. She the mistress?
It may be so for a time; but let my lord
Say only, that he but like it, and would have it,
I say, ere long 'tis his.

Lov. Impossible.

Over. You do conclude too fast, not knowing
me,

Nor the engines that I work by. 'Tis not alone
The lady Allworth's lands; for those, once Well-
born's,

(As, by her dotage on him, I know they will be) Shall soon be mine. But point out any man's
In all the shire, and say they lie convenient
And useful for your lordship, and once more
I say aloud, they are yours.

Lov. I dare not own
What's by unjust and cruel means extorted:
My fame and credit are more dear to me,
Than to expose them to be censured by
The public voice.

Over. You run, my lord, no hazard;
Your reputation shall stand as fair,
In all good mens' opinions, as now:
Nor can my actions, though condemned for ill,
Cast any foul aspersion upon yours.
For though I do condemn report myself,
As a mere sound, I still will be so tender
Of what concerns you in all points of honour,
That the immaculate whiteness of your fame,
Nor your unquestioned integrity,
Shall ere be sullied with one taint or spot,
That may take from your innocence and candour.
All my ambition is, to have my daughter
Right honourable; which my lord can make her:
And might I live to dance upon my knee
A young lord Lovell, born by her unto you,
I write nil ultra to my proudest hopes.
As for possessions, and annual rents,
Equivalent to maintain you in the port
Your noble birth and present state require,
I do remove that burden from your shoulders,
And take it on mine own; for though I ruin
The country, to supply your riotous waste,
The scourge of prodigals, want, shall never find
you.

Lov. Are you not moved with the imprecations

And curses of whole families, made wretched
By these practices?

Over. Yes, as rocks are,
When foamy billows split themselves against
Their flinty ribs; or as the moon is moved,
When wolves, with hunger pined, howl at her brightness.

I am of a solid temper, and, like these,
Steer on a constant course: with mine own sword,
If called into the field, I can make that right,
Which fearful enemies murmured at as wrong.
Now, for those other piddling complaints,
Breathed out in bitterness; as when they call me
Extortioner, tyrant, cormorant, or intruder
On my poor neighbour's right, or grand incloser,
Of what was common, to my private use;
Nay, when my ears are pierced with widows'
cries,

And undone orphans wash with tears my threshhold,

I only think what 'tis to have my daughter
Right honourable; and 'tis a powerful charm!
Makes me insensible of remorse, or pity,
Or the least sting of conscience.

Lov. I admire
The toughness of your nature.

Over. 'Tis for you,
My lord, and for my daughter, I am marble;
Nay, more, if you will have my character
In little, I enjoy more true delight
In my arrival to my wealth these dark
And crooked ways, than you shall e'er take pleasure

In spending what my industry hath compassed.
My haste commands me hence: in one word, therefore,

Is it a match, my lord?

Lov. I hope that is past doubt, now.

Over. Then rest secure; not the hate of all mankind here,
Not fear of what can fall on me hereafter,
Shall make me study aught but your advancement
One story higher. An earl! If gold can do it.
Dispute not my religion, nor my faith,
Though I am borne thus headlong by my will;
You may make choice of what belief you please;
To me they are equal. So, my lord, good morrow. [Exit.]

Lov. He's gone; I wonder how the earth can bear
Such a portent! I, that have lived a soldier,
And stood the enemy's violent charge undaunted,
To hear this horrid beast, I'm bathed all over
In a cold sweat; yet, like a mountain, he
Is no more shaken, than Olympus is,
When angry Boreas loads his double head
With sudden drifts of snow.

Enter LADY.

Lady. Save you, my lord!
Disturb I not your privacy?

Lov. No, good madam;

For your own sake I am glad you came no sooner,
Since this bold, bad man, sir Giles Overreach,
Made such a plain discovery of himself,
And read this morning such devilish matins,
That I should think a sin, next to his,
But to repeat it——

Lady. I ne'er pressed, my lord,
On other's privacies; yet, against my will,
Walking, for health's sake, in the gallery
Adjoining to our lodgings, I was made
(So loud and vehement he was) partaker
Of his tempting offers. But,
My good lord, if I may use my freedom,
As to an honoured friend——

Lov. You lessen else
Your favour to me.

Lady. I dare, then, say thus:
(However common men
Make sordid wealth the object and sole end
Of their industrious aims) 'twill not agree
With those of noble blood, of fame and honour.

Love. Madam, 'tis confessed;
But what infer you from it?

Lady. This, my lord: I allow
The heir of sir Giles Overreach, Margaret,
A maid well qualified, and the richest match
Our north part can boast of; yet she cannot,
With all that she brings with her, fill their mouths,
That never will forget who was her father;
Or that my husband Allworth's lands, and Well-
born's,

(How wrung from both needs no repetition)
Were real motives, that more worked your lordship

To join your families, than her form and virtues.
You may conceive the rest.

Lov. I do, sweet madam;
And long since have considered it.
And this my resolution, mark me, madam;
Were Overreach's states thrice centupled, his daughter

Millions of degrees much fairer than she is,
I would not so adulterate my blood,
By marrying Margaret. In my own tomb
I will inter my name first.

Lady. I am glad to hear this. [Aside.
Why, then, my lord, pretend you marriage to
her?

Dissimulation but ties false knots
On that straight line, by which you hitherto
Have measured all your actions.

Lov. I make answer,
And aptly, with a question. Wherefore have you,
That, since your husband's death, have lived a strict

And chaste nun's life, on the sudden given yourself

To visits and entertainments? Think you, madam,
'Tis not grown public conference? or the favours,
Which you too prodigally have thrown on Well-
born,

Incur not censure?

Lady. I am innocent here, and, on my life, I swear

My ends are good.

Lee. On my soul, so are mine
To Margaret; but leave both to the event:
And since this friendly privacy doth serve
But as an offered means unto ourselves
To search each other farther; you have shewn
Your care of me, I my respect to you.
Deny me not, but still in chaste words, madam,
As afternoon's discourse.

Lady. Affected modesty might deny your suit;
But, such your honour, I accept it, lord.
My tongue unworthy can't belie my heart.
I shall attend your lordship. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A landscape.

Enter TAPWELL and FROTH.

Tap. Undone! undone! this was your counsel, Froth.

Froth. Mine! I defy thee: did not Master Marrall

(He has married all, I am sure) strictly command us

(On pain of Sir Giles Overreach's displeasure)
To turn the gentleman out of doors?

Tap. 'Tis true;

But now he's his uncle's darling, and has got Master Justice Greedy (since he filled his belly)
At his commandment to do any thing;

We woe to us!

Froth. He may prove merciful.

Tap. Troth, we do not deserve it at his hands:
Though he knew all the passages of our house,
As the receiving of stolen goods,
When he was rogue Wellborn, no man would believe him,

And then his information could not hurt us:

But now he is right worshipful again,
Who dares but doubt his testimony? Methinks
I see thee, Froth, already in a cart,

And my hand hissing (if I 'scape the halter)

With the letter R printed upon it.

Froth. Would that were the worst!

That were but nine days wonder: as for credit,
We have none to lose; but we shall lose the money

He owes us, and his custom; there's the hell on't.

Tap. He has summoned all his creditors by the drum,

And they swarm about him like so many soldiers
On the pay day; and has found such a new way
To pay his old debts, as, 'tis very likely,
He shall be chronicled for it.

Froth. He deserves it

More than ten pageants. But are you sure his worship

Comes this way to my lady's?

[A cry within, brave MR. WELLBORN!]

Tap. Yes, I hear him.

Froth. Be ready with your petition, and present it

To his good grace.

Enter WELLBORN, in a rich habit, GREEDY, MARRALL, AMBIE, ORDER, FURNACE, and three creditors; TAPWELL, kneeling, delivers his bill of debt.

Well. How's this! petitioned too!

But note what miracles the payment of
A little trash, and a rich suit of clothes,
Can work upon these rascals! I shall be,
I think, prince Wellborn.

Mar. When your worship's married,
You may be—I know not what I hope to see you.

Well. Then look thou for advancement.

Mar. To be known

Your worship's bailiff, is the mark I shoot at.

Well. And thou shalt hit it.

Mar. Pray you, sir, dispatch

These needy followers, and for my admittance,
[In this interim, TAPWELL and FROTH flattering and bribing Justice GREEDY.]

(Provided you'll defend me from sir Giles, Whose service I am weary of) I'll say something
You shall give thanks for.

Well. Fear him not.

Greedy. Who, Tapwell? I remember thy wife brought me,

Last new year's tide, a couple of fat turkies.

Tap. And shall do every Christmas, let your worship

But stand my friend now.

Greedy. How! with Mr Wellborn?

I can do any thing with him, on such terms—
See you this honest couple? they are good souls.
As ever drew out spigot; have they not
A pair of honest faces?

Well. I o'erheard you,

And the bribe he promised; you are cozened in them;

For of all the scum, that grew rich by my riots,
This, for a most unthankful knave, and this,
For a base bawd and whore, have worst deserved;

And therefore speak not for them. By your place,

You are rather to do me justice; lend me your ear,

Forget his turkeys, and call in his licence,

And, at the next fair, I'll give you a yoke of oxen
Worth all his poultry.

Greedy. I am changed on the sudden,
In my opinion—Mum! my passion is great!
I fry like a burnt marrow-bone—Come nearer, rascal!

And now I view him better, did you e'er see

One look so like an arch-knave? his very countenance,

Should an understanding judge but look on him,
Would hang him, though he were innocent,

Tap. and Froth. Worshipful sir!

Greedy. No; though the Great Turk came instead of turkies,
To beg my favour, I am inexorable:
Thou hast an ill-name; for, except thy musty ale,
That hath destroyed many of the king's liege people,
Thou never hadst in thy house, to stay men's stomachs,
A piece of Suffolk cheese, or gammon of bacon,
Or any esculent, as the learned call it,
For their emolument, but sheer drink only.
For which gross fault, I here do damn thy licence,
Forbidding thee ever to tap or draw;
For instantly I will, in mine own person,
Command the constable to pull down thy sign;
And do it before I eat.

Froth. No mercy?

Greedy. Vanish.

If I shew any, may my promised oxen gore me!

Tap. Unthankful knaves are ever so rewarded.

[Exeunt TAPWELL and FROTH.]

Well. Speak; what are you?

1 Cred. A decayed vintner, sir,
That might have thrived, but that your worship broke me,
With trusting you with muscadine and eggs,
And five pound suppers, with your after-drinkings,
When you lodged upon the bankside.

Well. I remember.

1 Cred. I have not been hasty, nor e'er laid to arrest you;

And therefore, sir——

Well. Thou art an honest fellow:
I'll set you up again; see this bill paid.
What are you?

2d Cred. A taylor once, but now mere botcher.
I gave you credit for a suit of cloaths,
Which was all my stock; but you failing in payment,
I was removed from the shop-board, and confined
Under a stall.

Well. See him paid; and botch no more.

2d Cred. I ask no interest, sir.

Well. Such taylors need not;
If their bills are paid in one and twenty years,
They are seldom losers—O, I know thy face;
Thou wert my surgeon;
I will pay you in private.
See all men else discharged;
And, since old debts are cleared by a new way,
A little bounty will not misbecome me;
There is something, honest cook, for thy good breakfasts,
And this for your respect; take it, 'tis good gold,
And I am able to spare it.

Order. You are too munificent.

Furn. He was ever so.

Well. Pray you, on before;
I'll attend you at dinner.

Greedy. For Heaven's sake don't stay long;
It is almost ready. [Exit GREEDY]

Mar. At four o'clock the rest know where to meet me.

[Exeunt ORDER, FURNACE, AMBLE, and Creditors.]

Well. Now, Mr Marrall, what's the weighty secret

You promised to impart?

Mar. Sir, time nor place
Allow me to relate each circumstance;
This, only, in a word: I know sir Giles
Will come upon you for security,
For his thousand pounds; which you must not consent to.

As he grows in heat (as I am sure he will),
Be you but rough, and say, he's in your debt,
Ten times the sum, upon sale of your land:
I had a hand in't, (I speak it to my shame)
When you were defeated of it.

Well. That's forgiven.

Mar. I shall deserve it, then. Then urge him to produce

The deed, in which you passed it over to him,
Which I know he'll have about him, to deliver
To the lord Lovell, with many other writings,
And present monies. I'll instruct you farther,
As I wait on your worship. If I play not my part
To your full content, and your uncle's much vexation,

Hang up Jack Marrall.

Well. I rely upon thee.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A chamber in Sir Giles's house.

Enter ALLWORTH and MARGARET.

Allw. Whether to yield the first praise to my lord's Unequalled temperance, or your constant sweetness,
I yet rest doubtful.

Marg. Give it to lord Lovell;
For what in him was bounty, in me is duty.
I make but payment of a debt, to which
My vows, in that high office registered,
Are faithful witnesses.

Allw. 'Tis true, my dearest;
Yet, when I call to mind, how many fair ones
Make wilful shipwreck of their faiths and oaths
To God and man, to fill the arms of greatness;
And you, with matchless virtue, thus to hold out,
Against the stern authority of a father,
And spurn at honour, when it comes to court you;
I am so tender of your good, that I can hardly Wish myself that right, you are pleased to do me.

Marg. To me, what's title, when content is wanting?
Or wealth, when the heart pines

In being disposess of what it longs for?
Or the smooth brow
Of a pleased sire, that slaves me to his will?
And, so his ravenous humour may be feasted
By my obedience, and he see me great,
Leaves to my soul nor faculties nor power
To make her own election.

Allw. But the dangers,
That follow the repulse!

Marg. To me they are nothing:
Let Allworth love, I cannot be unhappy.
Suppose the worst; that, in his rage, he kill me;
A tear or two by you dropt on my hearse,
In sorrow for my fate, will call back life
So far as but to say, that I die your's.
I then shall rest in peace.

Allw. Heaven avert
Such trials of your true affection to me!
Nor will it unto you, that are all mercy,
Shew so much rigour. But since we must run
Such desperate hazards, let us do our best
To steer between them.

Marg. Lord Lovell is your friend;
And, though but a young actor, second me,
In doing to the life what he has plotted.

Enter OVERREACH.

The end may yet prove happy: now, my Allworth!

Allw. To your letter, and put on a seeming anger. [Aside.]

Marg. I'll pay my lord all debts due to his title;
And, when with terms not taking from his honour,

He does solicit me, I shall gladly hear him:
But in this peremptory, nay, commanding way,
To appoint a meeting, and without my knowledge;

A priest to tie the knot, can ne'er be undone,
Till death unloose it, is a confidence
In his lordship, that will deceive him.

Allw. I hope better, good lady.

Marg. Hope, sir, what you please: for me,
I must take a safe and secure course; I have
A father, and, without his full consent,
Though all lords of the land kneeled for my favour,

I can grant nothing.

Over. I like this obedience.
But whatsoever my lord writes, must, and shall be Accepted and embraced.—[Aside.]—Sweet Mr
Allworth,

You shew yourself a true and faithful servant
To your good lord; he has a jewel of you.
How! frowning, Meg! are these looks to receive

A messenger from my lord? What's this? give me it.

Marg. A piece of arrogant paper, like the inscription.

VOL. II.

[OVERREACH reads the letter.]

'Fair mistress, from your servant learn, all joys,
'That we can hope for, if deferred, prove toys;
'Therefore, this instant, and in private, meet
'A husband, that will gladly, at your feet,
'Lay down his honours, tendering them to you
'With all content, the church being paid her due.'

Over. Is this the arrogant piece of paper?
fool!

Will you still be one? In the name of madness, what

Could his good honour write more to content
you?

Is there aught else to be wished after these two,
That are already offered? Marriage first,
And lawful pleasure after: What would you more?

Marg. Why, sir, I would be married like your
daughter,

Not hurried away in the night I know not whither,
Without all ceremony; no friends invited,
To honour the solemnity.

Allw. An't please your honour,
For so before to-morrow I must stile you,
My lord desires this privacy, in respect
His honourable kinsmen are far off;
And his desires to have it done, brook not
So long delay as to expect their coming;
And yet he stands resolved, with all due pomp,
To have his marriage at court celebrated,
When he has brought your honour up to London.

Over. He tells you true; 'tis the fashion, on my knowledge:

Yet the good lord, to please your peevishness,
Must put it off, forsooth.

Marg. I could be contented,
Were you but by to do a father's part,
And give me in the church.

Over. So my lord have you,
What do I care who gives you? since my lord
Does propose to be private, I'll not cross him.
I know not, Mr Allworth, how my lord
May be provided, and therefore, there's a purse
Of gold: 'twill serve this night's expence: to-morrow

I'll furnish him with any sums. In the mean time,

Use my ring to my chaplain; he is beneficed
At my manor of Gotham, and called parson Welldo:

'Tis no matter for a licence; I'll bear him out in't.

Marg. With your favour, sir, what warrant is your ring?

He may suppose I got that twenty ways
Without your knowledge; and, then, to be refused,

Were such a stain upon me—if you please, sir,
Your presence would do better.

Over. Still perverse!

I say again, I will not cross my lord,
Yet I'll pervert you, too—Paper and ink there.

Allw. I can furnish you.

L

Over. I thank you, I can write then.

[Writes on his book.]

Allw. You may, if you please, leave out the name of my lord,

In respect he comes disguised, and only write, Marry her to this gentleman.

Over. Well advised. [MARGARET kneels.]

'Tis done; away—my blessing, girl? thou hast it. Nay, no reply—be gone, good Mr Allworth;

This shall be the best night's work you ever made.

Allw. I hope so, sir.

[Exeunt ALLWORTH and MARGARET.]

Over. Farewell! Now all's sure.

Methinks, I hear already knights and ladies

Say, sir Giles Overreach, how is it with

Your honourable daughter? has her honour

Slept well to-night? or, will her honour please

To accept this monkey, dog, or paroquet?

(This is state in ladies) or my eldest son

To be her page, and wait upon her trencher?—

My ends, my ends are compassed!—then for Wellborn

And the lands; were he once married to the widow—

I have him here—I can scarce contain myself,

I am so full of joy! nay, joy all over! [Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A chamber in LADY ALLWORTH'S house.

Enter LOVELL and LADY.

Lady. By this, you know how strong the motives were,

That did, my lord, induce me to dispense

A little with my gravity, to advance

The plots and projects of the down-trod Wellborn.

Lov. What you intended, madam,

For the poor gentleman, hath found good success;

For, as I understand, his debts are paid,

And he once more furnished for fair employment:

But all the arts, that I have used to raise

The fortunes of your joy and mine, young Allworth,

Stand yet in supposition, though I hope well.

For the young lovers are in wit more pregnant

Than their years can promise; and for their desires,

On my knowledge they equal.

Lady. Though my wishes

Are with yours, my lord, yet give me leave to fear

The building, though well grounded. To deceive

Sir Giles, that's both a lion and a fox

In his proceedings, were a work beyond

The strongest undertakers; not the trial

Of two weak innocents.

Lov. Despair not, madam:

Hard things are compassed oft by easy means.

The cunning statesman, that believes he fathoms

The counsels of all kingdoms on the earth,

Is, by simplicity, oft overreached.

Lady. May be so.

The young ones have my warmest wishes.

Lov. O, gentle lady, let them prove kind to me!

You've kindly heard—now grant my suit.

What say you, lady?

Lady. Troth, my lord,

My own unworthiness may answer for me;

For had you, when I was in my prime,

Presented me with this great favour,

I could not but have thought it as a blessing,

Far, far beyond my merit.

Lov. You are too modest,

And undervalue that, which is above

My title, or whatever I call mine. In a word,

Our years, our states, our births, are not unequal.

If, then, you may be won to make me happy,

But join your hand to mine, and that shall be

A solemn contract.

Lady. I were blind to my own good,

Should I refuse it; yet, my lord, receive me

As such a one, the study of whose whole life

Shall know no other object but to please you.

Lov. If I return not, with all tenderness,

Equal respect to you, may I die wretched!

Lady. There needs no protestation, my lord,

To her, that cannot doubt—You are welcome, sir.

Enter WELLBORN.

Now, you look like yourself.

Well. And will continue

Such in my free acknowledgement, that I am

Your creature, madam, and will never hold

My life mine own, when you please to demand it.

Lov. It is a thankfulness, that well becomes you;

You could not make choice of a better shape

To dress your mind in.

Lady. For me, I am happy,

That my endeavours prospered. Saw you, of late,

Sir Giles, your uncle?

Well. I heard of him, madam,

By his minister, Marrall: he's grown into strange passions

About his daughter. This last night he looked for Your lordship at his house; but, missing you,

And she not yet appearing, his wise head

Is much perplexed and troubled.

Lov. I hope my project took.

Enter OVERREACH, with distracted looks, driving in MARRALL before him.

Lady. I strongly hope.

Over. Ha! find her, booby; thou huge lump of nothing,

I'll bore thine eyes out else.

Well. May it please your lordship,
For some ends of my own, but to withdraw
A little out of sight, though not of hearing;
You may, perhaps, have sport.

Lee. You shall direct me. [Steps aside.]

Over. I shall sol fa you, rogue!

Mar. Sir, for what cause
Do you use me thus?

Over. Cause, slave! why, I am angry,
And thou a subject only fit for beating;
And so to cool my choler. Look to the writing;
Let but the seal be broke upon the box,
That has slept in my cabinet these three years,
I'll rack thy soul for it.

Mar. I may yet cry quittance;
Though now I suffer, and dare not resist. [Aside.]

Over. Lady, by your leave, did you see my daughter, lady?
And the lord her husband? Are they in your house?

If they are, discover, that I may bid them joy;
And, as an entrance to her place of honour,
See your ladyship on her left hand, and make curtsies

When she nods on you; which you must receive

As a special favour.

Lady. When I know, sir Giles,
Her state requires such ceremony, I shall pay it;
But, in the mean time,

I give you to understand, I neither know
Nor care where her honour is.

Over. When you once see her
Supported, and led by the lord her husband,
You'll be taught better—Nephew!

Well. Well!

Over. No more!

Well. 'Tis all I owe you.

Over. Have your redeemed rags
Made you thus insolent?

Well. Insolent to you! [In scorn.]
Why, what are you, sir, more than myself?

Over. His fortune swells him:

'Tis rank, he is married.

Lady. This is excellent!

Over. Sir, in calm language (though I seldom use it),

I am familiar with the cause, that makes you
Bear up thus bravely; there's a certain buz
Of a stolen marriage; Do you hear? of a stolen
marriage;

In which, 'tis said, there's somebody hath been cozened.

I name no parties. [Lady turns away.]

Well. Well, sir, what follows?

Over. Marry this, since you are peremptory, remember,

Upon mere hope of your great match, I lent you
A thousand pounds; put me in good security,

And suddenly, by mortgage or by statute,
Of some of your new possessions, or I'll have you

Dragged in your lavender robe, to the jail; you know me,

And therefore do not trifle.

Well. Can you be
So cruel to your nephew, now he is in
The way to rise? Was this your courtesy
You did me in pure love, and no ends else?

Over. End me no ends; engage the whole estate,

And force your spouse to sign it: you shall have Three or four thousand more to roar and swag-
ger,

And revel in bawdy taverns.

Well. And beg after:

Mean you not so?

Over. My thoughts are mine, and free.

Shall I have security?

Well. No, indeed, you shall not:

Nor bond, nor bill, nor bare acknowledgment:

Your great looks fright not me.

Over. But my deeds shall—

Out-braved! [They both draw.]

Enter AMBLE, ORDER, and FURNACE.

Lady. Help, murder! murder!

Well. Let him come on,
With all his wrongs and injuries about him,
Armed with his cut-throat practices to guard
him;

The right I bring with me will defend me,
And punish his extortion.

Over. That I had thee
But single in the field!

Lady. You may; but make not
My house your quarrelling scene.

Over. Were it in a church,
By Heaven and hell, I'll do it!

Mar. Now, put him to
The shewing of the deed.

Well. This rage is vain, sir;
For fighting, fear not, you shall have your hands full

Upon the least incitement; and whereas
You charge me with a debt of a thousand pounds;
If there be law (howe'er you have no conscience)
Either restore my land, or I'll recover
A debt, that is truly due to me from you,
In value ten times more than what you challenge.

Over. I in thy debt! oh impudence! Did I not purchase

The land left by thy father? that rich land,
That had continued in Wellborn's name
Twenty descents; which, like a riotous fool,

Enter Servant, with a box.

Thou didst make sale of? Is not here inclosed
The deed, that does confirm it mine?

Mar. Now, now.

Well. I do acknowledge none; I ne'er passed o'er

Such land; I grant, for a year or two,
You had it in trust; which, if you do discharge,

Surrendering the possession, you shall ease
Yourself and me, of chargeable suits in law;
Which, if you prove not honest (as I doubt it),
Must, of necessity, follow.

Lady. In my judgment,
He does advise you well.

Over. Good, good! conspire
With your new husband, lady; second him
In his dishonest practices; but, when
This manor is extended to my use,
You'll speak in an humble key, and sue for favour.

Lady. Never: do not hope it.

Well. Let despair first seize me.

Over. Yet, to shut up thy mouth, and make thee give
Thyself the lie, the loud lie! I draw out
The precious evidence: If thou canst forswear
Thy hand and seal, and make a forfeit of [Opens the box.]

Thy ears to the pillory; see, here's that, will make

My interest clear—Ha!

Lady. A fair skin of parchment!

Well. Indented, I confess, and labels, too;
But neither wax nor words. How! thunderstruck!

Not a syllable to insult with? my wise uncle,
Is this your precious evidence? Is this, that makes

Your interest clear?

Over. I am o'erwhelmed with wonder!
What prodigy is this? What subtle devil
Hath razed out the inscription? the wax
Turned into dust, the rest of my deeds whole
As when they were deliver'd; and this only
Made nothing! do you deal with witches, rascal?
There's a statute for you, which will bring
Your neck in a hempen circle; yes, there is;
And now 'tis better thought; for, cheater, know
This juggling shall not save you.

Well. To save thee,
Would beggar the stock of mercy.

Over. Marrall.

Mar. Sir.

Over. Tho' the witnesses are dead,
[Flattering him.]

Your testimony
Help with an oath or two; and for thy master,
Thy liberal master, my good honest servant,
I know you will swear any thing to dash
This cunning slight: besides, I know thou art
A public notary, and such stands in law
For a dozen witnesses; the deed being drawn too
By thee, my careful Marrall, and delivered
When thou wert present, will make good my title;

Wilt thou not swear this?

Mar. I! no, I assure you.
I have a conscience, not seared up like yours;
I know no deeds.

Over. Wilt thou betray me?

Mar. Keep him
From using of his hands, I'll use my tongue
To his no little torment.

Over. Mine own varlet
Rebel against me?

Mar. Yes, and uncase you too.
The idiot; the patch; the slave; the booby;
The property, fit only to be beaten
For your morning exercise; your football, or
The unprofitable lump of flesh, your drudge,
Can now anatomize you, and lay open
All your black plots, level with the earth
Your hill of pride, and shake,
Nay, pulverize, the walls, you think defend you.

Lady. How he foams at the mouth with rage!

Over. O that I had thee in my gripe! I would tear thee
Joint after joint!

Mar. I know you are a tearer.
But I'll have first your fangs pared off; and then Come nearer to you; when I have discovered,
And made it good before the judge, what ways
And devilish practises, you used to cozen with.

Over. But that I will live, rogue, to torture
thee,
And make thee wish and kneel in vain to die;
These swords, that keep thee from me, should fix here,
Although they made my body but one wound,
But I would reach thee.

I play the fool, and make my anger but ridiculous.

There will be a time, and place, there will be, cowards!

When you shall feel what I dare do.

Well. I think so:
You dare do any ill, yet want true valour
To be honest and repent.

Over. They are words I know not,
Nor e'er will learn. Patience, the beggar's virtue,
Shall find no harbour here—After these storms,
At length a calm appears.

Enter GREEDY and Parson WELLD.

Welcome, most welcome!
There's comfort in thy looks; is the deed done?
Is my daughter married? say but so, my chaplain,
And I am tame.

Well. Married? yes, I assure you.

Over. Then vanish all sad thoughts! there's more gold for thee.
My doubts and fears are in the titles drowned
Of my right honourable, right honourable daughter.

Greedy. Here will be feasting at least for a month!

I am provided: empty guts, croak no more!
You shall be stuffed, like bag-pipes, not with wind,

But bearing disbes.

Over. Instantly be here!

[Whispering to WELLD.]

To my wish, to my wish. Now, you that plot against me,
And hoped to trip my heels up; that contemned
me;

Think on it and tremble!—[Loud music.]—They come, I hear the music.

A ha! there for my lord!

Well. This sudden heat
May yet be cooled, sir.

Over. Make way, there, for my lord!

Enter ALLWORTH, MARGARET, LOVELL, and LADY.

Marg. Sir, first your pardon, then your blessing, with Your full allowance of the choice I have made.
Not to dwell too long on words, [Kneeling.
This is my husband.

Over. How!

Alth. So, I assure you; all the rites of marriage,
With every circumstance, are past;
And for right honourable son-in-law, you may say
Your dutiful daughter.

Over. Devil! are they married?

Well. Do a father's part, and say, Heaven give them joy!

Over. Confusion and ruin! speak, and speak quickly,
Or thou art dead.

Well. They are married.

Over. Thou hadst better
Have made a contract with the king of fiends
Than these.—My brain turns!

Well. Why this rage to me?
Is not this your letter, sir? and these the words—
Marry her to this gentleman?

Over. It cannot;
Nor will I ever believe it: 'sdeath! I will not.
That I, that in all passages I touched
At worldly profit have not left print
Where I have trod, for the most curious search
To trace my footsteps, should be gulled by children!

Baffled and fooled, and all my hopes and labours
Defeated and made void!

Well. As it appears,
You are so, my grave uncle.

Over. Village nurses
Revenge their wrongs with curses; I'll not waste
A syllable, but thus I take the life,
Witch, wretch! I gave to thee.

[Offers to kill MARGARET.

Lov. Hold, for your own sake!
Though charity to your daughter hath quite left
you,

Will you do an act, tho' in your hopes lost here,
Can leave no hope for peace or rest hereafter?

Over. Lord! thus I spit at thee,
And at thy counsel; and again desire thee,
As thou art a soldier, if thy valour
Dares shew itself where multitude and example

Lead not the way, let's quit the house, and change

Six words in private.

Lov. I am ready.

Well. You'll grow like him,
Should you answer his vain challenge.

Over. Are you pale?

Borrow his help, though Hercules call it odds,
I'll stand against both, as I am hem'd in thus.
Say they were a squadron
Of pikes, lined through with shot, when I am mounted

Upon my injuries, shall I fear to charge them?
No: I'll thro' the battalia, and, that routed,
I'll fall to execution.—Ha! I am feeble:
Some undone widow sits upon mine arm,
And takes away the use of't! and my sword,
Glewed to my scabbard with wronged orphans'
tears,

Will not be drawn. Ha! what are these? Sure,
hangmen,
That come to bind my hands, and then to drag
me

Before the judgment-seat.—Now they are new shapes,

And do appear like furies, with steel whips,
To scourge my ulcerous soul! Shall I then fall
Ingloriously, and yield? No: spite of fate
I will be forced to hell like to myself;

Tho' you were legions of accursed spirits,
Thus would I fly among you.—

[Dragged off by ORDER and AMBLE.

Mar. Is't brave sport?

Greedy. Brave sport? I'm sure it has taken away my stomach.

I do not like the sauce.

Mar. Was it not a rare trick, (An't please your worship) to make the deed nothing?

Certain minerals I used,
Incorporated in the ink and wax.
Besides, he gave me nothing, but still fed me
With hopes and blows; and that was the inducement

To this conundrum.

Well. You are a rascal. He, that dares be false

To a master, tho' unjust, will ne'er be true
To any other. Look not for reward,
Or favour from me; I will shun thy sight
As I would do a basilisk's. Thank my pity,
If thou keep thy ears; howe'er I will take order

Your practice shall be silenced.

Greedy. I'll commit him,
If you'll have me, sir.

Well. That were to little purpose;
His conscience be his punishment; not a word,
But instantly begone. [Exit MARRALL.

Lov. Here is a precedent to teach wicked
men,
That, when we leave religion, and turn atheists,

Their own abilities leave them. Pray you take comfort. [To MARG.]

I will endeavour you shall be his guardians
In his distraction : and for your land, Mr. Well-
born,

Be it good or ill in law, I'll be an umpire
Between you, and this the undoubted heir
Of sir Giles Overreach ; for me, here's the anchor

That I must fix on. [Takes the lady's hand.]

Alw. What you shall determine,
My lord, I will allow of.

Well. 'Tis the language,
That I speak too ; but there is something else
Beside the repossession of my land
And payment of my debts, that I must practise.
I had a reputation, but 'twas lost
In my loose course ; and, till I redeem it
Some noble way, I am but half made up.

It is a time of action ; if your lordship
Will please to confer a company upon me
In your command, I doubt not, in my service
To my king and country, but I shall do ~~some~~ thing,

That may make me right again.

Lov. Your suit is granted,
And you loved for the motion.

Well. Nothing wants, then, [To the audience]
But your allowance—and, in that, our all
Is comprehended ; it being known, nor we,
Nor he that wrote the comedy, can be free
Without your manumission ; which, if you
Grant willingly, as a fair favour due
The poet's and our labours, as you may,
(For we despair not, gentlemen, of the play)
We jointly shall profess your grace hath might
To teach us action, and him how to write.

[Exeunt omnes]

Scene—Florence.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

Enter CAROLO CHAROMONTE. and CONTARINO.

Car. You bring your welcome with you.

Con. Sir, I find it,
In every circumstance.

Car. Again more welcome.
Yet, give me leave to wish (and pray you excuse
me,
For I must use the freedom I was born with)
The great duke's pleasure had commanded you
To my poor house upon some other service;
Not thus you are designed to: but his will Must be obeyed, howe'er it ravish from me
The happy conversation of one,
As dear to me as the old Romans held Their household Lares, who, they believed, had power

To bless and guard their families.

Con. 'Tis received so

On my part, signior; nor can the duke
But promise to himself as much as may Be hoped for from a nephew. And it were weakness

In any man to doubt, that Giovanni,
Trained up by your experience and care,
In all those arts peculiar and proper
To future greatness, of necessity
Must, in his actions, being grown a man,
Make good the princely education
Which he derived from you.

Car. I have discharged,
To the utmost of my power, the trust the duke
Committed to me, and, with joy, perceive
The seed of my endeavours was not sown
Upon the barren sands, but fruitful glebe,

Which yields a large increase; my noble charge,
By his sharp wit, and pregnant apprehension,
Instructing those that teach him; making use,
Not in a vulgar and pedantic form,
Of what's read to him, but 'tis straight digested,
And truly made his own. His grave discourse,
In one no more indebted unto years,
Amazes such as hear him. Horsemanship
And skill to use his weapon are, by practice,
Familiar to him: As for knowledge in Music, he needs it not, it being born with him;
All that he speaks being with such grace delivered,

That it makes perfect harmony.

Con. You describe

A wonder to me.

Car. Sir, he is no less;

And, that there may be nothing wanting that May render him complete, the sweetness of
His disposition so wins on all
Appointed to attend him, that they are Rivals even in the coarsest office, who Shall get precedence to do him service;
Which they esteem a greater happiness
Than if they had been fashioned and built up
To hold command o'er others.

Con. And what place

Does he now bless with his presence?

Car. He is now

Running at the ring, at which he's excellent.
He does allot for every exercise
A several hour; for sloth, the nurse of vices
And rust of action, is a stranger to him.
But I fear I am tedious; let us pass,
If you please, to some other subject, though I cannot

Deliver him as he deserves.

Con. You have given him

A noble character.

Car. And how, I pray you,
(For we that never look beyond our villas Must be inquisitive) are state affairs
Carried in court?

Con. There's little alteration:
Some rise, and others fall; as it stands with
The pleasure of the duke, their great disposer.

Car. Does Lodovico Sanazarro hold
Weight and grace with him?

Con. Every day new honours
Are showered upon him, and without the envy
Of such as are good men; since all confess,
The service done our master, in his wars
Against Pisa and Sienna, may, with justice,
Claim what's conferred upon him.

Car. 'Tis said nobly:

For princes never more make known their wisdom
Than when they cherish goodness, where they find it;
They being men, and not gods, Contarino,
They can give wealth and titles, but no virtues;

That is without their power. When they advance,

Not out of judgment, but deceiving fancy,
An undeserving man, howe'er set off
With all the trim of greatness, state, and power,
And, of a creature, even grown terrible
To him from whom he took his giant form,
This thing is still a comet, no true star;
And when the bounties, feeding his false fire,
Begin to fail, will of itself go out,
And, what was dreadful, proves ridiculous.
But in our Sanazarro 'tis not so:
He, being pure and tried gold, and any stamp
Of grace to make him current to the world,
The duke is pleased to give him, will add honour

To the great bestower; for he, though allowed
Companion to his master, still preserves
His majesty in full lustre.

Con. He, indeed,

At no part does take from it, but becomes
A partner of his cares, and eases him,
With willing shoulders, of a burthen, which
He should alone sustain.

Car. Is he yet married?

Con. No, signior; still a batchelor; howe'er,
It is apparent, that the choicest virgin
For beauty, bravery, and wealth, in Florence,
Would, with her parents' glad consent, be won
(Were his affection and intent but known)
To be at his devotion.

Car. So I think too.

Enter GIOVANNI and CALANDRINO.

But break we off. Here comes my princely charge.

Make your approaches boldly; you will find
A courteous entertainment.

Giov. Pray you, forbear

My hand, good signior; 'tis a ceremony
Not due to me. 'Tis fit we should embrace
With mutual arms

Con. It is a favour, sir,
I grieve to be denied.

Giov. You shall overcome:

But 'tis your pleasure, not my pride, that grants
it.

Nay, pray you, guardian, and good sir, put on:
How ill it shews to have that reverend head
Be uncovered to a boy!

Car. Your excellence
Must give me liberty to observe the distance
And duty that I owe you.

Giov. Owe me duty?

I do profess (and when I do deny it
Good fortune leave me), you have been to me
A second father, and may justly challenge,
For training up my youth in arts and arms,
As much respect and service, as was due
To him that gave me life. And did you know,
sir,
Or will believe from me, how many sleeps

Good Charomonte hath broken, in his care
To build me up a man, you must confess
Chiron, the tutor to the great Achilles,
Compared with him, deserves not to be named.
And if my gracious uncle, the great duke,
Still holds me worthy his consideration,
Or finds in me aught worthy to be loved,
That little rivulet flowed from this spring;
And so from me report him.

Con. Fame already
Hath filled his highness' ears with the true story
Of what you are, and how much bettered by him.
And 'tis his purpose to reward the travail
Of this grave sir, with a magnificent hand.
For, though his tenderness hardly could consent
To have you one hour absent from his sight,
For full three years he did deny himself
The pleasure he took in you, that you, here,
From this great master, might arrive unto
The theory of those high mysteries
Which you by action must make plain in court.
Tis, therefore, his request (and that, from him,
Your excellence must grant a strict command),
That instantly (it being not five hours riding)
You should take horse, and visit him. These his letters

Will yield you further reasons.

Cal. To the court?
Farewell the flower, then, of the country's garland!

This is our sun, and, when he's set, we must not Expect or spring or summer; but resolve
For a perpetual winter.

Car. Pray you observe

[GIOVANNI reading the letter.

The frequent changes in his face.

Con. As if
His much unwillingness to leave your house
Contented with his duty.

Car. Now he appears
Collected and resolved

Gior. It is the duke!
The duke, upon whose favour all my hopes
And fortunes do depend. Nor must I check
At his commands, for any private motives
That do invite my stay here, though they are Almost not to be mastered. My obedience,
In my departing suddenly, shall confirm
I am his highness's creature. Yet, I hope
A little stay, to take a solemn farewell
For all those ravishing pleasures I have tasted
In this my sweet retirement from my guardian,
And his incomparable daughter, cannot meet
An ill construction?

Con. I will answer that;
Use your own will.

Gior. I would speak to you, sir,
In such a phrase as might express the thanks
My heart would gladly pay; but——

Car. I conceive you:
And something I would say; but I must do it
In that dumb rhetoric which you make use of;

VOL. II.

For I do wish you all——I know not how,
My toughness melts, and, spite of my discretion,
I must turn woman.

Con. What a sympathy
There is between them!

Cal. Were I on the rack,
I could not shed a tear.—But I am mad,
And, ten to one, shall hang myself for sorrow,
Before I shift my shirt. But hear you, sir, I'll separate you: When you are gone, what will Become of me?

Gior. Why thou shalt to court with me.

Cal. To see you worried?

Con. Worried, Calandrino?

Cal. Yes, sir. For, bring this sweet face to the court,

There will be such longing among the madams,
Who shall ingross it first, nay, fight and scratch
for it,

That, if they be not stopped, for entertainment
They'll kiss his lips off. Nay, if you'll scape so,
And not be tempted to a farther danger,
These succubæ are so sharp set, that you must Give out you are an eunuch.

Con. Have a better
Opinion of court-ladies, and take care
Of your own stake.

Cal. For my stake, 'tis past caring;
I would not have a bird of unclean feathers
Handsel his lime-twig—and so much for him:
There's something else that troubles me.

Con. What's that?

Cal. Why, how to behave myself in court, and tightly.

I have been told the very place transforms men,
And that not one of a thousand, that, before,
Lived honestly in the country, on plain sallads,
But bring him thither, mark me that, and feed
him

But a month or two with custards and court cake-bread,

And he turns knave immediately. I would be honest;

But I must follow the fashion, or die a beggar.

Gior. And, if I ever reach my hopes, believe
it

We will share fortunes.

Car. This acknowledgment

Enter LYDIA.

Binds me your debtor ever. Here comes one,
In whose sad looks you may easily read
What her heart suffers, in that she is forced
To take her last leave of you.

Con. As I live,
A beauty without parallel.

Lyd. Must you go, then,
So suddenly?

Gior. There's no evasion, Lydia,
To gain the least delay, though I would buy it
At any rate. Greatness, with private men

M

Esteemed a blessing, is to me a curse ;
And we, whom, for our high births, they conclude

The only free men, are the only slaves.
Happy the golden mean ! had I been born
In a poor sordid cottage, not nursed up
With expectation to command a court,
I might, like such of your condition, sweetest,
Have took a safe and middle course, and not,
As I am now, against my choice compelled,
Or to lie grovelling on the earth, or raised
So high upon the pinnacles of state,
That I must either keep my height with danger,
Or fall with certain ruin.

Lyd. Your own goodness
Will be your faithful guard.

Giov. O Lydia !

Con. So passionate ?

Giov. For, had I been your equal,
I might have seen and liked with mine own eyes,
And not, as now, with other's ; I might still,
And without observation or envy,
As I have done, continued my delights
With you, that are alone, in my esteem,
The abstract of society : We might walk
In solitary groves, or in choice gardens ;
From the variety of curious flowers
Contemplate Nature's workmanship and wonders ;

And then, for change, near to the murmur of
Some bubbling fountain, I might hear you sing,
And, from the well-tuned accents of your tongue,
In my imagination conceive
With what melodious harmony a quire
Of angels sing, above, their maker's praises.
And then, with chaste discourse, as we returned,
Imp feathers to the broken wings of time ;
And all this I must part from !

Con. You forget
The haste imposed upon us.

Giov. One word more,
And, then, I come. And, after this, when with Continued innocence of love and service,
I had grown ripe for hymeneal joys,
Embracing you, but with a lawful flame,
I might have been your husband !

Lyd. Sir, I was,
And ever am, your servant ; but it was,
And 'tis, far from me, in a thought, to cherish
Such saucy hopes. If I had been the heir
Of all the globes and sceptres mankind bows to,
At my best you had deserved me ; as I am,
How'er unworthy, in my virgin zeal
I wish you, as a partner of your bed,
A princess equal to you ; such a one
That may make it the study of her life,
With all the obedience of a wife, to please you.
May you have happy issue, and I live
To be their humblest handmaid.

Giov. I am dumb,
And can make no reply.

Con. Your excellence

Will be benighted.

Giov. This kiss, bathed in tears,
May learn you what I should say.

Lyd. Give me leave
To wait on you to your horse.

Car. And me to bring you
To the one half of your journey.

Giov. Your love puts
Your age to too much trouble.

Car. I grow young,
When most I serve you.

Con. Sir, the duke shall thank you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

ALPHONSO, HIPPOLITO, HIERONIMO, with a petition.

Alph. His highness cannot take it ill.

Hip. However,
We, with our duties, shall express our care
For the safety of his dukedom.

Hier. And our loves

Enter Cozimo, the Duke.

To his person. Here he comes : Present it boldly.

Cox. What needs this form ? We are not grown so proud
As to disdain familiar conference
With such as are to counsel and direct us.
This kind of adoration shewed not well
In the old Roman emperors, who, forgetting
That they were flesh and blood, would be styled gods :

In us to suffer it, were worse. Pray you, rise.
Still the old suit ? With too much curiousness

[Reads.]
You have too often searched this wound, which yields

Security and rest, not trouble to me.
For here you grieve, that my firm resolution
Continues me a widower ; and that My want of issue to succeed me in
My government, when I am dead, may breed
Distraction in the state, and make the name
And family of the Medicis, now admired, Contemptible.

Hip. And, with strong reasons, sir.

Alph. For, were you old, and past hope to beget
The model of yourself, we should be silent.

Hier. But, being in your height and pride of years,
As you are now, grent sir, and having too
In your possession the daughter of
The deceased duke of Urbin, and his heir, Whose guardian you are made, were you but pleased

To think her worthy of you, besides children,
The dukedom she brings with her for a dower,
Will yield a large increase of strength and power
To these fair territories, which already

Acknowledge you their absolute lord.

Coz. You press us
With solid arguments, we grant; and, though
We stand not bound to yield account to any,
Why we do this or that (the full consent
Of our subjects being included in our will),
We, out of our free bounties, will deliver
The motives that divert us. You well know,
That three years since, to our much grief, we lost

Our dutchess; such a dutchess, that the world,
In her whole course of life, yields not a lady
That can, with imitation, deserve
To be her second. In her grave we buried
All thoughts of women: Let this satisfy
For any second marriage. Now, whereas
You name the heir of Urbin, as a princess
Of great revenues, 'tis confessed she is so:
But for some causes, private to ourself,
We have disposed her otherwise. Yet despair
not;

For you, ere long, with joy, shall understand,
That, in our princely care, we have provided
One worthy to succeed us.

Hip. We submit,
And hold the counsels of great Cozimo Oraculous.

Enter LODOVICO and SANAZARRO.

Coz. My Sanazarro—Nay,
Forbear all ceremony. You look sprightly, friend,
And promise, in your clear aspect, some novel
That may delight us.

San. O sir, I would not be
The harbinger of aught that might distaste you.
And, therefore, know (for 'twere a sin to torture
Your highness' expectation) your vice-admiral,
By my directions, hath surprised the gallies
Appointed to transport the Asian tribute
Of the great Turk; a richer prize was never Brought into Florence.

Coz. Still my nightingale,
That with sweet accents dost assure me, that
My spring of happiness comes fast upon me.
Embrace me boldly. I pronounce that wretch
An enemy to brave and thriving action,
That dares believe, but in a thought, we are Too prodigal in our favours to this man,
Whose merits, though with him we should divide
Our dukedom, still continue us his debtor.

Hip. 'Tis far from me.

Alph. We all applaud it.

Coz. Nay, blush not, Sanazarro; we are proud
Of what we build up in thee; nor can our Election be disparaged, since we have not Received into our bosom and our grace
A glorious lazy drone, grown fat with feeding
On other's toil, but an industrious bee,
That crops the sweet flowers of our enemies,
And every happy evening returns
Loaden with wax and honey to our hive.

San. My best endeavours never can discharge

The service I should pay.

Coz. Thou art too modest;
But we will study how to give, and when,

Enter GIOVANNI and CONTARINO.

Before it be demanded. Giovanni!
My nephew! Let me eye thee better, boy.
In thee, methinks, my sister lives again:
For her love I will be a father to thee,
For thou art my adopted son.

Giov. Your servant,
And humblest subject.

Coz. Thy hard travel, nephew,
Requires soft rest; and, therefore, we forbear,
For the present, an account how thou hast spent
Thy absent hours. See, signiors, see, our care,
Without a second bed, provides you of
A hopeful prince! Carry him to his lodgings,
And, for his farther honour, Sanazarro,
With the rest, do you attend him.

Giov. All true pleasures
Circle your highness.

San. As the rising sun,
We do receive you.

Giov. May this never set,
But shine upon you ever.

[Exeunt GIOVANNI, SANAZARRO, HIERO-
NIMO, ALPHONSO, LODOVICO.

Coz. Contarino!

Con. My gracious lord.

Coz. What entertainment found you
From Carolo de Charamonte?

Con. Free
And bountiful. He's ever like himself,
Noble and hospitable.

Coz. But did my nephew
Depart thence willingly?

Con. He obeyed your summons
As did become him. Yet, it was apparent,
But that he durst not cross your will, he would Have sojourned longer there, he ever finding
Variety of sweetest entertainment.
But there was something else; nor can I blame
His youth, though with some trouble he took leave

Of such a sweet companion.

Coz. Who was it?

Con. The daughter, sir, of Signior Carolo,
Fair Lydia, a virgin at all parts,
But in her birth and fortunes, equal to him.
The rarest beauties Italy can boast of
Are but mere shadows to her, she the substance
Of all perfection. And, what increases
The wonder, sir, her body's matchless form
Is bettered by the pureness of her soul;
Such sweet discourse, such ravishing behaviour,
Such charming language, such enchanting manners,

With a simplicity that shames all courtship,
Flow hourly from her, that I do believe
Had Circe, or Calypso, her sweet graces,

Wandering Ulysses never had remembered
Penelope or Ithaca.

Coz. Be not rapt so.

Con. Your excellence would be so, had you seen her.

Coz. Take up, Take up ! But did your observation

Note any passage of affection
Between her and my nephew ?

Con. How it should

Be otherwise between them, is beyond
My best imagination. Cupid's arrows
Were useless there ; for, of necessity,
Their years and dispositions do accord so,
They must wound one another.

Cas. Hum ! Thou art

My secretary, Contarino, and more skilled
In politic designs of state, than in Thy judgment of a beauty ; give me leave
In this to doubt it. Here. Go to my cabinet ;
You shall find there letters newly received,
Touching the state of Urbin. Pray you, with care

Peruse them ; leave the search of this to us.

Con. I do obey in all things.

[Exit CONTARINO.

Coz. Lydia ! a diamond so long concealed,
And never worn in court ? Of such sweet feature ?

And he on whom I fix my dukedom's hopes,
Made captive to it ? Hum ! 'Tis somewhat strange !

Our eyes are every where, and we will make
A strict inquiry. Sanazarro !

Enter SANAZARRO.

San. Sir.

Coz. Is my nephew at his rest ?

San. I saw him in bed, sir.

Coz. 'Tis well ; and does the princess Fiorinda
(Nay, do not blush, she is rich Urbin's heir)
Continue constant in her favours to you ?

San. Dread sir, she may dispense them as she pleases ;

But I look up to her as on a princess
I dare not be ambitious of ; and hope
Her prodigal graces shall not render me
Offending to your highness.

Coz. Not a scruple.

He whom I favour, as I do my friend,
May take all lawful graces that become him.
But touching this hereafter ; I have now
(And though, perhaps, it may appear a trifle)
Serious employment for thee.

San. I stand ready

For any act you please.

Coz. I know it, friend.

Have you ne'er heard of Lydia, the daughter
Of Carolo Charomonte ?

San. Him I know, sir,

For a noble gentleman, and my worthy friend ;
But never heard of her.

Coz. She is delivered,
And feelingly, to us by Contarino,
For a master-piece in nature. I would have you
Ride suddenly thither, to behold this wonder :
But not as sent by us, that's our first caution.
The second is, and carefully observe it,
That, though you are a bachelor, and endowed with

All those perfections that may take a virgin,
On forfeit of our favour, do not tempt her.
It may be her fair graces do concern us.
Pretend what business you think fit, to gain
Access into her father's house, and there
Make full discovery of her, and return me
A true relation. I have some ends in it,
With which we will acquaint you.

San. This is, sir,
An easy task.

Coz. Yet, one that must exact
Your secrecy and diligence. Let not Your stay be long.

San. It shall not, sir.

Coz. Farewell,
And be, as you would keep our favour, careful.
[Exeunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter FIORINDA and CALAMINTA.

Fio. How does this dressing shew ?

Cal. 'Tis of itself

Curious and rare ; but, borrowing ornament,
As it does from your grace, that deigns to wear
it,
Incomparable.

Fio. Thou flatterest me.

Cal. I cannot :

Your excellence is above it.

Fio. Were we less perfect,

Yet, being, as we are, an absolute princess,
We, of necessity, must be chaste, wise, fair,
By our prerogative. Yet all these fail
To move where I would have them. How received

Count Sanazarro the rich scarf I sent him
For his last visit ?

Cal. With much reverence ;
I dare not say affection. He expressed
More ceremony, in his humble thanks,
Than feeling of the favour ; and appeared
Wilfully ignorant, in my opinion,
Of what it did invite him to.

Fio. No matter ;

He's blind with too much light. Have you not heard

Of any private mistress he's engaged to?

Cal. Not any; and this does amaze me, madam,

That he, a soldier, one that drinks rich wines,
Feeds high, and promises as much as Venus
Could wish to find from Mars, should, in his manners,

Be so averse to women.

Fio. Troth, I know not;

He's man enough; and, if he has a haunt,
He preys far off, like a subtle fox.

Cal. And that way

I do suspect him. For I learnt last night,
(When the great duke went to rest) attended by
One private follower, he took horse; but whither

He's rid, or to what end, I cannot guess at,
But I will find it out.

Fio. Do, faithful servant;

Enter CALANDRINO.

We would not be abused. Who have we here?

Cal. How the fool stares!

Fio. And looks as if he were Conning his neck-verse.

Caland. If I now prove perfect
In my A. B. C. of courtship, Calandrino
Is made for ever. I am sent—let me see,
On a how d'ye, as they call it.

Cal. What would'st thou say?

Caland. Let me see my notes. These are her lodgings. Well.

Cal. Art thou an ass?

Caland. Peace! thou art a court wag-tail,

[CALANDRINO still looking on his instructions.

To interrupt me.

Fio. He has given it you.

Caland. And then say to the illustrious Fiorinda—

I have it. Which is she?

Cal. Why this, Fop-doodle.

Caland. Leave chattering, bullfinch; you would put me out,

But 'twill not do. Then, after you have made
Your three obeisances to her, kneel and kiss
The skirt of her gown. I am glad it is no worse.
Are you the princess?

Fio. Yes, sir.

Caland. Then stand fair,
(For I am cholerick) and do not nip
A hopeful blossom. Out again. Three low Obeisances—

Fio. I am ready.

Caland. I come on, then.

Cal. With much formality.

Caland. Hum! One, two, three.

[Makes antic curtesies.

Thus far I am right. Now for the last. O rare!
She is perfumed all over! Sure great women,

Instead of little dogs, are privileged
To carry musk-cats.

Fio. Now the ceremony

Is passed, what is the substance?

Caland. I'll peruse

My instructions, and then tell you. Her skirt kissed,

Inform her highness, that your lord—

Cal. Who's that?

Caland. Prince Giovanni, who entreats your grace,

That he, with your good favour, may have leave
To present his service to you. I think I have nicked it,

For a courtier of the first form.

Fio. To my wonder.

Enter GIOVANNI and a Gentleman.

Return unto the prince. But he prevents
My answer. Calaminta, take him off;
And, for the neat delivery of his message,
Give him ten ducats; such rare parts as yours
Are to be cherished.

Caland. We will share: I know
It is the custom of the court, when ten
Are promised, five is fair. Fie! fie! the princess

Shall never know it, so you dispatch me quickly,
And bid me not come to-morrow.

Cal. Very good, sir.

[Exeunt CALANDRINO and CALAMINTA.

Giov. Pray you, friend,
Inform the duke I am putting into act
What he commanded.

Gent. I am proud to be employed, sir.

[Exit gentleman.

Giov. Madam, that, without warrant, I presume

To 'trench upon your privacies, may argue
Rudeness of manners: but the free access
Your princely courtesy vouchsafes to all
That come to pay their services, gives me hope
To find a gracious pardon.

Fio. If you please, not
To make that an offence in your construction,
Which I receive as a large favour from you,
There needs not this apology.

Giov. You continue,
As you were ever, the greatest mistress of Fair entertainment.

Fio. You are, sir, the master,
And in the country have learnt to out-do
All that in court is practised. But why should we Talk at such a distance? You are welcome, sir.
We have been more familiar; and since
You will impose the province you should govern,
Of boldness on me, give me leave to say
You are too punctual. Sit, sir, and discourse
As we were used.

Giov. Your excellence knows so well
How to command, that I can never err
When I obey you.

Fio. Nay, no more of this.

You shall o'ercome ; no more, I pray you, sir.
And what delights—pray you, be liberal .
In your relation—bath the country life
Afforded you ?

Giov. All pleasures, gracious madam,
But the happiness to converse with your sweet virtues.

I had a grave instructor, and my hours,
Designed to serious studies, yielded me
Pleasure with profit, in the knowledge of What before I was ignorant in ; the signior
Carolo de Charomonte being skilful
To guide me through the labyrinth of wild passions,

That laboured to imprison my free soul,
A slave to vicious sloth.

Fio. You speak him well.

Giov. But short of his deserts. Then, for the time

Of recreation, I was allowed
(Against the form followed by jealous parents
In Italy) full liberty to partake
His daughter's sweet society. She's a virgin,
Happy in all endowments which a poet
Could fancy in his mistress ; being herself
A school of goodness, where chaste maids may learn,

Without the aids of foreign principles,
By the example of her life and pureness,
To be, as she is, excellent. I but give you
A brief epitome of her virtues, which,
Dilated on at large, and to their merit,
Would make an ample story.

Fio. Your whole age,
So spent with such a father, and a daughter,
Could not be tedious to you.

Giov. True, great princess :
And now, since you have pleased to grant the hearing
Of my time's expence in the country, give me
leave

To entreat the favour, to be made acquainted
What service, or what objects in the court
Have, in your excellence's acceptance, proved
Most gracious to you ?

Fio. I'll meet your demand,
And make a plain discovery. The duke's care
For my estate and person, holds the first
And choicest place ; then, the respect the courtiers

Pay gladly to me, not to be contemned.
But that which raised in me the most delight,
For I'm a friend to valour, was to hear
The noble actions truly reported
Of the brave count Sanazarro. I profess,
When it hath been, and fervently, delivered,
How boldly in the horror of a fight,
Covered with fire and smoke, and, as if nature
Had lent him wings, like lightning he hath fallen
Upon the Turkish gallies, I have heard it
With a kind of pleasure, which hath whispered to me

This worthy must be cherished.

Giov. 'Twas a bounty
You never can repent.

Fio. I glory in it.
And when he did return, but still with conquest,
His armour off, not young Antinous
Appeared more courtly ; all the graces that Render a man's society dear to ladies,
Like pages waiting on him ; and it does
Work strangely on me.

Giov. To divert your thoughts,
Though they are fixed upon a noble subject,
I am a suitor to you.

Fio. You will ask,
I do presume, what I may grant, and then
It must not be denied.

Giov. It is a favour,
For which, I hope, your excellence will thank me,

Fio. Nay, without circumstance.

Giov. That you would please
To take occasion to move the duke,
That you, with his allowance, may command
This matchless virgin, Lydia, of whom
I cannot speak too much, to wait upon you.
She's such a one, upon the forfeit of
Your good opinion of me, that will not
Be a blemish to your train.

Fio. 'Tis rank, he loves her :
But I will fit him with a suit. [Aside.] I pause
not,

As if it bred or doubt or scruple in me,
To do what you desire ; for I'll effect it,
And make use of a fair and fit occasion.
Yet, in return, I ask a boon of you,
And hope to find you, in your grant to me,
As I have been to you.

Giov. Command me, madam.

Fio. 'Tis near allied to yours. That you would be

A suitor to the duke, not to expose,
After so many trials of his faith,
The noble Sanazarro to all dangers,
As if he were a wall, to stand the fury
Of a perpetual battery : But now,
To grant him, after his long labours, rest
And liberty to live in court ; his arms,
And his victorious sword and shield hung up
For monuments.

Giov. Hum ! I'll embrace, fair princess,

Enter COZIMO.

The soonest opportunity. The duke !

Coz. Nay, blush not ; we smile on your privacy,

And come not to disturb you. You are equals,
And, without prejudice to either's honour,
May make a mutual change of love and court-
ship,

Till you are made one, and with holy rites ;
And we give suffrage to it.

Giov. You are gracious.

Coz. To ourself in this. But now break off :
Too much

Taken at once of the most curious viands,
Dulls the sharp edge of appetite. We are now
For other sports, in which our pleasure is,
That you should keep us company.
For. We attend you. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

BERNARDO, CAUPONI, PETRUCHIO.

Bern. Is my lord stirring?

Caup. No, he's fast.

Pet. Let us take, then,
Our morning draught. Such as eat store of beef,
Mutton, and capons, may preserve their healths
With that thin composition called small beer,
As 'tis said they do in England. But Italians,
That think, when they have supped upon an olive,

A root, or bunch of raisins, 'tis a feast,
Must kill those crudities, rising from cold herbs,
With hot and lusty wifes.

Caup. A happiness
Those tramontanes ne'er tasted.

Bern. Have they not
Store of wine there?

Caup. Yes, and drink more in two hours,
Than the Dutchman or the Dane in four and twenty.

Pet. But what is't? French trash, made of rotten grapes,
And dregs and lees of Spain, with Welch methue-glin,
A drench to kill a horse; but this pure nectar,
Being proper to our climate, is too fine
To brook the roughness of the sea. The spirit
Of this begets in us quick apprehensions,
And active executions; whereas their
Gross feeding makes their understanding like it.
They can fight, and that's their all. [They drink.]

Enter SANAZARRO, and a Servant.

San. Security
Dwells about this house, I think; the gate's wide open,

And not a servant stirring. See the horses
Set up, and clothed.

Serv. I shall, sir.

San. I'll make bold
To press a little further.

Bern. Who is this?
Count Sanazarro!

Pet. Yes, I know him. Quickly
Remove the flaggon.

San. A good day to you, friends!
Nay, do not conceal your physick; I approve it,
And, if you please, will be a patient with you.

Pet. My noble lord— [Drinks.]

San. A health to yours. Well done!
I see you love yourselves. And I commend you;
'Tis the best wisdom.

Pet. May it please your honour

To walk a turn in the gallery, I'll acquaint
My lord with your being here.

[Exit PETRUCHIO.]

San. Tell him, I come
For a visit only. 'Tis a handsome pile this.

[Exit SANAZARRO.]

Caup. Why, here is a brave fellow, and a right
one;

Nor wealth nor greatness makes him proud.

Bern. There are Too few of them; for most of our new courtiers,
Whose fathers were familiar with the prices
Of oil and corn, with when and where to vent
them,
And left their heirs rich from their knowledge that way,

Like gourds shot up in a night, disdain to speak
But to cloth of tissue.

Enter CAROLO CHAROMONTE in a night gown, PETRUCHIO following.

Car. Stand, you prating knaves,
When such a guest is under my roof! See all
The rooms perfumed. This is the man that carries

The sway and swing of the court; and I had rather

Preserve him mine, with honest offices, than—
But I'll make no comparisons. Bid my daughter Trim herself up to the height; I know this courtier

Must have a smack at her; and, perhaps, by his place,

Expects to wriggle further. If he does,
I shall deceive his hopes; For I'll not taint
My honour for the dukedom. Which way went he?

Caup. To the round gallery.

Car. I will entertain him
As fits his worth and quality, but no farther.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter SANAZARRO.

San. I cannot apprehend, yet I have argued
All ways I can imagine, for what reasons
The great duke does employ me hither; and,
What does increase the miracle, I must render
A strict and true account, at my return,
Of Lydia, this lord's daughter, and describe
In what she's excellent, and where defective.
'Tis a hard task; he that will undergo
To make a judgment of a woman's beauty,
And see through all her plasterings and paintings,

Had need of Lynceus' eyes, and, with more ease,
May look, like him, through nine mud-walls, than make

A true discovery of her. But the intents
And secrets of my prince's heart must be Served, and not searched into.

Enter CAROLO CHAROMONTE.

Car. Most noble sir,
Excuse my age, subject to ease and sloth,
That with no greater speed I have presented
My service with your welcome.

San. 'Tis more fit
That I should ask your pardon, for disturbing
Your rest at this unseasonable hour.
But my occasions carrying me so near
Your hospitable house, my stay being short, too;
Your goodness, and the name of friend, which
you

Are pleased to grace me with, gave me assurance
A visit would not offend.

Car. Offend, my lord!
I feel myself much younger for the favour.
How is it with our gracious master?

San. He, sir,
Holds still his wonted greatness, and confesses
Himself your debtor for your love and care
To the prince Giovanni, and had sent Particular thanks by me, had his grace known
The quick dispatch of what I was designed to
Would have licensed me to see you.

Car. I am rich
In his acknowledgment.

San. Sir, I have heard
Your happiness in a daughter.

Car. Sits the wind there? [Aside.

San. Fame gives her out for a rare masterpiece.

Car. 'Tis a plain village girl, sir, but obedient;
That's her best beauty, sir.

San. Let my desire
To see her find a fair construction from you:
I bring no loose thought with me.

Car. You are that way,
My lord, free from suspicion. Her own manners,
Without an imposition from me,

Enter LYDIA and PETRONELLA.

I hope, will prompt her to it. As she is,
She come's to make a tender of that service
Which she stands bound to pay.

San. With your fair leave,
I make bold to salute you.

Lyd. Sir, you have it.

Pet. I am her gentlewoman, will not he kiss me, too?

This is coarse, 'faith. [Aside.

Car. How he falls off!

Lyd. My lord, though silence best becomes a
maid,
And to be curious to know but what
Concerns myself, and with becoming distance,
May argue me of boldness, I must borrow
So much of modesty, as to enquire
Prince Giovanni's health.

San. He cannot want

What you are pleased to wish him.

Lyd. Would 'twere so!

And then there is no blessing that can make
A hopeful, and a noble prince complete,
But should fall on him. O! he was our north-
star,

The light and pleasure of our eyes.

San. Where am I?

I feel myself another thing: Can charms
Be writ on such pure rubies? Her lips melt
As soon as touched! not those smooth gales that glide

O'er happy Arabia, or rich Sabæa,
Creating, in their passage, gums and spices,
Can serve for a weak simile to express
The sweetness of her breath. Such a brave stature

Homer bestowed on Pallas, every limb
Proportioned to it.

Car. This is strange, my lord!

San. I crave your pardon, and yours, matchless maid:

For such I must report you.

Pet. There's no notice
Taken all this while of me. [Aside.

San. And I must add,
If your discourse and reason parallel
The rareness of your more than human form,
You are a wonder.

Car. Pray you, my lord, make trial:
She can speak, I can assure you; and, that my presence
May not take from her freedom, I will leave
you:

For know, my lord, my confidence dares trust her
Where, and with whom, she pleases. If he be Taken the right way with her, I cannot fancy
A better match; and for false play, I know
The tricks, and can discern them. Petronella!

Pet. Yes, my good lord.

Car. I have employment for you.

[Exeunt CAROLO and PETRONELLA.]

Lyd. What is your will, sir!

San. Madam, you are so large a theme to treat of,

And every grace about you offers to me
Such copiousness of language, that I stand
Doubtful which first to touch at. If I err,
As in my choice I may, let me entreat you,
Before I do offend, to sign my pardon;
Let this, the emblem of your innocence,
Give me assurance.

Lyd. My hand joined to yours,
Without this superstition, confirms it.
Nor need I fear you will dwell long upon me;
The barrenness of the subject yielding nothing
That rhetoric, with all her tropes and figures,
Can amplify. Yet, since you are resolved
To prove yourself a courtier in my praise,
As I'm a woman (and you men affirm
Our sex loves to be flattered) I'll endure it.

[CAROLO above.]

Now, when you please, begin.

San. Such Leda's breasts were,

[Turns from her.

Down pillows styled by Jove: And their pure whiteness

Shames the swan's down, or snow. No heat of lust Swells up her azure veins. And yet I feel That this chaste ice, but touched, fans fire in me.

Lyd. You need not, noble sir, be thus transported,

Or trouble your invention to express Your thought of me: The plainest phrase and language

That you can use, will be too high a strain For such an humble theme.

San. If the great duke

Made this his end to try my constant temper, Though I am vanquished, 'tis his fault, not mine; For I am flesh and blood, and have affections Like other men. Who can behold the temples, Or holy altars, but the objects work Devotion in him? And I may as well Walk over burning iron with bare feet, And be unscorched, as look upon this beauty Without desire, and that desire pursued, too, Till it be quenched with the enjoying those Delights, which to atchieve, danger is nothing, And loyalty but a word. [Aside.

Lyd. I ne'er was proud; Nor can I find I'm guilty of a thought Deserving this neglect and strangeness from you. Nor am I amorous——

San. Suppose his greatness Loves her himself, why makes he choice of me To be his agent? It is tyranny To call one, pinched with hunger, to a feast, And at that instant cruelly deny him To taste of what he sees. Allegiance, Tempted too far, is like the trial of A good sword on an anvil: as that often Flies in pieces without service to the owner; So trust, enforced too far, proves treachery, And is too late repented. [Aside.

Lyd. Pray you, sir, Or license me to leave you, or deliver The reasons which invite you to command My tedious waiting on you.

Car. As I live, I know not what to think on't. Is't his pride, Or his simplicity?

San. Whither have my thoughts Carried me from myself? In this my dulness, I've lost an opportunity. [He turns to her.

Lyd. 'Tis true, [She falls off. I was not bred in court, nor live a star there; Nor shine in rich embroideries and pearl, As they, that are the mistresses of great fortunes, Are every day adorned with.

San. Will you vouchsafe Your ear, sweet lady?

Lyd. Yet I may be bold, For my integrity and fame, to rank

With such as are more glorious. Though I never Did injury, yet I am sensible When I'm contemned, and scorned.

San. Will you please to hear me?

Lyd. O the difference of natures! Giovanni, A prince in expectation, when he lived here, Stole courtesy from Heaven, and would not, to The meanest servant in my father's house, Have kept such distance.

San. Pray you, do not think me Unworthy of your ear: It was your beauty That turned me statue.—I can speak, fair lady.

Lyd. And I can hear. The harshness of your courtship

Cannot corrupt my courtesy.

San. Will you hear me, If I speak of love?

Lyd. Provided you be modest; I were uncivil, else.

Car. They are come to parley: I must observe this nearer. [CAROLO descends.

San. You're a rare one, And such (but that my haste commands me hence)

I could converse with ever. Will you grace me With leave to visit you again?

Lyd. So you, At your return to court, do me the favour To make a tender of my humble service To the prince Giovanni.

San. Ever touching Upon that string? And will you give me hope Of future happiness?

Lyd. That, as I shall find you. The fort, that's yielded at the first assault, Is hardly worth the taking.

Enter CAROLO.

Car. O! they are at it.

San. She is a magazine of all perfection, And 'tis death to part from her; yet I must—— [Aside.

A parting kiss, fair maid.

Lyd. That custom grants you.

Car. A homely breakfast does attend your lordship, Such as the place affords.

San. No; I have feasted Already here. My thanks, and so I leave you: I will see you again. Till this unhappy hour I ne'er was lost; and what to do, or say, I have not yet determined. [Exit SANAZARRO.

Car. Gone so abruptly? 'Tis very strange!

Lyd. Under your favour, sir, His coming hither was to little purpose For any thing I heard from him.

Car. Take heed, Lydia! I do advise you with a father's love, And tenderness of your honour; as I would not Have you coarse and harsh in giving entertain- ment,

So, by no means be credulous. For great men,
Till they have gained their ends, are giants in
Their promises; but, those obtained, weak pigmies
In their performance. And it is a maxim Allowed among them, so they may deceive,
They may swear any thing; for the queen of love,
As they hold constantly, does never punish,
But smile at lovers' perjuries.—Yet be wise, too;

And, when you are sued to in a noble way,
Be neither nice nor scrupulous.

Lyd. All you speak, sir,
I hear as oracles; nor will digress
From your directions.

Car. So shall you keep
Your fame untainted.

Lyd. As I would my life, sir.

[Exeunt]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter SANAZARRO and Servant.

San. Leave the horses with my grooms; but be you careful
With your best diligence and speed, to find out
The prince, and humbly in my name entreat him
I may exchange some private conference with him,
Before the great duke know of my arrival.

Serv. I haste, my lord.

San. Here I'll attend his coming;
And see you keep yourself, as much as may be,
Concealed from all men else.

Serv. To serve your lordship,
I wish I were invisible. [Exit servant.]

San. I am driven
Into a desperate straight, and cannot steer
A middle course; and, of the two extremes
Which I must make election of, I know not
Which is more full of horror. Never servant
Stood more engaged to a magnificent master,
Than I to Cozimo. And all those honours
And glories, by his grace conferred upon me,
Or by my prosperous services deserved,
If now I should deceive his trust, and make
A shipwreck of my loyalty, are ruined.
And, on the other side, if I discover
Lydia's divine perfections, all my hopes
In her are sunk, never to be buoyed up:
For 'tis impossible, but as soon as seen,
She must with adoration be sued to.
A hermit at his beads, but looking on her,
Or the cold cynic, whom Corinthian Lais,
Not moved with her lust's blandishments, called a stone,

At this object would take fire. Nor is the duke
Such an Hippolitus, but that this Phædra,
But seen, must force him to forsake the groves
And Dian's huntmanship, proud to serve under Venus' soft ensigns. No, there is no way
For me to hope fruition of my ends,
But to conceal her beauties—and how that
May be effected, is as hard a task
As with a veil to cover the sun's beams,
Or comfortable light. Three years the prince
Lived in her company, and Contarino,
The secretary, hath possessed the duke
What a rare piece she is.—But he's my creature,
And may with ease be frightened to deny
What he hath said. And, if my long experience,
With some strong reasons I have thought upon,

Cannot o'erreach a youth, my practice yields me
But little profit.

Enter GIOVANNI and the Servant.

Giov. You are well returned, sir.

San. Leave us. When that your grace shall know the motives

That forced me to invite you to this trouble,
You will excuse my manners. [Exit servant.]

Giov. Sir, there needs not
This circumstance between us. You are ever
My noble friend.

San. You shall have further cause
To assure you of my faith and zeal to serve you.
And, when I have committed to your trust
(Presuming still on your retentive silence)
A secret of no less importance than
My honour, nay, my head, it will confirm
What value you hold with me.

Giov. Pray you believe, sir,
What you deliver to me, shall be locked up
In a strong cabinet, of which you yourself
Shall keep the key. For here I pawn my honour, (Which is the best security I can give yet)
It shall not be discovered.

San. This assurance
Is more than I with modesty could demand
From such a paymaster; but I must be sudden.
And therefore to the purpose. Can your excellence,
In your imagination, conceive
On what design, or whither, the duke's will Commanded me hence last night?

Giov. No, I assure you;
And it had been a rudeness to enquire
Of that I was not called to.

San. Grant me hearing.
And I will make you understand
It only did concern you.

Giov. Me, my lord?

San. You, in your present state, and future fortunes;
For both lie at the stake.

Giov. You much amaze me!
Pray you, resolve this riddle.

San. You know the duke,
If he die issueless (as yet he is)
Determines you his heir.

Giov. It hath pleased his highness
Oft to profess so much.

San. But say he should

Be won to prove a second wife, on whom
He may beget a son, how, in a moment,
Will all those glorious expectations, which Render you revered and remarkable,
Be in a moment blasted, howe'er you are
His much-beloved sister's son?

Giov. I must bear it
With patience, and in me it is a duty
That I was born with; and 'twere much unfit
For the receiver of a benefit
To offer, for his own ends, to prescribe
Laws to the giver's pleasure.

San. Sweetly answered,
And like your noble self. This your rare temper
So wins upon me, that I would not live
(If that by honest arts I can prevent it)
To see your hopes made frustrate. And but think How you shall be transformed from what you are,

Should this (as Heaven avert it) ever happen;
It must disturb your peace. For whereas now,
Being, as you are, received for the heir apparent,
You are no sooner seen, but wondered at;
The signiors making it a business to Enquire how you have slept; and as you walk
The streets of Florence, the glad multitude,
In throngs, press but to see you, and with joy
The father, pointing with his finger, tells
His son, this is the prince, the hopeful prince,
That must hereafter rule, and you obey him.
Great ladies beg your picture, and make love
To that, despairing to enjoy the substance;
And, but the last night, when 'twas only rumoured

That you were come to court (as if you had
By sea past hither from another world)
What general shouts and acclamations followed!
The bells rang loud, the bonfires blazed, and such
As loved not wine, carousing to your health,
Were drunk, and blushed not at it: And is this
A happiness to part with?

Giov. I allow these
As flourishes of fortune, with which princes
Are often soothed, but never yet esteemed them
For real blessings.

San. Yet all these were paid
To what you may be, not to what you are;
For if the great duke but shew to his servants
A son of his own; you shall, like one obscure,
Pass unregarded.

Giov. I confess, command
Is not to be contemned; and if my fate
Appoint me to it, as I may, I'll bear it
With willing shoulders. But, my lord, as yet,
You've told me of a danger coming towards me,
But have not named it.

San. That is soon delivered.
Great Cozimo, your uncle, as I more
Than guess (for 'tis no frivolous circumstance
That does persuade my judgment to believe it)
Purposes to be married.

Giov. Married, sir!

With whom, and on what terms? pray you, instruct me.

San. With the fair Lydia.

Giov. Lydia!

San. The daughter
Of signior Charomonte.

Giov. Pardon me,
Though I appear incredulous; for, on
My knowledge, he ne'er saw her.

San. That is granted:
But Contarino hath so sung her praises,
And given her out for such a master-piece,
That he's transported with it, sir. And love
Steals sometimes through the ear, into the heart,
As well as by the eye. The duke no sooner
Heard her described, but I was sent in post
To see her, and return my judgment of her.

Giov. And what's your censure?

San. 'Tis a pretty creature.

Giov. She's very fair.

San. Yes, yes, I have seen worse faces.

Giov. Her limbs are neatly formed.

San. She hath a waist
Indeed, sized to love's wish.

Giov. A delicate hand, too.

San. Then for a leg and foot——

Giov. And there I leave you,
For I presumed no farther.

San. As she is, sir,
I know she wants no gracious part that may
Allure the duke; and if he only see her,
She is his own. He will not be denied,
And then you're lost. Yet, if you'll second me,
(As you have reason, for it most concerns you)
I can prevent all yet.

Giov. I would you could,
A noble way.

San. I will cry down her beauties,
Especially the beauties of her mind,
As much as Contarino hath advanced them;
And this, I hope, will breed forgetfulness,
And kill affection in him. But you must
Join with me in my report, if you be questioned.

Giov. I never told a lie yet, and I hold it
In some degree blasphemous, to dispraise
What's worthy admiration. Yet, for once,
I will dispraise a little, and not vary
From your relation.

San. Be constant in it.

Enter ALPHONSO.

Alph. My lord, the duke hath seen your man and wonders

Enter COZIMO, CONTARINO, and attendants.

You come not to him. See, if his desire
To have conference with you, hath not brought Him hither in his own person.

Coz. They are comely coursers,
And promise swiftness.

Con. They are, of my knowledge,
Of the best race in Naples.

Cox. You are, nephew,
As I hear, an excellent horseman, and we like it.
'Tis a fair grace in a prince. Pray you, make trial
Of their strength and speed, and, if you think them fit

For your employment, with a liberal hand
Reward the gentleman, that did present them
From the viceroy of Naples.

Giov. I will use
My best endeavour, sir.

[Enter GIOVANNI, ALPHONSO, and HIPPO-LITO.

Cox. Wait on my nephew.
Nay, stay you, Contarino; be within call;
It may be we shall use you. You have rode hard, sir,
And we thank you for it. Every minute seems Irksome and tedious to us, till you have Made your discovery. Say, friend, have you seen

This phoenix of our age?

San. I have seen a maid, sir;
But, if that I have judgment, no such wonder
As she was delivered to you.

Cox. This is strange!

San. But certain truth. It may be, she was looked on
With admiration in the country, sir;
But, if compared with many in your court,
She would appear but ordinary.

Cox. Contarino
Reports her otherwise.

San. Such as ne'er saw swans,
May think crows beautiful.

Cox. How is her behaviour?

San. 'Tis like the place she lives in.

Cox. How her wit,
Discourse, and entertainment?

San. Very coarse;
I would not willingly say poor and rude:
But, had she all the beauties of fair women,
The dulness of her soul would fright me from
her.

Cox. You are curious, sir. I know not what to think on't.
Contarino!

Con. Sir.

Cox. Where was thy judgment, man,
To extol a virgin Sanazarro tells me
Is nearer to deformity?

San. I saw her,
And curiously perused her; and I wonder
That she, that did appear to me, that know
What beauty is, not worthy the observing,
Should so transport you.

Con. Troth, my lord, I thought then——

Cox. Thought? didst thou not affirm it?

Con. I confess, sir,
I did believe so then; but, now I hear
My lord's opinion to the contrary,
I am of another faith; for 'tis not fit

That I should contradict him. I am dim, sir;
But he's sharp-sighted.

San. This is to my wish.

[Aside.

Cox. We know not what to think of this; yet would not

Enter GIOVANNI, HIPPOLITO, and LODOVICO.

Determine rashly of it. How do you like
My nephew's horsemanship?

Hip. In my judgment, sir,
It is exact and rare.

Alph. And, to my fancy.
He did present great Alexander, mounted
On his Bucephalus.

Cox. You are right courtiers,
And know it is your duty to cry up
All actions of a prince.

San. Do not betray
Yourself; you're safe; I've done my part.

[Aside to GIOVANNI.

Giov. I thank you;
Nor will I fail.

Cox. What's your opinion, nephew,
Of the horses?

Giov. Two of them are, in my judgment,
The best I ever backed: I mean the roan, sir,
And the brown bay; but for the chestnut coloured,

Though he be full of metal, hot, and fiery,
He treads weak in his pasterns.

Cox. So, come nearer;
This exercise hath put you into a sweat;
Take this, and dry it: and now I command you
To tell me truly, what's your censure of Charomonte's daughter, Lydia?

Giov. I am, sir,
A novice in my judgment of a lady;
But, such as it is, your grace shall have it freely.
I would not speak ill of her, and am sorry,
If I keep myself a friend to truth, I cannot Report her as I would, so much I owe
Her reverend father: but I'll give you, sir,
As near as I can, her character in little.
She's of a goodly stature, and her limbs
Not disproportioned. For her face, it is Far from deformity; yet they flatter her
That style it excellent. Her manners are Simple and innocent; but her discourse
And wit deserve my pity, more than praise.
At the best, my lord, she is a handsome picture:

And, that said, all is spoken.

Cox. I believe you;
I ne'er yet found you false.

Giov. Nor ever shall, sir.—
Forgive me, matchless Lydia! too much love,
And jealous fear to lose thee, do compel me,
Against my will, my reason, and my knowledge,
To be a poor detracter of that beauty,
Which fluent Ovid, if he lived again,
Would want words to express.

[Aside.

Cox. Pray you, make choice of
The richest of our furniture for these horses;
[To SANAZARRO.
And take my nephew with you; we, in this,
Will follow his directions.

Giov. Could I find now
The princess Fiorinda, and persuade her
To be silent in the suit that I moved to her,
All were secure.

San. In that, my lord, I'll aid you.

Cox. We will be private; leave us. All my studies [Exeunt all but COZIMO.
And serious meditations aim no farther
Than this young man's good. He was my sister's son,

And she was such a sister, when she lived,
I could not prize too much; nor can I better
Make known how dear I hold her memory,
Than in my cherishing the only issue
Which she hath left behind her. Who's that?

Enter FIORINDA.

Fio. Sir.

Cox. My fair charge, you are welcome to us.

Fio. I have found it, sir.

Cox. All things go well in Urbin?

Fio. Your gracious care to me, an orphan, frees me

From all suspicion that my jealous fears
Can drive into my fancy.

Cox. The next summer
In our own person, we will bring you thither,
And seat you in your own.

Fio. When you think fit, sir.
But, in the mean time, with your highness' pardon,
I am a suitor to you.

Cox. Name it, madam,
With confidence to obtain it.

Fio. That you would please
To lay a strict command on Charomonte,
To bring his daughter Lydia to the court:
And, pray you, think, sir, that 'tis not my purpose

To employ her as a servant, but to use her
As a most wished companion.

Cox. Ha! your reason?

Fio. The hopeful prince, your nephew, sir, hath given her
To me for such an abstract of perfection
In all that can be wished for in a virgin,
As beauty, music, ravishing discourse,
Quickness of apprehension, with choice manners

And learning, too, not usual with women,
That I am much ambitious (though I shall Appear but as a foil to set her off)
To be from her instructed, and supplied
In what I am defective.

Cox. Did my nephew
Seriously deliver this?

Fio. I assure your grace,

With zeal and vehemence; and even when,
With his best words, he strived to set her forth,
Though the rare subject made him eloquent,
He would complain, all he could say came short
Of her deservings.

Cox. Pray you, have patience.

This was strangely carried.—Ha! are we trifled
with?

Dare they do this? Is Cozimo's fury, that
Of late was terrible, grown contemptible?
Well; we will clear our brows, and undermine
Their secret works, though they have digged like moles,

And crush them with the tempest of my wrath
When I appear most calm; he is unfit
To command others, that knows not to use it,
And with all rigour. Yet my stern looks shall not

Discover my intents; for I will strike
When I begin to frown. [Aside.] You are the mistress

Of that you did demand.

Fior. I thank your highness;
But speed in the performance of the grant
Doubles the favour, sir.

Cox. You shall possess it sooner than you expect;

Only be pleased to be ready when my secretary Waits upon you, to take the fresh air. My nephew!

And my bosom friend, so to cheat me? 'Tis not fair! [Aside.]

Enter GIOVANNI and SANAZARRO.

San. Where should this princess be? Not in her lodgings,
Nor in the private walks, her own retreat,
Which she so much frequented?

Giov. By my life,
She's with the duke; and I much more than fear,

Her forwardness to prefer my suit hath ruined
What, with such care, we built up.

Cox. Have you furnished
Those coursers, as we willed you?

San. There's no sign
Of anger in his looks. [Aside.]

Giov. They are complete, sir.

Cox. 'Tis well. To your rest. Soft sleeps wait on you, madam;

To-morrow, with the rising of sun,
Be ready to ride with us. They with more safety

Had trod on fork-tongued adders, than provoked
me. [Exit COZIMO.]

Fior. I come not to be thanked, sir, for the speedy

Performance of my promise touching Lydia;
It is effected.

San. We are undone.

Fior. The duke
No sooner heard me, with my best of language,

Describe her excellencies, as you taught me,
But he confirmed it. You look sad, as if
You wished it were undone.

Giov. No, gracious madam,
I am your servant for it.

Fior. Be you as careful
For what I moved to you. Count Sanazarro,
Now I perceive you honour me, in vouchsafing
To wear so slight a favour.

San. 'Tis a grace
I am unworthy of.

Fior. You merit more,
In prizing so a trifle. Take this diamond;
I'll second what I have begun: for, know,
Your valour hath so won upon me, that
'Tis not to be resisted. I have said, sir,
And leave you to interpret it. [Exit FIORINDA.]

San. This, to me,
Is wormwood. 'Tis apparent we are taken
In our own noose.—What's to be done?

Giov. I know not.
And 'tis a punishment justly fallen upon me
For leaving Truth, a constant mistress, that Ever protects her servants, to become
A slave to lies and falsehood. What excuse
Can we make to the duke? What mercy hope
for,
Our packing being laid open?

San. 'Tis not to
Be questioned, but this purposed journey is
To see fair Lydia.

Giov. And to divert him
Impossible.

San. There's now no looking backward.

Giov. And which way to go on with safety,
not
To be imagined.

San. Give me leave. I have
An embryo in my brain, which, I despair not,
May be brought to form and fashion, provided
You will be open-breasted.

Giov. 'Tis no time now,
Our dangers being equal, to conceal
A thought from you.

San. What power hold you o'er Lydia?
Do you think, that, with some hazard of her life,
She would prevent your ruin?

Giov. I presume so:
If, in the undertaking it, she stray not
From what becomes her innocence; and to that 'Tis far from me to press her; I myself
Will rather suffer.

San. 'Tis enough; this night
Write to her by your servant Calandrino,
As I shall give direction; my man

Enter CALANDRINO.

Shall bear him company. See, sir, to my wish

He does appear, but much transformed from what

He was when he came hither.

Cal. I confess
I am not very wise; and yet I find
A fool, so he be parcel knave, in court
May flourish and grow rich.

Giov. Calandrino!

Cal. Peace!
I'm in contemplation.

Giov. Don't you know me?

Cal. I tell thee, no; on forfeit of my place,
I must not know myself, much less my father,
But by petition: that petition lined, too,
With golden birds, that sing to the tune of profit,
Or I am deaf.

Giov. But you've your sense of feeling.

[Offering to kick him.]

San. Nay, pray you, forbear.

Cal. I have all that's requisite
To the making up of a signior. My spruce ruff,
My hooded cloak, long stocking, and panned hose,
My case of tooth-picks, and my silver fork,
To convey an olive neatly to my mouth;
And, what is all in all, my pockets ring
A golden peal. O, that the peasants in the country,

My quondam fellows, but saw me as I am!
How they would admire and worship me!

Giov. As they shall;
For instantly you must thither.

Cal. My grand signior,
Vouchsafe a bezolus manus, and a cringe
Of the last edition.

Giov. You must ride post with letters
This night to Lydia.

Cal. An' it please your grace,
Shall I use my coach, or foot-cloth mule?

San. You widgeon,
You are to make all speed; think not of pomp.

Giov. Follow for your instructions, sirrah!

Cal. I have one suit to you,
My good lord.

San. What is it?

Cal. That you would give me
A subtle court-charm, to defend me from
The infectious air of the country.

Giov. What's the reason?

Cal. Why, as this court-air taught me knavish
wit,
By which I am grown rich; if that again
Should turn me fool and honest—vain hopes, farewell,

For I must die a beggar.

San. Go to, sirrah!

You'll be whipped for this.

Giov. Leave fooling, and attend us. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter CAROLO CHAROMONTE, and LYDIA.

Car. DAUGHTER, I have observed, since the prince left us,

Whose absence I mourn with you, and the visit Count Sannazarro gave us, you have nourished Sad and retired thoughts, and parted with That freedom and alacrity of spirit, With which you used to cheer me.

Lyd. For the count, sir, All thought of him does with his person die; But, I confess ingenuously, I cannot So soon forget the choice and chaste delights The courteous conversation of the prince (And without stain, I hope) afforded me, When he made this house a court.

Car. It is in us To keep it so without him. Want we know not, And all we can complain of (Heaven be praised for it)

Is too much plenty, and we will make use of Enter Servants.

All lawful pleasures. How now, fellows, when Shall we have this lusty dance?

Caup. In the afternoon, sir. 'Tis a device, I wis, of my own making, And such a one, as shall make your signiorship know

I have not been your butler for nothing, but I've crotchets in my head. We'll trip it tightly, And make my sad young mistress merry again, Or I'll forswear the cellar.

Bern. If we had Our fellow Calandrino here to dance His part, we were perfect.

Petru. O! he was a rare fellow; But I fear the court hath spoiled him.

Caup. When I was young, I could have cut a caper on a pinnacle; But now I am old and wise. Keep your figure fair, And follow but the sample I shall set you, The duke himself will send for us, and laugh at us,

And that were credit.

Lyd. Who have we here?

Enter CALANDRINO.

Cal. I find What was brawn in the country, in the court grows tender. The bots on these jolting jades, I am bruised to jelly. A coach for my money! and that the courtezans know well; Their riding so makes them last three years longer Than such as are hackneyed.

Car. Calandrino? 'tis he.

Cal. Now to my postures. Let my hand have the honour

To convey a kiss from my lips to the cover of Your foot, dear signior.

Car. Fie, you stoop too low, sir.

Cal. The hem of your vestinent, lady. Your glove is for princes;

Nay, I have coned my distances.

Lyd. 'Tis most courtly.

Caup. Fellow Calandrino!

Cal. Signior de Cauponi, Grand botelier of the mansion!

Bern. How is it, man?

[Claps him on the shoulder.]

Cal. Be not so rustic in your salutations. Signior Bernardo, master of the accounts! Signior Petruchio! May you long continue Your function in the chamber.

Caup. When shall we learn such gambols in our villa?

Lyd. Sure, he's mad.

Car. 'Tis not unlike, for most of such mushroom-rooms are so.

What news at court?

Cal. Basto! They are mysteries, And not to be revealed. With your favour, signior,

I am in private to confer awhile With this signiora. But I'll pawn my honour, That neither my terse language, nor my habit, Howe'er it may convince, nor my new shrugs, Shall render her enamoured.

Car. Take your pleasure.

A little of these apish tricks may pass; Too much is tedious. [Exit CAROLO.]

Cal. The prince, in this paper, Presents his service. Nay it is not courtly To see the seal broke open. So I leave you. Signiors of the villa, I'll descend to be Familiar with you.

Caup. Have you forgot to dance?

Cal. No, I am bettered.

Pet. Will you join with us?

Cal. As I like the project.

Let me warm my brains, first, with the richest grape,

And then I'm for you.

Caup. We will want no wine. [Exeunt.]

Lyd. [Alone.] That this comes only from the best of princes,

With a kind of adoration does command me To entertain it, and the sweet contents,

[Kissing the letter.]

That are inscribed here by his hand, must be Much more than musical to me. All the service Of my life at no part can deserve this favour. O what a virgin longing I find on me To unrip the seal, and read it! Yet, to break What he hath fastened, rashly, may appear

A saucy rudeness in me. I must do it, (Nor can I, else, learn his commands, or serve them)
But with such reverence, as I would open
Some holy writ, whose grave instructions beat down
Rebellious sins, and teach my better part
How to mount upward. So 'tis done, and I
[Opens the letter. Reads.]
With eagle's eyes will curiously peruse it.

'Chaste Lydia! The favours are so great
'On me by you conferred, that to entreat
'The least addition to them, in true sense
'May argue me of blushless impudence.
'But, such are my extremes, if you deny
'A farther grace, I must, unpitied, die.
'Haste cuts off circumstance. As you're ad'mired
'For beauty, the report of it hath fired
'The duke, my uncle; and, I fear, you'll prove
'Not with a sacred, but unlawful love.
'If he see you, as you are, my hoped-for light
'Is changed into an everlasting night.
'How to prevent it if your goodness find,
'You save two lives, and me you ever bind,
'The honourer of your virtues,
'GIOVANNI.'

Were I more deaf than adders, these sweet charms
Would through my ears find passage to my soul,
And soon enchant it. To save such a prince,
Who would not perish? Virtue in him must suffer,
And piety be forgotten. The duke's lust,
Though it raged more than Tarquin's, shall not reach me.
All quaint inventions of chaste virgins aid me!
My prayers are heard—I have it. The duke ne'er saw me;
Or, if that fail, I am again provided.
[This spoke as if she studied an evasion.]
But for the servants! They will take what form
I please to put upon them. Giovanni,
Be safe; thy servant Lydia assures it.
Let mountains of afflictions fall on me,
Their weight is easy, so I set thee free. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter COZIMO, GIOVANNI, SANAZARRO,
CAROLO, and Servants.

San. Are you not tired with travel, sir?
Coz. No, no;
I am fresh and lusty.
Car. This day shall be ever
A holiday to me, that brings my prince
Under my humble roof. [Weeps.]
Giov. See, sir, my good tutor
Sheds tears for joy.
Coz. Dry them up, Charomonte,
And all forbear the room, while we exchange

Some private words together.

Giov. O my lord,
How grossly have we overshot ourselves!

San. In what, sir?

Giov. In forgetting to acquaint
My guardian with our purpose. All that Lydia
Can do, avails us nothing—if the duke
Find out the truth from him.

San. 'Tis now past help,
And we must stand the hazard—Hope the best
sir!

[Exit GIOVANNI and SANAZARRO]

Car. My loyalty doubted, sir?

Coz. 'Tis more. Thou hast
Abused our trust, and, in a high degree,
Committed treason.

Car. Treason! 'Tis a word
My innocence understands not. Were my breast
Transparent, and my thoughts to be discerned,
Not one spot shall be found to taint the candour
Of my allegiance. And I must be bold
To tell you, sir (for he that knows no guilt
Can know no fear), 'tis tyranny to o'er-charge
An honest man; and such, till now, I've lived;
And such, my lord, I'll die.

Coz. Sir, do not flatter
Yourself with hope, these great and glorious words,

(Which every guilty wretch, as well as you,
That's armed with impudence, can with ease deliver,

And with as full a mouth) can work on us;
Nor shall gay flourishes of language clear
What is, in fact, apparent.

Car. Fact! What fact?
You, that know only what it is, instruct me,
For I am ignorant.

Coz. This, then, sir. We gave up
(On our assurance of your truth and care)
Our nephew Giovanni, nay, our heir
In expectation, to be trained up by you
As did become a prince.

Car. And I discharged it.
Is this the reason?

Coz. Take us with you, sir.
And, in respect we knew his youth was prone
To women, and that, living in our court,
He might make some unworthy choice, before
His weaker judgment was confirmed, we did
Remove him from it; constantly presuming
You, with your best endeavours, rather would Have quenched those heats in him, than light a torch,

As you have done, to his looseness.

Car. I! my travail
Is ill-requited, sir; for, by my soul,
I was so curious that way, that I granted
Access to none could tempt him, nor did ever
One syllable, or obscene accent, touch
His ear, that might corrupt him.

Coz. No! Why, then,
With your allowance did you give free way

To all familiar privacy, between
My nephew and your daughter? Or why did you
(Had you no other ends in it but our service)
Read to them, and, together, as they had been Scholars of one form, grammar, rhetoric,
Philosophy, history, and interpret to them
The close temptations of lascivious poets?
Or wherefore (for we still had spies upon you)
Was she still present, when, by your advice,
He was taught the use of his weapon, horseman-
ship,

Wrestling, nay, swimming, but to fan in her
A hot desire of him? And, then, forsooth,
His exercises ended, covered with
A fair pretence of recreation for him,
When Lydia was instructed in those graces
That add to beauty, he brought to admire her,
Must hear her sing, while to her voice, her hand
Made ravishing music; and, this applauded, dance

A light levalto with her?

Car. Have you ended

All you can charge me with?

Coz. Nor stopped you there,
But they must, unattended, walk into
The silent groves, and hear the amorous birds
Warbling their wanton notes; here, a sure shade
Of barren sycamores, which the all-seeing sun
Could not pierce through; near that, an arbour hung

With spreading eglantine; there, a bubbling spring

Watering a bank of hyacinths and lillies,
With all allurements that could move to love.
And could this, Charomonte, (should I grant
They had been equals both in birth and fortune,)
Become your gravity? Nay, 'tis clear as air,
That your ambitious hopes to match your daughter

Into our family, gave convenience to it.
And this, though not in act, in the intent,
I call high treason.

Car. Hear my just defence, sir,
And, though you are my prince, it will not take from

Your greatness to acknowledge with a blush,
In this my accusation you have been
More swayed by spleen, and jealous suppositions, Than certain grounds of reason. You had a father

(Blest be his memory) that made frequent proofs
Of my loyalty and faith, and, would I boast
The dangers I have broke through in his service,
I could say more. Nay, you yourself, dread sir,
Whenever I was put into the test,
Found me true gold, and not adulterate metal;
And am I doubted now?

Coz. This is from the purpose.

Car. I will come to it, sir; your grace well knew,

Before the prince's happy presence made
My poor house rich, the chiefest blessing which

VOL. II.

I gloried in (though now it prove a curse),
Was an only daughter. Nor did you command
me,

As a security to your future fears,
To cast her off: Which had you done, how'er
She was the light of my eyes, and comfort of
My feeble age; so far I prized my duty
Above affection, she now had been
A stranger to my care. But she is fair!
Is that her fault or mine? Did ever father
Hold beauty in his issue for a blemish?
Her education and her manners tempt, too.
If these offend, they're easily removed:
You may, if you think fit, before my face,
In recompense of all my watchings for you,
With burning corrosives transform her to
An ugly leper; and this done, to taint
Her sweetness, prostitute her to a loathsome brothel.

This I will rather suffer, sir, and more,
Than live suspected by you.

Coz. Let not passion

Carry you beyond your reason.

Car. I am calm, sir;

Yet you must give me leave to grieve, I find
My actions misinterpreted. Alas! sir,
Was Lydia's desire to serve the prince
Called an offence? Or did she practice to Seduce his youth, because, with her best zeal
And fervour, she endeavoured to attend him?
'Tis a hard construction—Though she be my
daughter,

I may thus far speak her. From her infancy
She was ever civil, her behaviour nearer
Simplicity than craft; and malice dares not Affirm, in one loose gesture, or light language,
She gave a sign she was in thought unchaste.
I'll fetch her to you, sir; and but look on her
With equal eyes, you must, in justice, grant
That your suspicion wrongs her.

Coz. It may be;

But I must have stronger assurance of it
Than passionate words. And, not to trifle time,
As we came unexpected to your house,
We will prevent all means that may prepare her
How to answer that, with which we come to charge her.

And howsoever it may be received
As a foul breach of hospitable rites,
On thy allegiance and boasted faith,
Nay, forfeit of thy head, we do confine thee
Close prisoner to thy chamber, till all doubts
Are cleared that do concern us.

Car. I obey, sir,

And wish your grace had followed my hearses
To my sepulchre, my loyalty unsuspected,
Rather than now.—But I am silent, sir,
And let that speak my duty.

[Exit CAROLO.]

Coz. If this man
Be false, disguised treachery ne'er put on
A shape so near to truth. Within there!

O

Enter GIOVANNI and SANAZARRO, ushering in PETRONELLA. CALANDRINO and others, setting forth a banquet.

San. Sir.

Coz. Bring Lydia forth.

Giov. She comes, sir, of herself,
To present her service to you.

Coz. Ha! This personage
Cannot invite affection.

San. See you keep state.

Pet. I warrant you.

Coz. The manners of her mind
Must be transcendent, if they can defend
Her rougher out-side. May we, with your liking, Salute you, lady?

Pet. Let me wipe my mouth, sir,
With my cambric-handkerchief, and then have at you.

Coz. Can this be possible?

San. Yes, sir, you will find her
Such as I gave her to you.

Pet. Will your dukeship
Sit down and eat some sugar-plumbs? Here's a castle

Of march pane, too, and this quince-marmalade
Was of my own making; all summed up together
Did cost the setting on; and here is wine, too,
[Drinks all off.]

As good as ever was tapped: I'll be your tapster;
For I know the fashion—Now you must do me right, sir;

You shall, nor will, nor choose.

Giov. She's very simple.

Coz. Simple! 'tis worse. Do you drink thus often, lady?

Pet. Still when I am thirsty, and eat when I am hungry.

Such juncjets come not every day. Once more to you,

With a heart and a half, i'faith.

Coz. Pray you, pause a little;
If I hold your cards I shall pull down the side;
I am not good at the game.

Pet. Then I'll drink for you.

Coz. Nay, pray you stay. I'll find you out a pledge

That shall supply my place; what think you of This complete signior? You are a Juno, and in such state

Must feast this Jupiter. What think you of him?

Pet. I desire no better.

Coz. And you will undertake this service for
me?

You are good at the sport.

Caland. Who, I? A pidler, sir.

Coz. Nay, you shall sit enthroned, and eat and drink

As you were a duke.

Caland. If your grace will have me,
I'll eat and drink like an emperor.

Coz. Take your place, then;

We are amazed.

Giov. This is gross: Nor can the imposture
But be discovered.

San. The duke's too sharp-sighted
To be deluded thus.

Caland. Nay, pray you eat fair;
Or divide, and I will choose. Cannot you use
Your fork as I do? Gape, and I will feed you.
[Feeds her.]

Gape wider yet; this is court-like.

Pet. To choke daws with:
I like it not.

Caland. But you like this. [They drink.]

Pet. Let it come, boy.

Coz. What a sight is this! We could be angry
with you.

How much you did belye her, when you told us
She was only simple! This is barbarous rudeness, Beyond belief.

Giov. I would not speak her, sir,
Worse than she was.

San. And I, my lord, chose rather
To deliver her better parted than she is,
Than to take from her.

Enter CAUPONI.

Caup. Ere I'll lose my dance,
I'll speak to the purpose. I am, sir, no prologue;
But, in plain terms, must tell you, we are provided

Of a lusty hornpipe.

Coz. 'Prithee let us have it,
For we grow dull.

Caup. But, to make up the medley,
For it is of several colours, we must borrow
Your grace's ghost here.

Caland. Pray you, sir, depose me;
It will not do else. I am, sir, the engine
[Rises, and resigns his chair.]
By which it moves.

Pet. I will dance with my duke, too;
I will not out.

Coz. Begin, then. There's morn'g in this [Dance.]
Than yet I have discovered. Some Œdipus
Resolve this riddle!

Pet. Did I not foot it roundly? [Falls down.]

Coz. As I live, stark-drunk. Away with her.
We'll reward you,

When you have cooled yourselves in the cellar.

Caup. Heaven preserve you. [Ereunt Dancers.]

Coz. We pity Charomonte's wretched fortune
In a daughter, nay, a monster. Good old man!
The place grows tedious: Our removal shall be
With speed. We'll only, in a word or two,
Take leave and comfort him.

San. 'Twill rather, sir,
Increase his sorrow, that you know his shame;
Your grace may do it by letter.

Coz. Who signed you
A patent to direct us? Wait our coming
In the garden.

Giv. All will out.

San. I more than fear it.

[Ereunt GIOV. and SAN.]

Coz. These are strange chimeras to us! What to judge of it

Is past our apprehension! One command Charomonte to attend us. Can it be,

[Exit Servant.]

That Contarino could be so besotted As to admire this prodigy? Or her father To dote upon it? Or does she personate, For some ends unknown to us, this rude behaviour, Which, in the scene presented, would appear Ridiculous and impossible? O, you are welcome.

Enter CAROLO.

We now acknowledge the much wrong we did you In our unjust suspicion. We have seen The wonder, sir, your daughter.

Car. And have found her Such as I did report her. What she wanted In courtship, was, I hope, supplied in civil And modest entertainment.

Coz. Pray you, tell us, And truly we command you, did you never Observe she was given to drink?

Car. To drink, sir?

Coz. Yes. Nay, more, to be drunk.

Car. I had rather see her buried.

Coz. Dare you trust your own eyes, if you find her now More than distempered?

Car. I will pull them out, sir, If your grace can make this good. And if you please

To grant me liberty, as she is, I'll fetch her, And in a moment.

Coz. Look you do, and fail not, On the peril of your head.

Car. Drunk?—She disdains it. [Exit CAROLO.]

Coz. Such contrarieties were never read of. Charomonte is no fool, nor can I think His confidence built on sand. We are abused.

Enter CAROLO and LYDIA.

Lyd. I am indisposed, sir, And that life, you tendered once, much endangered In forcing me from my chamber.

Car. Here she is, sir, Suddenly sick, I grant; but, sure, not drunk. Speak to my lord the duke.

Lyd. All is discovered. [Kneels.]

Coz. Is this your only daughter?

Car. And my heir, sir, Nor keep I any woman in the house (Unless for sordid offices) but one, I do maintain trimmed up in her cast habits, To make her sport. And she, indeed, loves wine, And will take too much of it; and, perhaps, for mirth,

She was presented to you.

Coz. It shall yield

No sport to the contrivers. 'Tis too plain now, Her presence does confirm what Contarino Delivered of her; nor can sickness dim The splendour of her beauties: being herself, then,

She must exceed his praise.

Lyd. Will your grace hear me? I am faint, and can say little.

Coz. Here are accents, Whose every syllable is musical! Pray you let me raise you, and a-while rest here. False Sanazarro, treacherous Giovanni! But stand we talking?

Car. Here's a storm soon raised.

Coz. As thou art our subject, Charomonte, swear

To act what we command.

Car. That is an oath I long since took.

Coz. Then, by that oath we charge thee, Without excuse, denial, or delay, To apprehend, and suddenly, Sanazarro, And our ungrateful nephew. We have said it. Do it without reply, or we pronounce thee, Like them, a traitor to us. See them guarded In several lodgings, and forbid access To all, but when we warrant. Is our will Heard sooner than obeyed?

Car. These are strange turns! But I must not dispute them. [Exit CAROLO.]

Coz. Be severe in it. O my abused lenity! From what height Is my power fallen!

Lyd. O me most miserable! That, being innocent, make others guilty: Most gracious prince!—

Coz. Pray you rise, and then speak to me.

Lyd. My knees shall first be rooted in this earth, And, myrrha like, I'll grow up to a tree, Dropping perpetual tears of sorrow, which, Hardened by the rough wind, and turned to amber, Unfortunate virgins like myself shall wear, Before I'll make petition to your greatness But with such reverence, my hands held up thus, As I would do to Heaven. You princes are As gods on earth to us, and to be sued to With such humility, as his deputies May challenge from their vassals.

Coz. Here's that form Of language I expected; pray you, speak: What is your suit?

Lyd. That you would look upon me As an humble thing, that millions of degrees Is placed beneath you. For what am I, dread sir?

Or what can fall in the whole course of my life, That may be worth your care, much less your trouble?

As the lowly shrub is to the lofty cedar,
Or a mole-hill to Olympus, if compared,
I am to you, sir. Or, suppose the prince,
(Which cannot find belief in me) forgetting
The greatness of his birth and hopes, hath thrown

An eye of favour on me, in me punish (That am the cause) the rashness of his youth.
Shall the queen of the inhabitants of the air,
The eagle, that bears thunder on her wings,
In her angry mood, destroy her hopeful young,
For suffering a wren to perch too near them?
Such is our disproportion.

Coz. With what fervour
She pleads against herself!

Lyd. For me, poor maid,
I know the prince to be so far above me,
That my wishes cannot reach him. Yet I am
So much his creature, to fix him in
Your wonted grace and favour, I'll abjure
His sight for ever, and betake myself
To a religious life (where in my prayers
I may remember him) and ne'er see man more,

But my ghostly father. Will you trust me, sir?
In truth I'll keep my word; or, if this fail,
A little more of fear what may befall him,
Will stop my breath for ever!

Coz. Had you thus argued [Raises her.
As you were yourself, and brought as advocates
Your health and beauty, to make way for you,
No crime of his could put on such a shape
But I should look with the eyes of mercy on it.
What would I give to see this diamond
In her perfect lustre, as she was before
The clouds of sickness dimmed it! Yet, take comfort,

And, as you would obtain remission for
His treachery to me, cheer your drooping spirits,
And call the blood again into your cheeks,
And then plead for him; and in such a habit
As in your highest hopes you would put on,
If we were to receive you for our bride.

Lydia. I'll do my best, sir.

Coz. And that best will be
A crown of all felicity to me. [Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

SANAZARRO above.

San. 'Tis proved in me, the curse of human frailty
(Adding to our afflictions) makes us know
What's good; and yet our violent passions force us
To follow what is ill. Reason assured me
It was not safe to shave a lion's skin;
And that to trifle with a sovereign, was
To play with lightning: Yet imperious beauty,
Treading upon the neck of understanding,
Compelled me to put off my natural shape
Of loyal duty, to disguise myself
In the adulterate and cobweb masque
Of disobedient treachery. Where is now
My borrowed greatness? or the promised lives
Of following courtiers echoing my will?
In a moment vanished. Power, that stands not on Its proper base, which is peculiar only
To absolute princes, falls or rises with Their frown or favour. The great duke, my master,
(Who almost changed me to his other self)
No sooner takes his beams of comfort from me,
But I, as one unknown, or unregarded,
Unpitied suffer! Who makes intercession
To his mercy for me now? Who does remember
The service I have done him? Not a man!
And such as spake no language, but my lord,
The favourite of Tuscany's grand duke,
[Looks backwards.]
Deride my madness. Ha! what noise of horses?

A goodly troop! This back-part of my prison
Allows me liberty to see and know them.
Contarino! Yes, 'tis he; and Lodovico:
And the duchess Fiorinda, Urbin's heir,
A princess I have slighted; yet I wear
Her favours. And, to teach me what I am,
She whom I scorned can only mediate for me.
This way she makes, yet speak to her I dare not;
And how to make a suit to her, is a task
Of as much difficulty—Yes, thou blessed pledge [Takes off the ring, and writes on a pane of glass.]

Of her affection, aid me. This supplies
The want of pen and ink, and this of paper.
It must be so; and I in my petition
Concise and pithy.

Enter CONTARINO, leading in FIORINDA, AL-PHONSO, LODOVICO, HIERONIMO, CALAMINTA.

Fio. 'Tis a goodly pile, this.

Hier. But bettered by the owner.

Alph. But most rich

In the great states it covers.

Fio. The duke's pleasure
Commands us hither.

Con. Which was laid on us
To attend you to it.

Lod. Signior Charomonte,
To see your excellence his guest, will think
Himself most happy.

Fio. Tie my shoe. What's that?

[The pane thrown down.]
A pane thrown from the window, no wind stirring?
Cala. And at your feet too fallen; there's something writ on it.

Cor. Some courtier, belike, would have it known

He wore a diamond.

Car. Ha! it is directed
To the princess Fiorinda.

Fio. We will read it.

The inscription.

' He, whom you pleased to favour, is cast down
' Past hope of rising, by the great duke's frown,
' If, by your gracious means, he cannot have
' A pardon. And, that got, he lives your slave.'

The subscription.

' Of men the most distressed,
' SANAZARRO.'

Of me the most beloved, and I will save thee,
(Or perish with thee. Sure, thy fault must be
Of some prodigious shape, if that my prayers
And humble intercession to the duke

Enter COZIMO and CAROLO.

Prevail not with him. Here he comes; delay
Shall not make less my benefit.

Cor. What we purpose
Shall know no change, and therefore move me not.

We were made as properties, and what we shall Determine of them cannot be called rigour,
But noble justice. When they proved disloyal,
They were cruel to themselves. The prince, that pardons

The first affront offered to majesty,
Invites a second, rendering that power
Subjects should tremble at, contemptible.
Ingratitude is a monster, Carolo,
To be strangled in the birth, not to be cherished.
Madam, you are happily met with.

Fio. Sir, I am
An humble suitor to you; and the rather
Am confident of a grant, in that your grace,
When I made choice to be at your devotion,
Vowed to deny me nothing.

Cor. To this minute
We have confirmed it. What's your boon?

Fio. It is, sir,
That you, in being gracious to your servant,
The ne'er sufficiently praised Sanazarro,
(That now under your heavy displeasure suffers)
Would be good unto yourself. His services,
So many, and so great, (your storm of fury Calmed by your better judgment) must inform
you,

Some little slip (for sure it is no more)
From his loyal duty, with your justice cannot Make foul his fair deservings. Great sir, therefore,

Look backward on his former worth, and, turning
Your eye from his offence (what 'tis I know not),
And, I am confident, you will receive him

Once more into your favour.

Cor. You say well,
You are ignorant in the nature of his fault,
Which, when you understand, (as we'll instruct
you)

Your pity will appear a charity,
(It being conferred on an unthankful man,)
To be repented. He's a traitor, madam,
To you, to us, to gratitude; and in that
All crimes are comprehended.

Fio. If his offence
Aimed at me only, whatsoe'er it is,
'Tis freely pardoned.

Cor. This compassion in you
Must make the colour of his guilt more ugly.
The honours we have hourly heaped upon him,
The titles, the rewards, to the envy of
The old nobility, as the common people,
We now forbear to touch at, and will only Insist on his gross wrongs to you. You were pleased,

Forgetting both yourself and proper greatness,
To favour him, nay, to court him to embrace
A happiness, which, on his knees, with joy
He should have sued for. Who repined not at
The grace you did him! Yet, in recompense
Of your large bounties, the disloyal wretch Makes you a stale; and, that he might be by
you

Scorned and derided, gives himself up wholly
To the service of another. If you can Bear this with patience, we must say, you have not

The bitterness of spleen, or ireful passions,
Familiar to women. Pause upon it,
And when you seriously have weighed his carriage,

Move us again, if your reason will allow it,
His treachery known. And then, if you continue
An advocate for him, we, perhaps, because
We would deny you nothing, may awake
Our sleeping mercy. Carolo!

Car. My lord. [They whisper.

Fio. To endure a rival, that were equal to me,
Cannot but speak my poverty of spirit;
But an inferior, more: Yet true love must not Know or degrees, or distances. Lydia may be
As far above me in her form, as she
Is in her birth beneath me; and what I
In Sanazarro liked, he loves in her.
But if I free him now, the benefit
Being done so timely, and confirming too
My strength and power, my soul's best faculties being

Bent wholly to preserve him, must supply me
With all I am defective in, and bind him
My creature ever. It must needs be so,
Nor will I give it o'er thus.

Cor. Does our nephew
Bear his restraint so constantly as you
Deliver it to us?

Car. In my judgment, sir,

He suffers more for his offence to you,
Than in his fear of what can follow it.
For he is so collected and prepared
To welcome that you shall determine of him,
As if his doubts and fears were equal to him.
And sure he's not acquainted with much guilt,
That more laments the telling one untruth,
Under your pardon still, (for 'twas a fault, sir,)
Than others, that pretend to conscience, do
Their crying secret sins.

Coz. No more ; this gloss
Defends not the corruption of the text ;
Urge it no more.

[CAROLO and the others whisper.

Fio. I once more must make bold, sir,
To trench upon your patience. I have Considered my wrongs duly : Yet that cannot Divert my intercession for a man,
Your grace, like me, once favoured. I am still
A suppliant to you, that you would vouchsafe
The hearing his defence, and that I may,
With your allowance, see, and comfort him.
Then, having heard all that he can alledge
In his excuse for being false to you,
Censure him as you please.

Coz. You will o'ercome ;
There's no contending with you. Pray you, enjoy
What you desire, and tell him, he shall have
A speedy trial, in which we'll forbear
To sit as judge, because our purpose is
To rise up his accuser.

Fio. All increase
Of happiness wait on Cozimo.

[Exeunt FIORINDA and CALAMINTA.

Alph. Was it no more ?

Car. My honour's pawned for it.

Con. I'll second you.

Lod. Since it is for the service and the safety
Of the hopeful prince, fall what can fall, I'll run
The desperate hazard.

Hic. He's no friend to virtue
That does decline it. [They all kneel.

Coz. Ha ! what sue you for ?
Shall we be ever troubled ? Do not tempt
That anger may consume you.

Car. Let it, sir :
The loss is less, though innocent we perish,
Than that your sister's son should fall, unheard,
Under your fury. Shall we fear to entreat
That grace for him, that are your faithful servants,
Which you vouchsafe the count, like us a subject ?

Coz. Did not we vow, till sickness had forsook
Thy daughter Lydia, and she appeared,
In her perfect health and beauty, to plead for
him,

We were deaf to all persuasion ?

Car. And that hope, sir,
Hath wrought a miracle. She is recovered,
And, if you please to warrant her, will bring
The penitent prince before you.

Coz. To enjoy
Such happiness, what would we not dispense
with ?

Alph. Lod. Hic. We all kneel for the prince

Con. Nor can it stand
With your mercy, that are gracious to strangers
To be cruel to your own.

Coz. But art thou certain
I shall behold her at the best ?

Car. If ever
She was handsome, as it fits not me to say so,
She is now much bettered.

Coz. Rise ; thou art but dead
If this prove otherwise. Lydia, appear,
And feast an appetite, almost pined to death
With longing expectation to behold
Thy excellencies : Thou, as beauty's queen,
Shalt censure the detractors. Let my nephew
Be led in triumph under her command ;
We'll have it so ; and Sanazarro tremble
To think whom he hath slandered. We'll retire Ourselves a little, and prepare to meet
A blessing, which, imagination tells us,
We are not worthy of, and then come forth ;
But with such reverence, as if I were Myself the priest, the sacrifice, my heart,
To offer at the altar of that goodness,
That must or kill or save me. [Exit Cozimo

Car. Are not these
Strange gambols in the duke ?

Alph. Great princes have,
Like meaner men, their weakness.

Lod. And may use it
Without controul or check.

Con. 'Tis fit they should ;
Their privilege were less else than their subjects.

Hic. Let them have their humours ; there's no crossing them. [Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Enter FIORINDA, SANAZARRO, and CALAMINTA.

San. And can it be your bounties should fall down

In showers on my ingratitude ? Or the wrongs
Your greatness should revenge, teach you to pity ?
What retribution can I make ? what service
Pay to your goodness, that in some proportion,
May to the world express I would be thankful ?
Since my engagements are so great, that all
My best endeavours to appear your creature,
Can but proclaim my wants, and what I owe
To your magnificence.

Fio. All debts are discharged
In this acknowledgment : Yet, since you please,
I shall impose some terms of satisfaction
For that, which you profess yourself obliged for :
They shall be gentle ones, and such as will not,
I hope, afflict you.

San. Make me understand,
Great princess, what they are, and my obedience

Shall, with all cheerful willingness, subscribe
To what you shall command.

Fio. I will bind you to Make good your promise. First, I then enjoin
you

To love a lady, that a noble way
Truly affects you; and that you would take
To your protection and care, the dukedom
Of Urbin, which no more is mine, but yours;
And that, when you have full possession of
My person, as my fortunes, you would use me,
Not as a princess, but instruct me in
The duties of an humble wife; for such,
The privilege of my birth no more remembered,
I will be to you. This consented to,
All injuries forgotten, on your lips
I thus sign your quietus.

Sen. I am wretched
In having but one life to be employed
As you please to dispose it: And, believe it,
If it be not already forfeited
To the fury of my prince, as 'tis your gift,
With all the faculties of my soul I'll study,
In what I may, to serve you.

Fio. I am happy

Enter GIOVANNI and LYDIA.

In this assurance.—What Sweet lady's this?

Sen. 'Tis Lydia, madam, she——

Fio. I understand you.

Nay, blush not; by my life, she is a rare one!
And, if I were your judge, I would not blame
you,
To like and love her.—But, sir, you are mine
now;

And I presume so on your constancy,
That I dare not be jealous.

Sen. All thoughts of her
Are in your goodness buried.

Lyd. Pray you, sir,
Be comforted; your innocence should not know
What 'tis to fear, and if you but look on
The guards, that you have in yourself, you cannot.

The duke's your uncle, sir; and though a little Incensed at you, when he sees your sorrow,
He must be reconciled. What rugged Tartar,
Or cannibal, though bathed in human gore,
But, looking on your sweetness, would forget
His cruel nature, and let fall his weapon,
Though then aimed at your throat?

Giov. O Lydia,
Of maids the honour, and your sex's glory!
It is not fear to die, but to lose you,
That brings this fever on me. I will now
Discover to you that, which, till this minute,
I durst not trust the air with. Ere you knew
What power the magic of your beauty had,
I was enchanted by it, liked, and loved it,
My fondness still encreasing with my years;
And, flattered by false hopes, I did attend

Some blessed opportunity to move
The duke, with his consent, to make you mine.
But now, such is my star-crossed destiny,
When he beholds you as you are, he cannot Deny himself the happiness to enjoy you.
And I as well in reason may entreat him
To give away his crown, as to part from
A jewel of more value, such you are:
Yet, howsoever, when you are his dutchess,
And I am turned unto forgotten dust,
Pray you, love my memory. I should say more,
But I am cut off.

Enter COZIMO, CAROLO, CONTARINO, and others.

San. The duke! that countenance, once,
When it was cloathed in smiles, shewed like an angel's;
But, now 'tis folded up in clouds of fury,
'Tis terrible to look on.

[The DUKE admiring LYDIA.

Lyd. Sir.

Coz. A while

Silence your musical tongue, and let me feast
My eyes with the most ravishing object that
They ever gazed on. There's no miniature
In her fair face, but is a copious theme
Which would (discoursed at large of) make a volume.

What clear arched brows! What sparkling eyes!
The lilies

Contending with the roses in her cheeks,
Who shall most set them off! What ruby lips!
Or unto what can I compare her neck,
But to a rock of crystal! Every limb Proportioned to love's wish, and in their neatness

Add lustre to the richness of her habit,
Not borrow from it.

Lyd. You are pleased to shew, sir,
The fluency of your language, in advancing
A subject much unworthy.

Coz. How unworthy?
By all the vows which lovers offer at
The Cyprian goddess' altars, eloquence
Itself, presuming as you are to speak you,
Would be struck dumb. And what have you deserved, then,
(Wretches, you kneel too late) that have endeavoured

To spout the poison of your black detraction
On this immaculate whiteness! Was it malice
To her perfections? Or——

Fio. Your highness promised
A gracious hearing to the count.

Lyd. And prince too;
Do not make void such a grant.

Coz. We will not;
Yet, since their accusation must be urged,
And strongly, ere their weak defence have hearing, [Seats the ladies.
We seat you here, as judges, to determine

Of your gross wrongs and ours. And now, remembering

Whose deputies we are, be neither swayed,
Or with particular spleen or foolish pity;
For neither can become you.

Car. There's some hope yet,
Since they have such gentle judges.

Coz. Rise, and stand forth, then,
And hear with horror to your guilty souls
What we will prove against you. Could this princess

(Thou enemy to thyself!) stoop her high flight
Of towering greatness, to invite thy lowness
To look upon it, and with nimble wings
Of gratitude, couldst thou forbear to meet it?
Were her favours boundless in a noble way,
And warranted by our allowance, yet,
In thy acceptance, there appeared no sign
Of a modest thankfulness?

Fio. Pray you, forbear
To press that farther; 'tis a fault we have Already heard, and pardoned.

Coz. We will then
Pass over it, and briefly touch at that,
Which does concern ourself; in which, both being

Equal offenders, what we shall speak, points
Indifferently at either. How we raised thee,
Forgetful Sanazarro, of our grace,
To a full possession of power and honours,
It being too well known, we'll not remember.
And what thou wert (rash youth) in expectation,
(And from which, headlong, thou hast thrown thyself)

Not Florence, but all Tuscany, can witness
With admiration. To assure thy hopes,
We did keep constant to a widowed bed,
And did deny ourself those lawful pleasures,
Our absolute power and height of blood allowed us;

Made both the keys that opened our heart's secrets,

And what you spake, believed as oracles.
But you, in recompense of this, to him
That gave you all, to whom you owed your being,

With treacherous lies endeavoured to conceal
This jewel from our knowledge, which ourself
Could only lay just claim to.

Giov. 'Tis most true.

San. We both confess a guilty cause.

Coz. Look on her;

Is this a beauty fit to be embraced
By any subject's arms? Can any tire
Become that forehead, but a diadem?
Or, should we grant your being false to us
Could be excused, your treachery to her,
In seeking to deprive her of that greatness,
(Her matchless form considered), she was born to,
Must ne'er find pardon! We have spoken, ladies,

Like a rough orator, that brings more truth

Than rhetorick, to make good his accusation,
And now expect your sentence.

[The ladies descend from the state.]

Lydia. In your birth, sir,
You were marked out the judge of life and death,
And we, that are your subjects, to attend
With trembling fear your doom.

Fio. We do resign
This chair, as only proper to yourself.

Giov. And, since in justice we are lost, we fly Unto your saving mercy. [All kneeling.]

San. Which sets off
A prince much more than rigour.

Car. And becomes him,
When 'tis expressed to such as sell by weakness,
That being a twin-born brother to affection,
Better than wreaths of conquest.

Hier. Lod. Con. Alph. We all speak
Their language, mighty sir.

Coz. You know our temper,
And, therefore, with more boldness venture on it:

And, would not our consent to your demands
Deprive us of a happiness, hereafter
Ever to be despaired of, we, perhaps,
Might hearken nearer to you, and could wish,
With some qualification or excuse,
You might make less the mountains of your crimes,

And so invite our clemency to feast with you.
But you, that know with what impatience
Of grief, we parted from the fair Clarinda,
Our dutchess, (let her memory still be sacred!)
And with what imprecations on ourself
We vowed, not hoping e'er to see her equal,
Ne'er to make trial of a second choice,
If nature framed not one that did excel her,
(As this maid's beauty prompts us that she does)
And yet, with oaths then mixed with tears, upon
Her monument we swore our eye should never Again be tempted; 'tis true, and those vows
Are registered above; something here tells me.
Carolo, thou heardst us swear.

Car. And swear so deeply,
That if all women's beauties were in this
(As she's not to be named with the dead dutchess),

Nay, all their virtues bound up in one story,
(Of which mine is scarce an epitome)
If you should take her as a wife, the weight
Of your perjuries would sink you. If I durst,
I had told you this before.

Coz. 'Tis strong truth, Carolo:
And yet, what was necessity in us
Cannot free them from treason.

Car. There's your error.
The prince, in care to have you keep your vow
Made unto heaven, vouchsafed to love my daughter.

Lydia. He told me so, indeed, sir.

Fio. And the count
Averred as much to me.

Coz. You all conspire
To force our mercy from us.

Car. Which, given up
To after-times, preserves you unforesworn;
An honour, which will live upon your tomb,
When your greatness is forgotten.

Coz. Though we know
All this is practice, and that both are false,
Such reverence we will pay to dead Clarinda,
And to our serious oaths, that we are pleased,
With our own hand, to blind our eyes, and not Know what we understand. Here, Giovanni,
We pardon thee, and take from us in this,
More than our dukedom: love her. As I part
With her, all thoughts of women fly fast from us.

Sanazarro, we forgive you: in your service
To this princess merit it. Yet, let not others
That are in trust and grace, as you have been,
By the example of our tenderness,
Presume upon their sovereign's lenity. [A shout.]

Enter CALANDRINO and PETRONELLA.

All. Long live great Cozimo!

Caland. Sure the duke is In the giving vein, they are so loud. Come on, spouse,

We have heard all, and we will have our boon,
too.

Coz. What is't!

Caland. That your grace, in remembrance of My share in a dance, and that I played your part

When you should have drunk hard, would get this signior's grant

To give this damsel to me in the church;
For we are contracted. In it you shall do
Your dukedom pleasure.

Coz. How?

Caland. Why, the whole race
Of such as can act naturally fools' parts,
Are quite worn out, and they that do survive,
Do only zanie us; and we will bring you,
If we die not without issue, of both sexes
Such chopping mirth-makers, as shall preserve
Perpetual cause of sport, both to your grace
And your posterity, that sad melancholy
Shall never approach you.

Coz. We are pleased in it,
And will pay her portion. May the passage prove

Of what's presented, worthy of your love
And favour, as was aimed; and we have all
That can, in compass of our wishes, fall.

[Exeunt omnes.]

RULE A WIFE AND HAVE A WIFE.

MARGARITTA, a wanton lady, married to Leon,
by whom she is reclaimed.
ALTEA, her servant.
CLARA, a Spanish lady.
ESTIFANIA, a woman of intrigue.
An old woman.
Maid.
Visiting ladies.

Scene—Spain.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A chamber.

Enter DON JUAN DE CASTRO and MICHAEL PEREZ.

Mich. ARE your companies full, colonel?

Juan. No, not yet, sir,
Nor will not be this month yet, as I reckon.
How rises your command?

Mich. We pick up still,
And, as our monies hold out, we have men come.
About that time, I think, we shall be full, too:
Many young gallants go.

Juan. And inexperienced.
The wars are dainty dreams to young hot spirits;
Time and experience will allay those visions.
We have strange things to fill our numbers:
There's one Don Leon, a strange goodly fellow,
Commended to me from some noble friends,
For my Alferes.

Mich. I've heard of him, and that he hath served before, too.

Juan. But no harm done, nor ever meant, Don Michael,

That came to my ears yet: ask him a question,
He blushes like a girl, and answers little,
To the point, less. He wears a sword, a good one,

And good clothes, too; he's whole skinned, has no hurt yet;

Good promising hopes. I never yet heard certainly,
Of any gentleman, that saw him angry.

Mich. Preserve him; he'll conclude a peace, if need be;

Many, as stout as he, will go along with us,
That swear as valiantly as heart can wish.

Their mouths charged with six oaths at once, and whole ones,
That make the drunken Dutch creep into mole-hills.

Juan. 'Tis true, such we must look for. But, Michael Perez,

When heard you of Donna Margaritta, the great heiress?

Mich. I hear every hour of her, though I ne'er saw her;

She is the main discourse. Noble Don Juan de Castro,

How happy were that man could catch this wench up,

And live at ease! She's fair, and young, and wealthy,

Infinite wealthy, and as gracious, too,

In all her entertainments, as men report.

Juan. But she is proud, sir; that I know for certain;

And that comes seldom without wantonness:

He, that shall marry her, must have a rare hand.

Mich. Would I were married! I would find that wisdom,

With a light rein to rule my wife. If e'er woman,

Of the most subtile mould, went beyond me,

I'd give boys leave to hoot me out of the parish.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, there be two gentlewomen attend to speak with you.

Juan. Wait on them in.

Mich. Are they two handsome women?

Ser. They seem so, very handsome! but they're veiled, sir.

Mich. Thou putt'st sugar in my mouth. How it melts with me!

I love a sweet young wench.

Juan. Wait on them in, I say. [Exit Servant.]

Mich. Don Juan.

Juan. Michael, how you burnish?

Will not this soldier's heat out of your bones yet?

Mich. There be two.

Juan. Say honest, what shame have you, then?

Mich. I would fain see that.

I've been in the Indies twice, and have seen strange things;

But for two honest women:—one I read of once.

Juan. Prithee, be modest.

Mich. I'll be any thing.

Enter Servant, DONNA CLARA and ESTIFANIA, veiled.

Juan. You're welcome, ladies.

Mich. Both hooded! I like them well though: They came not for advice in law, sure, hither.

They're very modest; 'tis a fine prelude.

Juan. With me, or with this gentleman, would you speak, lady?

Cl. With you, sir, as I guess, Juan de Castro.

Mich. Her curtain opens; she is a pretty gentlewoman.

Juan. I am the man, and shall be bound to fortune,

I may do any service to your beauties.

Cl. Captain, I hear you're marching down to Flanders,

To serve the Catholic king.

Juan. I am, sweet lady.

Cl. I have a kinsman, and a noble friend, Employed in those wars; may be, sir, you know him;

Don Campusano, captain of carbines, To whom I would request your nobleness

To give this poor remembrance. [Gives a letter.]

Juan. I shall do it:

I know the gentleman, a most worthy captain.

Cl. Something in private.

Juan. Step aside: I'll serve thee.

[Exeunt JUAN and CLARA.]

Mich. Prithee, let me see thy face.

Estif. Sir, you must pardon me;

Women of our sort, that maintain fair memories,

And keep suspect off from their chastities,

Had need wear thicker veils.

Mich. I am no blaster of a lady's beauty,

Nor bold intruder on her special favours:

I know how tender reputation is,

And with what guards it ought to be preserved.

Lady, you may to me—

Estif. You must excuse me, signior, I come Not here to sell myself.

Mich. As I am a gentleman; by the honour of a soldier!

Estif. I believe you;

I pray be civil: I believe you'd see me,

And when you've seen me, I believe you'll like me;

But in a strange place, to a stranger, too,

As if I came on purpose to betray you,

Indeed I will not.

Mich. I shall love you dearly,

And 'tis a sin to fling away affection;

I have no mistress; no desire to honour

Any but you.

I know not, you have struck me with your modesty

So deep, and taken from me

All the desire, I might bestow on others—

Quickly, before they come.

Estif. Indeed, I dare not.

But since I see you're so desirous, sir,

To view a poor face, that can merit nothing

But your repentance—

Mich. It must needs be excellent.

Estif. And with what honesty you ask it of me,

When I am gone, let your man follow me,

And view what house I enter. Thither come,

For there I dare be bold to appear open;

And as I like your virtuous carriage, then,

Enter JUAN, CLARA, and Servant.

I shall be able to give welcome to you.

She hath done her business; I must take my leave, sir.

Mich. I'll kiss your fair white hand, and thank you, lady.

My man shall wait, and I shall be your servant.

Sirrah, come near, hark.

Ser. I shall do it faithfully. [Exit.]

Juan. You will command me no more services?

Cla. To be careful of your noble health, dear sir,

That I may ever honour you.

Juan. I thank you,
And kiss your hands. Wait on the ladies down there. [Exit ladies and Servant.]

Mich. You had the honour to see the face, that came to you?

Juan. And 'twas a fair one. What was yours, don Michael?

Mich. Mine was in the eclipse, and had a cloud drawn over it.

But I believe well, and I hope 'tis handsome! She had a hand would stir a holy hermit.

Juan. You know none of them?

Mich. No.

Juan. Then I do, captain;
But I'll say nothing till I see the proof on't.
Sit close, don Perez, or your worship's caught.

Mich. Were those she brought love letters?

Juan. A packet to a kinsman now in Flanders.
Yours was very modest, methought.

Mich. Some young unmanaged thing:
But I may live to see.

Juan. 'Tis worth experience.
Let us walk abroad and view our companies.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Another Street, ESTIFANIA crosses the stage.

Enter a servant of MICHAEL PEREZ after her.

Ser. 'Tis this or that house, or I've lost my aim;
They're both fair buildings; she walked plaguy fast.

Enter ESTIFANIA, courtesies, and exit.

And hereabouts I lost her. Stay, that's she!
'Tis very she! she makes me a low court'sy:—
Let me note the place, the street I well remember. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—A chamber in MARGARITTA'S house.

Enter three old Ladies.

1 Lady. What should it mean, that in such haste we're sent for?

2 Lady. Belike the lady Margaret has some business

She'd break to us in private.

3 Lady. It should seem so.
'Tis a good lady, and a wise young lady.

2 Lady. And virtuous enough, too, that I warrant ye,
For a young woman of her years: 'tis a pity
To load her tender age with too much virtue.

3 Lady. 'Tis more sometimes than we can well away with.

Enter ALTEA.

Alt. Good-morrow, ladies.

All. 'Morrow, my good madam.

1 Lady. How does the sweet young beauty, lady Margaret?

2 Lady. Has she slept well after her walk last night?

1 Lady. Are her dreams gentle to her mind?

Alt. All's well,

She's very well: she sent for you thus suddenly,
To give her counsel in a business
That much concerns her.

2 Lady. She does well and wisely,
To ask the counsel of the ancientest. Madam,
Our years have run through many things she knows not.

Alt. She would fain marry.

1 Lady. 'Tis a proper calling,
And well be seems her years. Who should she yoke with?

Alt. That is left to argue on. I pray, come in
And break your fast; drink a good cup or two,
To strengthen your understandings, then she'll tell ye.

2 Lady. And good wine breeds good counsel;
we'll yield to ye. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—A street.

Enter JUAN DE CASTRO and LEON.

Juan. Have you seen any service?

Leon. Yes.

Juan. Where?

Leon. Everywhere.

Juan. What office bore ye?

Leon. None; I was not worthy.

Juan. What captains know you?

Leon. None; they were above me.

Juan. Were you ne'er hurt?

Leon. Not that I well remember;
But once I stole a hen, and then they beat me.
Pray, ask me no long questions. I have an ill memory.

Juan. This is an ass. Did you ne'er draw your sword yet?

Leon. Not to do any harm, I thank Heaven for it.

Juan. Nor ne'er ta'en prisoner?

Leon. No, I ran away;
For I ne'er had no money to redeem me.

Juan. Can you endure a drum?

Leon. It makes my head ache.

Juan. Are you not valiant, when you're drunk?

Leon. I think not; but I am loving, sir.

Juan. What a lump is this man!
Was your father wise?

Leon. Too wise for me, I'm sure;
For he gave all he had to my younger brother.

Juan. That was no foolish part, I'll bear you witness.

Why art thou sent to me to be my officer,
Aye, and commended, too, when thou dar'st not fight?

Leon. There be more officers of my opinion,
Or I am cozened, sir; men that talk more, too.

Juan. How wilt thou escape with a bullet?

Leon. Why, by chance.

They aim at honourable men; alas, I am none, sir.

Juan. This fellow hath some doubts in his talk, that strike me.

Enter ALONZO.

He cannot be all fool. Welcome, Alonzo.

Alon. What have you got there, Temperance into your company?
The spirit of peace? we shall have wars by the ounce, then.

Enter CACAFOGO.

Oh, here's another pumpion, the crammed son of a starved usurer, Cacafoگو.

Both their brains, buttered, cannot make two spoonfuls.

Caca. My father's dead, I am a man of war, too,
Monies, demesnes; I have ships at sea, too, captains.

Juan. Take heed of the Hollanders, your ships may leak else.

Caca. I scorn the Hollanders, they are my drunkards.

Alon. Put up your gold, sir, I will borrow it else.

Caca. I am satisfied you shall not.
Come out, I know thee; meet mine anger instantly!

Leon. I never wronged ye.

Caca. Thou hast wronged mine honour,
Thou look'st upon my mistress thrice lasciviously;
I'll make it good.

Juan. Do not heat yourself, you will surfeit.

Caca. Thou want'st my money, too, with a pair of base bones,
In whom there was no truth, for which I beat thee,

I beat thee much; now I will hurt thee dangerously.

This shall provoke thee. [He strikes.]

Alon. You struck too low, by a foot, sir.

Juan. You must get a ladder, when you would beat this fellow.

Leon. I cannot chuse but kick again; pray, pardon me.

Caca. Hadst thou not asked my pardon, I had killed thee.

I leave thee, as a thing despised; baso las manos a vostra Signora. [Exit CACA.]

Alon. You have escaped by miracle; there is not, in all Spain,

A spirit of more fury than this fire-drake.

Leon. I see he's hasty, and I would give him leave

To beat me soundly, if he'd take my bond.

Juan. What shall I do with this fellow?

Alon. Turn him off;

He will infect the camp with cowardice,
If he go with thee.

Juan. About some week hence, sir,
If I can hit upon no abler officer,
You shall hear from me.

Leon. I desire no better.

[Exit.]

SCENE V.—A chamber in MARGARITTA'S house.

Enter ESTIFANIA and PEREZ.

Per. You have made me too bountiful amends, lady,

For your strict carriage, when you saw me first.
These beauties were not meant to be concealed;
It was a wrong to hide so sweet an object;
I could now chide ye, but it shall be thus:
No other anger ever touch your sweetness.

Estif. You appear to be so honest and so civil,

Without a blush, sir, I dare bid you welcome.

Per. Now, let me ask your name.

Estif. 'Tis Estifania, the heir of this poor place.

Per. Poor, do you call it?

There's nothing that I cast mine eyes upon,
But shews both rich and admirable; all the rooms
Are hung, as if a princess were to dwell here;
The gardens, orchards, every thing so curious.
Is all that plate your own, too?

Estif. 'Tis but a little,

Only for present use; I've more and richer,
When need shall call, or friends compel me use it;

The suits you see of all the upper chambers,
Are those, that commonly adorn the house;
I think, I have, besides, as fair as Seville,
Or any town in Spain, can parallel.

Per. Now, if she be not married, I have some hopes.

Are you a maid?

Estif. You make me blush to answer;
I ever was accounted so to this hour,
And that's the reason, that I live retired, sir.

Per. Then would I counsel you to marry presently,

(If I can get her, I am made for ever) [Aside.]
For every year you lose, you lose a beauty.

A husband now, an honest, careful husband,
Were such a comfort. Will you walk above stairs?

Estif. This place will fit our talk; 'tis fitter far, sir;

Above, there are day-beds, and such temptations
I dare not trust, sir.

Per. She is excellent wise withal, too.

Estif. You named a husband; I am not so strict, sir,
Nor tied unto a virgin's solitariness,
But if an honest, and a noble one,
Rich, and a soldier, for so I've vowed he shall be,
Were offered me, I think I should accept him.
But, above all, he must love.

Per. He were base else.
There's comfort ministered in the word, soldier.
How sweetly should I live!

Estif. I'm not so ignorant,
But that I know well how to be commanded,
And how again to make myself obey, sir.
I waste but little: I have gathered much:
My rial not less worth, when it is spent,
If spent by my direction. To please my husband,

I hold it as indifferent in my duty,
To be his maid in the kitchen, or his cook,
As in the hall to know myself the mistress.

Per. Sweet, rich, and provident! now, fortune, stick to me.

I am a soldier, and a bachelor, lady;
And such a wife as you I could love infinitely.
They, that use many words, some are deceitful:
I long to be a husband, and a good one;
For 'tis most certain I shall make a precedent
For all, that follow me, to love their ladies.

I'm young, you see; able, I'd have you think, too;
If it please you know, try me before you take me.

'Tis true, I shall not meet in equal wealth with ye;

But jewels, chains, such as the war has given me,
A thousand ducats, too, in ready gold,
As rich clothes, too, as any he bears arms, lady.

Estif. You're a gentleman, and fair, I see by ye,

And such a man I'd rather take——

Per. Pray, do so.

I'll have a priest o' the sudden.

Estif. And as suddenly
You will repent, too.

Per. I'll be hanged or drowned first,
By this, and this, and this kiss.

Estif. You're a flatterer;
But I must say there was something, when I saw you

First, in that noble face, that stirred my fancy.

Per. I'll stir it better ere you sleep, sweet lady.

I'll send for all my trunks, and give up all to ye,
Into your own dispose, before I bed ye;
And then, sweet wench.—

Estif. You have the art to cozen me.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—An Apartment in MARGARITTA'S house.

Enter MARGARITTA, three ladies, and ALTEA.

Mar. COME in, and give me your opinions seriously.

1 Lady. You say you have a mind to marry, lady.

Mar. 'Tis true, I have, for to preserve my credit.

I desire my pleasure, and pleasure I must have.

2 Lady. What husband mean ye?

Alt. A husband of an easy faith, a fool,
Made by her wealth, and moulded to her pleasure;

One, though he sees himself become a monster,
Shall hold the door, and entertain the maker.

2 Lady. You grant there may be such a man.

1 Lady. Yes, marry; but how to bring him to this rare perfection.

2 Lady. They must be chosen so, things of no honour,

Nor outward honesty.

Mar. No, 'tis no matter;

I care not what they are, so they be comely.

Alt. With search, and wit, and labour,
I've found one out, a right one, and a perfect.

Mar. Is he a gentleman?

Alt. Yes, and a soldier; but as gentle as you'd wish him. A good fellow, and has good clothes, if he knew how to wear them.

Mar. Those I'll allow him;
They are for my credit. Does he understand But little?

Alt. Very little.

Mar. 'Tis the better.
Have not the wars bred him up to anger?

Alt. No, he won't quarrel with a dog that bites him;

Let him be drunk or sober, he's one silence.

Mar. H'as no capacity what honour is;
For that's a soldier's god?

Alt. Honour's a thing too subtle for his wisdom;

If honour lie in eating, he's right honourable.

Mar. Is he so goodly a man, do you say?

Alt. As you shall see, lady;
But, to all this, he's but a trunk.

Mar. I'd have him so.

Go, find me out this man, and let me see him.

If he be that motion, that you tell me of,
And make no more noise, I shall entertain him.
Let him be here.

Alt. He shall attend your ladyship. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A street.

Enter JUAN, ALONSO, and PEREZ.

Juan. Why, thou'rt not married indeed?

Per. No, no, pray think so.

Alas! I am a fellow of no reckoning,
Nor worth a lady's eye.

Alon. Wou'dst steal a fortune,
And make none of thy friends acquainted with it,
Nor bid us to thy wedding?

Per. No, indeed.

There was no wisdom in it, to bid an artist,
An old seducer, to a female banquet.
I can cut up my pie without your instructions.

Juan. Was it the wench in the veil?

Per. Basta; 'twas she.

The prettiest rogue, that e'er you looked upon;
The loving'st thief!

Juan. And is she rich withal, too?

Per. A mine, a mine; there is no end of her wealth, colonel;

I am an ass, a bashful fool. Pr'ythee, colonel,
How do thy companies fill now?

Juan. You're merry, sir;

You intend a safer war at home, belike, now?

Per. I do not think I shall fight much this year, colonel;

I find myself given to my ease a little,
I care not, if I sell my foolish company;
They're things of hazard.

Alon. How it angers me,
This fellow, at first sight, should win a lady,
A rich young wench—And I, that have consumed

My time and art in searching out their subtleties,
Like a fooled alchymist, blow up my hopes still.
When shall we come to thy house, and be freely
merry?

Per. When I have managed her a little more.
I have an house to maintain an army.

Alon. If thy wife be fair, thou'lt have few less come to thee.

Per. Where they'll get entertainment, is the point;

Signior, I beat no drum.

May be I'll march, after a month or two,
To get a fresh stomach. I find, colonel,
A wantonness in wealth, methinks, I agree not with.

'Tis such a trouble to be married, too,
And have a thousand things of great importance,
Jewels and plate, and fooleries molest me,
To have a man's brains whimsied with his wealth.
Before I walked contentedly.

Enter Servant.

Ser. My mistress, sir, is sick, because you're absent.

She mourns, and will not eat.

Per. Alas, my jewel!

Come, I'll go with thee. Gentlemen, your fair leaves;

You see I am tied a little to my yoke;
Pray, pardon me; would ye had both such loving wives!

Juan. I thank ye
For your old boots. Never be blank, Alonzo,
Because this fellow has outstripped thy fortune.
Tell me, ten days hence, what he is, and how

The gracious state of matrimony stands with
him.

Come, let's to dinner; when Margaritta comes,
We'll visit both; it may be then your fortune.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A chamber.

Enter MARGARITTA, ALTEA, and Ladies.

Mar. Is he come?

Alt. Yes, madam, he has been here this half hour.

I've questioned him of all that you can ask him,
And find him fit as you had made the man.

Mar. Call him in, Altea. [Exit ALTEA,

Enter LEON and ALTEA.

A man of a comely countenance. Pray ye, come this way.

Is his mind so tame?

Alt. Pray question him, and, if you find him
not

Fit for your purpose, shake him off; there's no harm done.

Mar. Can ye love a young lady? How he blushes!

Alt. Leave twirling of your hat, and hold your head up,

And speak to the lady.

Leon. Yes, I think I can;

I must be taught; I know not what it means,
madam.

Mar. You shall be taught. And can you,
when she pleases,

Go ride abroad, and stay a week or two?
You shall have men and horses to attend ye,
And money in your purse.

Leon. Yes, I love riding;

And when I am from home, I am so merry!

Mar. Be as merry as you will. Can you as handsomely,

When you are sent for back, come with obedience,

And do your duty to the lady loves you?

Leon. Yes, sure, I shall.

Mar. And when you see her friends here,
Or noble kinsmen, can you entertain
Their servants in the cellar, and be busied,
And hold your peace, whate'er you see or hear?

Leon. 'Twere fit I were hanged else.

Mar. Come, salute me.

Leon. Madam?

Mar. How the fool shakes! I will not eat you, sir.

Can't you salute me?

Leon. Indeed, I know not; but, if your lady-ship will

Please to instruct me, sure I shall learn.

Mar. Come on, then.

Leon. Come on, then. [He kisses her.

Mar. You shall, then, be instructed.

If I should be this lady, that affects ye ;

Nay, say I marry ye ?

Alt. Hark to the lady.

Mar. What money have ye ?

Leon. None, madam, nor no friends.

I would do any thing to serve your ladyship.

Mar. You must not look to be my master, sir.

Nor talk in the house, as though you wore the breeches ;

No, nor command in any thing.

Leon. I will not ;

Alas, I am not able ! I've no wit, madam.

Mar. Nor do not labour to arrive at any ;

'Twill spoil your head. I take ye upon charity,

And like a servant ye must be unto me.

As I behold your duty, I shall love you ;

Can you mark these ?

Leon. Yes, indeed, forsooth.

Mar. There is one thing,

That, if I take ye in, I put ye from me,

Utterly from me ; you must not be saucy,

No, nor at any time familiar with me,

Scarce know me, when I call ye not.

Leon. I will not. Alas, I never knew myself sufficiently !

Mar. Nor must not now.

Leon. I'll be a dog to please you.

Mar. Indeed, you must fetch and carry as I appoint ye.

Leon. I were to blame else.

Mar. Kiss me again.

[Kisses her.]

If you see me

Kiss any other, twenty in an hour, sir,

You must not start, nor be offended.

Leon. No, if you kiss a thousand, I shall be contented ;

It will the better teach me how to please ye.

Alt. I told ye, madam.

Mar. 'Tis the man I wished for, the less you speak——

Leon. I'll never speak again, madam,

But when you charge me ; then I'll speak softly too.

Mar. Get me a priest ; I'll wed him instantly.

But, when you're married, sir, you must wait on me,

And see ye observe my laws.

Leon. Else you shall hang me.

Mar. I'll give you better clothes, when you deserve them.

Come in, and serve for witness.

Omnes. We shall, madam.

Mar. And then away to the city presently ;

I'll to my new house, and new company.

Leon. A thousand crowns are thine ; I'm a made man.

[Aside to ALTEA.]

Alt. Do not break out too soon.

Leon. I know my time, wench.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—A grand saloon.

Enter CLARA and ESTIFANIA, with a paper.

Cl. What, have you caught him ?

Estif. Yes.

Cl. And do you find him

A man of those hopes, that you aimed at ?

Estif. Yes, and the most kind man ;

I find him rich too, Clara.

Cl. Hast thou married him ?

Estif. What, dost thou think I fish without a bait, wench ?

I bob for fools. He is mine own. I have him.

I told thee what would tickle him like a trout ;

And as I cast it, so I caught him daintily ;

And all, he has, I've stowed at my devotion.

Cl. Does the lady know this ? she's coming now to town :

Now, to live here, in this house.

Estif. Let her come,

She shall be welcome, I'm prepared for her ;

She's mad, sure, if she be angry at my fortune ;

For what I have made bold.

Cl. Dost thou not love him ?

Estif. Yes, entirely well.

As long as there he stays, and looks no farther

Into my ends ; but when he doubts, I hate him ;

And that wise hate will teach me how to cozen him.

How to decline their wives, and curb their manners ;

To put a stern and strong rein to their natures :

And holds he is an ass not worth acquaintance,

That cannot mould a devil into obedience.

I owe him a good turn for these opinions ;

And, as I find his temper, I may pay him.

Enter PEREZ.

O, here he is ! now you shall see a kind man.

Per. My Estifania, shall we to dinner, lamb ?

I know thou stay'st for me.

Estif. I cannot eat else.

Per. I never enter, but methinks a paradise appears about me.

Estif. You are welcome to it, sir.

Per. I think I have the sweetest seat in Spain, wench, Methinks the richest, too. We'll eat i' the garden,

In one of the arbours ; there 'tis cool and pleasant ;

And have our wine cooled in the running fountain.

Who's that ?

Estif. A friend of mine, sir.

Per. Of what breeding ?

Estif. A gentlewoman, sir.

Per. What business has she ?

Is she a woman learned in the mathematics ?

Can she tell fortunes ?

Estif. More than I know, sir.

Per. Or has she e'er a letter from a kinswoman,
That must be delivered in my absence, wife?
Or comes she from the doctor to salute ye,
And learn your health? she looks not like a confessor.

Estif. What needs all this? why are you troubled, sir?
What do you suspect? she cannot cuckold ye:
She is a woman, sir, a very woman.

Per. Your very woman may do very well, sir,
Towards the matter; for, though she cannot perform it.

In her own person, she may do it by proxy.
Your rarest jugglers work still by conspiracy.

Estif. Cry ye mercy, husband! you are jealous, then,
And haply suspect me?

Per. No, indeed, wife.

Estif. Methinks you should not, till you have more cause,
And clearer, too. I'm sure you've heard say,
husband,

A woman forced will free herself through iron;
A happy, calm, and good wife, discontented,
May be caught by tricks.

Per. No, no: I do but jest with ye.

Estif. To-morrow, friend, I'll see you.

Cl. I shall leave ye
Till then, and pray all may go sweetly with ye.

[Erit.
[Knocking.

Estif. Why, where's the girl? who's at the door?

[Knock.

Per. Who knocks there?

Is't for the king you come, ye knock so boisterously?
Look to the door.

Enter Maid.

Maid. My lady, as I live! mistress, my lady's come;
She's at the door; I peeped through, I saw her,
And a stately company of ladies with her.

Estif. This was a week too soon, but I must meet with her,
And set a new wheel going, and a subtle one,
Must blind this mighty Mars, or I am ruined.

[Aside.

Per. What are they at the door?

Estif. Such, my Michael,
As you may bless the day they entered here;
Such for our good.

Per. 'Tis well.

Estif. Nay, 'twill be better
If you will let me but dispose the business,
And be a stranger to it, and not disturb me.
What have I now to do but advance your fortune?

Per. Do, I dare trust thee; I am ashamed I was angry;
I find thee a wise young wife.

VOL. II.

Estif. I'll wise your worship
Before I leave ye. [Aside.] Pray ye walk by, and say nothing;

Only salute them, and leave the rest to me, sir;
I was born to make ye a man.

Per. The rogue speaks heartily:
Her good-will colours in her cheeks: I am born to love her.

I must be gentle to these tender natures:
A soldier's rude, harsh words befit not ladies;
Nor must we talk to them, as we talk to
Our officers. I'll give her way, for 'tis for me she Works now; I am husband, heir, and all she has—

Enter MARGARITTA, LEON, ALTEA, and Ladies.

Who are these? I hate such flaunting things.
A woman of rare presence! excellent fair;
This is too big, sure, for a bawdy house;
Too open seated, too.

Estif. My husband, lady.

Mar. You have gained a proper man.

Per. Whate'er I am, I am your servant, lady.

[Kisses.

Estif. Sir, be ruled now, [Apart to PEREZ.
And I shall make you rich: this is my cousin;
That gentleman doats on her, even to death.
See how he observes her.

Per. She is a goodly woman.

Estif. She is a mirror.
But she is poor, she were for a prince's side else;
This house she has brought him to as to her own,
And presuming upon me, and on my courtesy—Conceive me short; he knows not but she's wealthy:

Or if he did know otherwise, 'twere all one,
He's so far gone.

Per. Forward; she's a rare face.

Estif. This we must carry with discretion,
husband,
And yield unto her for four days.

Per. Yield our house up, our goods and wealth!

Estif. All this is but seeming. Do you see this writing?
Two hundred pounds a year, when they are married,
Has she sealed to for our good—The time is unfit now;
I'll shew it you to-morrow.

Per. All the house?

Estif. All, all; and we'll remove, too, to confirm him.
They'll into the country suddenly again,
After they are matched, and then she'll open to him.

Per. The whole possession, wife? Look what you do.
A part of the house.

Estif. No, no, they shall have all,
And take their pleasure too; 'tis for our advantage.

Q

Why, what's four days? Had you a sister, sir,
A niece, or mistress, that required this courtesy,
And should I make a scruple to do you good?

Per. If easily it would come back.

Estif. I swear, sir, as easily as it came on.
Is't not pity
To let such a gentlewoman for a little help—
You give away no house.

Per. Clear but that question.

Estif. I'll put the writings into your hand.

Per. Well then.

Estif. And you shall keep them safe.

Per. I'm satisfied. Would I had the wench
too!

Estif. When she has married him,
So infinite his love is linked unto her,
You, I, or any one that helps at this pinch,
May have—Heaven knows what.

Per. I'll remove my trunks straight,
And take some poor house by; 'tis but four days.

Estif. I have a poor friend; there we will be.

Per. 'Tis well then.

Estif. Go handsome off, and leave the house clear.

Per. Well.

Estif. That little stuff we'll use shall follow
after;

And a boy to guide ye. Peace, and we are made both.

Mar. Come, let's go in. Are all the rooms kept sweet, wench?

Estif. They're sweet and neat. [Exit PEREZ.]

Mar. Why, where's your husband?

Estif. Gone, madam.

When you come to your own, he must give place,
lady.

Mar. Well, send you joy; you would not let me know it,

Yet I shall not forget ye.

Estif. Thank your ladyship.

Mar. Come, lead me.

[Ereunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A Chamber.

Enter MARGARITTA and ALTEA.

Alt. ARE you at ease now? Is your heart at rest,

Now you have got a shadow, an umbrella,
To keep the scorching world's opinion
From your fair credit?

Mar. I am at peace, Altea.

If he continue but the same he shews,
And be a master of that ignorance
He outwardly professes, I am happy.

Alt. You're a made woman.

Mar. But if he should prove now
A crafty and dissembling kind of husband,
One read in knavery, and brought up in the art
Of villainy concealed?

Alt. My life, an innocent.

Mar. That's it I aim at.

That's it I hope too, then I'm sure I rule him:
For innocents are like obedient children,
Brought up under a hard mother-in-law, a cruel,
Who, being not used to breakfasts and colla-
tions,

When they have coarse bread offered, are thankful,

And take it for a favour too.

Are the rooms made ready
To entertain my friends? I long to dance now.
Let me have a song. Is the great couch up
The duke of Medina sent?

Alt. Your house is nothing now but various pleasures.

The gallants begin to gaze too.

Mar. Let them gaze on.

I was brought up a courtier, high and happy;
And company is my delight, and courtship,

And handsome servants at my will. Where's my good husband?

Where does he wait?

Alt. He knows his distance, madam.

I warrant ye he is busy in the cellar
Among his fellow-servants, or asleep,
Till your commands awake him.

Enter LEON and LORENZO.

Mar. 'Tis well, Altea;
It should be so; my ward I must preserve him.
Who sent for him? How dare he come uncalled
for?

His bonnet on too!

Alt. Sure he sees you not.

Mar. How scornfully he looks!

Leon. Are all the chambers
Decked and adorned thus for my lady's pleasure?

New hangings every hour for entertainment?
And new plate bought, new jewels to give lustre?

Ser. They are, and yet there must be more and richer;

It is her will.

Leon. Hum, is it so? 'Tis excellent.
Is it her will, too, to have feasts and banquets,
Revels and masques?

Ser. She ever loved them dearly;
And we shall have the bravest house kept now,
sir.

I must not call ye master; she has warned me;
Nor must not put my hat off to you.

Leon. 'Tis no fashion.

What though I be her husband, I'm your fellow;
I may cut first?

Ser. That's as you shall deserve, sir.

Leon. I thank you, sir.

Enter a Lady.

1 Lady. Madam, the duke Medina, with some captains,
Will come to dinner, and have sent rare wine,
And their best services.

Mar. They shall be welcome.
See all be ready in the noblest fashion.
Go, get your best clothes on; but, till I call ye,
Be sure you be not seen. Dine with the gentle-
women,
And behave yourself handsomely, sir; 'tis for my credit.

Enter a second Lady.

2 Lady. Madam, the lady Julia——
Leon. That's a bawd;
A three-piled bawd; bawd major to the army.
3 Lady. Has brought her coach to wait upon your ladyship,
And to be informed if you will take the air this morning.

Leon. The neat air of her nunnery.
Mar. Tell her no; i' the afternoon I'll call on her.
4 Lady. I will, madam. [Exit.]
Leon. Faith, madam, in my little understanding,
You'd better entertain your honest neighbours,
Your friends about ye, that may speak well of ye,

And give a worthy mention of your bounty.
Mar. How now, what's this?
Leon. 'Tis only to persuade ye
Courtiers are tickle things to deal withal,
A kind of march-pane men that will not last,
madam;

An egg and pepper goes farther than their portions;
And in a well-knit body, a poor parsnip
Will play his prize above their strong potables.

Mar. The fellow's mad!
Leon. He, that shall counsel ladies,
That have both liquorish and ambitious eyes,
Is either mad or drunk, let him speak gospel.

Alt. He breaks out modestly.
Leon. Pray ye be not angry;
My indiscretion has made bold to tell ye
What you'll find true.

Mar. Thou dar'st not talk?
Leon. Not much, madam;
You have a tie upon your servant's tongue;
He dare not be so bold as reason bids him;
Twere fit there were a stronger on your temper.
N'er look so stern upon me! I'm your husband:
But what are husbands? Read the New World's Wonders,

Such husbands as this monstrous world produces,
And you will scarce find such strange deformities;
They're shadows to conceal your venal virtues;
Sails to your mills, that grind with all occasions;
Balls that lie by you, to wash out your stains;

And bills nailed up with horns before your doors,
To rent out wantonness.

Mar. Do you hear him talk?

Leon. I've done, madam:
An ox once spoke, as learned men deliver;
Shortly I shall be such, then I'll speak wonders.
'Till when I tie myself to my obedience. [Exit.]

Mar. First I'll untie myself. Did you mark the gentleman,
How boldly and how saucily he talked,
And how unlike the lump I took him for!
The piece of ignorant dough! he stood up to me,
And rated my commands.

This was your providence,
Your wisdom, to elect this gentleman,
Your excellent forecast in the man, your knowledge!

What think ye now?

Alt. I think him an ass still.

This boldness, some of your people have blown into him,

This wisdom too, with strong wine; 'tis a tyrant,
And a philosopher also, and finds out reasons.

Mar. I'll have my cellar locked, no school kept there,

Nor no discovery. I'll turn my drunkards,
Such as are understanding in their draughts,
And dispute learnedly the whys and wherefores,
'To grass immediately: I'll keep all fools;
Sober or drunk, still fools that shall know nothing.

Nothing belongs to mankind but obedience,
And such a hand I'll keep over this husband.

Alt. He'll fall again: my life, he cries by this time:

Keep him from drink; he's a high constitution.

Enter LEON.

Leon. Shall I wear my new suit, madam?

Mar. No, your old clothes.

And get you into the country presently,
And see my hawks well trained: you shall have victuals,

Such as are fit for saucy palates, sir,
And lodgings with the hinds; it is too good too.

Leon. Good madam, be not so rough with repentance!

Alt. You see how he's come round again.

Mar. I see not what I expect to see.

Leon. You shall see, madam, if it please your ladyship.

Alt. He's humbled;

Forgive, good lady.

Mar. Well, go, get you handsome,
And let me hear no more.

Leon. Have ye yet no feeling?

I'll pinch you to the bones then, my proud lady.
[Exit.]

Mar. See you preserve him thus, upon my favour.

You know his temper, tie him to the grindstone;
The next rebellion I'll be rid of him,

I'll have no needy rascals I tie to me
Dispute my life. Come in, and see all handsome.

Alt. I hope to see you so too, I've wrought ill else. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—An ordinary apartment.

Enter PEREZ.

Per. Shall I
Never return to mine own house again?
We're lodged here in the miserablest dog-hole!
A conjuror's circle gives content above it;
A hawk's mew is a princely palace to it:
We have a bed no bigger than a basket,
And we lie like butter clapt together,
And sweat ourselves to sauce immediately;
The fumes are infinite, that inhabit here too,
And to that so thick they cut like marmalade;
So various too, they'll pose a gold finder.
Never return to mine own paradise——
Why, wife, I say; why, Estifania!
Estif. [within.] I'm going presently.
Per. Make haste, good jewel.
I'm like the people that live in the sweet islands:
I die, I die, if I stay but one day more here.
My lungs are rotten with the damps that rise,
And I cough nothing now but stinks of all sorts.
The inhabitants we have are two starved rats,
(For they're not able to maintain a cat here,)
And those appear as fearful as two devils;
They've eat a map o' the whole world up already,
And if we stay a night, we're gone for company.
There's an old woman, that's now grown to marble,
Dried in this brick-kiln, and she sits i' the chimney,
Which is but three tiles raised, like a house of cards,
The true proportion of an old smoaked Sybil.
There is a young thing too, that nature meant
For a maid servant, but 'tis now a monster;
She has a husk about her like a chesnut,
With laziness, and living under the line here;
And these two makes a hollow sound together,
Like frogs, or winds between two doors, that murmur.

Enter ESTIFANIA.

Mercy deliver me. Oh, are you come, wife;
Shall we be free again?

Estif. I am now going,
And you shall, presently, to your own house, sir:
The remembrance of this small vexation
Will be argument of mirth for ever.
By that time you have said your orisons,
And broke your fast, I shall be back, and ready
To usher you to your old content, your freedom.

Per. Break my fast! break my neck rather.
Is there any thing here to eat
But one another, like a race of cannibals?
A piece of buttered wall you think is excellent.

Let's have our house again immediately;
And pray ye take heed unto the furniture,
None be embezzled.

Estif. Not a pin, I warrant ye.

Per. And let them instantly depart.

Estif. They shall both; there's reason in all courtesy;

For by this time I know she has acquainted him,
And has provided too: she sent me word, sir,
And will give over gratefully unto you.

Per. I will walk in the church-yard;
The dead cannot offend more than these living.
An hour hence I'll expect ye.

Estif. I'll not fail, sir.

Per. And do you hear? let's have a handsome dinner,
And see all things be decent as they have been;
And let me have a strong bath to restore me;
I stink like a stale fish-shambles, or an oil-shop.

Estif. You shall have all, which some interpret nothing. [Aside.]
I'll send ye people for the trunks afore-hand.

Per. Let them be known and honest;
And do my service to your niece.

Estif. I shall, sir:
But if I come not at my hour, come thither,
That they may give you thanks for your fair courtesy;

And pray you, be brave for my sake.

Per. I observe ye. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A street.

Enter JUAN DE CASTRO, SANCHIO, and CACA-FOGO.

San. Thou'rt very brave.

Caca. I've reason, I have money.

San. Is money reason?

Caca. Yes, and rhyme too, captain.
If you've no money, you're an ass.

San. I thank ye.

Caca. Ye've manners; ever thank him, that has money.

San. Wilt thou lend me any?

Caca. Not a farthing, captain:
Captains are casual things.

San. Why so are all men. Thou shalt have my bond.

Caca. Not bonds, nor fetters, captain.

My money is my own, I make no doubt on't.

Juan. What dost thou do with it?

Caca. Put it to pious uses.

Buy wine and wenches, and undo young coxcombs

That would undo me.

Juan. Are those hospitals?

Caca. I first provide to fill my hospitals
With creatures of mine own, that I know wretched,

And then I build: those are more bound to pray for me:

Besides, I keep the inheritance in my name still.

Juan. A provident charity. Are you for the wars, sir?

Caca. I am not poor enough to be a soldier, Nor have I faith enough to ward a bullet; There is no lining for a trench, I take it.

Juan. Ye have said wisely.

Caca. Had you but my money, You'd swear it, colonel. I had rather drill at home

A hundred thousand crowns, and with more honour,

Than exercise ten thousand fools with nothing.

A wise man safely feeds, fools cut their fingers.

Sen. A right state usurer. Why dost not marry,

And live a reverend justice?

Caca. Is it not nobler to command a reverend justice, than to be one?

And for a wife, what need I marry, captain,

When every courteous fool, that owes me money, Owe me his wife too, to appease my fury?

Juan. Wilt thou go to dinner with us?

Caca. I will go, and view the pearl of Spain, the orient

Fair one, the rich one too; and I will be respected.

I bear my patent here; I will talk to her;

And when your captainships shall stand aloof,

And pick your noses, I will pick the purse Of her affection.

Juan. The duke dines there to-day too, the duke of Medina.

Caca. Let the king dine there!

He owes me money, and so far's my creature,

And certainly I may make bold with mine own, captain.

Sen. Thou wilt eat monstrously.

Caca. Like a true born Spaniard:

Eat as I were in England, where the beef grows:

And I will drink abundantly, and then

Talk ye as wantonly as Ovid did,

To stir the intellectuals of the ladies;

I learnt it of my father's amorous scrivener.

Juan. If we should play now, you must supply me.

Caca. You must pawn a horse troop, And then have at ye, colonel.

Sen. Come, let's go.

This rascal will make rare sport. How the ladies Will laugh at him!

Juan. If I light on him, I'll make his purse sweat too.

Caca. Will ye lead, gentlemen? [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—An ordinary apartment.

Enter PEREZ, Old Woman, and Maid.

Per. Nay, pray ye come out, and let me understand ye,

And tune your pipe a little higher, lady;

I'll hold ye fast. How came my trunks open,

And my goods gone? What pick-lock spirit—

Old Wom. Ha! What would ye have?

Per. My goods again. How came my trunks all open?

Old Wom. Are your trunks all open?

Per. Yes, and clothes gone,

And chains and jewels. How she smells like hung beef,

The palsy, and pick-locks! Fye, how she belches The spirit of garlic!

Old Wom. Where's your gentlewoman?

The young fair woman?

Per. What's that to my question?

She is my wife, and gone about my business.

Maid. Is she your wife, sir?

Per. Yes, sir: is that a wonder?

Is the name of wife unknown here?

Old Wom. Is she duly and truly your wife?

Per. Duly and truly my wife! I think so,

For I married her. It was no vision, sure!

Maid. She has the keys, sir.

Per. I know she has; but who has all my goods, spirit?

Old Wom. If you be married to that gentlewoman,

You are a wretched man: she has twenty husbands.

Maid. She tells you true.

Old Wom. And she has cozened all, sir.

Per. The devil she has! I had a fair house with her,

That stands hard by, and furnished royally.

Old Wom. You're cozened too; 'tis none of her's, good gentleman,

It is a lady's.

Maid. The lady Margaritta; she was her servant,

And kept the house; but going from her, sir, For some lewd tricks she played.

Per. Plague o' the devil!

Am I, in the full meridian of my wisdom,

Cheated by a stale quean! What kind of lady

Is that that owns the house?

Old Wom. A young sweet lady.

Per. Of low stature?

Old Wom. She's indeed but little, but she's wondrous fair.

Per. I feel I'm cozened:

Now I am sensible I am undone.

This is the very woman sure, that cousin,

She told me would entreat but for four days

To make the house hers—I am entreated sweetly.

Maid. When she went out this morning, I saw, sir,

She had two women at the door attending,

And there she gave them things, and loaded them:

But what they were—I heard your trunks too open,

If they be yours.

Per. They were mine while they were laden;

But now they've cast their calves, they're not worth owning.

Was she her mistress, say you?

Old Wom. Her own mistress, her very mistress, sir; and all you saw About and in that house was hers.

Per. No plate, no jewels, nor no hangings?

Maid. Not a farthing; she's poor, sir, a poor shifting thing.

Per. No money?

Old Wom. Abominable poor, as poor as we are, Money as rare to her, unless she steal it. But for one single gown her lady gave her, She might go bare, good gentlewoman.

Per. I'm mad now:

I think I am as poor as she, I'm wild else. One single suit I have left too, and that's all, And if she steals that she must flay me for it. Where does she use?

Old Wom. You may find the truth as soon. Alas, a thousand concealed corners, sir, she lurks in;

And here she gets a fleece, and there another, And lives in mists and smokes where none can find her.

Per. Is she a whore too?

Old Wom. Little better, gentleman: I dare not say she is so, sir, because She's yours, sir: these five years she has firked A pretty living.

Per. She has firked me finely. A whore and thief; two excellent moral learnings

In one she saint. I hope to see her legend. Have I been feared for my discoveries, And been courted by all women to conceal them; Have I so long studied the art of this sex, And read the warning to young gentlemen; Have I professed to tame the pride of ladies, And make them bear all tests; and am I tricked now?

Caught in my own noose? Here's a rial left yet; There's for your lodging, and your meat for a week;

A silk-worm lives at a more plentiful ordinary, And sleeps in a sweeter box.

Farewell, great grandmother;

If I do find you were an accessory, 'Tis but the cutting off two smoaking minutes! I'll hang ye presently.

Old Wom. And I deserve it—I tell you truth.

Per. Not I, I am an ass, mother.

Old Wom. O the rogue, the villain! Is this usage for the fair sex. [Ereunt.

SCENE V.—A grand apartment.

Enter the DUKE OF MEDINA, JUAN DE CASTRO, ALONZO, SANCHIO, CACAFOGO, and Attendants.

Duke. A goodly house.

Juan. And richly furnished too, sir.

Alon. Hung wautonly; I like that preparation; It stirs the blood into a hopeful banquet, And intimates the mistress free and jovial;

I love a house, where pleasure prepares welcome.

Duke. Now, Cacafogo, how like you this mansion?

'Twere a brave pawn.

Caca. I shall be master of it;

'Twas built for my bulk, the rooms are wide and spacious,

Airy, and full of ease, and that I love well.

I'll tell you, when I taste the wine, my lord,

And take the height of her table with my stomach,

How my affection stands to the young lady.

Enter MARGARITTA, ALTEA, Ladies, and Servant.

Mar. All welcome to your grace, and to these soldiers!

You honour my poor house with your fair presence;

Those few slight pleasures, that inhabit here, sir, I do beseech your grace command; they're yours; Your servant but preserves them to delight ye.

Duke. I thank ye, lady. I am bold to visit ye, Once more to bless mine eyes with your sweet beauty.

It has been a long night, since you left the court, For, till I saw you now, no day broke to me.

Mar. Bring in the duke's meat.

San. She's most excellent.

Juan. Most admirable fair, as e'er I looked on; I rather would command her than my regiment.

Caca. I'll have a fling; 'tis but a thousand ducats, Which I can cozen up in ten days.

Enter LEON.

Mar. Why, where's this dinner?

Leon. 'Tis not ready, madam, Nor shall it be, until I know the guests too, Nor are they fairly welcome till I bid them.

Juan. Is not this my Alferes? he looks another thing;

Are miracles a-foot again?

Mar. Why, sirrah; why, sirrah, you!

Leon. I hear you, saucy woman; And, as you are my wife, command your absence,

And know your duty; 'tis the crown of modesty.

Duke. Your wife!

Leon. Yes, good my lord, I am her husband, And, pray, take notice, that I claim that honour, And will maintain it.

Caca. If thou be'st her husband, I am determined thou shalt be my cuckold; I'll be thy faithful friend.

Leon. Peace, dirt and dunghill!

I will not lose my anger on a rascal.

Provoke me more, I'll beat thy blown-up body, Till thou rebound'st again like a tennis-ball.

Caca. I'll talk with you another time. [Erit.

Alon. This is miraculous!

Sen. Is this the fellow
That had the patience to become a fool,
A dattered fool, and, on a sudden, break,
As if he would shew a wonder to the world,
Both in bravery and fortune too?
I am astonished!

Mar. I'll be divorced immediately.

Leon. You shall not.
You shall not have so much will to be wicked.
I am more tender of your honour, lady.
You took me for a shadow,
You took me to gloss over your discredit,
To be your fool.
You had thought you had found a coxcomb.
I'm innocent of any foul dishonour I mean to ye;
Only I will be known to be your lord now,
And be a fair one, too, or I will fall for it.

Mar. I do command ye from me, thou poor fellow,
Thou cozened fool!

Leon. Thou cozened fool!
I will not be commanded: I'm above ye.
You may divorce me from your favour, lady,
But from your 'state you never shall. I'll hold that,
And hold it to my use; the law allows it.
And then maintain your wantonness, I'll wink at it.

Mar. Am I braved thus in mine own house?

Leon. 'Tis mine, madam!
You are deceived, I'm lord of it, I rule it,
And all that's in it; you've nothing to do here, madam,
But as a servant to sweep clean the lodgings,
And at my farther will to do me service;
And so I'll keep it.

Mar. 'Tis well.

Leon. It shall be better.

Mar. As you love me, give way.

Leon. I will give none, madam;
I stand upon the ground of my own honour,
And will maintain it; you shall know me now
To be an understanding, feeling man,
And sensible of what a woman aims at;
A young proud woman, that has will to sail with;
A wanton woman, that her blood provokes too.
I cast my cloud off, and appear myself,
The master of this little piece of mischief,
And I will put a spell about your feet, lady;
They shall not wander, but where I give way now.

Duke. Is this the fellow, that the people pointed at,
For the mere sign of man, the walking image?
He speaks wondrous highly.

Leon. As a husband ought, sir,
In his own house; and it becomes me well, too.
I think your grace would grieve, if you were put to it,
To have a wife or servant of your own,
(For wives are reckoned in the rank of servants)
Under your own roof to command ye.

Juan. Brave! a strange conversion; thou shalt lead
In chief now.

Duke. Is there no difference betwixt her and you, sir?

Leon. Not now, my lord; my fortune makes me even,
And, as I am an honest man, I'm nobler.

Mar. Get me my coach.

Leon. Let me see who dares get it,
Till I command; I'll make him draw your coach,
And eat your coach too (which will be hard diet),
That executes your will; or, take your coach, lady;
I give you liberty; and take your people,
Which I turn off; and take your will abroad with ye—

Take all these freely, but take me no more;
And so, farewell.

Duke. Nay, sir, you shall not carry it
So bravely off; you shall not wrong a lady
In a high huffing strain, and think to bear it.
We shall not stand by, as bawds to your brave fury,
To see a lady weep—Draw, sir.

Leon. They're tears of anger,
Wrung from her rage, because her will prevails not.
She would even now swoon, if she could not cry,
Else they were excellent, and I should grieve, too;
But falling thus, they shew nor sweet nor orient.
Put up, my lord! this is oppression,
And calls the sword of justice to relieve me,
The law to lend her hand, the king to right me;
All which shall understand how you provoke me.
In mine own house to brave me, is this princely?
Then to my guard; and if I spare your grace,
And do not make this place your monument,
Too rich a tomb for such a rude behaviour,
Mercy forsake me! [Draws.]
I have a cause will kill a thousand of ye.

Juan. Hold, fair sir, I beseech ye!
The gentleman but pleads his own right nobly.

Leon. He, that dares strike against the husband's freedom,
The husband's curse stick to him, a tamed cuckold!
His wife be fair and young; but most dishonest,
Most impudent, and he have no feeling of it,
No conscience to reclaim her from a monster;
Let her lie by him like a flattering ruin,
And, at one instant, kill both name and honour:
Let him be lost, no eye to weep his end,
And find no earth, that's base enough to bury him!
Now, sir, fall on, I'm ready to oppose ye.

Duke. I've better thought. I pray, sir, use your wife well.

Leon. Mine own humanity will teach me that, sir.
And now, you're welcome all, and we'll to dinner;
This is my wedding-day.

Duke. I'll cross your joy yet.

Juan. I've seen a miracle; hold thine own, soldier!

Sure they dare fight in fire, that conquer women.

Enter PEREZ.

Per. 'Save ye, which is the lady of the house?

Leon. That's she, sir, that good-natured pretty lady,

If you'd speak with her.

Juan. Don Michael!

Per. Pray do not know me, I am full of business.

When I have more time I'll be merry with ye.

It is the woman. Good madam, tell me truly, Had you a maid called Estifania?

Mar. Yes, truly had I.

Per. Was she a maid do you think?

Mar. I dare not swear for her;

For she had but a scant fame.

Per. Was she your kinswoman?

Mar. Not that I ever knew; now I look better, I think you married her; give you much joy, sir.

Per. Give me a halter.

Mar. You may reclaim her; 'twas a wild young girl.

Per. Is not this house mine, madam?

Was not she owner of it? Pray, speak truly.

Mar. No, certainly, I'm sure my money paid for it,

And ne'er remember yet I gave it you, sir.

Per. The hangings and the plate, too?

Mar. All are mine, sir,

And every thing you see about the building;

She only kept my house, when I was absent;

And so I'll keep it, I was weary of her.

Per. Where is your maid?

Mar. Do you not know, that have her?

She's yours now, why should I look after her? Since that first hour I came I never saw her.

Per. I saw her later—would the devil had had her!

It is all true, I find; a wild-fire take her!

Juan. Is thy wife with child, Don Michael? Thy excellent wife.

Art thou a man yet?

Alon. When shall we come and visit thee?

San. And eat some rare fruit? Thou hast admirable orchards.

You are so jealous now! Pox on your jealousy, How scornfully you look!

Per. Prithee leave fooling.

I'm in no humour now to fool and prattle.

Did she ne'er play the wag with you?

Mar. Yes, many times,

So often that I was ashamed to keep her.

But I forgave her, sir, in hopes she'd mend still;

And had not you o' the instant married her, I'd put her off.

Per. I thank ye; I am blest still;

Which way so'er I turn I'm a made man.

Miserably gulled beyond recovery.

Juan. You'll stay and dine?

Per. Certain I cannot, captain.

Hark in thine ear, I am the arrantest puppy,

The-miserablest ass! But I must leave ye.

I am in haste, in haste. Bless you, good madam, And may you prove as good as my wife!

Leon. What then, sir?

Per. No matter, if the devil had one to fetch the other. [Exit PEREZ.]

Leon. Will you walk in, sir? will your grace but honour me,

And taste our dinner? You are nobly welcome.

All anger's past, I hope, and I shall serve ye.

[Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—A street.

Enter PEREZ.

Per. I'll to a conjurer, but I'll find this polecat,

This pilfering whore. A plague of veils, I cry, And covers for the impudence of women!

Their sanctity in show will deceive devils.

It is my evil angel! let me bless me.

Enter ESTIFANIA, with a casket.

Estif. 'Tis he! I'm caught. I must stand to it stoutly,

And show no shake of fear. I see he's angry, Vexed at the uttermost.

Per. My worthy wife, I have been looking of your modesty All the town over.

Estif. My most noble husband,

I'm glad I have found ye; for, in truth, I am weary,

Weary and lame with looking out your lordship.

Per. I have been in bawdy houses—

Estif. I believe you, and very lately, too.

Per. 'Pray ye, pardon me;

To seek your ladyship, I have been in cellars,

In private cellars, where the thirsty bawds

Hear your confessions; I have been at plays,

To look you out among the youthful actors;

At puppet-shows, you are mistress of the motions;

At last, I went to church to seek you out;

'Tis so long since you were there, they have forgot you.

Estif. You had a pretty progress; I'll tell mine now.

To look you out, I went to twenty taverns—

Per. And are you sober?

Estif. Yes, I reel not yet, sir;

Where I saw twenty drunk, most of them soldiers.

There I had great hope to find you disguised, too ;
From hence to the dicing-house ; there I found quarrels

Needless and fenceless, swords, pots, and candlesticks,

Tables, and stools, and all in one confusion,
And no man knew his friend. I left this chaos,
And to the surgeon's went : he willed me stay,
For, says he, learnedly, if he be tippled,
Twenty to one he whores, and then I hear of him ;

If he be mad, he quarrels, then he comes, too.
I sought ye where no safe thing would have ventured,

Amongst diseases, base and vile, vile women ;
For I remembered your old Roman axiom,
The more the danger, still the more the honour.
Last, to your confessor I came, who told me,
You were too proud to pray ; and here I've found ye.

Per. She bears up bravely, and the rogue is witty,

But I shall dash it instantly to nothing.
Here leave we off our wanton languages,
And now conclude we in a sharper tongue.

Why am I cozened ?

Estif. Why am I abused ?

Per. Thou most vile, base, abominable——

Estif. Captain.

Per. Thou stinking, over-stewed, incorrigible——

Estif. Captain.

Per. Do you echo me ?

Estif. Yes, sir, and go before ye,
And round about ye ! Why do you rail at me,
For that was your own sin, your own knavery ?

Per. And brave me, too ?

Estif. You'd best now draw your sword, captain !

Draw it upon a woman, do, brave captain,
Upon your wife, Oh, most renowned captain !

Per. A plague upon thee, answer me directly ;
Why didst thou marry me ?

Estif. To be my husband ;
I thought you had had infinite, but I am cozened.

Per. Why didst thou flatter me, and shew me wonders ?

A house and riches, when they are but shadows ;
Shadows to me !

Estif. Why did you work on me,
(It was but my part to requite you, sir)
With your strong soldier's wit, and swore you'd bring me

So much in chains, so much in jewels, husband,
So much in right rich clothes ?

Per. Thou hast them, rascal ;
I gave them to thy hands, my trunks and all,
And thou hast opened them, and sold my treasure.

Estif. Sir, there's your treasure, sell it to a tinker

To mend old kettles ! Is this noble usage ?
Let all the world view here the captain's treasure.

A man would think now these were worthy matters.

Here's a shoeing-horn chain gilt over ; how it scenteth,

Worse than the dirty mouldy heels it served for !
And here's another of a lesser value ;

So little, I would shame to tie my dog in it.
These are my jointure ; blush and save a labour,
Or else these will blush for ye.

Per. A fire subtle ye ! are ye so crafty ?

Estif. Here's a goodly jewel !

Did not you win this at Goletta, captain ?
Or took it in the field from some brave bashaw ?
See how it sparkles !—Like an old lady's eyes ;
And fills each room with light, like a close lantern.

This would do rarely in an abbey window,
To cozen pilgrims.

Per. Prithee leave prating.

Estif. And here's a chain of whittings' eyes for pearls ;

A mussel-monger would have made a better.

Per. Nay, prithee wife, my clothes, my clothes.

Estif. I'll tell ye,

Your clothes are parallels to these, all counterfeit.

Put these and them on, you are a man of copper,
A kind of candlestick,
A copper, a copper captain ! these you thought,
my husband,

To have cozened me withal ; but I am quit with you.

Per. Is there no house, then, nor no grounds about it ?

No plate nor hangings

Estif. There are none, sweet husband.

Shadow for shadow is as equal justice.

[PEREZ sings—ESTIFANIA sings.
Can you rail now ? Pray, put your fury up, sir,
And speak great words ! you are a soldier ; thunder !

Per. I will speak little ; I have played the fool,
And so I am rewarded.

Estif. You have spoke well, sir ;
And now I see you're so comfortable,
I'll heighten you again. Go to your house ;
They're packing to be gone ; you must sup there ;
I'll meet you, and bring clothes and clean linen after,

And all things shall be well. I'll colt you once more,

And teach you to bring copper.

Per. Tell me one thing,
I do beseech thee, tell me truth, wife ;
However, I forgive thee ; art thou honest ?
The beldam swore——

Estif. I bid her tell you so, sir

R.

It was my plot; alas, my credulous husband!

The lady told you, too——

Per. Most strange things of thee.

Estif. Still 'twas my way, and all to try your suffrance.

And she denied the house?

Per. She knew me not,
No, nor title that I had.

Estif. 'Twas well carried;
No more, I am right and straight.

Per. I would believe thee,
But Heaven knows how my heart is; will ye follow me?

Estif. I'll be there straight.

Per. I'm fooled, yet dare not find it.

Estif. Go, silly fool; thou may'st be a good soldier

In open fields, but for our private service
Thou art an ass.

Enter CACAFOGO.

Here comes another trout, that I must tickle,
And tickle daintily, I've lost my end else.

May I crave your leave, sir?

Caca. Prithee, be answered, thou shalt crave no leave;

I am in my meditations; do not vex me;

A beaten thing! but this hour a most bruised thing,

That people had compassion on, it looked so!

The next sir Palmerin. Here's fine proportion!

An ass, and then an elephant. Sweet justice!

There's no way left to come at her now, no craving;

If money could come near, yet I would pay him;

I have a mind to make him a huge cuckold,

And money may do much; a thousand ducats!

'Tis but the letting blood of a rank heir.

Estif. Pray you, hear me.

Caca. I know thou hast some wedding-ring to pawn now,

Of silver gilt, with a blind posy in it:

Or thy child's whistle, or thy squirrel's chain.

I'll none of them. I would she did but know me!

Or would this fellow had but use of money,

That I might come in any way.

Estif. I am gone, sir;

And I shall tell the beauty sent me to ye,

The lady Margaritta——

Caca. Stay, I prithee.

What is thy will? I turn me wholly to ye;

And talk now till thy tongue ache, I will hear ye.

Estif. She would intreat you, sir——

Caca. She shall command, sir;

Let it be so; I beseech thee, my sweet gentlewoman,

Do not forget thyself.

Estif. She does command, then,

This courtesy, because she knows you're noble.

Caca. Your mistress by the way?

Estif. My natural mistress.

Upon these jewels, sir, they're fair and rich,

And view them right——

Caca. To doubt them is an heresy.

Estif. A thousand ducats; 'tis upon necessity
Of present use; her husband, sir, is stubborn.

Caca. Long may he be so.

Estif. She desires, withal,
A better knowledge of your parts and person,
And when you please to do her so much honour——

Caca. Come, let's dispatch.

Estif. In truth I've heard her say, sir,
Of a fat man she has not seen a sweeter.
But in this business, sir——

Caca. Let's do it first,

And then dispute; the lady's use may long for it.

Estif. All secrecy she would desire. She told me
How wise you are.

Caca. We are not wise to talk thus.

Carry her the gold, I'll look her out a jewel

Shall sparkle like her eyes, and thee another.

Come, prithee come, I long to serve the lady;

Long monstrously. Now, valour, I shall meet ye,
You, that dare dukes. [Exit.

SCENE II.—A Chamber.

Enter the Duke, SANCHIO, JUAN, and ALONZO.

Duke. He shall not have his will, I shall prevent him.

I have a toy here, that will turn the tide,
And suddenly and strangely. Here, Don Juan,
Do you present it to him.

Juan. I am commanded. [Exit.

Duke. A fellow founded out of charity,
And moulded to the height, contemn his maker,
Curb the free hand that framed him!
It must not be.

San. That such an oyster-shell should hold a pearl,

And of so rare a price, in prison!

Was she made to be the matter of her own undoing,

To let a slovenly, unwieldy fellow,

Unruly and self-willed, dispose her beauties?

We suffer all, sir, in this sad eclipse:

She should shine, where she might shew like herself,

An absolute sweetness, to comfort those admire her,

And shed her beams upon her friends.

We are gulled all,

And all the world will grumble at your patience,
If she be ravished thus.

Duke. Ne'er fear it, Sanchio;

We'll have her free again, and move at court

In her clear orb. But one sweet handsomeness
To bless this part of Spain, and have that slubbered!

Alon. 'Tis every good man's cause, and we must stir in it.

Duke. I'll warrant ye, he shall be glad to please us,

And glad to share too ; we shall hear anon
A new song from him ; let's attend a little.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Another Chamber.

Enter LEON and JUAN with a commission.

Leon. Colonel, I am bound to you for this nobleness.
I should have been your officer, 'tis true, sir ;
And a proud man I should have been to have served you.

It has pleased the king, out of his boundless favours,
To make me your companion : this commission
Gives me a troop of horse.

Juan. I do rejoice at it,
And am a glad man we shall gain your company.
I'm sure the king knows you are newly married,
And out of that respect gives you more time, sir.

Leon. Within four days I'm gone, so he commands me,

And 'tis not mannerly for me to argue it.
The time grows shorter still—Are your goods ready ?

Juan. They are aboard.

Leon. Who waits there ?

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir.

Leon. Do you hear, ho ? Go carry this unto your mistress, sir,
And let her see how much the king has honoured me ;

Bid her be lusty, she must make a soldier.
Go, take down all the hangings,
And pack up all my clothes, my plate and jewels,
And all the furniture, that's portable.

Sir, when we lie in garrison, 'tis necessary
We keep a handsome port, for the king's honour.
And, do you hear ? let all your lady's wardrobe
Be safely placed in trunks ; they must along too.

Ser. Whither must they go, sir ?

Leon. To the wars, Lorenzo.

Ser. Must my mistress go, sir ?

Leon. Ay, your mistress, and you, and all must go.

I will not leave a turnspit behind me,
That has one dram of spleen against a Dutchman :

All must go.

Ser. Why Pedro, Vasco, Diego, come, help me, boys. [Exit.]

Juan. He has taken a brave way to save his honour,

And cross the duke ; now I shall love him dearly.
By the life of credit, thou art a noble gentleman.

Enter MARGARITTA, led by two Ladies.

Leon. Why, how now, wife ; what, sick at my preferment ?

This is not kindly done.

Mar. No sooner love ye,
Love ye entirely, sir, brought to consider
The goodness of your mind and mine own duty,
But lose you instantly, be divorced from ye !
This is a cruelty. I'll to the king,
And tell him 'tis unjust to part two souls,
Two minds so nearly mixed.

Leon. By no means, sweet-heart.

Mar. If he were married but four days, as I am—

Leon. He'd hang himself the fifth, or fly his country. [Aside.]

Mar. He'd make it treason for that tongue, that durst

But talk of war, or any thing to vex him.
You shall not go.

Leon. Indeed I must, sweet wife.

What, should I lose the king for a few kisses ?
We'll have enough.

Mar. I'll to the duke, my cousin ; he shall to the king.

Leon. He did me this great office ;
I thank his grace for it : should I pray him now
To undo it again ? Fie, 'twere a base discredit.

Mar. Would I were able, sir, to bear you company !

How willing should I be then, and how merry !
I will not live alone

Leon. Be in peace, you shall not.

[Knocking within.]

Mar. What knocking's this ? Oh, Heaven, my head ! Why, rascal,
I think the wars begun in the house already.

Leon. The preparation is, they are taking down

And packing up the hangings, plate and jewels,
And all those furnitures, that shall befit me,
When I lie in garrison.

Enter LORENZO.

Lor. Must the coach go too, sir ?

Leon. How will your lady pass to the sea else easily ?

We shall find shipping for't there to transport it.

Mar. I go ? Alas !

Leon. I'll have a main care of ye :

I know you are sickly ; he shall drive the easier,
And all accommodation shall attend ye.

Mar. Would I were able !

Leon. Come, I warrant ye.

Am not I with ye, sweet ? Are her clothes packed up,

And all her linen ? Give your maids direction :
You know my time's but short, and I'm commanded.

Mar. Let me have a nurse,
And all such necessary people with me ;
An easy bark.

Leon. It shall not trot, I warrant ye ;
Curvet it may sometimes.

Mar. I am with child, sir.

Leon. At four days warning ! This is something speedy.

Do you conceive as our jennets do, with a west wind?

My heir will be an errant fleet one, lady.

Mar. You must provide a cradle, and what a trouble's that!

Leon. The sea shall rock it;

'Tis the best nurse; 'twill roar and rock together,

A swinging storm will sing you such a lullaby!

Mar. Faith let me stay: I shall but shame you, sir.

Leon. An you were a thousand shames you shall along with me:

At home I'm sure you'd prove a million.

Every man carries the bundle of his sins

Upon his back: you are mine; I'll sweat for ye.

Enter Duke, ALONZO, and SANCHIO.

Duke. What, sir, preparing for your noble journey?

'Tis well, and full of care.

I saw your mind was wedded to the war,

And knew you'd prove some good man for your country;

Therefore, fair cousin, with your gentle pardon, I got this place. What, mourn at his advancement!

You are to blame; he'll come again, sweet cousin:

Meantime, like sad Penelope and sage,

Among your maids at home, and housewifely—

Leon. No, sir, I dare not leave her to that solitariness:

She's young, and grief or ill news from those quarters

May daily cross her: she shall go along, sir.

Duke. By no means, captain.

Leon. By all means, an't please ye.

Duke. What, take a young and tender-bodied lady,

And expose her to those dangers, and those tumults!

A sickly lady, too!

Leon. 'Twill make her well, sir;

There's no such friend to health as wholesome travel.

San. Away, it must not be.

Alon. It ought not, sir.

Go hurry her! It is not humane, captain.

Duke. I cannot blame her tears—Fright her with tempests,

With thunder of the war!

I dare swear, if she were able—

Leon. She's most able:

And, pray ye, swear not: she must go, there's no remedy:

Nor greatness, nor the trick you had to part us,

Which smells too rank, too open, too evident,

Shall hinder me. Had she but ten hours life,

Nay, less, but two hours, I would have her with me;

I would not leave her fame to so much ruin,

To such a desolation and discredit, as Her weakness and your hot will would work her to.

Fie, fie, for shame!

Enter PEREZ.

What mask is this now?

More tropes and figures to abuse my sufferance!

What cousin's this?

Juan. Michael Van Owle, how dost thou?

In what dark barn, or tod of aged ivy,

Hast thou lain hid?

Per. Things must both ebb and flow, colonel, And people must conceal and shine again.

You're welcome hither, as your friend may say, gentlemen;

A pretty house, ye see, handsomely seated, Sweet and convenient walks, the waters crystal.

Alon. He's certain mad.

Juan. As mad as a French tailor, that

Has nothing in his head but ends of fustians.

Per. I see you're packing now, my gentle cousin,

And my wife told me I should find it so;

'Tis true I do: you were merry, when I was last here:

But 'twas your will to try my patience, madam.

I'm sorry, that my swift occasions

Can let you take your pleasure here no longer;

Yet I would have you think, my honoured cousin,

This house, and all I have, are all your servants.

Leon. What house, what pleasure, sir? what do you mean?

Per. You hold the jest so stiff, 'twill prove discourteous.

This house I mean; the pleasures of this place.

Leon. And what of them?

Per. They're mine, sir, and you know it:

My wife's, I mean, and so conferred upon me.

The hangings, sir, I must entreat your servants,

That are so busy in their offices,

Again to minister to their right uses.

I shall take view of the plate anon, and furnitures,

That are of under place. You're merry still, cousin,

And of a pleasant constitution:

Men of great fortunes make their mirths ad placitum.

Leon. Pr'ythee, good stubborn wife, tell me directly:

Good evil wife, leave fooling, and tell me honestly,

Is this my kinsman?

Mar. I can tell ye nothing,

Leon. I've many kinsmen, but so mad a one,

And so fantastic—all the house?

Per. All mine.

And all within it. I will not bait you an ace on't.

Can't you receive a noble courtesy,

And quietly and handsomely as ye ought, coz,

But you must ride o' the top on't?

Leon. Canst thou fight?

Per. I'll tell ye presently: I could have done, sir.

Leon. For you must law and claw before ye get it.

Juan. Away, no quarrels.

Leon. Now I am more temperate, I'll have it prov'd, you were ne'er yet in bedlam; Never in love, for that's a lunacy; No great state left ye, that ye never looked for, Nor cannot manage, that's a rank distemper; That you were christened, and who answered for you.

And then I yield——Do but look at him.

Per. He has half persuaded me, I was bred i' the moon: I have ne'er a brush at my breech—Are not we both mad?

And is not this a fantastic house we are in, And all a dream we do? Will you walk out? And if I do not beat thee presently Into a sound belief as sense can give thee, Brick me into that wall there for a chimney-piece, And say, I was one of the Cæsars done by a seal-cutter.

Leon. I'll talk no more; come, we'll away immediately.

Mar. Why then the house is his, and all that's in it:

I'll give away my skin, but I'll undo ye: I gave it to his wife. You must restore, sir; And make a new provision.

Per. Am I mad, now, Or am I christened? You, my pagan cousin, My mighty Mahound kinsman, what quirk now? You shall be welcome all. I hope to see, sir, Your grace here, and my coz: we are all soldiers, And must do naturally for one another.

Duke. Are you blank at this? Then I must tell ye, sir, Ye've no command; now you may go at pleasure, And ride your ass troop. 'Twas a trick I used

To try your jealousy, upon entreaty, And saving of your wife.

Leon. All this not moves me, Nor stirs my gall, nor alters my affections. You have more furniture, more houses, lady, And rich ones, too; I will make bold with those; And you have land in the Indies, as I take it; Thither we'll go, and view awhile those climates, Visit your factors there, that may betray ye. 'Tis done; we must go.

Mar. Now thou'rt a brave gentleman; And, by this sacred light, I love thee dearly: Hark ye, sir;

The house is none of yours; I did but jest, sir; You are no coz of mine; I beseech ye, vanish. I tell you plain, you have no more right than he Has, that senseless thing. Your wife has once more fooled ye, sir.

Go ye and consider.

Leon. Good-morrow, my sweet Mahound cousin.

You are welcome—welcome all—my cousin too—We are soldiers, and should naturally do for one another.

Per. By this hand she dies for't, Or any man that speaks for her.

These are fine toys. [Exit PEREZ.

Mar. Let me request you stay but one poor month;

You shall have a commission, and I'll go, too. Give me but will so far.

Leon. Well, I will try ye.

Good-morrow to your grace; we've private business.

Duke. If I miss thee again, I'm an arrant bungler.

Juan. Thou shalt have my command, and I'll march under thee,

Nay, be thy boy, before thou shalt be baffled; Thou art so brave a fellow.

Alon. I have seen visions.

[Exit.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—MARGARITTA'S House.

Enter LEON, with a letter, and MARGARITTA.

Leon. Come hither, wife. Do you know this hand?

Mar. I do, sir; 'tis Estifania's, that was once my woman.

Leon. She writes to me here, that one Caca-fogo, As usuring jeweller's son, I know the rascal, Is mortally fallen in love with you.

Mar. He is a monster; deliver me from mountains.

Leon. Do you go a birding for all sorts of people?

And this evening will come to ye, and shew ye jewels,

And offers any thing to get access to you.

If I can make or sport or profit on him, (For he is fit for both) she bids me use him, And so I will. Be you conformable, and follow but my will.

Mar. I shall not fail, sir.

Leon. Will the duke come again, do you think?

Mar. No, sure, sir.

He has now no policy to bring him hither.

Leon. Nor bring you to him, if my wit hold, fair wife.

Let's in to dinner.

[Exit.

SCENE II.—A Street.Enter PEREZ.

Per. Had I but lungs enough to bawl sufficiently,
That all the queans in Christendom might hear me,
That men might run away from the contagion,
I had my wish. Would it were made high treason,
Most infinite high, for any man to marry;
I mean, for a man, that would live handsomely,
And like a gentleman, in's wits and credit.
What torments shall I put her to?
Cut her in pieces, every piece will live still,
And every morsel of her will do mischief.
They have so many lives, there's no hanging of them.
They are too light to drown, they're cork and feathers;
To burn too cold, they live like salamanders:
Under huge heaps of stones to bury her,
And so depress her as they did the giants?
She will move under more than built old Babel.
I must destroy her.

Enter CACAFOGO, with a casket.

Caca. Be cozened by a thing of clouts! a she moth,
That every silkman's shop breeds! To be cheated,
And of a thousand ducats, by a whim-wham!

Per. Who is he, that's cheated? Speak again, thou vision!
But art thou cheated? Minister some comfort.
Tell me, I conjure thee, art thou cheated bravely?

Come, prithee come; art thou so pure a coxcomb,
To be undone? Do not dissemble with me.

Caca. Then keep thy circle:
For I'm a spirit wild, that flies about thee;
And, whosoe'er thou art, if thou be'st human,
I'd let thee plainly know, I'm cheated damnably.

Per. Ha, ha, ha!

Caca. Dost thou laugh? Damnably, I say, most damnably.

Per. By whom, good spirit? Speak, speak! Ha, ha, ha!

Caca. I'll utter; laugh till thy lungs crack; by a rascal woman!
A lewd, abominable, and plain woman!
Dost thou laugh still?

Per. I must laugh; prithee pardon me, I shall laugh terribly.

Caca. I shall be angry,
Terribly angry; I have cause.

Per. That's it;
And 'tis no rension but thou shouldst be angry,
Angry at heart; yet I must laugh still at thee.
By a woman cheated! Art sure it was a woman?

Caca. I shall break thy head; my valour itches at thee.

Per. It is no matter. By a woman cozened,
A real woman!

Caca. By a real devil.
Plague of her jewels, and her copper chains,
How rank they swell!

Per. Sweet, cozened sir, let's see them.
I have been cheated, too; I would have you note that;

And lewdly cheated, by a woman also,
A scurvy woman. I am undone, sweet sir;
Therefore, I must have leave to laugh.

Caca. Pray ye, take it;
You are the merriest undone man in Europe.
What need we fiddles, bawdy songs, and sherry,
When our own miseries can make us merry?

Per. Ha, ha, ha!
I've seen these jewels: what a notable pennyworth

Have you had! You will not take, sir,
Some twenty ducats—

Caca. Thou'rt deceived; I will take—

Per. To clear your bargain, now.

Caca. I'll take some ten,
Some any thing, some half ten, half a ducat.

Per. An excellent lapidary set these stones,
sure:

D'ye mark their waters?

Caca. Quicksands choak their waters,
And her's that brought them, too! but I shall find her.

Per. And so shall I, I hope: but do not hurt her.

If you had need of cozening, as you may have,
(For such gross natures will desire it often;
'Tis, at sometimes too, a fine variety)
You cannot find, in all this kingdom,
A woman, that can cozen ye so neatly.
She has taken half mine anger off with this trick.

[Erit.]

Caca. If I were valiant now, I'd kill this fellow.

I've money enough lies by me, at a pinch,
To pay for twenty rascals' lives, that vex me.
I'll to this lady; there I shall be satisfied.

[Erit.]SCENE III.—A street.Enter PEREZ and ESTIFANIA, meeting.

Per. Why, how dar'st thou meet me again, thou rebel,
And know'st how thou hast used me thrice, thou rascal?

Were there not ways enough to fly my vengeance,

No holes nor vaults to hide thee from my fury,
But thou must meet me face to face to kill thee?
I would not seek thee to destroy thee willingly,
But now thou com'st to invite me, com'st upon me.

How like a sheep-biting rogue, taken in the manner,

And ready for a halter, dost thou look now?
Thou hast a hanging look, thou scurvy thing!
Hast ne'er a knife,
Nor e'er a string to lead thee to Elysium;
Be there no pitiful 'pothecaries in this town,
That have compassion upon wretched women,
That dare administer a dram of ratsbane,
But thou must fall to me?

Estif. I know you've mercy.

Per. If I had tons of mercy, thou deserv'st none.

What new tricks now a-foot, and what new houses

Have you in the air? What orchards in apparition?

What can'st thou say for thy life?

Estif. Little or nothing.

I know you'll kill me, and I know 'tis useless
To beg for mercy. Pray, let me draw my book out,

And pray a little.

Per. Do, a very little;

For I have a farther business than thy killing.

I have money yet to borrow. Speak when you are ready.

Estif. Now, now sir, now [Shews a pistol.
Come on. Do you start off from me?

Do you sweat, great captain? Have you seen a spirit?

Per. Do you wear guns?

Estif. I am a soldier's wife, sir,
And by that privilege I may be armed.

Now, what's the news? And let's discourse more friendly,

And talk of our affairs in peace.

Per. Let me see,

Prithee let me see thy gun; 'tis a very pretty one.

Estif. No, no, sir, you shall feel.

Per. Hold, hold, ye villain! what, would you
Kill your own husband?

Estif. Let mine own husband, then,
Be in his own wits. There, there's a thousand ducats.

Who must provide for you? And yet you'll kill me!

Per. I will not hurt thee for ten thousand millions.

Estif. When will you redeem your jewels? I have pawned them,

You see for what we must keep touch.

Per. I'll kiss thee;

And get as many more. I'll make thee famous.
Had we the house now!

Estif. Come along with me;

If that be vanished, there be more to hire, sir.

Per. I see I am an ass, when thou art near me. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—A chamber.

Enter LEON and MARGARITTA.

Leon. Come, we'll away unto your country house,
And there we'll learn to live contentedly.

This place is full of charge, and full of hurry;
No part of sweetness dwells about these cities.

Mar. Whither you will, I wait upon your pleasure;

Live in a hollow tree, sir, I'll live with ye.

Leon. Ay, now you strike a harmony, a true one,

When your obedience waits upon your husband.

Why, now I doat upon you, love ye dearly;

And my rough nature falls, like roaring streams,
Clearly and sweetly into your embraces.

Oh, what a jewel is a woman excellent,

A wise, a virtuous, and a noble woman!

When we meet such, we bear our stamps on both sides,

And through the world we hold our current virtues.

Alone, we are single medals, only faces,

And wear our fortunes out in useless shadows.

Command you now, and ease me of that trouble;
I'll be as humble to you as a servant.

Bid whom you please, invite your noble friends,

They shall be welcome all, now experience

Has bound you fast unto the chain of goodness.

[Clashing swords, a cry within—Down with their swords!]

What noise is this? what dismal cry?

Mar. 'Tis loud too.

Sure there's some mischief done in the street;
Look out there!

Leon. Look out, and help.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Oh, sir, the duke Medina——

Leon. What of the duke Medina?

Ser. Oh, sweet gentleman! he's almost slain!

Mar. Away, away, and help him!

All the house help. [Exit Servant.

Leon. How! slain? Why, Margaritta,

Wife, sure some new device they have afoot again,
Some trick upon my credit; I shall meet it.

I'd rather guide a ship imperial,

Alone, and in a storm, than rule one woman.

Enter DUKE, SANCHIO, ALONZO, and Servant.

Mar. How came you hurt, sir?

Duke. I fell out with my friend, the noble colonel.

My cause was naught, for 'twas about your honour;

And he, that wrongs the innocent, ne'er prospers,

And he has left me thus; for charity,

Lend me a bed to ease my tortured body,

That, ere I perish, I may shew my penitence.

I fear I'm slain.

Leon. Help, gentlemen, to carry him.

There shall be nothing in this house, my lord,
But as your own.

Duke. I thank ye, noble sir.

Leon. To bed with him; and, wife, give your attendance.

[Exeunt DUKE, SANCHIO, ALONZO, MARGARITTA, and servant.

Enter JUAN.

Leon. Afore me,
'Tis rarely counterfeited.

Juan. True, it is so, sir;
And take you heed this last blow do not spoil ye.
He is not hurt, only we made a scuffle,
As though we purposed anger: that same scratch
On's hand he took, to colour all, and draw compassion,
That he might get into your house more cunningly.

I must not stay; stand now, and you're a brave fellow,

Leon. I thank ye, noble colonel, and I honour ye.
Never be quiet? [Erit JUAN.

Enter MARGARITTA.

Mar. He's most desperate ill, sir;
I do not think these ten months will recover him.

Leon. Does he hire my house to play the fool
in,
Or does it stand on fairy ground? We're haunted.

Are all men and their wives troubled with dreams
thus?

Mar. What ail you, sir?

Leon. Nay, what ail you, sweet wife,
To put these daily pastimes on my patience?
What dost thou see in me, that I should suffer
this?

Mar. Alas, I pity ye.

Leon. Thou'lt make me angry;
Thou never saw'st me mad yet.

Mar. You are always;
You carry a kind of bedlam still about ye.

Leon. If thou pursuest me farther, I run stark mad.
If you have more hurt dukes, or gentlemen,
To lie here on your cure, I shall be desperate.
I know the trick, and you shall feel I know it;
Are ye so hot, that no hedge can contain ye?
I'll have thee let blood in all the veins about
thee;

I'll have thy thoughts found, too, and have them opened,
Thy spirits purged, for those are they that fire ye.
The maid shall be thy mistress, thou the maid,
And all her servile labours thou shalt reach at,
And go through cheerfully, or else sleep empty:
That maid shall lie by me, to teach you duty;
You in a pallet by, to humble ye,
And grieve for what you lose, thou foolish, wicked woman.

Mar. I've lost myself, sir,
And all that was my base self, disobedience:
[Kneels.

My wantonness, my stubbornness, I've lost too.
And now, by that pure good faith good wives are crowned with,

By your own nobleness——

Leon. Beware, beware——have you no fetch
now?

Mar. No, by my repentance, no.

Leon. And art thou truly, truly honest?

Mar. These tears will shew it.

Leon. I take you up, and wear you next my heart;
See you be worth it.

Enter ALTEA.

Now, what with you?

Alt. I come to tell my lady,
There is a fulsome fellow would fain speak with
her.

Leon. 'Tis Cacasogo; keep him from the duke,
The duke from him; anon he'll yield us laughter.

Alt. Where is it, please you, that we shall detain him?

He seems at war with reason, full of wine.

Leon. To the cellar with him; 'tis the drunkard's den,
Fit cover for such beasts. Should he be resty,
Say I am at home; unwieldy as he is,
He'll creep into an augre-hole to shun me.

Alt. I'll dispose him there. [Erit.

Leon. Now, Margaritta, comes your trial on:
The duke expects you; acquit yourself to him;
I put you to the test; you have my trust,
My confidence, my love.

Mar. I will deserve them. [Erit.

Leon. My work is done, and now my heart's at ease.

I read in every look, she means me fairly;
And nobly shall my love reward her for't.
He, who betrays his rights, the husband's rights,
To pride and wantonness; or who denies
Affection to the heart he has subdued,
Forfeits the claim to manhood and humanity.
[Erit.

SCENE V.—A chamber. Duke discovered in a night gown.

Duke. Why, now, this is most excellent invention.
I shall succeed, spite of this huffing husband.
I can but smile to think most wary spouses
The soonest are deceived.

Enter MARGARITTA.

Who's there, my love?

Mar. 'Tis I, my lord.

Duke. Are you alone, sweet friend?

Mar. Alone, and come to enquire how your wounds are.

Duke. I have none, lady; not a hurt about
me;

My damages I did but counterfeit,
And feigned the quarrel to enjoy you, lady.
I am as lusty, and as full of health,
As high in blood——

Mar. As low in blood, you mean :
Dishonest thoughts debase the greatest birth ;
The man, that acts unworthily, though ennobled,
Sells his honour.

Duke. Nay, nay, my Margaritta ;
Come to my couch, and there let's kiss love's language.

Mar. Would you take that, which I've no right to give ?

Steal wedlock's property ; and, in his house,
Beneath the roof of him, that entertains you,
Would you his wife betray ? Will you become
The ungrateful viper, who, restored to life,
Venomed the breast, which saved him ?

Duke. Leave these dull thoughts to mortifying penance ;

Let us, while love is lusty, prove its power.

Mar. Ill wishes, once, my lord, my mind de-based :

You found my weakness, wanted to ensnare it :
Shameful I own my fault, but 'tis repented.

No more the wanton Margaritta now,
But the chaste wife of Leon. His great merit,
His manly tenderness, his noble nature,
Commands from me affection in return,
Pure as esteem can offer. He has won me ;
I owe him all my heart.

Duke. Indeed, fair lady,
His jesting well becomes a sprightly beauty.
Love prompts to celebrate sublimer rights.
No more memento's ; let me press you to me,
And stifle with my kisses——

Mar. Nay, then, within, there !

Enter LEON, JEAN, ALONZO, and SANCHIO.

Leon. Did you call, my wife ? or you, my lord ?

Was it your grace that wanted me ? No answer !
How do you, my good lord ? What, out of bed !
Methinks you look but poorly on this matter.
Has my wife wounded you ? You were well before.

Duke. More hurt than ever ; spare your reproach ;
I feel too much already.

Leon. I see it, sir—and now your grace shall know,
I can as readily pardon as revenge.
Be comforted ; all is forgotten.

Duke. I thank you, sir.

Leon. Wife, you are a right one ;
And now, with unknown nations, I dare trust ye.

Juan. No more feigned fights, my lord ; they never prosper.

Enter LORENZO.

Lor. Please you, sir,
Ye cannot keep this gross fat man in order :

VOL. II.

He swears he'll have admittance to my lady,
And reels about, and clamours most outrageously.

Leon. Let him come up—wife, here's another suitor,

We forgot ; he has been sighing in the cellar,
Making my casks his mistresses.

Will your grace permit us to produce a rival ?

Duke. No more on that theme, I request, don Leon.

Leon. Here comes the porpus ; he's devilish drunk.

Let me stand by.

Enter CACAFOGO drunk.

Caca. Where is my bona roba ? Oh, you're all here. Why, I don't fear snap dragons—impoten-tial, powerfully potioned—I can drink with Hector, and beat him, too. Then, what care I for captains ! I'm full of Greek wine ; the true, an-tient courage. Sweet Mrs Margaritta, let me kiss thee—your kisses shall pay me for his kicking.

Leon. What would you ?

Caca. Sir !

Leon. Lead off the wretch.

Duke. Most filthy figure, truly.

Caca. Filthy ! Oh, you're a prince ; yet I can buy all of you, your wives and all.

Juan. Sleep, and be silent.

Caca. Speak you to your creditors, good captain half-pay ;
I'll not take thy pawn in.

Leon. Which of the butts is thy mistress ?

Caca. Butt in thy belly.

Leon. There are two in thine, I'm sure, it is grown so monstrous,

Caca. Butt in thy face.

Leon. Go, carry him to sleep ; [Exit CACA.
When he is sober, let him out to rail,
Or hang himself ; there will be no loss of him.

Enter PEREZ and ESTIFANIA.

Who's this ? my Mahound cousin ?

Per. Good sir, 'tis very good : would I had a house, too,

For there's no talking in the open air.
You have a pretty seat, you have the luck on't,
A pretty lady, too, I have missed both ;
My carpenter built in a mist, I thank him.

Do me the courtesy to let me see it,
See it once more. But I shall cry for anger.

I'll hire a chandler's shop close under ye,
And, for my foolery, sell soap and whip-cord.
Nay, if you do not laugh now, and laugh heartily,

You are a fool, coz.

Leon. I must laugh a little ;
And now I've done. Coz, thou shalt live with
me,

My merry coz ; the world shall not divorce us :

S

Thou art a valiant man, and thou shalt never want.

Will this content thee ?

Per. I'll cry, and then be thankful ;
Indeed I will, and I'll be honest to ye ;
I'd live a swallow here, I must confess.
Wife, I forgive thee all, if thou be honest,
And, at thy peril, I believe thee excellent.

Estif. If I prove otherwise, let me beg first.

Mar. Hold, this is yours, some recompense for service ;

Use it to nobler ends than he, that gave it.

Duke. And this is yours, your true commission, sir.

Now you're a captain.

Leon. You're a noble prince, sir ;
And now a soldier.

Juan. Sir, I shall wait upon you through all fortunes.

Alon. And I.

Alt. And I must needs attend my mistress.

Leon. Will you go, sister ?

Alt. Yes, indeed, good brother,

I have two ties, mine own blood, and my mistress.

Mar. Is she your sister ?

Leon. Yes, indeed, good wife,
And my best sister ; for she proved so, wench,
When she deceived you with a loving husband.

Alt. I would not deal so, truly, for a stranger.

Mar. Well, I could chide ye, but it must be lovingly,

And like a sister.

I'll bring you on your way, and feast ye nobly,
For now I have an honest heart to love ye,
And then deliver you to the blue Neptune.

Juan. Your colours you must wear, and wear them proudly,

Wear them before the bullet, and in blood, too.

And all the world shall know we're virtue's servants.

Duke. And all the world shall know, a noble mind

Makes women beautiful, and envy blind.

Leon. All you who mean to lead a happy life,
First learn to rule, and then to have a wife.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—MANLY'S lodgings.

MANLY enters in a morning gown, followed by LORD PLAUSIBLE.

MAN. PRAY, my lord, pray, my lord Plausible, give me leave! I have more of the mastiff than the spaniel in my nature; I own it; besides, I am too old now to learn to play tricks: I cannot fawn, and fetch and carry; neither will I ever practise that servile complaisance, which some people pique themselves on being masters of.

L. Plau. Well, but seriously, my dear friend, this is being singular; will you declare war against general custom; refuse to subscribe to the common forms of good breeding?

MAN. Forms indeed, my lord; they are mere forms, and therefore shall not sway me. In short, I will not, as your subscribers to forms do, whisper my contempt or hatred; call a man a fool, or knave, by signs, or mouths over his shoulder, while I have him in my arms.—I will not do as you do.

L. Plau. As I do!—Heaven defend me! upon my honour, I never attempted to abuse, or lessen any one in my life.

MAN. What! you were afraid!

L. Plau. No; but seriously I hate to do a rude thing.—No, faith, I speak well of all mankind.

MAN. I thought so; but know, that is the worst sort of detraction, for it takes away the reputation of the few good men in the world, by making all alike.—Now I speak ill of most men, because they deserve it.

L. Plau. Well, tell not me, my dear friend, what people deserve; I, like an author in a dedication, never speak well of a man for his sake, but my own: I will not disparage any one, to disparage myself: to speak ill of people behind their backs is not pretty, and to speak ill of them to their faces, would be the most monstrous thing in nature.

MAN. So that, if you was to say an unhand-some thing of any of your friends, I suppose you would chuse to do it behind their backs.

L. Plau. Oh certainly, certainly; I would do it behind their backs out of pure good manners.

Man. Very well, my lord: I have not leisure at present to examine into the propriety of your decorums: I confess, I am but an unpolished sea-fellow. But there is a favour, which, if your lordship would grant me—

L. Plau. A favour, dear sir! you make me the happiest man in the world; pray let me know how I have it in my power to serve you.

Man. No otherwise, my lord, than by leaving me a little to myself; at present, I am really unfit for company.

L. Plau. Perhaps you have business.

Man. If you have any, I would not detain your lordship.

L. Plau. Detain me! dear sir, I came on purpose to pay my respects to you: I heard of your arrival in town last night, and could not be easy. But be free with me; if my company is in the least disagreeable or inconvenient—

Man. I have told your lordship, already, I had rather be alone.

L. Plau. I will lay hold then of some other opportunity of paying my most humble respects to you; and in the mean time—

Enter OAKUM.

Man. Oakum! wait on his lordship down.

L. Plau. Sir, I am your most obedient.

Man. Good-bye to your lordship.

L. Plau. Your most faithful.

Man. Your servant, your servant.

L. Plau. And eternally—

Man. And eternal ceremony!—

L. Plau. You shall use no ceremony, by my life!

Man. I do not intend it.

L. Plau. Where are you going then?

Man. Zounds! to see you out of doors, that I may shut them against more welcomes.

[Exit MANLY and LORD PLAUSIBLE.]

Oak. Well said, bully-tar! He came alongside of his match, when he grappled with you, I can tell him that. Zounds, he makes no more of one of these fresh-water sparks, than a three-decker would of a bomb-boat! But he's as brave a heart as ever stept between stem and stern; and so's a sign, by his sinking our fine vessel the other day, rather than let her fall into the hands of the rascally French, when he found three or four of their piccaroons at once were too many for us. Let me see—'Tis just six weeks since we sailed out of Portsmouth harbour, and we had scarce been a month on our cruize, before we fell in with the enemy's squadron—Ah! we have made a base, broken, short voyage of it—Howsomever, he soon expects to be put into commission again, and I would go with him about the round world, if so be it was his destination; for, thof he's as crusty as any one sometimes, and will be obey'd, there's never a captain in the navy, that's a truer friend to a seaman—Avast though! He steers this way, in company of our merry lieutenant: 'tis foul weather, I doubt; I'll loof up, and get to windward of him.

[Retires.]

Enter MANLY and FREEMAN.

Free. But how the devil could you turn a man of his quality down stairs? You use a lord with very little ceremony it seems.

Man. A lord! What, you are one of those, who esteem men only by the value and marks, which fortune hath set upon them, and never consider intrinsic worth! but counterfeit honours will not be current with me; I weigh the man, not his title: it is not the king's inscription can make the metal better or heavier. Your lord is a leaden shilling, which you bend every way, and debases the stamp he bears, instead of being raised by it—And you, rascal, blockhead! didn't I order you to deny me to every body?

Oak. Yes, your honour; and so I would, but I was just stepped into the back-parlour to play a game at all-fours with our landlady's daughter; and, while we were wrangling about the cards, the little boy let the gentleman up, unknown to us.

Man. Well, be more careful for the future: stand at the stair-foot, and, at your peril, keep all that ask for me from coming up.

Oak. Must no one come up to you, sir?

Man. No man, sir.

Oak. A woman, an't like your honour?

Man. No woman, neither, you impertinent rascal.

Oak. Indeed, your honour, it will be hard for me to deny a woman any thing, since we are so newly come on shore: but I'll let no old woman come up to you.

Man. Would you be witty?—You become a jest as ill as you do a horse—Begone.

[Exit OAKUM.]

Free. Nay, let the poor rogue have his forecastle jests: a sailor cannot help them in a storm, scarce when a ship's sinking—But what, will you see nobody? not your friends?

Man. Friends! I have only one friend, and he, I hear, is not in town: nay, can have only one; for a true heart admits but of one friendship, as of one love. But in having found that friend, I have a thousand; for he has the courage of men in despair, yet the caution and diffidence of cowards; secrecy of the revengeful, and the constancy of martyrs; one fit to advise, to keep a secret, to fight, to die for his friend—But words are but weak testimonies of his merit, and my esteem: I have trusted him, in my absence, with the care of the woman I love; which is a charge of so tender, so delicate a nature—

Free. Well, but all your good thoughts are not for him alone, I hope! Pray, what do you think of me for a friend?

Man. Of you! Why you are a latitudinarian in friendship; that is, no friend; you will side with all mankind, but suffer for none; you are, indeed, like your lord Plausible, the pink of courtesy, and therefore have no friendship.

Free. No! that's very odd doctrine, indeed.

Man. Look you, I am so much your friend, that I would not deceive you; and therefore must tell you, not only because my heart is taken up, but according to your rules of friendship, I cannot be your friend.

Free. Why, pray?

Man. Because you will say, he, that is a true friend to a man, is a friend to all his friends; but you must excuse me; I cannot wish well to a pack of coxcombs, sharpers, and scoundrels, whom I have seen you treat, I know not how often, as the dearest friends in the world.

Free. What, I suppose you have observed me in the park, and at the coffee-house, doing the business of the several places! But could you really think I was a friend to all those I bowed to, shook hands with, and received in open arms?

Man. You told them you were; nay, and swore it, too; I heard you.

Free. Ay, but, when their backs were turned, did not I tell you the greater part of them were wretched, infamous fellows, whom I despised and hated?

Man. Very true; but what right had I to believe you spoke your heart to me, who professed deceiving so many?

Free. Nay, if you are such a precise adherer to matter of fact, it is in vain to argue with you; yet, surely, you would not have every man wear his opinion upon his sleeve, and find fault and quarrel with all, that he cannot in his conscience approve?

Man. I would have every man speak truth, and neither act the part of a sycophant or a coward.

Free. Yet, pray, sir, believe the friendship I offer you real, whatever I have professed to others—Try me at least.

Man. Why, what would you do for me? However, spare yourself the trouble of professing; for, go as far as you will—here comes one will say as much at least—

Enter FIDELIA, in men's clothes.

Don't you love me devilishly, too, my little volunteer? as well as he, or any man can?

Fide. Better than any man can love you, my dear captain: as well as you do truth and honour, sir: as well—

Man. Nay, good young gentleman, enough for shame! Sure you forget that I am an unsuccessful man; that I have met with nothing abroad, but losses and disappointments; and am like to find nothing at home but frowns and vexation! Why do you follow me, then, flatter my vanity now; since, so far from being able to befriend you, I stand in need of a patron myself?

Fide. I never followed reward or preferment, sir, but you alone; and, were you this instant to embark on the most hazardous expedition, I would cheerfully risk my life for the bare pleasure of serving with you.

Man. Nay, hold there, sir; did not I see you, during the engagement, more afraid—

Fide. Yet, do me justice, sir: when we took to our long-boat, on your giving orders to sink the ship, did I shew any signs of dread or weariness; though the waves broke over us on every side, and the night was so dark?—

Man. Ay, ay, you were in haste to get to land: the apprehension of death made you insensible of danger, and so you were valiant out of fear.

Fide. Well, sir, 'tis in vain for me to avow my sentiments, since you are determined not to believe me; but one day or other, perhaps—

Free. Poor lad! you bring tears into his eyes: consider his youth and inexperience, and make some allowances.

Man. What, does he cry?—No more, you milk-sop! Dry your eyes: I will never make you afraid again; for of all men, if I had occasion, you should not be my second; and when I return to sea—

Fide. You will not leave me behind?

Man. Leave you behind! Ay, ay; you are a hopeful youth for the shore only; you have a smock-face, and an officious readiness about you: you may get yourself recommended to some great man by flattering his valet-de-chambre; or, who knows, some liquorish old woman, or wanton young one, may take a fancy to you, allow you a conditional annuity, and make your fortune that way:

Fide. Sure, sir, you are industrious to find yourself reasons for an aversion to me: do you think, then, I am capable of being the despicable wretch, you describe?

Man. Why, don't I know you to be a coward, sir; a wretch capable of any thing?

Fide. Yet consider, sir; do not turn me off to beggary and ruin: when I came to you, I told you I was helpless and friendless.

Man. Very well, sir—I will provide you with half a score friends, which will help you a little: in the mean time, be gone; go! you will fare better in any place than with me.

Fide. I can fare well no where, lost as I am; I pursue happiness, but at every turn I meet complicated misery! [Aside.] [Erit.]

Enter OAKUM.

Oak. There's a woman below, an please your honour, who scolds and bustles to come up, as much as a seaman's widow at the navy-office; she says her name's Blackacre.

Man. That fiend!

Free. The widow Blackacre, that litigious she-pettifogger, who is at law and difference with all the world! I wish I could make her agree with me in a church. She hath three thousand pounds a-year jointure, and the care of her son; that is, the destruction of his estate.

Man. The lawyers, attornies, and solicitors, have three thousand pounds a-year, while she is content to be poor to make other people so ; for she is as vexatious as her father was, the great Norfolk attorney——

Free. Ay, the devil take him ! I am four hundred pounds a-year out of pocket by his knavish practices on an old aunt of mine ; though, indeed, there was suspicion of a false deed of conveyance ; I once had a design of suing the widow upon it, and something I will now think of seriously—but, hang her ! she wont pretend to know me !

Man. Go to her, can't you ? When she's in town, she lodges in one of the inns of court, where she breeds her son, and is herself his tutoress in law-French : but bid her come up ; she is Olivia's relation, and may make me amends for her visit by giving me some account of her.

Enter MRS BLACKACRE and JERRY.

Mrs Black. I never had so much trouble with a judge's door-keeper, as with yours : you should consider, captain Manly, this is term time, and folks have something else to do, besides waiting for admittance to people they have business with.

Man. Well, well, a truce with your exclamations, and tell me something about your cousin. How does Olivia ?

Mrs Black. Jerry, give me the subpoena.—It was by mere chance I heard of your being in town, and you are my chief witness : you can't imagine how my cause——

Man. Damn your cause ! when did you see Olivia ?

Mrs Black. I am no visitor, captain, but a woman of business : or, if ever I visit, 'tis only the Chancery-Lane ladies towards the law ; and none of your lazy, good for nothing, fashionable gill-flirts.—Many a fine estate has been lost in families for want of a notable stirring woman, to rummage among the writings : but come, sir, we have no time to lose ; and since you won't listen to me, I desire you may hear my son a little ; let him put our case to you ; for, if the trial comes on to-day, it will not be amiss to have your memory refreshed, and your judgment informed, lest you should give your evidence improperly.—Jerry !

Jer. What's the matter with you now ?

Mrs Black. Come, child, put our case to captain Manly.—Nay, don't hold down your head and look like a fool ; for you can do it very well, if you please.

Jer. I wish I may be hanged, if I ever knew such a woman as you are in my life ! I wonder you are not ashamed to make one an antic before strangers this way !

Mrs Black. Jerry, Jerry ! don't be perverse, but lay down the bags, and speak out, like a good child, when I bid you.—Lord, sir, it would do you good to hear him sometimes.—Why don't you begin ?

Jer. Psha ! you are always in such a hurry, there's no such thing as doing nothing for you—What case must I put ?

Mrs Black. Our case, that comes on to-day in the Common Pleas : you know well enough, but you will be stubborn ! Pray, captain, mark him.

Jer. Hem ! hem !—John a Stiles——

Man. You may talk, young lawyer, and put her case, if you think proper ; but I shall no more mind you than I would your mother, if I was in your case, when she bid me do a thing to make a fool of myself.

Jer. Look you there now ; I told you so.

Mrs Black. Never mind him, Jerry, he only says that to dash you : go on ! Bless my soul, I could hear our Jerry put cases all day !

Jer. John a Stiles—no—there are first, Fitz, Pere, and Ayle ; no, no, Ayle, Pere, and Fitz—Ayle is seized in fee of Blackacre ; John a Stiles disseizes the Ayle ; Ayle makes claim, and the disseisors die—Then the Ayle—no the Fitz——

Mrs Black. No, the Pere, sirrah !

Jer. Oh, the Pere—ay, the Pere, sir, and the Fitz—No, the Ayle—No, the Pere and the Fitz—

Man. Damn Pere, Ayle, and Fitz, sir !

Mrs Black. No, you are out, child. Take notice of me, captain—There are Ayle, Pere, and Fitz : Ayle is seized in fee of Blackacre ; and being so seized, John a Stiles disseizes the Ayle : Ayle makes claim, and the disseizor dies ; then the Pere enters.—The Pere, sirrah, the Pere !—And the Fitz enters upon the Pere ; and the Ayle brings his writ of disseizen in the post, and the Pere brings his writ of disseizen in the Pere, and——

Man. 'Sdeath, Freeman, can you listen to this stuff ?

Mrs Black. Hold, sir ! I must serve you [Gives a paper, which he throws away] ; you are required, sir, by this, to give your testimony——

Man. I'll be forsworn, to be revenged of you. [Erit.]

Mrs Black. Get you gone for an unmannerly fellow ! But the service is good in law ; so he must attend it at his peril.—Come, Jerry, I had almost forgot, we are to meet at the master's before eleven.—Let us mind our business still, child.

Jer. Well, and who hinders you ?

Free. Nay, madam, now I would beg you to hear me a little.—A little of my business.

Mrs Black. I have business of my own, sir, calls me away.

Free. My business would prove yours too, madam.

Mrs Black. What, 'tis no Westminster-hall business ! would you have my advice ?

Free. No, faith ; it is a little Westminster abbey business : I would have your consent.

Mrs Black. Fye, fye ! to me such language, sir ! and in the presence of my dear minor here.

Jer. Ay, ay, mother, he would be taking livery and seizen of your jointure, by digging the turf ;

but I'll watch his waters, and so you may tell him.
Come along. [Exeunt JERRY and Widow.]

Enter FIDELIA.

Fide. Dear Mr Freeman, speak to the captain for me.

Free. Where is he?

Fide. Within, sir.

Free. Sighing and meditating, I suppose, on his darling mistress—He would never trust me to see her; is she handsome?

Fide. I am not a proper judge.

Free. What is she?

Fide. A gentlewoman, I believe; but of as mean fortune as beauty. You know, sir, the captain made early choice of a sea life, to which the particularity of his disposition afterwards attached him. But, some time since, he determined to quit the navy; and, having conceived a violent passion for this lady, was about to marry, and retire with her into the country.

Free. And what prevented him?

Fide. The offer of a ship to go against the enemies of his country: however, when he came home again, the treaty was to be concluded; and in the mean time, he left his intended wife ten or twelve thousand pounds, lest any thing should happen to him, whilst he was abroad.

Free. He has left her in the care of some friend, has he not? Pray, do you know any thing of him?

Fide. Nothing further than that his name is Varnish; and he is a man, in whom the captain puts the greatest confidence.

Free. But if this Olivia be not handsome, what the devil can he see in her?

Fide. He imagines her, I suppose, the only woman of truth and sincerity in the world.

Free. No common beauties, I must confess—

Fide. But methinks he should have had more than common proofs of them, before he trusted the bulk of his fortune in her hands.

Free. Why, did he leave the sum you mention actually in her custody?

Fide. So I am told.

Free. Then he shewed love to her indeed—But I'll go plead with him for you, and learn something more of this wonderful fair one. [Exit.]

Fide. Was ever woman in so strange, so cruel a situation? As long as I have worn this disguise, I cannot look at myself without astonishment; but when I consider, that I have run such lengths for a man, who knows not that I love him, and, if he did know it, would certainly reject my passion—I am startled indeed. At the time I formed the bold resolution of going with him to sea, I was sensible his affections were engaged to another: Why, then, did I embark in so rash an adventure? because I loved; and love is apt to buoy itself up with false hopes; he left the object of his desires behind: he took me with him; and, from that favourable circumstance, I suffered myself to be cheated with a thousand fond imaginations—Here he comes, and I must avoid him. Oh, fortune, fortune! I have been indiscreet; yet surely I may be punished for my indiscretion with too great severity. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter MANLY, in his uniform, followed by FREEMAN.

Man. 'Sdeath! it is past eleven o'clock, and I should have been abroad before nine! But this comes of being pestered with a pack of impertinent visitors. Well, I am going out, and shall not return all day.

Free. What, I suppose you are going to pay your devoirs to some great man now?

Man. And why should you suppose that?

Free. Nay, faith, only because I think it is what you ought to do, and I know it is what those sort of people expect.

Man. Well, but if they expect it from me, they shall be disappointed. I have done nothing to be afraid of, that I need solicit their interest, by way of a screen; and I leave those to dance attendance, who are more supple, and can play the parasite better—If they want, let them come to me—No, I am going at present, where, I dare swear, I shall be a welcome guest; and where I ought to have gone last night, indeed; but I came to town too late for her regular hours.

Free. Oh! I guess where you mean; to the lady I have so often heard you talk of. Methinks I would give a good deal to see this phenomenon. She must needs be mistress of very extraordinary charms, to engage a person of your difficult disposition.

Man. The charms of her person, though in them she excels most of her sex, are her meanest beauties: her tongue, no more than her face, ever knew artifice: she is all sincerity; and hates the creeping, canting, hypocritical tribe, as I do; for which I love her, and I am sure she hates not me; for, as an instance of her inviolable attachment, when I was going to sea, and she found it impracticable to accompany me, she insisted upon my suffering her to swear, that, in my absence, she would not listen to the addresses of any other man; which oath—

Free. You thought she would keep!

Man. Yes; for I tell you she is not like the rest of her sex, but can keep her promise, though she has sworn it.

Free. Ha, ha, ha!

Man. You doubt it, then! Well, I shall be at her house in an hour; come to me there; the volunteer will shew you the way; and we'll try how long your infidelity will be able to resist conviction. [Exeunt.]

A C T II.

SCENE I.—A dressing room.

Enter OLIVIA, ELIZA, and LETTICE.

Oliv. Oh! horrid, abominable! Peace, cousin Eliza, or your discourse will be my aversion—But you cannot be in earnest, sure, when you say you like the filthy world!

Eliz. You cannot be in earnest, sure, when you say you dislike it? Come, come, cousin Olivia, I will never believe, that a place, which has such a variety of charms for other women, should have none for you! Pray, what do you think of dressing and fine clothes?

Oliv. Dressing! it is, of all things, my aversion: I hate dressing: and I declare solemnly—Mercy on us! Come hither, you dowdy—Heavens! what a figure you have made of my head to-day!—Oh, hideous! I can't bear it! Did you ever see any thing so frightful?

Eliz. Well enough, cousin, if dressing be your aversion.

Oliv. It is so; and for variety of rich clothes, they are more my aversion, Lett. That's because you wear them too long, Madam.

Oliv. Insatiable creature! I take my death I have not wore this gown above three times; and I have made up six or seven more within these two months.

Eliz. Then your aversion to them is not altogether so great.

Oliv. Alas! cousin, it is for my woman I wear them.

Eliz. But what do you think of visits—balls?

Oliv. Oh! I detest them!

Eliz. Of plays?

Oliv. I abominate them—Filthy, obscene, hideous things!

Eliz. What say you to the opera in winter, and to Ranelagh and Vauxhall in summer? or, if these want attractions to engage you, what say you to the court?

Oliv. The court, cousin! the court! my aversion! my aversion of all aversions!

Eliz. Well, but prithee—

Oliv. Nay, don't attempt to defend the court; for, if you do, you will make me rail against it.

Eliz. To come nearer to the point, then—pray, what think you of a rich young husband?

Oliv. Oh, rueful! marriage! What a pleasure you have found out! I nauseate the very thoughts of it.

Lett. Mayhap, ma'am, my lady would rather like a generous, handsome, young lover!

Oliv. What do mean, Mrs Impertinence, by talking such stuff in my hearing? A handsome young lover! A lover, indeed! I hate men of all things; and I declare solemnly I would not let one into my doors.

Enter Footboy.

Boy. Madam, here's the gentleman to wait on you.

Oliv. On me, you little blockhead! Do you know what you say?

Boy. Yes, ma'am, 'tis the gentleman, that comes every day to you.

Oliv. Hold your tongue, you little heedless animal, and get out of the room. This country boy, cousin, takes my music-master, mercer, and spruce milliner, for visitors. [NOVEL speaks within.]

Lett. No, madam, 'tis Mr Novel, I am sure, by his talking so loud; I know his voice, too, madam.

Oliv. You know nothing, you stupid creature! You would make my cousin believe I receive visits—However, if it be your Mr.—

Lett. Mr Novel, madam—

Oliv. Peace, will you! I'll hear no more of him—But if it be your Mr.—I cannot think of his name again—I supposed he followed my cousin hither.

Eliz. No, cousin, I will not rob you of the honour of the visit; it is to you, cousin, for I know him not.

Oliv. Nor I neither, upon my honour, cousin! Besides, have not I told you that visits, and the business of visits, flattery and detraction, are my aversion? Do you then think I would admit such a coxcomb as he; the scandal-carrier of the whole town! more impudently scurrilous than a party libeller, who abuses every person and every thing, and piques himself upon his talents for ridicule!

Eliz. I find you know him, cousin; at least have heard of him.

Oliv. Yes, now I remember, I have heard of him.

Eliz. Well, but if he is such a dangerous coxcomb, for heaven's sake let him not come up! tell him, Mrs Lettice, your lady is not at home.

Oliv. No, Lettice, tell him my cousin is here, and that he may come up: for, notwithstanding I detest the sight of him, you may like his conversation; and I will not be rude to you in my own house. Since he has followed you hither, let him come up, I say.

Eliz. Very fine! Let him go and be hanged, I say, for me! I know him not, nor desire it.—Send him away, Mrs Lettice. [Exit LETTICE.]

Oliv. Upon my word, she shall not; I must disobey your commands, to comply with your desires. Mr Novel! Mr Novel!

Enter NOVEL.

Nov. I beg ten thousand pardons, madam! perhaps you are busy; I did not know you had company.

Eliz. Yet he comes to me, cousin.

Oliv. Chairs there! Pray, sir, be seated.

Nov. I should have waited on you yesterday evening, according to appointment; but I dined at a place, where there is always such a profusion of good cheer, and so hearty a welcome, that one can never get away, while one has either appetite or patience left—You know that surfeiting piece of hospitality, lady Autumn? Ha, ha, ha! the nauseous old fury at the upper end of her table——

Oliv. Revives the ancient Grecian custom of serving up a death's head with their banquets! Oh, God! I detest her hollow cherry cheeks!—She looks like an old coach new painted, affecting an unseemly smugness, while she is ready to drop in pieces.

Nov. Excellent and admirable simile upon my soul! But do, madam, give me leave to paint her out to you a little, because I am intimately acquainted with the family. You must know she is horridly angry, if I don't dine at her house three times a-week.

Oliv. Nay, for that matter, any one is welcome to partake of her victuals, who will be content to listen to her stories of herself, when she was a young woman, and used to go with her fat Flanders mares, in her father's great gilt chariot, to take the air in Hyde Park. Oh, cousin! I must tell you——

Nov. What, Madam! I thought I was going to tell the lady; but, perhaps, you think nobody has wit enough to draw characters but yourself; in which case, I have done.

Oliv. Nay, I swear, you shall tell us who you had there at dinner.

Nov. With all my heart, madam, if you will condescend to listen to me.

Oliv. Most patiently, sir: pray speak.

Nov. In the first place, then, we had her daughter, whom, I suppose, you have seen.

Oliv. Seen! oh, I see her now! the very disgrace to good clothes, which she always wears to heighten her deformity, not mend it; for she is still most splendidly, gallantly ugly! and looks like an ill piece of daubing in a rich frame.

Nov. Very well, madam! Have you done with her? And can you spare her a little to me?

Oliv. If you please, sir.

Nov. In my opinion, she is like——

Oliv. She is, you would observe, like a great city bride; the greater fortune, but not the greater beauty, for her dress.

Nov. Yet have you done, madam?

Oliv. Pray, sir, proceed.

Nov. Then, she——

Oliv. I was just going to say so—she——

Eliz. I find, cousin, one may have a collection of all one's acquaintance's pictures at your house, as well as at sir Joshua Reynolds's, with this difference only, that his are handsome likenesses; to say the truth, you are the first of the profession of portrait-painters I ever knew without flattery.

Oliv. I draw from the life, cousin; paint every one in their proper colours.

Eliz. Oh! cousin, I perceive you hate detraction!

Oliv. But, Mr Novel, who had you besides at dinner?

Nov. Ladies, I wish you a good morning!

Oliv. 'Psha! how can you be so provoking? Nay, I take my death you shall not go, till you tell us the rest of the company! [Stopping NOVEL who rises.] Come, sit down again: I long to hear who your men were; for I am sure I am acquainted with some of them.

Nov. We had no men there at all, madam.

Oliv. What! was not sir Marmaduke Gimcrack with you? I'll lay fifty pounds on it! for I know he is courting one of her ladyship's crooked nieces.

Nov. Pray, ma'am, let me go.

Oliv. Nay, I know another of your company, I hold you a wager of it. Come, my lord Plausible dined with you, too, who is, cousin——

Eliz. You need not tell me what he is, cousin; for I know him to be a civil, good-natured gentleman, who talks well of all the world, and is never out of humour.

Oliv. Hold, cousin! I hate detraction: but I must tell you he is a tiresome, insipid coxcomb, without either sense to see faults, or wit to expose them; in fine, he is of all things my aversion, and I never admit his visits beyond my hall.

Nov. No! he visit you! damn him! he's never admitted to any one but worn-out dowagers, and superannuated maidens, who want to be flattered into conceit with themselves; he has often strove to scrape acquaintance with me, but I always took care——

Enter LORD PLAUSIBLE.

Ha! my dear, my dear lord! let me embrace you.

Eliz. Well, this is pleasant!

L. Plau. Your most faithful, humble servant, generous Mr Novel; and, madam, I am your eternal slave, and kiss your fair hands, which I had done sooner, according to your orders——

Oliv. No excuses, my lord, I know you must divide yourself; your company is too general a good to be engrossed by any particular friend.

Eliz. You hate flattery, cousin!

L. Plau. Oh lord, madam! my company! your most obliged, faithful, humble servant! But I might have brought you good company, indeed; for I parted just now at your door with two of the most sensible, worthy men——

Oliv. Who are they, my lord?

Nov. Who do you call the most sensible, worthy men?

L. Plau. Oh, sir, two of the brightest characters of the present age; men of such honour and virtue. Perhaps, you may know them—Count Levant, and sir Richard Court-Title.

Nov. Court-Title! ha! ha! ha!

Oliv. And count Levant! How can you keep such a wretch company, my lord?

L. Plau. Oh seriously, madam, you are too severe: he is highly carest by every body.

Oliv. Carest, my lord! why he was never three times in company in his life, without being twice kicked out of it.

Nov. And for sir Richard!

L. Plau. He is nice in his connections, and loves to chuse those he converses with.

Oliv. He loves a lord, indeed——

Nov. Or any thing with a title——

Oliv. Though he borrows his money, and never pays him again. Nay, he carries his passion for quality so far, that they say the creature has an intrigue among them; and half starves his poor wife and family, by keeping a correspondence with that overgrown piece of right honourable filthiness, lady Bab Clumsey.

L. Plau. Oh, madam, he frequents her house because it is the tabernacle-gallant, the meeting-house for all the fine ladies and people of fashion about town.

Nov. Mighty fine ladies! There is first——

Oliv. Her honour, as fat as a hostess!

L. Plau. She is somewhat plump, indeed! a woman of a noble and majestic presence.

Nov. Then there's Miss what dye call her——

Oliv. As sluttish and slatternly as an Irish woman bred in France.

L. Plau. She has a prodigious fund of wit; and the handsomest heel, elbow, and tip of an ear, you ever saw.

Nov. Heel and elbow! Ha, ha, ha!

Eliz. I find you see all faults with lover's eyes, my lord!

L. Plau. Oh, Madam, your most obliged, faithful, very humble servant, to command!

Nov. Pray, my lord, are you acquainted with lady Sarah Dawdle?

L. Plau. Yes, sure, sir, very well, and extremely proud I am of the great honour; for she is a person whose wit, beauty, and conduct, nobody can call in question.

Oliv. No!

Nov. No! pray, madam, let me speak.

Oliv. In the first place, can any one be called handsome that squints?

L. Plau. Her eyes languish a little, I own.

Nov. Languish! ha, ha, ha!

Oliv. Languish!

Eliz. Well, this is to be borne no longer: cousin, I have some visits to make this morning, and will take my leave.

Oliv. You will not, sure! nay, you shall not venture my reputation, by leaving me with two men here. You'll disoblige me for ever——

Eliz. If I stay! your servant.

[Erit.

MANLY and footboy speak within.

Man. Not at home! Not see me! I tell you she is at home, and she will see me——let her know my name is Manly.

Boy. Well, but your honour, my lady's sick, I dare not go to her.

Man. Well, then, I'll go to her.

Boy. Help, Mrs Lettice! help! here's the sea gentleman!

Oliv. What noise is that?

Enter MANLY.

Man. My Olivia! 'Sdeath, what do I see! In close conversation with these!

Oliv. Ha, Manly! this is somewhat unexpected: however, I am prepared for him. [Aside

L. Plau. Most noble and heroic captain, your most obliged, faithful, very humble——

Nov. Captain Manly, your servant.

Man. Away! Madam——

Oliv. Sir!

Man. It seems, madam, as if I was an unwelcome guest here: your footboy would hardly allow me admittance; at first he told me you were not at home. Indeed, I did not expect to find you in such good company.

Oliv. I suppose, sir, my servant had orders for what he did.

L. Plau. Perhaps, madam, Mr Novel and I incommode you; the captain and you may have something to say, so we'll retire.

Oliv. Upon my honour, my lord, you shan't stir; the captain and I have nothing to say to one another, assure yourself, nor ever shall: 'tis only one of his mad freaks, for which you will make allowances; salt-water lovers, you know, will be boisterous now and then.

Man. Confusion!

Nov. We shall have a quarrel here presently: I see she's going to use him damnably.

Man. What am I to think of this behaviour, Madam?

Oliv. Even what you please, good captain.

Man. And is this the reception I meet with after an absence——

Oliv. And is this behaving like a gentleman, to force into a lady's apartment contrary to her inclinations? I suppose it is Wapping breeding: however, you are fitted for your ill manners.

Man. I am fitted for believing you could not be fickle, though you were young; could not dissemble love, though it was for your interest; nor be vain, though you were handsome; nor break your promise, though to a parting lover. But I take not your contempt of me worse than your keeping company with and encouraging these things here.

Nov. Things!

L. Plau. Let the captain rally a little.

Man. Yes, things. Dare you be angry, you thing?

Noc. No, since my lord says you speak in rail-lery.

Man. And pray, madam, let me ask you, what is it you find about them to entertain you? For example, this spark here: is it the merit of his fashionable impudence, the briskness of his noise, the wit of his laugh, or his judgment and fancy in his solitaire, that engages your esteem?

Noc. Very well, sir! Egad, these captains of ships—

Man. Then, for this gentle piece of tame courtesy—

Oliv. Good, jealous captain, no more of your—

L. Pleu. No, madam, let him go on; for, perhaps, he may make you laugh; and I would contribute to your pleasure any way.

Man. Obliging coxcomb!

Oliv. No, noble captain, you cannot think any thing would tempt me more than that heroic title of yours, captain! for you know we women love honour inordinately.

Noc. Ha, ha, ha! I cannot hold; I must laugh at you, faith, Mr Manly!

L. Pleu. And i'faith, dear captain, I beg your pardon, and leave to laugh at you, too; though I protest I mean you no hurt—

Man. Peace, you buffoons! And be not you vain, that these laugh on your side; for they will laugh at their own dull jests: but no more of them; for I will only now suffer this lady to be witty.

Oliv. You would not have your panegyric interrupted! I go on, then, to your honour. Is there any thing more agreeable than the pretty oddity of that? Then the greatness of your courage! which most of all appears in your spirit of contradiction: for you dare give all mankind the lie; and your opinion is your only mistress; for you renounce that, too, when it becomes another man's.

L. Pleu. Ha, ha, ha!

Noc. Ha, ha, ha!

Man. Why, you impudent, pitiful wretches!
You presume, sure, upon your effeminacy, to urge me; for you are all things so like women, it might be thought cowardice to chastise you.

Oliv. No hectoring, good captain!

Man. Or, perhaps, you think this lady's presence secures you; but have a care; she hath talked herself out of all the respect I had for her;
and, by using me ill before you, hath given me a privilege of using you so before her—therefore, begone immediately!

Noc. Begone! what!

L. Pleu. Nay, worthy, noble, generous captain!—

Man. Begone, I say!

Noc. Well, Madam, we'll step into the next room; you will not stay long with him I suppose.
Fal, la! [Exeunt LORD PLAUSIBLE and NOVEL.]

Oliv. Turn hither your rage, good captain

Swagger-huff! and be saucy with your mistress, like a true captain; but be civil to your rivals and betters; and do not threaten any thing but me here; no, not so much as my windows: do not think yourself in the lodgings of one of your suburb mistresses beyond the tower.

Man. Do not you give me the cause to think so! for those less infamous women part with their lovers, just as you did from me, with unforced vows of constancy, and floods of willing tears; but the same winds bear away their lovers and their vows; and for their griefs, if the credulous, unexpected fools return, they find new comforters, such as I found here; the mercenary love of these women, too, suffers shipwreck with their lovers' fortune: you have heard, that chance has used me indifferently, and you do so too. Well, persevere in your ingratitude, falsehood, and disdain; be constant in something; and I promise to be as just to your real scorn, as I was to your feigned love;
and henceforward despise, loath, and detest you most faithfully.

Oliv. I'll wait upon you again in a minute.

[Erit.]

Enter FIDELIA and FREEMAN.

Free. How now, captain!

Man. Pray keep out of my way; dont speak
to me.

Fide. Dear sir, what's the matter?

Man. Blockhead! Oh, Freeman! I have been so cheated, so abused, by this perfidious—

Free. Nay, sir, you need not tell us, for we have been for some time within hearing in the next room. But now, I hope, you will act as becomes you.

Man. I hope so, too.

Fide. Do you but hope it, sir?

Man. She has restored my reason with my heart.

Free. But there are other things, captain, which, next to a man's heart, he would not part with, and, methinks, she ought to restore, too; I mean your money and jewels, sir; which, I understand, she has.

Man. What's that to you, sir?

Free. Pardon me; whatever belongs to you, I have a share in, I am sure, which I will not lose for want of asking; though you may be too generous, or too angry, now, to do it yourself.

Fide. Nay, then I'll make bold, too—

Man. Hold, you impertinent, officious—how have I been deceived!

Enter OLIVIA.

Free. Madam, excuse this liberty—but we are captain Manly's friends, and have accidentally been witnesses to your disagreement.

Oliv. And what am I to infer from thence, sir?

Free. Why, then, Madam, there are certain appurtenances to a lover's heart, called jewels, which always go along with it.

Fide. And with lovers, madam, have no value, but from the heart they come with—our captain's, it seems, you scorn to keep; much more those worthless things without it, I am confident.

Oliv. I understand you, gentlemen. Captain, your young friend, here, has a very persuading face, I must confess; but you might have asked me yourself for those trifles you left with me, which—bark you a little—for I dare trust you with a secret, you are a man of so much honour I am sure—I say, then, considering the chance of war, the danger of the seas, and being in doubt whether you might ever return again, I have delivered your jewels and money to——

Man. Whom?

Oliv. My husband.

Man. Your husband!

Oliv. Aye, my husband. For, since you could leave me, I am lately and privately married to one, who is a man of so much honour and experience, that I dare not ask him for your things again, to restore them to you, lest he should conclude you never would have parted with them to me on any other score than the exchange of my virtue; which, rather than you would bring into suspicion——

Man. Triumphant impudence! Married!

Oliv. There's no resisting one's destiny, or love, you know.

Man. Damnation!

Oliv. Oh, don't swear! 'Tis true, my husband is now absent in the country; however, he returns shortly; therefore I beg, for your own ease and quiet, and my reputation, you will never see me more.

Man. I wish I never had seen you!

Oliv. You may perceive, by this, how great a dependance I have upon your friendship: I am sensible every man might not be talked to in the same manner; but your uncommon delicacy of thinking will, I am sure, feel for a person in my nice circumstances.

Man. True, perfect woman! and if I could say any thing more injurious to you I would—Leave me; go! lest I should be tempted to do something, which may hereafter make me think as meanly of myself, as I do now of you.

Oliv. Sir, it is a maxim with me never to stay in any place, where my company is disagreeable: I obey you with all willingness—young gentleman, your servant.

[Exit OLIVIA.]

Enter Footboy.

Boy. Here are Madam Blackacre, and Major Oldfox, to wait on my lady.

Man. Do you hear that? Let's be gone before he comes.

Free. Excuse me; the widow is the very game I have in view; I wanted just such an opportunity to attack her—and, if you will take my advice, you'll stay too; if it be only to see this major Oldfox, her supernumerary 'squire, her occasional gentleman usher: he is a character, I assure you.

Man. No; confound him, he is as bad as the cockatrice herself, whom I would avoid as a sinking ship, and the whole sex, for ever.

[Exit with FIDELIA.]

Enter MRS BLACKACRE, JERRY, and MAJOR OLDFOX.

Mrs Black. 'Tis an arrant sea-ruffian! I thought he would have pushed us down, major. Jerry, where's my paper of memorandums? Give it me. So! where's my cousin Olivia, now—my kind relation?

Free. Here's one that would be your kind relation, madam.

Mrs Black. Hey day! who is this wild rude fellow?

Jer. Why, don't you know him? It's the man, that wanted to fall aboard you at Captain Manly's this morning.

Old. Pray be civil to the lady, Mr ——, she is a person of quality—a person, that is, no person——

Free. Yes, but she is a person, that is, a widow. Be you civil to her; because you are to pretend only to be her 'squire, to arm her to her lawyer's chambers: but I will be impudent and forward; for she must love and marry me.

Mrs Black. Marry come up; you saucy, familiar puppy! Marry you! God forgive me! now-a-days, every idle young rascal, with a laced waistcoat, and a bit of black ribbon in his hat, thinks to carry away any widow of the best degree.

Old. No, no, soft! you are a young man, and not fit; besides, others have laid in their claims before you.

Free. Not you, I hope!

Old. Why, not I, sir? Sure I am a much more proportionable match for her than you, sir; I, who am a person of rank and means in the world, and of equal years——

Mrs Black. How's that? you unmannerly—I would have you to know I was born in an. scun Georgii prim——

Old. Your pardon, madam, your pardon; be not offended—but I say, sir, you are a beggarly younger brother; twenty years younger than she; without any land or stock, but your great stock of impudence: therefore, what pretensions can you have to her?

Mrs Black. And what pretensions have you, major? Go and solicit a brevet for Chelsea Hospital, you old mummy! Air yourself there under the cloisters; smoke your pipe, and make love to your laundress: you shall have a widow with three thousand pounds a year, you shall, you barbarous brute!

Old. How, madam!

Free. Ha, ha, ha!

Jer. Well said, mother! use all suitors thus for my sake.

Mrs Black. A senseless, impertinent, quibbling, scribbling, feeble, paralytic, conceited, ridiculous, pretending, old bellweather!

Jer. Hey! brave mother for calling names!

Mrs Black. Would you make a caudle-maker, a nurse of me? Can't you be bed-rid without a bed-fellow? Won't your swan-skins, furs, flannels, and the scorched trencher, keep you warm there? Would you make me your Scotch warming pan, with a plague to you!

Jer. Ay, you old fobus, and you would be my guardian, would you? to take care of my estate, that half of it should never come to me, by letting leases at pepper-corn rents?

Mrs Black. If I would have married an old man, it is well known I might have married an earl. Nay, what's more, a judge, and been covered the winter nights with the lamb-skins, which I prefer to the ermines of nobles. And do you think I would wrong my poor minor here, for you?

Free. Your minor is a chopping minor; Heaven bless him!

Old. Your minor may be a major of horse or foot for his bigness: and it seems you will have the cheating of your minor yourself.

Mrs Black. Pray, sir, bear witness: cheat my minor! I'll bring my action of the case, for the slander.

Free. Nay, I would bear false witness for you now, widow, since you have done me justice, and thought me the fitter man!

Mrs Black. Fair and softly, sir! 'tis my minor's case more than my own: and now I must do him justice on you. And, first, you are, to my knowledge—for I am not unacquainted with you—a debauched, drunken, hectoring, lewd, gaming, spend-thrift.

Jer. There's for you, bully-rock!

Mrs Black. A worn-out rake at five-and-twenty, both in body and estate: a cheating, lying, cozening, impudent fortune-hunter! and would patch up your own broken income with the ruins of my jointure.

Jer. Ay, and make havock of our estate personal, and of all our gilt plate—I should soon be picking up our silver-handled knives and forks, spoons, mugs, and tankards, at most of the pawnbrokers' between the Hercules pillars and the boatswain at Wapping. And you would be scouring among my trees, and making them play at loggerheads, would you?

Mrs Black. I would have you to know, you pitiful, paltry, lath-backed fellow, if I would have married a young man, it is well known I might have had any young heir in Norfolk; nay, the hopefulest young man this day at the King's Bench bar! I, that am a relict, and executrix of known plentiful assets and parts, who understand myself and the law; and would you have me under covert baron again? No, sir, no covert baron for me.

Free. Well; but, dear madam——

Mrs Black. Fie, fie! I neglect my business with this foolish discourse of love!—Jerry, child, let me see a list of the jury; I am sure my cousin Olivia must have some acquaintance among them: But where is she?

Free. Will you not allow me one word, then?

Mrs Black. No, no, sir; have done, pray.

Old. Ay, pray, sir, have done, and don't be troublesome; since you see the lady has no occasion for you, though you are a younger brother. Ha, ha, ha! [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A view of St James's Park.

MANLY enters alone, musing.

How irksome is restraint to a mind naturally averse to hypocrisy! Yet I, who used to give birth to my thoughts as freely as I conceived them; I, who was wont to speak without reserve to every body; am now endeavouring even to deceive myself. That ungrateful woman, in whom I placed such unlimited confidence! into whose keeping I had given my heart, my judgment, nay, my very senses! 'Sdeath! had a man treated me ill, resentment would at once have cancelled regard, and revenge have prevented vexation; but here, I am obliged to side with my enemy, and increase the injuries she hath done me, by loving her in spite of them.

Enter FIDELIA.

Fide. Sir, have I liberty to speak to you?

Man. What would you say? You see this is no place to talk in; don't trouble me now.

Fide. I shall not detain you long, sir; and you may bear to hear two or three words from me, though you do hate me, as you have often said.

Man. I must confess I hate a flatterer: why will you not learn to be a man, and scorn that mean, that sneaking vice?

Fide. Perhaps I am to blame, sir; but I do not come to offend you at present—I have something to tell you, if you will vouchsafe to listen to me. Who do you think I met on the other side of the park just now, sir?

Man. Nay, how should I know? Prithee, kind impertinence, leave me. You are as hard to shake off, as that obstinate, effeminate mischief, love.

Fide. Love, sir!—did you name love?

Man. No, no! Prithee away! Begone!—I had almost discovered my shame, my weakness; which must draw on me the derision even of this boy.

Fide. There is something, sir, that makes you uneasy: am I not worthy to be acquainted with the cause?

Man. What cause, child? Nothing makes me uneasy; a little involuntary thoughtfulness, that's all. But you say you met somebody in the park just now; who was it?

Fide. Why, really, sir, on second thoughts, I don't know how to mention her name to you; but it was that creature, that wretch, that—

Man. That who? Who is it you are going to speak of now, that you preface your discourse with all this bitterness of invective?

Fide. Why, sir, that monster of ingratitude, Olivia!

Man. Olivia!

Fide. Yes, sir.

Man. Well, and how?

Fide. Nay, not much, sir; only she called me over to her as I was crossing the Mall, and would feign have had me gone home to her house, where she had something to communicate; but, for my part, I could hardly bear to look at her, much less afford her an opportunity for conversation.—Pray, sir, don't you think she has a most forbidding countenance?

Man. I cannot say I ever observed it.

Fide. Then her shape is by no means one of the best.

Man. Indeed!

Fide. But I hope, sir, your eyes are now as open to her deformities, as they must be to her perfidiousness; and that you will never think of her any more.—But why do I mention that?—You never can think of her without bringing your good sense, nay, your reputation, in question: for after such unworthy, such infamous usage—

Man. Confusion! Who told you, sir, she had used me ill?

Fide. Why, sir, was not I witness?

Man. 'Sdeath, sirrah, if ever I hear you mutter such a word again, I'll shake you into atoms! How am I exposed and rendered contemptible? It is enough, that I think I have nothing to complain of. I am perfectly well satisfied with her conduct.—Do you mark!—perfectly well satisfied.

Fide. Very well, sir, I have done.

Man. Oh, the curse of being conscious of a weakness one is ashamed to divulge! Hold, sir! Come hither. Have you resolution enough to endure the torture of a secret; for such to some is insupportable.

Fide. I would keep it as safe as if your dear precious life depended upon it.

Man. It concerns more than my life—my honour.

Fide. Doubt me not, sir.

Man. And do not discover it by too much fear of discovering—Do ye mark?—But, above all things, take care, that Freeman find it not out.

Fide. I warrant you, sir.

Man. Then, know, I love Olivia; doat on her: her ingratitude and disdain, like oil thrown into the flames, have made my passion burn the fiercer.

Fide. Oh, Heavens!

Man. You say she met you just now, and wanted you to go home with her, in order to communicate something: who knows what that might be?—Perhaps she hath repented her behaviour this morning—Perhaps it was the result of passion, of affectation, or was meant to try me: in short, I can assign a thousand reasons for it, besides that one of change in her affections; for, I am sure, once she loved me.

Fide. Hang her, dissembling creature! Love you! It was only for her interest, then.

Man. Well, well, no matter; but, I tell you, I know better: I am sure once she did love me.

Fide. Indeed, sir, she never cared for you.

Man. Will you have done, sir!

Fide. Besides, sir, did she not tell you, she was married?

Man. Well, well, but that might be artifice, too—'Sdeath, sir! will you listen to me, or go about your business, and never let me see you more?

Fide. I beg pardon, sir.

Man. I say you shall go to her house, and hear what this business is.

Fide. I go to her house, sir? I would sooner go—

Man. No hesitating, sir! I say you must: she lives but in the next street.

Fide. Indeed, sir, I cannot go there.

Man. No, sir!

Fide. Besides, sir, consider: you scorned her this morning.

Man. I know not what I did this morning: I dissembled this morning.—What! are you not gone yet?

Fide. Well, sir, now I think on it, I will go: for, perhaps, this is a sting of conscience; and she hath a mind to make some recompense for her ill usage of you, by returning your money and jewels: methinks I feign would have them out of her hands.

Man. Stay, sir; if she drops the least hint of any such thing, I charge you, come away immediately, and do not stay even to give her an answer.

Fide. Well, but, dear sir, only let me speak one word—

Man. I will not hear a syllable: you will find me in Westminster-hall: begone!

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—Westminster-hall—A crowd of people, serjeants, counsellors, and attorneys, walking busily about.

Enter Mrs BLACKACRE in the middle of half a dozen lawyers, JERRY following, with a green bag.

Mrs Black. Offer me a reference, you saucy Noddhead! Do you know who you speak to? Are you a solicitor in chancery, and offer a reference? Mr Serjeant Plodden, here is a fellow has the impudence to offer me a reference!

Plod. Who is that has the impudence to offer a reference within these walls?

Mrs Black. Nay, for a splitter of causes to do it!

Plod. No, madam; to a lady, learned in the law as you are, the offer of a reference were to impose upon you.

Mrs Black. No, never fear me for a reference, Mr Serjeant—But come, have not you forgot your brief? Are you sure you shall not make the mistake of—Hark you—

Enter MAJOR OLDFOX and Bookseller.

—Come, Mr Splitcause, pray go see, when my cause in chancery comes on; and go speak with Mr Quillet in the King's Bench, and Mr Quirk in the Common Pleas, and see how matters go there.

Old. Madam, I have the pleasure to bid you good-morrow once again; and may all your causes go as prosperously as if I myself was to be the judge of them!

Mrs Black. Sir, excuse me, I am busy, and cannot answer compliments in Westminster-hall. Go, Mr Splitcause, and come to me again at the bookseller's.

Old. No, sir, come to the lady at the other bookseller's. If you please, madam, I'll attend you thither.

Mrs Black. And why to the other bookseller's, major?

Old. Because, madam, he is my bookseller.

Mrs Black. To sell you lozenges for your cough, or salve for your corns? What else can a major deal with a bookseller for?

Old. Madam, he publishes for me.

Mrs Black. Publishes! oh, that is true, I forgot—you are an author.

Old. Now and then, madam, now and then—the good of one's country, you know.

Mrs Black. And pray, major, what are your books upon?

Old. Deign you, madam, to peruse one of them! There is a thing of mine lately come out; and I'll assure you, a certain great person, whom I presented it to, was pleased to pay me a compliment in the Court of Requests.

Book. Do you want any thing, madam? We have all the plays, magazines, and new pamphlets—

Mrs Black. Have you the Lawyer's Magazine?

Book. We have no law books at all, madam.

Mrs Black. No! you are a pretty bookseller!

Old. Come hither, young man—Has your master got any of my last pamphlet left?

Book. Yes, sir, we have got enough of them; we never had above two or three called for, besides what you took away yourself.

Old. May be so, may be so; the thing is not sufficiently known yet. Well, let me see a couple. [Gets them.] It is entitled, madam, "A Letter to a certain great Man on the present Posture of Affairs;" and if you will please to accept of one ex dono auctoris—

Jer. Hoh, hoh, hoh! [Laughing at a pamphlet behind.]

Mrs Black. Jerry, what have you got there?

Jer. Why—nothing—

Mrs Black. Nothing! Let me look at that book—Rochester's Jest! A very pretty study, truly. Give him the Young Clerk's Guide.

Old. No, no; give the young gentleman my Treatise upon Military Discipline.

Mrs Black. Away with such trash! Do you want to send him to the devil headlong? I should have him teasing me, to-morrow or next day, to buy him an ensign's commission. I would as lief he should read a play!

Jer. Well, and what if I did! There's very good discourse to be got out of plays, for all you.

Mrs Black. Sirrah, sirrah! Don't let me hear such a word out of your mouth. What has spoiled most of the attornies' clerks in London, but turning critics, and running every night to the playhouses at half price? and do you want to follow their example?—Stay, Jerry—Is not that Mr What d'ye call him goes yonder, he that offered to sell me a suit in chancery for five hundred pounds, for an hundred down, and only paying the clerk's fees?

Jer. Yes, that's he.

Mrs Black. It is the cheapest thing I ever heard of—Stay here, and have a care of the bags, while I go and talk with him. Have a care of the bags, I say—

[Erit.]

Jer. Have a care of the fiddle's end, I say: Gad, I am sure I lead a dog's life with you.

Enter FREEMAN.

Free. So, here's a limb of my widow, that used to be inseparable from her: she can't be far—How now, major!

Old. What do you mean by that, sir! Who are you, sir? What are you, sir?

Free. Nay, my dear Don Choleric, don't snap my nose off.

Old. Sir, you are a very impertinent fellow, sir!—And, sir—'squire, where's your mother?

Jer. Oh, what, you were so intent upon reading your works, you let her give you the slip, did you?

Well, yonder she is, talking to that weazle-faced man in the big wig—hobble after her.

Old. An unmannerly, insignificant, ignorant—I shall take notice of you, Mr Sea-Lieutenant, I shall take notice of you! [Exit.]

Jer. Look you, master, I'll tell you what it is—I'll buy that book of choice sayings from you, if so be you'll take half a crown for it, and stay till lawyer Splitcause comes to lend me the money to pay you.

Free. Lend you! Here, I'll pay him—I am sorry, squire, a man of your estate should want money.

Jer. Why, I am not at age yet, you must understand.

Free. At age! You are at age already, man, to have spent a fortune: there are younger than you, who, to my knowledge, have kept their girls these three years; ruined half a dozen tradesmen, and lost as many thousand pounds at play. But what is the reason, 'squire, that you will not give your consent to my marrying your mother?

Jer. Why you would not be such a fool, would you?

Free. Why I would not be a fool, if I could help it: but has not she a good jointure?

Jer. A good jointure! If she has, she knows what to do with it: she will let no body have a finger in the pie but herself, I can tell you that. Come a little this way—Why, you would not believe what an old plague my mother is; she'll never allow me sixpence in my pocket; so that I am ashamed to go into company, because I have not wherewithal to call for a glass of wine, and do as the rest do. And, for a wench!—I was but making a little fun with our laundress's daughter upon the staircase, the other night, and she threatened to send the poor girl to Bridewell.

Free. Sure!

Jer. Upon my word she did! Oh, you don't know what a woman she is.

Free. Well, but 'squire, methinks this might easily be remedied: if I was you, I would go to law with her.

Jer. Law! Lord help your head! Why she is as big a lawyer as any in our inn; and would not desire better sport—Besides, I would not care to do that, for fear she should marry out of spite, and cut down my trees. I should hate to see my father's wife kissed and slopped by another man—and our trees are the purest, nice, shady, even twigs!

Free. Come, 'squire, let your mother and your trees fall, as she pleases, rather than go of this fashion all your life—But you shall be able to deal with her the right way.

Jer. Nay, if I had any friend to stand by me, I would shew her a trick worth two of it, I can tell you that.

Free. Suppose I was to be your friend! Look you, 'squire, I don't use to profess much; however, there's a trifle for your present occasions.

Jer. Oh, Lord, Sir! two guineas! Do you lend me this? Is there no trick in it? Well, sir, I'll give you my bond for security.

Free. No, no, you have given me your face for security; any one would swear you do not look like a cheat: and come to me whenever you will, and you shall have what money you please of me.

Jer. By my soul he's a curious fine gentleman! but may I depend upon you? Will you stand by me?

Free. Here's my hand.

Jer. That's enough. Never stir, but the next cross word my mother gives me, but I'll leave her directly, and come off to you—But now I have got money, I'll go pay the man at the gate two shillings I owe him, for I believe the poor soul wants it; and his wife has been two or three times at chambers to dun me. [Exit.]

Enter MANLY, Mrs BLACKACRE, and MAJOR OLDFOX.

Man. Confound your cause! Can't you lose it without me? which you are like enough to do, if it be, as you say, an honest one: I'll suffer for it no longer.

Mrs Black. Nay, but, captain, you are my chief witness—And Mr Splitcause tells me we are pricked down for the next hearing. Lord! methinks you should take pleasure in walking here, as half you see now do: for they have no business here, I assure you.

Man. Yes, but I assure you, then, their business is to persecute me—'Sdeath! I can't turn but one puppy or other has me by the sleeve, with impertinent inquiries or fulsome compliments: I have been acting the sign of the salutation this half hour, with a bowed body and my hat off, to one of your law serjeants yonder; while he was loading me with professions of service and friendship, though, in all probability, he cared not if I was at the devil; and I was wishing him hanged out of my way.

Mrs Black. Well, well, sir, compose yourself a little, and every thing shall be made agreeable. Jerry, why, Jerry!—Mercy on me, major, did not you leave my son here?

Old. Yes, madam, but perhaps the young gentleman is stepped aside.

Mrs Black. Jerry Blackacre!

Free. Your son will be here in a minute, madam; he's only just gone out of the hall about a little business.

Mrs Black. Out of the hall! Gads my life!—Out of the hall!

Free. Don't make yourself uneasy, madam; I'll answer for it he'll come to no mischief.

Mrs Black. Sir, I don't direct my discourse to you—But I'll so rate this careless jackanapes—Come along, major, and help me to look for him.

[Exit all but MANLY and FREEMAN.

Free. Well, sir, how have you past your time, since you came here? You have had a great deal of patience, sure.

Man. Patience, indeed! for I have drawn but one quarrel and two law-suits upon me.

Free. The devil! How could you quarrel here?

Man. How could I refrain?—But let's get off, for I see another quarrel coming upon me.

Free. What do you mean?

Man. Ask no questions, but walk this way.

Enter NOVEL.

Nov. Hey! captain! captain Manly!

Man. What now?

Nov. I beg pardon; but I thought it was you. Have you been in the house hearing the debates? What are they upon to-day?

Man. Considering what passed between you and me at our last interview, sir, I cannot help being a little astonished at the familiarity of this salutation.

Nov. Pho, pho! a mere trifle. Don't mention it—It has been a very fine morning, sir.

Free. Yes, sir, the weather has been tolerable.

Nov. It was very cold yesterday.

Free. I believe it might, sir.

Nov. Captain, what do you think brings me to Westminster-hall?

Man. Why, I suppose somebody has thrashed you lately for being impertinent, and you are come to take the law of them.

Nov. No, that's not it. But I suppose you have heard—

Man. Heard what?

Nov. Why, that I am to be played the devil with; costs and damages, and the Lord knows what.

Man. No, really, I have heard nothing about the matter; but what is it? though I am sure you are in the wrong before you tell me.

Nov. Why, you must know, sir—Ha, ha, ha! Upon my soul it is so ridiculous a circumstance, that I can hardly think of it without laughing.—You must know, sir, I was some time ago at the house of a considerable merchant in the city, where a certain lady's name was brought up; and, in the course of the conversation, I happened to mention some things which I had heard, and which all the world believe to be fact, egad! However, as you may guess, I did not imagine the discourse would have gone any further.

Free. But I suppose the lady had a friend in company, sir.

Nov. Oh, sir! I know how the matter came about now—Yes, yes, the woman of the house was her sister-in-law, which I never dreamt of: the intolerable Jezebel went and told her every thing that passed: an attorney came the next morning to serve me with a copy of a writ; and now they have brought me here to make me prove my words, as they call it.

Man. And pray, sir, what was it you said of the lady?

Nov. Nothing, nothing!—some story that I heard about her cuckolding her husband; that was all.

Man. I hope she may trounce you severely; nay, and I hope what you said of her was true; that you may be made the more glaring example.

Nov. Well, but my dear creature! how can you be so inhuman to any person, that never did you any injury?

Man. Because I would have such mischievous triflers as you are punished for your tattling and effeminacy: I would have you taught the difference between satire and defamation; and learn some other topic for your nonsensical conversations, besides the character and conduct of the absent: you male members of the tea-table, who are, if possible, worse enemies to women, than they are to one another.

Nov. Well upon my honour, this is pleasant! especially from you, who are remarkable for abusing all the world.

Man. Do you hear him, Freeman? Plain-dealing may well be in disrepute, when 'tis confounded with impudence and scandal: but if I stay here any longer, I find I shall be tempted to beat him.

Free. Nay, prithee don't leave us.

Man. Yes, yes, I must; I shall bring myself into another scrape else: besides, I see a person just now come into the hall, that looks for me—Stand out of the way. [Erit.]

Nov. This is a sad brutish fellow, sir; I wonder you will keep him company.

Free. Why, faith, sir, I don't know how it is; I think I am bewitched to him, for my part—and yet, hang him! he has some good qualities, too, when one comes to be thoroughly acquainted with him.

Nov. Ay, sir! Pray, what may they be, for I never could find them out?

Free. Why, I think 'tis generally agreed, sir, that he has a tolerable good understanding.

Nov. Why, really, I have heard people say so; and yet, to me, he has always appeared the stupidest animal breathing.

Free. Then as to courage.—It must be allowed he is brave.

Nov. He is quarrelsome, if you please; but his bravery, I fancy, will admit of some dispute. You have heard, no doubt, of his late affair with the French?

Free. Ay, sir; what of that?

Nov. Why, I should not care to have my name mentioned as the author of such a thing; but I assure you there are some very odd reports fly about; and this, I believe, you may depend upon, that he will be brought to a court-martial for his behaviour on that occasion.

Free. I am glad to hear this, sir, with all my heart; for, you must know, I happened to be a partner in the action you mention.

Nov. Were you, sir?

Free. Yes, faith; but I was ignorant, till now, of the dangerous situation we were in; however, I am extremely obliged to you for your intelligence, as I dare swear the captain will be—

Nov. Yonder goes my attorney—I'll just speak two or three words to him, and be back with you again in an instant.

Free. Hold, sir! we must not part so. You must go along with me, sir, and tell this story to captain Manly.

Nov. Sir, I have not time at present—I—there's a gentleman beckons me, owes a thousand pounds, and goes out of town to-morrow morning—Mr—

[Exit.

Free. Ha, ha, ha! Well, we shall meet again.

Enter JERRY BLACKACRE.

How now, 'squire, what's the matter?

Jer. Nothing: I don't care; nothing's the matter: but if ever I go home again with her, I wish I may never stir! You said you would stand by me.

Free. Well, and so I will. Who has injured you?

Jer. Why, my mother: she caught me at the place there, changing the money you gave me, and flew at me like any mad, and pulled my hair, and called me all the names that ever she could think of—But if I don't be up with her! you will see! and if you won't take me with you, I'll go for a soldier.

Free. Take you with me, 'squire! do you desire to go with me?

Jer. Yes, 'tis all my desire.

Free. How shall I act in this affair? 'gad, 'twill be a good stroke towards making something of the widow in earnest; at least, of getting my right out of her hands.—[Aside.—Well, 'squire, I'll tell you what, if you are really serious—

Jer. Oh, Lord! yonder she is coming in at the gate with that old fellow: if you will come, come away; for I won't stay any longer to be beat and abused by her.

Free. Nay, since that's the case, have with you, my boy.

Jer. Ay, and now let's see how she'll be able to help herself. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.—Changes to the gate of Westminster-hall.

Enter, from within, MANLY and FIDELIA, and on the opposite side, MRS BLACKACRE and MAJOR OLDFOX.

Mrs Black. A villain! a rascal! I'll teach him better manners than to talk saucily to his mother!—These are pretty doings, are they not? My son flies in my face; and when I go to correct him for it, he tells me, truly, he'll leave me, and go to the mate of your ship, who has offered to take him.

Man. Well, and what's that to me? You must tie your calf up, if you are afraid of his being stolen.

Mrs Black. But which way did he run, major? May be he is gone to that seducing villain already; and he has got my writings with him, all that concerns my estate, my jointure, my husband's deed of gift, and the evidences for all my suits now depending.

Man. I am glad of that; for, if you have lost your evidence, your cause can't go on, and I am at liberty.

Old. Mr Jerry went off in a great passion, madam; I hope he won't commit any rash action, to do himself a mischief.

Mrs Black. No, no, I know him better than so; he will never be felo de se that way: but he may go and chuse a guardian of his own head, and so be felo de ses beins; for he has not chosen one yet.

Man. Which I hope he may, with all my heart!

Mrs Black. Oh, do you so, sir? then it seems you are in the plot.—Well, look to it; I'll play fast and loose with you all yet, if there be law, and my minor and writings are not forthcoming. I'll bring my action of detinue or trover—but I'll first go and seek—

Man. Well, I shall not stay here any longer.

Mrs Black. Stir a step, stir a step, at your peril, till the courts are broke up, and I'll serve you with a rule of contempt.

[Exeunt MRS BLACKACRE and MAJOR OLDFOX.

Man. Now, sir, go on.—You have been with Olivia, you say.

Fide. Yes, sir, I have seen and spoke with her.

Man. Well, and she received you kindly?

Fide. Kinder than you would think, sir.

Man. That's well—come, now, let me hear what she said to you.

Fide. Said to me, sir?

Man. Ay, what was her business with you? Come, come! Why don't you speak? You are so tedious! What was it she had to communicate?

Fide. Modesty, sir, prevents my entering into particulars; I need only tell you, that her business with me has proved of the most extraordinary kind; I am so shocked at the thoughts of her behaviour, I cannot say more.

Man. Confusion!

Fide. I assure you, sir, I would not impose upon you by the forgery of a falsehood, and cannot wrong her by any report of her, she is so wicked.

Man. Wicked! 'Sdeath, had she the impudence!

Fide. Impudence! Oh, sir!

Man. But what! How did she accost you?

Fide. When I came to the house, sir, I was conducted into her dressing-room, where I found her alone; and I took it for granted she would have begun immediately with talking of you and your late difference with her; but, instead of that, sir, I had hardly sat down, when she gave me to understand she had desired to see me on my own account only; and was so bold, and so forward—

Man. But in what terms did she express herself?

Fide. Her tongue, I confess, was silent, sir; but her eyes conveyed such things—

Man. Eyes! Eyes!—What, then, you have only had eye kindness from her; and your vanity has helped you, in this construction, so much to the lady's disadvantage?

Fide. Not so, sir—At first, indeed, her eyes, chiefly, were the interpreters of her thoughts; but, finding they spoke a language I could not, or would not, understand, she threw off the restraint, made a tender of her passion in direct terms; and, in short, sir, offered to prostitute that love to me, at half an hour's acquaintance, which you have deserved whole years in vain.

Man. I'll not believe it—It is a damned lie of your own contrivance; come, I know 'tis a lie.

Fide. I am sorry you should think so, sir: but, however unlikely it may appear, I can give you proof.

Man. Proof!

Fide. Yes, sir; for I have seemed half consenting to her solicitations, and made a kind of promise to pay her a visit this night, at twelve o'clock, when the family shall be asleep.

Man. Ha!

Fide. For which purpose she has shewn me a back way into her apartment, where a lamp always burns; for she will have no light in her chamber, because her woman lies in an adjoining closet—Nay, more, sir; she has given me the key of the garden, to let myself in with, which I have brought off.

Man. The key of the garden! Let me see it.—I know it well; and have a thousand times gone, by the passage you mention, to our private interviews: I imagined it led to paradise, and an angel of purity inhabited there; but I must think of that no more—Did she say nothing to you of this husband of her's?

Fide. Yes, sir; she is actually married, and her husband gone out of town; but she expects him very soon; and that, I suppose, made her more urgent with me to come to night.

Man. And can you think of disappointing a lady upon such an occasion?

Fide. I, sir!—I should disappoint her more by going.

Man. How so?

Fide. Her impudence and infidelity to you, sir, has made me loath her.

Man. Well, sir, but I say the lady shall not be disappointed.

Fide. Not disappointed, sir!—If ever I go near her again, may you think me as false to you as she is! hate and renounce me!

Man. Well, well, if you won't, leave the matter to me; I'll take care—

Fide. You, sir!—You take care, sir!—Pray give me that odious key again, and let me return it with the contempt, the detestation—

Man. No, sir; this key is the instrument of revenge, which fortune hath put into my hand; and, by Heaven, I'll make use of it.

Fide. Revenge, sir!—what revenge? Disdain is best revenged by scorn; and faithless love by loving another.

Man. Perhaps it may, where the object has once been esteemed; but, I now begin to think, I had never any share in her affections; and, therefore, I'll take another method.

Fide. And what is your design, sir?

Man. Not a word more; here's Freeman coming towards us: we will disengage ourselves from him as soon as we can, and talk of this affair further.

Enter FREEMAN.

Free. The most whimsical accident has happened to me here to-day, captain; the most unexpected, unaccountable—Ha, ha, ha!

Man. What, the great boy has rose in rebellion against the tyranny of his widow-mother, and put himself under your protection! Have a care, Freeman; though she is a fiend, and I wish her at the devil, we are still to have a regard to justice.

Free. Then we are to do ourselves justice, sure; which, I promise you, is all the use I shall make of the 'squire's revolt in my favour. Where shall we dine?

Man. I was just thinking of it—Where can we dine?

Free. Will you go to the King's Arms?

Man. Why, I don't much care if I do: but it must be upon one condition.

Free. Name it.

Man. That you shall not attempt to pin yourself upon me after dinner; I must positively have the whole evening at my own disposal; for my young volunteer and I have particular business.

Free. That's sufficient, sir; you know you always make your own terms with me.

Man. Come then, young gentleman, lead the way. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—MANLY'S lodgings.

MANLY enters in a surtout coat, followed by FIDELIA.

Man. THEN Freeman betrayed no marks of surprise at being told I was gone abroad so early! and you are positive he had not the least suspicion of my being out all night!

Fide. I believe not, sir.

Man. So much the better, I have been sitting at the coffee-house these three hours, lest knocking at the door at an unseasonable time might alarm the family—Help me off with my coat—and now shut the door, and bolt it, that no body may come in upon us unawares.

Fide. Heigh ho!

Man. What's the matter with you?

Fide. Nothing, sir.

Man. You have been crying!

Fide. I have not been very well, sir.

Man. Come, you are a good lad; don't let your spirits sink; I'll be your friend; you shall fare as I do; let that content you.

Fide. I desire no better, sir.

Man. Take the pen and ink, and sit down there—I am now convinced that what you told me yesterday was truth; and Olivia is the vilest, and most profligate of her sex.

Fide. Are you convinced, sir?—Are you indeed convinced? Then I hope——

Man. Speak softly—I suppose I need not tell you where I have been!

Fide. Sir!

Man. I say, I suppose I need not tell you, where I have been since we parted; I have been with Olivia; and she has bestowed on me a thousand caresses, which I returned with seemingly an equal ardour.

Fide. Lord, sir, I am vastly sick of a sudden!

Man. You are a coward—What ails you?

Fide. I don't know, sir, I never was so oddly taken in my life; but it will away again.

Man. Listen to me, then, and be surprised yet more—I have passed myself upon Olivia for you!

Fide. For me, sir!

Man. Yes—Darkness, and the particularity of our situation, favoured the deceit; and I was cautious not to undeceive her, by speaking but little, and that softly; and leaving her this morning before it was light.

Fide. Surely, sir, you will never go near this abominable woman more!

Man. That we'll consider of—In part, my revenge is satisfied.

Fide. Well, sir, what are your commands with me?

Man. Hear me! I would have you go immediately and write Olivia a very tender billet-doux; deplore the necessity, which forced you from her this morning, so much against your inclination; and appoint another meeting with her, at her own house, this evening, as soon as it shall be dusk.

Fide. Out of revenge, I suppose, sir!

Man. It is so—for I intend to go there.

Fide. Sir, my life is devoted to your service; but, however meanly you may think of me, I cannot descend so low as to the infamous office you would lay upon me.—Excuse me, sir, I cannot act the part of a pander.

Man. Your principles of honour I do not dislike, if they are sincere; but I tell you, you are mistaken in the matter.

Fide. Indeed, sir, I am not; I see all plain enough; but, upon my knees, I beg, if you have the least regard for yourself, renounce this woman; give her up, and never——

Man. What am I to think of your behaviour? Sure you would have me believe you love her yourself; which, indeed, I have all along suspected.

Fide. Indeed, sir, it is all my concern for your safety.

Man. Methinks you might trust that to my care—but, once for all, I desire I may have no more impertinent disputing or advice—you have reason to know I am unalterable.

Fide. Sir, you must give up either Olivia or me!

Man. Why so, sir? What have you and Olivia to do with one another?

Fide. Well, sir, let me hear your commands.

Man. I have already told them to you—I would have you write this letter, to make the appointment; you shall keep it in person; and when you have been with her some time, I will come in at the back door, which you shall purposely leave open, and catch you together.

Fide. Well, sir, and what then?

Man. Why then, sir, I will upbraid her falsehood, confront her impudence, boast of the triumph I have had over her, and never see her more.

Fide. And is this really all you intend, sir?

Man. All.

Fide. I think you can have no kindness left for Olivia now, sir; I think you can't—You don't love her the least bit, captain, do you?

Man. Love her! Damn her! I think of her with abhorrence.

Fide. Then, I will go and write the letter directly, sir.

Free. (Speaks within) Well, well, I will introduce you.

Man. Do so—and open the door, for I think I hear Freeman in the next room.

[Exit FIDELIA.]

Enter FREEMAN and MAJOR OLDFOX.

Free. Captain, here's a gentleman who is ambitious of being ranked amongst the number of your acquaintance.—This, sir, is major Oldfox, at once the votary of Mars and Apollo, and equally an ornament to the pen and the sword.

Old. Sir, I am your most——

Man. What do you mean by bringing the old fool to me?—Why will you, Freeman, take these liberties?

Free. Excuse me; upon my soul I could not avoid it.—The captain is a whimsical man, major; but I suppose you know his humour.

Old. Ay, ay, I have heard, and like him the better.—Captain, I honour you; you are a great man, sir: your late behaviour against the enemy has proved you such, and I shall be proud of being better known to you: as Mr Freeman has intimated, I am an humble admirer of the arts, and now and then throw my thoughts upon paper: nequeo dormire, as the poet says.

Man. And what then, sir?

Old. Nay, good captain, take me along with you.—I suppose you would not be displeased to have the particulars of your late action laid in a proper manner before the public; and, if so, I should be glad to drink a bottle, and have a little discourse with you about it—That's all, sir.

Man. Ha, ha, ha!

Old. He is an odd man, Mr Freeman.

Free. But ingenious, major.

Old. Ay, ay—Pray, captain, do you ever read the Royal Chronicle?

Man. No.

Old. Nor the Imperial Magazine?

Man. Neither.

Old. That's much, that's much, indeed; neither the Royal Chronicle, the Imperial Magazine, nor—! There are often very excellent pieces make their appearance in those publications, Mr Freeman.

Free. So there are, major, so there are—and I believe I can guess to whom the public is indebted for a good many of them! What say you? Eh?—Don't I know the signum—three stars and a dash?

Old. No, Mr Freeman; no, upon my honour, sir! That was my mark formerly; but now, all my things are signed Philanthropos.

Free. You are not author of that soliloquy in blank verse, in the papers the other day?

Old. What! an address to the land-carriage fish-office?

Free. Ay.

Old. Why, did you like it?

Free. As good as Milton!

Old. Mr Freeman, my dear soul! I am extremely sorry, that any thing should happen between us; but, as I said before, I hope that is all forgotten; and you will henceforward look upon me as your friend. It was I that writ it. But mum! between ourselves.

Man. Hark you, old gentleman, it seems you have taken it into your head you can write, and are turned author; shall I tell you what I once said to an acquaintance of mine, who was possessed of the same unaccountable whim?

Old. Well, sir, and what was that?

Man. Why, faith, I told him very plainly he was making himself an ass.

Old. Mr Freeman, I shall be glad to see you at my house, to eat a bit of mutton with me, and to have a little conversation about a matter I shall tell you. Sir, your servant! [Exit.]

Free. You took a very sure way to get rid of an author, by advising him not to write. But you are grown a very early man, sure; I was here two hours ago, and was told you were gone out.

Man. Aye, and I should have staid out, if I had known what company you intended to bring me.

Free. As to that, don't be angry; the major, you must know, is the widow's harbinger, who is coming in pursuit of her son; and he and I having a little quarrel, I had a mind to make it up with him, by doing what he said he would consider as the greatest obligation—introducing him to you.

Man. Well, and what have you done with your charge?

Free. Stay and you shall see: I have rigged him out with the remains of my ship-wrecked wardrobe: he has been under your sea valet de chambre's hands. By Jupiter! that is his mother's knock at the door. Stay, and I'll fetch him.

Man. No—you know I cannot easily laugh; but I desire once more you will take care, and bring yourself into no disagreeable circumstances by this business. [Exit.]

SCENE II—Covent-Garden Piazza.

Enter Mrs BLACKACRE and Major OLDFOX.

Old. But will you not walk in, madam?

Mrs Black. No, major, no; I shall not put my foot into his house, since I have not my lawyer with me. I called on counsellor Quillit, but he's attending a trial for an assault.

Old. Well, but, madam, this is a strange place to transact business in.

Mrs Black. Major, you are an ignoramus!—do you know, that as I have no search-warrant, execution, or other legal authority, if I was to go into his house, he might bring his writ for a forcibly entry on the premises. I served a person so once myself.

Old. Well, madam, I have sent the servant to call him out; and that you mayn't think the time long 'till he comes, I'll just read you over a little fancy, that came into my head this morning.

Mrs Black. Lord, major, how can you trouble me with such cursed stuff, when you see how I am perplexed and plagued here?

Old. Nay, in troth, I must have your opinion of a satire I am going to publish; it is a lash for the revicwers; in which I give such a character—

Mrs Black. Nay, if you talk of characters, look at my last suit in chancery, which gives such a character of my adversary, makes him as black as the very devil.

Old. Then, here's the outlines of what I once intended for a pamphlet—"The coffee-house man's case on the late rise of news-papers, humbly addressed to both Houses of Parliament."

Enter FREEMAN and JERRY.

Mrs Black. What do I see? Jerry Blackacre, my minor, in red breeches! Oh, Jerry, Jerry! have I lost all my good inns of court-breeding upon you, then? and will you go breeding yourself at coffee-houses and bagnios?

Jer. Aye, aye! what then? perhaps I will, and what's that to you? Here's my guardian and tutor, now that I am out of your huckster's hands.

Mrs Black. How! you have not chose him for your guardian yet?

Jer. Yes, but I have though; and I'll do any thing he bids me, and I'll go all over the world with him, to ordinaries or bagnios, or any where else.

Mrs Black. Do not go to ordinaries and bagnios, good Jerry!

Jer. Why, have you had any dealings there? you never had any ill by them, had you? but if I have left you, you may thank yourself; for you used me so barbarously, I was weary of my life.

Mrs Black. But consider, Jerry, you are but an infant; however, if you will go home with me again, and be a good child, you shall see—

Free. I beg your pardon, madam; this young gentleman is now under my care; and it is my duty, in quality of his guardian—

Mrs Black. Why, you villain, would you part mother and minor? rob me of my child and my writings? but you shall find that there is law; and in the case of ravishment of guard—Westm. the second—

Old. Well, but madam, by what I can find, this has been all the young gentleman's own doing. Come, squire, pray be ruled by your mother and friends.

Jer. Yes, I'll be ruled by my friends, and therefore not by my mother. I'll chuse him for my guardian till I am at age—nay, may be for as long as I live.

Mrs Black. Will you so, you wretch? and when you are of age, you will sign, seal, and deliver, too, will you?

Jer. Yes, I will.

Mrs Black. Oh! do not squeeze wax, son! rather go to ordinaries and bagnios, than squeeze wax. If thou dost that, farewell the goodly manor of Blackacre, with all its woods and underwoods, and appurtenances whatever!

Free. Come, madam, don't afflict yourself: 'tis true, this young gentleman, of his own free-will, has chosen me for his guardian: however, he's not out of your power; and might I flatter myself with hopes of being in the mother's good graces—

Mrs Black. I understand you, sir; no, if one of us must be ruined, e'en let it be him, if he won't be ruled by me. What say you, booby, will you be ruled?

Jer. Let me alone, can't you?

Mrs Black. Will you chuse him for a guardian, whom I refuse for a husband?

Jer. Aye, to chuse, I thank you! for I have taken leave of lawyering and pettifogging!

Mrs Black. Pettifogging, you profane! have you so?—Pettifogging! then you shall take your leave of me, and your estate, too; you shall be an alien to me and it for ever—Pettifogging!

Jer. Oh, but if you go there, we have the deeds and settlements, I thank you! would you cheat me of my estate?

Mrs Black. No, no; I will not cheat your little brother Bob; for you were not born in wedlock; you was—

Jer. What quirk has she got in her head, now?

Mrs Black. I say you cannot, shall not, inherit the Blackacre estate: you are but my base child, and, according to law, cannot inherit it.—Nay, you are not so much as a bastard eigne.

Jer. What! am I, then, mother, the son of a—?

Mrs Black. The law says—

Free. Madam, we know what the law says—but have a care of what you say! do not let your passion to ruin your son, ruin your reputation.

Mrs Black. Hang reputation, sir! am not I a widow? have no husband, nor intend to have any?

Jer. But have you no shame left in you, mother?

Mrs Black. No, no, sir! Come, major, let us make haste to the prerogative court.

[Exeunt.]

Free. Nay, but, madam—We must not let her go so, 'squire!

Jer. Nay, the devil can't stop her, if she has a mind to it. But I'll tell you what, master guardian-lieutenant, we will go and advise with three attornies, two proctors, two solicitors, and a sharp dog in White-friars, and sure all they will be too hard for her! for I fear, honest guardian of mine, you are too good a joker to have any law in your head.

Free. You are in the right on't, 'squire; I understand no law, especially that against bastards—which custom is against, I am sure; for more people get estates by being so, than lose them.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—OLIVIA'S lodgings.

Enter OLIVIA, with VARNISH booted and spurred, as just come off a journey.

Oliv. Lord bless me, my dear! you came upon me so unawares, you quite startled me—feel how my heart beats!

Var. Beats!—you seem startled, indeed! And yet, surely, you expected somebody, when you met me so kindly in the dark passage!

Oliv. Why, I thought it was your step, and could not refrain from coming out of my chamber; and yet I did not know how to believe it either, because it was so much sooner than your letters bid me look for you.

Var. And yet you began with upbraiding me for having staid beyond my time. Let me tell you, madam, this conduct is mysterious, and requires explanation.

Oliv. What explanation, my soul? you misunderstood my words. I upbraid you with having staid too long from me; and you shall never be absent so long from me again, you shan't indeed; by this kiss you shan't! But, my dearest, I have strange news to tell you—since you went, Manly's returned.

Var. Fortune forbid!

Oliv. He met with the French fleet; fought, and afterwards sunk his ship. He was here with me yesterday.

Var. You did not own our marriage to him!

Oliv. I told him I was married, to get rid of him; but to whom, is yet a secret to all the world: and I used him so abominably ill, that his pride, I believe, will prevent his troubling me any further.

Var. I hope it has given him a surfeit of the shore, and will send him to sea again; be you sure only to keep our great secret: in the mean time, I will lead the easy fool by the nose, as I used to do; and, whilst he stays, rail with him at you; and, when he is gone, laugh with you at him. By that time, too, I shall have settled some affairs, which I have now on hand, and shall not care who knows of our marriage. As for the notes and jewels, which he left with you, if he should want to recover them by law, you may plead a gift; but I fancy we are pretty safe as to that, for I know the particularity of his temper so well—

Oliv. Yet, let us be cautious, my love—Have you taken the thousand guineas, he lodged in my name, out of the banker's hand?

Var. No—where was the necessity?

Oliv. The greatest in the world. Do not confide too much in his generosity: I am well informed a much smaller sum would be acceptable to him at present; and, no doubt, his necessity will make him ready enough to take money, wherever he can claim any thing like a property.

Var. I believe you are in the right, and I will take care to remove them to-morrow.

Oliv. To-morrow! for Heaven's sake stay not till then; he may receive them before to-morrow. Go this night—immediately.

Var. You advise well, and I will only stay to rest myself a little.

Oliv. Rest yourself, when you come back. Pray, dear Varnish, don't trifle upon such an important occasion. Go this very instant!

Var. Well, well, I'll go now directly—a hackney coach will take me to Fleet-street, and back again, in an hour.

Oliv. If you stay till midnight, no matter. Make haste, dearest! I am impatient till you are out of the house. [Exit VAR.]

I shan't recover myself a good while, this unexpected visit has so flurried me! Who could have thought of his coming—a beast!—And at so critical a juncture!—And yet, if he had stayed a few moments longer, he might have taken me still more at a disadvantage—My conduct is mysterious, and requires explanation! Sure he intends to give himself the airs of being jealous—I wish I had never married him! He is of a cruel and dangerous temper; and, had I not luckily thought of the money, as an expedient to send him out again, I know not what might have happened, had he and my young friend met—

Enter FIDELIA.

Ah, heavens!

Fide. I hope I don't frighten you, madam.

Oliv. Oh, is it you? No, no; but I am the strangest timorous creature!—Well, you can excuse a woman's weakness; indeed I have given you too great proofs of mine—I hope you are not one of those capricious conquerors who despise a victory for being too easily gained!

Fide. I hope, madam—

Oliv. Nay, I know you will say to the contrary, and I shall believe you: though the hurry you were in to leave me, and your unkind behaviour, in hardly speaking to me, might make one of a less jealous temper suspect—

Fide. Upon my word, madam!—

Oliv. I am satisfied; you will tell me, no doubt, your letter contained a sufficient apology for that; and, to convince you I desire no other, if you are as sincere as I am, I will, this moment, put into your possession what, in many parts of the world, will be a magnificent fortune. In short, I am ready to forsake friends, country, reputation, and fly with you—

Fide. This offer, madam, does me so great an honour—

Oliv. Honour! Why will you make use of that cold expression? But methinks you look grave upon it! must I have the mortification to find that your passion is less violent than mine?

Fide. Pardon me, madam; but the violence of your passion may presage its change; and I must needs be afraid your affections would soon cool to me, since you could once grow indifferent to so worthy a gentleman as captain Manly.

Oliv. Oh, mention not his name!

Fide. Why, madam, did not you love him?

Oliv. Never. How could you think it?

Fide. Because he thought it; who is a man of that excellent understanding, and nice discernment—

Oliv. Hang him, untractable, surly brute! Some private reasons, indeed, made me outwardly accommodate myself to his tramontane humour; and he had vanity enough to think I liked him.

Fide. Bless my soul, madam! Vanity! Why, he is very well to be liked, I hope.

Oliv. Ha, ha, ha!

Fide. Indeed, madam, you don't do well to speak so disrespectfully of the captain.

Oliv. Why, you dear, friendly creature, you could not be a greater advocate for him, if you were one of his mistresses stept into breeches!

Fide. His mistresses, madam? I don't know what you mean. To be sure, I have great obligations to the captain, and don't like to hear him abused—but—

Oliv. Come, come, let us talk no more of him, that is the best way—What say you, shall we go sit in the next room? I have prepared a little collation there.

Fide. Are we not better here, madam?

Oliv. No, no; I'll conduct you; give me your hand.

Fide. I would rather stay where we are, if you please, madam.

Oliv. Why so?

Fide. I do not know, madam; I think it is more airy here.

Oliv. Airy! Is any thing the matter with you?

Fide. I am afraid I am going to have one of my fits.

Oliv. What fits?

Fide. Oh, madam, I am very subject to fits; and sometimes lie in a trance for an hour together.

Oliv. Ay!

Fide. Yes, indeed, madam; but, if you will let me alone where I am, perhaps I may not have one.

Oliv. Oh, stay, I will run into the next room, and fetch you some spirits; I would not, for the world, you should be seized here. [Exit.]

Fide. Mercy on us, what shall I do! I wish the captain would come and deliver me from this odious woman; she will certainly discover me, if I stay much longer. I wish I was well out of the house!

Enter OLIVIA.

Oliv. Undone, undone!

Fide. How, madam! Where?

Oliv. Ask no questions, but get out the back way as fast as you can; my husband's coming!

Fide. Your husband, madam!

Oliv. Ay, ay; he came in just before you did; I thought he was gone abroad again, but I saw him this moment cross the hall, and he followed me up stairs—Oh, heavens, here he is!—This way. [Exit.]

Fide. Hold, madam!—She has clapt the door after her, and the bolt is shot! What will become of me?

Enter VARNISH.

Var. So, now I am somewhat of a more decent figure to go abroad; while the fellow has been getting me a coach, I have made a shift to alter my dress a little.—Ha! who have we here! Nay, by the Lord, you shan't slip by me!

Fide. Pray, sir, do not be rude.

Var. Rude, you rascal! Who are you? And what brings you into this house?

Fide. I did not come to do you any harm, sir.

Var. You come here to do no good, I am certain. But now I see who it was my wife expected, and what occasioned her extraordinary trepidation. Damn you, sirrah, I have a mind to cut your throat. Come, draw!

Fide. Oh, pray sir, don't draw your sword—pray, sir, don't!

Var. How, a coward! yet dare to do a man the greatest injury in the world! but your want of courage shall not save your life.

Fide. Hold, sir, hold! Do not terrify me, and I will satisfy you I could not injure you.

Var. Now, quickly, then! What have you to say?

Fide. I am a woman, sir; a very unfortunate woman!

Var. Ha! a very handsome one, I am sure. It is so—But why in this masquerade?—Well, no matter.

Fide. I hope, sir, you are so much a man of honour as to let me go, now I have satisfied you.

Var. Let you go, madam!

Fide. Yes, sir; you may guess my misfortune to be love, by my disguise; and I dare swear, you will not urge me further on secrets, which concern my honour.

Var. Oh, no, madam, by no means—But I thought I saw my wife turn short upon the stairs just now, and run up in a great hurry before me. Has she not been with you?

Fide. Yes, sir.

Var. Well, and where is she gone?

Fide. Out of the house, I believe, sir.

Var. And why so, madam?

Fide. I know not, sir: perhaps, because she would not be forced to discover me to you; or, to guard me from suspicions, that you might not discover me yourself.

Var. Well, madam, at any rate I am obliged to her for having left me alone with so charming a creature. Lovely, bewitching woman!

Fide. What do you mean? Help, ho!

Var. 'Tis in vain to cry out—no one dares to help you; I am lord here.

Fide. Tyrant here!—But, if you are the master of this house, which I have taken for a sanctuary, do not violate it yourself.

Var. No, I'll preserve you in it, and nothing shall hurt you: I will be as true to you as your disguise, but you must trust me.

Fide. You don't look like a villain, sir—Help! help!

Enter FOOTBOY.

Var. You saucy rascal, how durst you!—

Boy. I come, sir, to let you know the coach is at the door.

Var. Damn the coach!—Well, madam, I shall leave you for a little while; perhaps, when I come back, I shall find you in a better humour. Here, sir, help me in with this fellow, this dishonourer of my family.

Boy. Fellow! Your honour said she was a woman.

Var. No matter, sir; must you prate?

Fide. Oh, Heavens! Is there—

Var. Come, madam, since you will yield to me no other way, you shall, at least, be my prisoner till I have leisure to examine you further—In there, in—I will know you better before I part with you, my pretty masquerader, or you shall have more strength and cunning than I think you have.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—ELIZA'S Lodgings.

Enter OLIVIA, ELIZA, and LETTICE.

Oliv. Ah, cousin! nothing troubles me, but that I have given the malicious world its revenge, and reason now to talk as freely of me as I used to do of it.

Eliz. Faith, then, let not that trouble you: for to be plain, cousin, the world cannot talk worse of you than it did before.

Oliv. How, cousin! I'd have you to know, before this faux-pas, this trip of mine, the world could not talk of me.

Lett. Oh, Lud, madam, here is my master!

Oliv. Whither shall I run? Save, protect me from him!

Enter VARNISH.

Var. Nay, nay, come!

Oliv. Oh, sir! forgive me.

Var. Yes, yes, I can forgive your being alone with a woman in man's clothes, but have a care of a man in woman's clothes!

Oliv. A woman in man's clothes! What does he mean! [Aside.]

Var. Come, come, you need not have lain out of your house for this: but perhaps you were afraid, when I was warm with suspicions, you must have discovered who she was.

Oliv. Who she was! Sure he dissembles only to get me into his power; or perhaps my young spark has imposed upon him! [Aside.]

Var. Come, what's the matter with you? If I must not know who she was, I am satisfied with—Come hither.

Oliv. Sure you do know her; she has told you herself, I suppose.

Var. No, I might have known her better, but I was obliged to go to the banker's; and so locked her into your chamber, with a design to examine her when I came back; but in the mean time she got away, by tying the window-curtains to the balcony, by which she slid down into the street—for you must know I jested, and made her believe I should be rude with her, which she apprehended, I suppose, in earnest.

Oliv. Then she got from you?

Var. Yes.

Oliv. And is quite gone?

Var. Yes.

Oliv. I am glad on't—otherwise you had been rude with her. But how durst you go so far, as to make her believe you would? Let me understand that, sir! What! there is guilt in your face!—You blush, too!—Nay, then, I see how things have happened—Oh, you base fellow!

Eliz. So, so!

Var. Nay, hear me!—Prithee—I swear—

Oliv. I have heard already too many of your false oaths and vows, especially your last in the church: Wicked man! and wretched woman that I am!

Var. My dear!—

Oliv. My devil!—

Var. Come, prithee be appeased—and go home: I have been so uneasy all day, not knowing where to find you—I'll give you every satisfaction.

Oliv. Satisfaction!

Var. Yes, do but go home, and I'll thoroughly satisfy you—and then, too, we'll have a fit of laughing at Manly, whom I am going to find at the King's Arms, where I hear he dined—Go, dearest, go home.

Eliz. A very pretty turn indeed, this!

Var. Now, cousin, since, by my wife, I have the honour and privilege of calling you so, I have something to beg of you, too; which is, not to take notice of our marriage to any person whatever yet a while, for some reasons very important to me; and, next, that you will do my wife the honour to go home with her, and me the favour to use that power, you have with her, in our reconciliation.

Eliz. That, I dare promise, sir, will be no hard matter. Your servant. [Exeunt VARNISH and LETTICE.]—Well, cousin, this I confess was a reasonable hypocrisy; you were the better for it.

Oliv. What hypocrisy?

Eliz. Why, this last deceit of your husband was lawful, since in your own defence.

Oliv. What deceit? I would have you to know I never deceived my husband.

Eliz. You do not understand me: I say this was an honest come off, and a good one. But what sort of a gallant must this be, who could so dexterously pass himself for a woman?

Oliv. What do you mean by a gallant, and passing for a woman?

Eliz. What do you mean? You see your husband took him for a woman.

Oliv. Whom?

Eliz. Hey-day! why the man he found with you; for whom, last night, you were so much afraid; and who you told me—

Oliv. Lord, you rave sure!

Eliz. Why, you did not tell me last night?—

Oliv. I know not what I might tell you last night in a fright.

Eliz. Ay, what was that fright for?—For a woman!—Fie, this fooling is insipid, 'tis offensive.

Oliv. And fooling with my honour will be more offensive. Did you not hear my husband say—

Eliz. Come, you need not fear, I'll keep your secret.

Oliv. My secret! I'd have you to know, I have no need of confidantes, though you value yourself on being a good one.

Eliz. Admirable confidence!

Oliv. Confidence! Is this language to me? Nay, then, I'll never see your face again! Lettice, where are you? Let us be gone from this censorious, ill woman. [Exit OLIV.]

Eliz. Your very humble servant, my sweet, good cousin! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A Tavern.

MANLY and FREEMAN discovered, drinking at a table.

Free. What, then, you were going to her yesterday evening?

Man. I did, as I tell you, intend it; but, being detained on the way by an old ship-mate, just as I had got to the corner of the street, I met the volunteer, breathless, and almost frightened out of his wits, who gave me this whimsical relation of his adventure with her husband.

Free. Whimsical indeed! Damn it—the fellow must be an idiot!

Man. I am not sorry the affair has happened, however; for, upon second thoughts, the discovery I have to make should be public, and before a number of witnesses—she must be made as infamous as she is guilty.

Free. Well, I am your man at any mad work; so here's my service to you—but I must now go look a little after my charge; I have disposed of him in the next room, with lord Plausible, and Mr. Novel, who have been here to day, at the expence of a young Creole, at a turtle feast.

Man. Go your ways, then, I won't detain you; but, I say, you know Olivia's house, and will be sure not to let slip the hour.

Free. I warrant you.

Man. And come straight up to her chamber, without more ado; and bring your charge, and my fellow Oakum, and whoever else you please; the greater your company the better. Here, take the watch—'Tis now five o'clock, and at half an hour after seven precisely—

Free. You need not doubt my diligence; I am an old blood, and can naturally beat up a wench's quarters that won't be civil to my friend—Shan't we break her windows, too?

Man. No, no; be punctual only.

[Exit FREEMAN.]

Enter VARNISH.

How!—Nay, here's a friend indeed! And he, that has him in his arms, can know no wants.

Var. Dear sir! and he, that is in your arms, is secure from all fears whatever: nay, our nation is secure by your defeat at sea; and the French, that fought against you, have proved enemies to themselves only, in bringing you back to us.

Man. Fie, fie—this from a friend? And yet, from any other 'twere insufferable. I thought I should never have taken any thing ill from you.

Var. A friend's privilege is to speak his mind, though it be ill taken.

Man. But your tongue need not tell me you think too well of me; I have found it from your heart, which spoke in actions, your unalterable heart. But Olivia is false, my friend; which I suppose is no news to you.

Var. Why, no—it is not.

Man. But could not you keep her true to me?

Var. Not for my life, sir.

Man. But could you not perceive it at all before I went? Could she so deceive us both?

Var. I must confess, the first time I knew it, was three days after your departure, when she received the money you had left in Fleet-street, in her name; and her fears, it seems, did not hinder her from counting it. You must trust her with all, like a true, generous lover!

Man. And she, like a mean—

Var. Jilting—

Man. Traitorous—

Var. Base—

Man. Damned—

Var. Mercenary strumpet!

Man. Ay, a mercenary strumpet, indeed! for she made me pay her before I had her.

Var. How!—Why, have you had her?

Man. Have I!—

Var. Nay, she deserves you should report it.

Man. Report it!—By Heaven, 'tis true!

Var. How?—sure not!

Man. I do not use to lie, nor you to doubt me.

Var. When?

Man. The night before last.

Var. Confusion!

Man. But, what—you wonder at it! nay, you seem to be angry too.

Var. I cannot but be enraged against her, for her usage of you;—damned, infamous, common jade!

Man. But you do not, for so great a friend, take pleasure enough in your friend's revenge, methinks!

Var. Yes, yes, I am glad to know it, since it is so.

Man. You cannot tell who that rascal, her cuckold, is?

Var. No.

Man. She would keep it from you, I suppose.

Var. Yes, yes.

Man. You would laugh, if you knew but all the circumstances of my gaining her: come, I'll tell you.

Var. Damn her! I don't care to hear any more of her.

Man. Well, you shall hear it presently, then; and, in the mean time, prithee go to her, but not from me, and try if you can get her to lend me an hundred pounds of my money; which I am at present in great want of. You may, perhaps, have some influence with her; and I suppose there is no recovering it by law.

Var. Not any; think not of it; nor by this way neither.

Man. What have you in your head, that makes you seem so unquiet?

Var. Only this base, impudent woman's falsehood.

Man. Oh, my dear friend, be not you too sensible of my wrongs, for then I shall feel them, too, with more pain, and think them insufferable.

Var. But why can't you go to Olivia yourself? methinks she, that granted you the last favour, as they call it, should not deny you any thing.—I understand not that point of kindness, I confess.

Man. No, you do not understand it, and I have not time to let you know all now: but anon, at supper, we'll laugh at leisure together at Olivia's cuckold, who took a young fellow, that goes betwixt his wife and me, for a woman.

Var. Ha!

Man. Senseless, easy rascal! 'twas no wonder she chose him for a husband. She thought him, I thank her, fitter than me for that blind, bearing office.

Var. Take a young fellow for a woman, say you?—'Sdeath, 'tis impossible I could be mistaken! [aside] Sure, he must be a dolt indeed!

Man. Oh, a very buzzard! Did you ever hear so ridiculous a circumstance?

Var. Never, never.

Man. Well, but, my dear friend, I must be gone immediately, in order to meet Olivia again to-night.

Var. To-night! It cannot be, sure?

Man. 'Tis not two hours since I made my young man write to her for that purpose; and she appointed half an hour after seven precisely—In short, I am, and I am not, to meet her.—It is a riddle, but shall be explained.

Var. But don't you apprehend the husband?

Man. He, snivelling gull, a thing to be feared!—A husband—the tamest of creatures!

Var. Very fine!

Man. But I must go to my appointment; you'll meet me here at supper, and then we'll have our laugh out. [Exit.]

VARNISH alone.

Ay, I will meet with you, but it shall be at Olivia's—Sure, it cannot be! she behaves so calmly, with that honest, modest assurance, it cannot be true—And yet he does not use to lie—But then, the woman in man's clothes, whom he calls a man—Well, but I know her to have been a woman—But then, again, his appointment from her to meet with him to-night: I am distracted more with doubt than jealousy. Well, I have no way but to go home immediately, put on a riding-suit, and pretend, to my wife, the same business, which carried me out of town last, requires me to go post to Oxford again to-night: then, if the appointment he boasts of be true, it is sure to hold; and I shall have an opportunity either of clearing her, or revenging myself on both. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Another room in the same tavern.
Tables and chairs.

Enter MAJOR OLDFOX, MRS BLACKACRE, and afterwards COUNSELLOR QUILLET.

Old. But how is it possible, madam, that you can prove your son has no right to his father's estate?

Mrs Black. Let me alone for that, sir; I will get a lawyer shall prove black's white, if occasion be. But suppose I prove it by his father's will; I have a will, sir; or can have one made: and how is it he can help himself?

Old. Nay, then, indeed——

Mrs Black. Yes, yes, I will shew the villain, that he took the wrong sow by the ear, when he meddled with me: I will lead him such a dance, major, as he never was led in his life; and make him pay the piper into the bargain. Come, counselor, we shall be quite snug here.—Major, you are sure it was at this house the villain appointed us to meet him?

Old. Yes, yes, madam, I am very sure; and have left orders below accordingly.

Mrs Black. Well, I suppose he will be for coming to a compromise; but there is no harm in being prepared.—Mr Quillet, let us sit down.

Coun. Just as you please, madam; sit or let it alone; it is the same thing to me.

Mrs Black. I say, counsellor, in part I have already told you what I would have done. With regard to this testament, there are three things to be considered——

Coun. Ay, madam, we will consider them.

Mrs Black. Well, but hear me out; don't snap one up so—I say there are three things to be considered. First, to prove whether the testator was compos mentis. Secondly, whether he was inops concilii. And, thirdly, whether there was a sufficient probat——

Coun. Nay, nay, but, madam, this is all unnecessary.

Mrs Black. Unnecessary! What do you mean? Was it not so ruled—Catling, 15th Edward the First, folio B? Was it not afterwards confirmed in the Exchequer-chamber, upon error, from banco regis? Look at your reports, sir—Crook James, 114.

Coun. Lackaday, Mrs Blackacre, you are really talking in the clouds—have got quite out of your sphere!—I tell you, there was no devise till the 27th Henry VIII.

Mrs Black. I say there was, sir.

Coun. You mean, Mrs Blackacre, there was devise in common-law, but not in secundum statutum; so that your quotation is quite foreign to the purpose: in fine, the whole is nonsense, and I see you know nothing of the law.

Mrs Black. No, sir! but I will shew you that I do know something of the law; and I will lay you five hundred pounds to your nosegay, that I know more of the law than you do; and you shall be instructed!

Coun. Not by you, madam; not by you! Send your solicitor to me; there is your paper of memorandums.

Mrs Black. Impertinent! My paper of memorandums! Odds my life! Return me my fee, too, then; my five guineas that I gave you!

Coun. Don't put yourself in a passion, Mrs Blackacre; I am always calm. As to your fee, I shall not return it; for, if it was double the sum, I have had trouble enough for it.

Mrs Black. Trouble! Major, did you ever see such usage as this?

Coun. To be short with you, madam, you are a person, whose affairs I do not chuse to meddle with; for your causes are such as have been set on the left side of the book any time these six years; and, since your evidence at the last Hilary sittings was pilloried, my lord chief-justice talks of making an order, that you shall not tease his court any more.

Mrs Black. Make an order! Make an order against me, that I should not tease! No, no, they know which side their bread is buttered on better than that. Ecod! if it was not for me; many a one, that is saucy enough in the courts, would make but a scurvy figure out of them.

Coun. Come, come, madam, that affair of the evidence was very black.

Mrs Black. It is false, sir! It was all a prejudice, because he was an Irishman: but, if there was any roguery in it, did not you draw his instructions?

Coun. You deluded, you deceived me——But guard your expressions, Mrs Blackacre; guard your expressions; have a care of an action of scandal.

Mrs Black. Odds my life, is this language to me, you puny upstart of the law! You green bag carrier! You murderer of unfortunate causes! The clerk's ink is scarce off your fingers! What a shame it is, that women should not plead their causes themselves, and not be obliged to employ such ignorant mongrels!

Coun. Well, madam, very well! Take notice, you are in the hands of the law. I call you to witness, sir, that this woman has attacked my reputation. Depend upon it, the bench shall hear of you, and my lord chief-justice determine, which is the best lawyer, you or I. [Exit.

Mrs Black. I have not patience! I will have him caned! I will have him caned in the courts, if it costs me ten thousand pounds—an impudent, saucy—make a rule against me!—And you, major, sitting there, with your mouth open—are you a man, a soldier! to wear a sword by your side, and see me treated—Oh, I wish I had a sword!

Old. Do not make yourself uneasy, madam; I warrant we will be up with him! I will write an essay against him in the newspapers; I can get any thing put in for five shillings and sixpence.

Mrs Black. Go, go, you are a silly old ass.

Enter Waiter.

Waiter. What is the matter, madam?

Mrs Black. Nothing, nothing; go down stairs. Make a rule against me! Odds my life! I wish they durst! Egad, the parliament should hear of it!

Enter FREEMAN, Bailiffs, and JERRY.

Jer. O law! My mother quarrelling with the waiter.—What is the matter here? won't she pay her reckoning?

Free. Bailiffs, execute your writ; there is your prisoner.

Bail. We arrest you in the king's name, at the suit of Mr Freeman, guardian to Jeremiah Blackacre, esq. in an action of ten thousand pounds.

Mrs Black. How, how! in a choke bail action?

Free. Yes, yes; you are taken indeed, madam; and we have discovered your equitable design of providing us with a forged will.

Mrs Black. Undone, undone! no man was ever too hard for me till now.—Oh, Jertry! child, wilt thou vex the mother, that bore thee?

Jer. Ay, for bearing me before wedlock, as you say: but I will teach you to call a Blackacre a bastard, though you are never so much my mother.

Mrs Black. Well, I am undone! not one trick left! Cruel sir, a word with you, I pray.

Free. In vain, madam; you have no way to release yourself now, but by the bonds of matrimony.

Mrs Black. How, sir, how! matrimony! that were but to sue out an habeas corpus, for a removal from one prison to another.

Free. Bailiffs, away with her!

Mrs Black. Oh, stay, sir! can you be so cruel as to bring me under covert baron again, and put it out of my power to sue in my own name? but I see, sir, your aim in all this; and, if you think proper, to make us both easy, I will, out of my jointure, secure you an annuity of three hundred pounds a year, and pay your debts; and that's all you younger brothers desire to marry a widow for, I am sure.

Free. Now, madam, you are come to the point I wanted to bring you to: but you shall find I will not be behind hand with you in generosity; I believe I need not tell you, widow, that I have suffered some injuries from your family, and there is now an estate in it, which lawfully and honestly belongs to me.

Mrs Black. Why, sir, I do remember something, and if you will be so good as to let me speak to my attorney——

Free. As for that, madam, there is no occasion—the land in question brings in about four hundred pounds a year; secure me that, and your person and your son, you are welcome to dispose of as you please.

Jer. What! I hope, master guardian, you are not making agreements without me!

Free. No, no. First, widow, you must say no more, that he is a bastard; have a care of that: and then he must have a settled exhibition of one hundred pounds a year, and a nag of assizes, kept by you, but not upon the common.

Mrs Black. Well, I can grant all this.

Jer. Aye, aye, fair words butter no cabbage: but, guardian, make her sign—sign and seal; or otherwise, if you knew her as well as I, you would not trust her word for a farthing.

Free. I warrant you, 'squire. Come, my lawyer, with writings ready drawn, is within, and in haste.

Mrs Black. Make a rule against me! a paltry jackanapes! [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—OLIVIA'S house. OLIVIA seated at a table, with candles, and a small cabinet.

Oliv. Sure, no intrigue was ever attended with so many odd circumstances as this of mine; I always knew Varnish was a silly fellow, but I thought he had too much experience to mistake a man for a woman. I am glad I picked a quarrel with Eliza, however; because, now, people will never believe I was in her power, but take for malice whatever she may say to my disadvantage. But 'tis just the hour I appointed my young sailor. And, as if my husband had not committed blunders enough already, he is again conveniently gone out of town, to give me a better opportunity of entertaining him: but I married him for a convenience. Hold, don't I hear somebody treading softly along the passage!

Enter FIDELIA, through the back scene.

Who's there? my dear!

Fide. My life!

Oliv. Well, this is kind; now, I think, you really love me, because you are punctual to your assignation. I was afraid the misadventure, when you was here last, would have frightened you from coming any more; and then I should have been so unhappy——

Fide. Why, really, madam, I was under some apprehensions.

Oliv. Go, you little coward! you a son of Neptune, and talk of fear! but stay, I'll lock the door, though there be no occasion for it, but to keep out your fears, and those ugly fits you tell me you are subject to.

Man. [At the door.] You have impudence enough to give me fits, and make revenge still impotent.

Oliv. What do you say?

Fide. Madam!

Oliv. I thought I heard you speak—come—sit down here—what makes you so pensive?

Fide. I am thinking, madam, if your husband should surprise us again!

Oliv. There's no danger; he's ten miles out of town by this time; however, don't mention his name, lest it should prove ominous.

Fide. Well, but wont you give me the satisfaction of telling you how I abused him last?

Oliv. I have heard enough of it: I hate any discourse, when he, or Manly, must be part of the subject. No, let me rather resume the conversation I began yesterday—Are you willing to go off with me?

Fide. Whither, madam?

Oliv. Any where—to Lapland, or India—I repeat it once more—I have a sufficient fortune to make us happy. [Trampling without.]

Fide. Hist! don't I hear a noise?

Oliv. No, no. [Trampling.]

Fide. Pray, madam, listen: I am sure I hear the motion of feet upon the stairs.

Oliv. I tell you it is no such thing. [Trampling.]

Fide. Hark! it grows louder.

Oliv. Be silent, then—there's somebody tampering with the lock of the door. Step gently this way—[VARNISH speaks within]—Death and confusion, 'tis my husband! I heard him speak to the footboy—he has sent him round to bar the garden gate.

Fide. I thought, madam, your husband was out of town, you said.

Oliv. No, no, 'tis he. Fool that I was, to trust in his pretended ignorance, or think his reconciliation real! he has laid this train purposely for my undoing. He has stopt the only passage we could get out by; and I know his revengeful temper so well, if he finds us here, he'll murder us. Let us escape your way by the balcony: here, take this cabinet, it contains jewels and bank notes to a considerable value; here, put out the candles, while I go into the next room and pull down the curtains.

[Erit.]

Enter MANLY.

Fide. This cabinet, I believe, is yours, sir.

Man. It is mine now, indeed; and shall never escape from me again, at least to her.

Fide. Did you ever hear such a wretch, sir?

Man. A wretch! why she makes love like a devil in a play. But she wanted to elope with you, sir; you never told me that!

Fide. Oh, sir, I have not told you half her wickedness; [loud noise] but they are breaking open the door. What shall I do, sir?

Man. Stay where you are, and fear nothing. Now we shall see who this happy man is she calls husband.

Enter VARNISH.

Var. With much labour and forcing, I have at last gained admittance: but now, to find out the occasion of all this privacy and barricading—I heard people talk in the room, I am sure—Ha! what's here?

Man. Sword and dark lantern, villain, are some odds; however, I believe I shall be able to deal with you—don't be frightened, my little volunteer.

Fide. Only for your life, sir.

Var. Damnation! two at once—but I'll make sure of one of them at least.

Fide. Murder! help! murder!

Enter OLIVIA, and then FREEMAN, LORD PLAUSIBLE, and NOVEL.

Oliv. What means this uproar? Distraction! my husband has got in! then we shall have murder indeed. Oh stay, you must not kill one unable to defend himself! lights! lights!

Enter footboy, with lights.

Man. Now, sir, where are you? Freeman, look to the door.—Hold, my dearest, after so much kindness past between us, I cannot part with you yet—Freeman, let no body out; for, notwithstanding your lights, we are still in the dark, till this gentleman turns his face—How!

Varnish! Are you the happy man?—You! You!—Speak, I say—But your guilty silence tells me all. Well, I will not upbraid you; let your own reflections be your punishment—Fare ye well, sir!

Free. Look yonder, captain, to the volunteer; he is hurt, and I believe fainting.

Fide. No, sir, 'tis only my fright, not yet well over: I shall recover here in the next room.

Man. My boy hurt?

Enter MRS BLACKACRE and JERRY.

Mrs Black. I dare swear there is something going forward contrary to the statute; and as, in that remarkable case, Stokes plaintiff, against Jenkins and other defendants—But I'll take minutes; for perhaps one side or other may chuse to bring it into the courts.

Jer. Well, my mother will never let the law alone, I see that; for when she's at a loss for wherewithal to go herself, she's for setting other people at it.

Man. Oh Heaven!—Freeman, come here!

Free. How now? What's the matter?

Man. More miracles still—The volunteer's a woman!

All. A woman!

Fide. Dear captain, spare my blushes; yet, wherefore should I be ashamed of a virtuous and generous passion? Yes, I am a woman, I own it; and, through love for the worthiest of men, have attempted to follow him in this disguise; partly out of fear to disclose my sentiments, for I knew of his engagements to that lady; and the constancy of his nature, which nothing but herself could have changed.

Man. Dear madam, I desired you to bring me out of confusion, and you have given me more: I know not what to speak to, or how to look upon you; the sense of my rough and ill usage gives me more pain, now it is over, than you felt when you suffered it: but, if my affections, once prostituted to such a woman—

Oliv. My breast burns with fury, indignation, disdain, and must have vent. Coxcomb, idiot, brute! But think not long to triumph, for I go to have such vengeance on ye—

L. Plau. Madam, will you permit me the honour of your fair hand?

Oliv. Take it. [Strikes him, and Erit.]

Nov. Ha, ha, ha! There's for your gentleman-ushership, my lord! Well, what do you think of her now? Did not I always tell you she was a jilt?

L. Plau. Take it from me, Mr Novel, she's a lady of great virtue and delicacy; though, indeed, I could not have believed her fingers to have been quite so hard.

Mrs Black. But, pray, captain Manly, a word with you. Is not this my cousin Olivia's house and furniture? And do you eject her, seize on her goods and chattels vi et armis? Ecod, if I was she, I'd make demand—bring my trover.

Man. Good Mrs Blackacre, be pacified: if your cousin had her deserts, the law would be her greatest enemy. And now, madam, let me beg of you to accept of this, and, with it, my heart; both, I confess, too small a recompense for your merit; for you deserve the Indian world, and I would go thither, out of covetousness, for your sake.

Fide. Your heart, sir, is a present of that value, I can never make any return for it: but I can give you back such a present as this, which I got by the death of my father, a gentleman of the north, whose only child I was; [gives a paper.] therefore left me in the present possession of 2000*l.* a year. The name of my family is Grey; my other, Fidelia; the rest of my story you shall know, when I have fewer auditors.

Man. Nay, madam, you now take from me all power of making you any compliment on my part. I was going to tell you, that, on your account only, I would forego the pleasures of a retirement I have long wished for, and be reconciled again to the world, which was grown odious to me: but if I should, I doubt my friend here would say it was your estate made me friends with it.

Free. I must confess I should; for I think most of our quarrels to the world are just such as we sometimes have to a handsome woman, only because she won't grant us as many favours as we could wish.

Man. Nay, if you are a Plain Dealer, too, give me your hand; and, for your two sakes, though I have been so lately deceived in both sexes, I will believe there are still in the world good-natured friends who are not prostitutes, and handsome women worthy to be friends.

[Exeunt omnes.]

Scene—A gallery in LORD TOUCHWOOD'S house, with chambers adjoining.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A gallery in LORD TOUCHWOOD'S house, with chambers adjoining.

Enter CARELESS, crossing the stage, with his hat, gloves, and sword in his hands, as just risen from table; MELLEFONT following him.

Mel. NED, Ned, whither so fast! What, turned flincher! Why, you will not leave us?

Care. Where are the women? I am weary of guzzling, and begin to think them the better company.

Mel. Then thy reason staggers, and thou art almost drunk.

Care. No, faith, but your fools grow noisy; and, if a man must endure the noise of words without sense, I think the women have more musical voices, and become nonsense better.

Mel. Why, they are at the end of the gallery, retired to their tea and scandal, according to their ancient custom after dinner. But I made a pretence to follow you, because I had something to say to you in private, and I am not like to have many opportunities this evening.

Care. And here is this coxcomb most critically come to interrupt you.

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Boys, boys, lads, where are you? What, do you give ground? Mortgage for a bottle, ha? Careless, this is your trick; you are always spoiling company by leaving it.

Care. And thou art always spoiling company by coming into it.

Brisk. Pooh, ha, ha, ha! I know you envy me. Spite, proud spite, by the gods! and burning envy. I'll be judged by Mellefont here, who gives and takes raillery better, you or I. Pshaw, man; when I say you spoil company by leaving it, I mean you leave nobody for the company to laugh at. I think there I was with you, ha! Mellefont?

Mel. O' my word, Brisk, that was a home thrust—you have silenced him.

Brisk. Oh, my dear Mellefont, let me perish, if thou art not the soul of conversation, the very essence of wit, and spirit of wine—The deuce take me, if there were three good things said, or one understood, since thy amputation from the body of our society—Heh! I think that's pretty, and metaphorical enough: Egad, I could not have said it out of thy company—Careless, ha!

Care. Hum, what is it?

Brisk. O, mon cœur! What is it! Nay, gad, I will punish you for want of apprehension: the deuce take me, if I tell you.

Mel. No, no, hang him, he has no taste—But, dear Brisk, excuse me, I have a little business.

Care. Prithee, get thee gone: thou see'st we are serious.

Mel. We'll come immediately, if you'll but go in, and keep up good humour and sense in the company: Prithee do—they'll fall asleep else.

Brisk. Egad so they will—Well, I will, I will; gad you shall command me from the zenith to the nadir. But the deuce take me, if I say a good thing till you come. But, prithee, dear rogue, make haste, prithee make haste, I shall burst else. And yonder your uncle, my lord Touchwood, swears he will disinherit you, and sir Paul Plyant threatens to disclaim you for a son-in-law, and my lord Froth won't dance at your wedding to-morrow; nor the deuce take me, I won't write your epithalamium—and see what a condition you are like to be brought to.

Mel. Well, I will speak but three words, and follow you.

Brisk. Enough, enough. Careless, bring your apprehension along with you. [Exit BRISK.]

Care. Pert coxcomb!

Mel. Faith, 'tis a good-natured coxcomb, and has very entertaining follies—You must be more humane to him; at this juncture it will do me service. I'll tell you, I would have mirth continued this day at any rate, though patience purchase folly, and attention be paid with noise.—There are times, when sense may be unseasonable, as well as truth. Prithee, do thou wear none to-day; but allow Brisk to have wit, that thou mayst seem a fool.

Care. Why, how now, why this extravagant proposition?

Mel. O, I would have no room for serious design, for I am jealous of a plot. I would have noise and impertinence keep my Lady Touchwood's head from working: for hell is not more busy than her brain, nor contains more devils than that imaginations.

Care. I thought your fear of her had been over. Is not to-morrow appointed for your marriage with Cynthia, and her father sir Paul Plyant come to settle the writings this day, on purpose?

Mel. True; but you shall judge, whether I have not reason to be alarmed. None, besides you and Maskwell, are acquainted with the secret of my aunt Touchwood's violent passion for me. Since my first refusal of her addresses, she has endeavoured to do me all ill offices with my uncle; yet has managed them with that subtilty, that to him they have borne the face of kindness, while her malice, like a dark lanthorn, only shone upon me, where it was directed. Still it gave me less perplexity to prevent the success of her displeasure, than to avoid the importunities of her love; and, of two evils, I thought myself favoured in her aversion: but, whether urged by her despair, and the short prospect of time she saw to accomplish her designs; whether the hopes of revenge, or of her love, terminated in the view of this my marriage with Cynthia, I know not; but this morning she surprised me in my bed.

Care. Was there ever such a fury! It is well nature has not put it into her sex's power to ravish. Well, bless us! proceed. What followed?

Mel. What at first amazed me; for I looked to have seen her in all the transports of a slighted and revengeful woman: but when I expected thunder from her voice, and lightning in her eyes, I saw her melted into tears, and hushed into a sigh. It was long before either of us spoke; passion had tied her tongue, and amazement mine. In short, the consequence was thus: she omitted nothing, that the most violent love could urge, or tender words express; which, when she saw had no effect, but still I pleaded honour and nearness of blood to my uncle, then came the storm I feared at first; for, starting from my bedside like a fury, she flew to my sword, and, with much ado, I prevented her doing me or herself a mischief: having disarmed her, in a gust of passion she left me, and in a resolution, confirmed by a thousand curses, not to close her eyes, till they had seen my ruin.

Care. Exquisite woman! But, what the devil! does she think thou hast no more sense than to get an heir to disinherit thyself? for, as I take it, this settlement upon you is with a proviso, that your uncle have no children.

Mel. It is so. Well, the service you are to do me will be a pleasure to yourself. I must get you to engage my lady Plyant all this evening, that my pious aunt may not work her to her interest; and, if you chance to secure her to yourself, you may incline her to mine. She is handsome, and knows it; is very silly, and thinks she has sense; and has an old fond husband.

Care. I confess a very fair foundation for a lover to build upon.

Mel. For my lord Froth, he and his wife will be sufficiently taken up with admiring one another, and Brisk's gallantry, as they call it. I will observe my uncle myself; and Jack Maskwell has promised me to watch my aunt narrowly, and give me notice upon any suspicion. As for sir Paul, my wise father-in-law that is to be, my dear Cynthia has such a share in his fatherly fondness, he would scarce make her a moment uneasy, to have her happy hereafter.

Care. So, you have manned your works; but I wish you may not have the weakest guard, where the enemy is strongest.

Mel. Maskwell, you mean; pr'ythee why should you suspect him?

Care. Faith I cannot help it; you know I never liked him; I am a little superstitious in physiognomy.

Mel. He has obligations of gratitude to bind him to me; his dependence upon my uncle is through my means.

Care. Upon your aunt, you mean.

Mel. My aunt!

Care. I am mistaken, if there be not a familiarity between them you do not suspect, notwithstanding her passion for you.

Mel. Pooh, pooh; nothing in the world but his design to do me service; and he endeavours to be well in her esteem, that he may be able to effect it.

Care. Well, I shall be glad to be mistaken: but your aunt's aversion, in her revenge, cannot be any way so effectually shewn, as in bringing forth a child to disinherit you. She is handsome and cunning, and naturally wanton. Maskwell is flesh and blood at best, and opportunities between them are frequent. His affection to you, you have confessed; is grounded upon his interest; that you have transplanted; and, should it take root in my lady, I do not see what you can expect from the fruit.

Mel. I confess the consequence is visible, were your suspicions just.—But see, the company is broke up; let us meet them.

Enter Lord Touchwood, Lord Froth, Sir Paul Plyant, and Brisk.

Lord Touch. Out upon't, nephew—leave your father-in-law, and me, to maintain our ground against young people!

Mel. I beg your lordship's pardon—we were just returning—

Sir Paul. Were you, son? Gadshud, much better as it is—Good, strange! I swear I'm almost tipsy—t'other bottle would have been too powerful for me—as sure as can be it would.—We wanted your company, but Mr. Brisk—where is he? I swear and vow he's a most facetious person—and the best company.—And my lord Froth, your lordship is so merry a man, he, he, he!

Lord Froth. O foy, sir Paul, what do you mean? Merry! O barbarous! I'd as lieve you called me fool.

Sir Paul. Nay, I protest and vow now, 'tis true; when Mr. Brisk jokes, your lordship's laugh does so become you, he, he, he!

Lord Froth. Ridiculous! sir Paul, you're strangely mistaken; I find champagne is powerful. I assure you, sir Paul, I laugh at nobody's jest but my own, or a lady's; I assure you, sir Paul.

Brisk. How? how, my lord? What, affront my wit! Let me perish, do I never say any thing worthy to be laughed at?

Lord Froth. O foy, don't misapprehend me: I don't say so; for I often smile at your conceptions. But there is nothing more unbecoming a man of quality, than to laugh; 'tis such a vulgar expression of the passion! every body can laugh. Then, especially, to laugh at the jest of an inferior person, or when any body else of the same quality does not laugh with one. Ridiculous! to be pleased with what pleases the crowd! Now, when I laugh, I always laugh alone.

Brisk. I suppose that's because you laugh at your own jests, 'egad, ha, ha, ha!

Lord Froth. He, he, I swear though! your railery provokes me to a smile.

Brisk. Ay, my lord, it's a sign I hit you in the teeth, if you shew them.

Lord Froth. He, he, he! I swear that's so very pretty, I can't forbear.

Lord Touch. Sir Paul, if you please we'll retire to the ladies, and drink a dish of tea to settle our heads.

Sir Paul. With all my heart.—Mr. Brisk, you'll come to us—or call to me when you joke—I'll be ready to laugh incontinently.

[Exeunt Lord Touch. and Sir Paul.]

Mel. But does your lordship never see comedies?

Lord Froth. O yes, sometimes; but I never laugh.

Mel. No!

Lord Froth. Oh no—never laugh, indeed, sir.

Care. No! Why, what d'ye go there for?

Lord Froth. To distinguish myself from the commonalty, and mortify the poets;—the fellows grow so conceited, when any of their foolish wit prevails upon the side-boxes.—I swear—he, he, he! I have often constrained my inclinations to laugh—he, he, he! to avoid giving them encouragement.

Mel. You are cruel to yourself, my lord, as well as malicious to them.

Lord Froth. I confess I did myself some violence at first, but now I think I have conquered it.

Brisk. Let me perish, my lord, but there is something very particular in the humour; 'tis true, it makes against wit, and I'm sorry for some friends of mine that write; but 'egad, I love to be malicious.—Nay, deuce take me, there's wit in't, too—and wit must be foiled by wit; cut a diamond with a diamond; no other way, 'egad.

Lord Froth. Oh, I thought you would not be long before you found out the wit.

Care. Wit! In what? Where the devil's the wit in not laughing, when a man has a mind to't?

Brisk. O lord, why, can't you find it out?—Why, there 'tis, in the not laughing.—Don't you apprehend me?—My lord, Careless is a very honest fellow; but hark ye—you understand me, somewhat heavy, a little shallow, or so.—Why, I'll tell you now; suppose, now, you come up to me—Nay, pr'ythee, Careless, be instructed. Suppose, as I was saying, you come up to me, holding your sides, and laughing, as if you would—Well—I look grave, and ask the cause of this immoderate mirth—You laugh on still, and are not able to tell me—Still I look grave, not so much as smile.—

Care. Smile, no; what the devil should you smile at, when you suppose I can't tell you?

Brisk. Pshaw, pshaw, pr'ythee don't interrupt me.—But I tell you, you shall tell me—at last—But it shall be a great while first.

Care. Well; but pr'ythee don't let it be a great while, because I long to have it over.

Brisk. Well, then, you tell me some good jest, or very witty thing, laughing all the while as if you were ready to die—and I hear it, and look thus.—Would not you be disappointed?

Care. No: for if it were a witty thing, I should not expect you to understand it.

Lord Froth. O foy, Mr. Careless, all the world allows Mr. Brisk to have wit; my wife says he has a great deal. I hope you think her a judge.

Brisk. Pooh, my lord, his voice goes for nothing.—I can't tell how to make him apprehend.—Take it t'other way. Suppose I say a witty thing to you?

Care. Then I shall be disappointed, indeed.

Mel. Let him alone, Brisk; he is obstinately bent not to be instructed.

Brisk. I'm sorry for him, the deuce take me.

Mel. Shall we go to the ladies, my lord?

Lord Froth. With all my heart;—methinks we are a solitude without them.

Mel. Or, what say you to another bottle of champagne?

Lord Froth. O, for the universe, not a drop more, I beseech you. Oh, intemperate! I have a flushing in my face already.

[Takes out a pocket glass, and looks in it.

Brisk. Let me see, let me see, my lord! I broke my glass that was in the lid of my snuff-box. Hum! Deuce take me, I have encouraged a pimple here too. [Takes the glass, and looks.

Lord Froth. Then you must mortify him with a patch; my wife shall supply you. Come, gentlemen; allons! here is company coming.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Enter Lady TOUCHWOOD and MASKWELL.

Lady Touch. I'll hear no more—Y'are false and ungrateful; come, I know you false.

Mask. I have been frail, I confess, madam, for your ladyship's service.

Lady Touch. That I should trust a man, whom I had known betray his friend!

Mask. What friend have I betrayed? or to whom?

Lady Touch. Your fond friend Mellefont, and to me—Can you deny it?

Mask. I do not.

Lady Touch. Have you not wronged my Lord, who has been a father to you in your wants, and given you being? Have you not wronged him in the highest manner, in his bed?

Mask. With your ladyship's help, and for your service, as I told you before. I cannot deny that, neither. Any thing more, madam?

Lady Touch. More! audacious villain. Oh, what's more is most my shame—Have you not dishonoured me?

Mask. No, that I deny: for I never told in all my life; so that accusation's answered—On to the next.

Lady Touch. Death! do you dally with my passion? Insolent devil! But have a care—provoke me not; for, by the eternal fire, you shall not escape my vengeance! Calm villain! how unconcerned he stands, confessing treachery and ingratitude! Is there a vice more black!—Oh, I have excuses, thousands, for my faults: fire in my temper; passions in my soul, apt to every provocation; oppressed, at once, with love and with despair: but a sedate, a thinking villain, whose black blood runs temperately bad, what excuse can clear?

Mask. Will you be in temper, madam? I would not talk not to be heard. I have been [She walks about disordered.] a very great rogue for your sake, and you reproach me with it; I am ready to be a rogue still, to do you service; and you are flinging conscience and honour in my face, to rebate my inclinations. How am I to behave myself? You know I am your creature, my life and fortune in your power; to disoblige you brings me certain ruin. Allow it, I would betray you, I would not be a traitor to myself I do not pretend to honesty, because you know I am a rascal: but I would convince you, from the necessity of my being firm to you.

Lady Touch. Necessity, impudence! Can no gratitude incline you, no obligations touch you? Were you not in the nature of a servant, and have not I, in effect, made you lord of all, of me, and of my lord? Where is that humble love, the languishing, that adoration, which once was paid me, and everlastingly engaged?

Mask. Fixed, rooted in my heart, whence nothing can remove them; yet you——

Lady Touch. Yet, what yet?

Mask. Nay, misconceive me not, madam, when I say I have had a generous and faithful passion, which you had never favoured but through revenge and policy.

Lady Touch. Ha!

Mask. Look you, madam, we are alone. Pray contain yourself, and hear me. You know you loved your nephew, when I first sighed for you; I quickly found it; an argument that I loved: for with that art you veiled your passion, 'twas imperceptible to all but jealous eyes. This discovery made me bold, I confess it; for, by it, I thought you in my power. Your nephew's scorn of you added to my hopes; I watched the occasion, and took you, just repulsed by him, warm at once with love and indignation; your disposition, my arguments, and happy opportunity, accomplished my design; I prest the yielding minute, and was blest. How I have loved you since, words have not shewn; then, how should words express?

Lady Touch. Well, mollifying devil!——And have I not met your love?

Mask. Your zeal, I grant, was ardent, but misplaced; there was revenge in view; that woman's idol had defiled the temple of the god, and love was made a mock-worship——A son and heir would have edged young Mellefont upon the brink of ruin, and left him none but you to catch at for prevention.

Lady Touch. Again provoke me! Do you wind me like a larum, only to rouse my stilled soul for your diversion? Confusion!

Mask. Nay, madam, I am gone, if you relapse——What needs this? I say nothing but what you yourself, in open hours of love, have told me. Why should you deny it? Nay, how can you? Is not all this present heat owing to the same fire? Do you not love him still? How have I this day offended you, but in not breaking off his match with Cynthia? which, ~~are~~ to-morrow, shall be done——had you but patience.

Lady Touch. How! what said you, Maskwell?——Another caprice to unwind my temper?

Mask. By Heaven, no! I am your slave, the slave of all your pleasures; and will not rest till I have given you peace, would you suffer me.

Lady Touch. Oh, Maskwell! in vain do I disguise me from thee: thou knowest me, knowest my soul——married to-morrow! Despair strikes me! Yet my soul knows I hate him, too: let him but once be mine——

Mask. Compose yourself, you shall possess and ruin him, too——Will that please you?

Lady Touch. How, how? thou dear, thou precious villain, how?

Mask. You have already been tampering with my Lady Plyant.

Lady Touch. I have; she is ready for any impression I think fit.

Mask. She must be thoroughly persuaded that Mellefont loves her.

Lady Touch. She is so credulous that way naturally, and likes him so well, that she will believe it faster than I can persuade her. But I don't see what you can propose from such a trifling design; for her first conversing with Mellefont will convince her of the contrary.

Mask. I know it—I don't depend upon it——But it will prepare something else; and gain us leisure to lay a stronger plot——If I gain a little time, I shall not want contrivance.

One minute gives invention to destroy,
What, to rebuild, will a whole age employ.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter Lady FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Cyn. INDEED, madam! Is it possible your ladyship could have been so much in love?

Lady Froth. I could not sleep; I did not sleep one wink for three weeks together.

Cyn. Prodigious! I wonder want of sleep, and so much love, and so much wit as your ladyship has, did not turn your brain.

Lady Froth. O my dear Cynthia, you must not rully your friend—but really, as you say, I wonder, too—but then I had a way. For, between you and I, I had whimsies and vapours—but I gave them vent.

Cyn. How, pray, madam?

Lady Froth. O, I writ, writ abundantly——Do you never write?

Cyn. Write, what?

Lady Froth. Songs, elegies, satires, encomiums, panegyrics, lampoons, plays, or heroic poems.

Cyn. O lord, not I, madam; I am content to be a courteous reader.

Lady Froth. O inconsistent! in love, and not write! If my lord and I had been both of your temper, we had never come together——O bless me! what a sad thing would that have been, if my lord and I should never have met!

Cyn. Then, neither my lord nor you would ever have met with your match, on my conscience.

Lady Froth. O' my conscience no more we should; thou say'st right——for sure my Lord Froth is as fine a gentleman, and as much a man of quality! Ah! nothing at all of the common air——I think I may say he wants nothing but a blue ribband and a star, to make him shine the very phosphorus of our hemisphere. Do you understand those two hard words? If you don't, I'll explain them to you.

Cyn. Yes, yes, madam, I am not so ignorant—At least I won't own it, to be troubled with your instructions. [Aside.]

Lady Froth. Nay, I beg your pardon; but being derived from the Greek, I thought you might have escaped the etymology—But I am the more amazed, to find you a woman of letters, and not write! Bless me! how can Mellefont believe you love him?

Cyn. Why, faith, madam, he, that won't take my word, shall never have it under my hand.

Lady Froth. I vow Mellefont's a pretty gentleman, but methinks he wants a manner.

Cyn. A manner! What's that, madam?

Lady Froth. Some distinguishing quality; as, for example, the bel air or brillant of Mr Brisk; the solemnity, yet complaisance of my lord; or something of his own that should look a little je ne sçai quoi; he is too much a mediocrity, in my mind.

Cyn. He does not indeed affect either pertness or formality, for which I like him—Here he comes.

Enter Lord Froth, Mellefont, and Brisk.

Impertinent creature! I could almost be angry with her now. [Aside.]

Lady Froth. My lord, I have been telling Cynthia how much I have been in love with you; I swear I have; I'm not ashamed to own it now. Ah! it makes my heart leap; I vow I sigh when I think on't:—My dear lord! ha, ha, ha, do you remember, my lord?

[Squeezes him by the hand, looks kindly on him, sighs, and then laughs out.]

Lord Froth. Pleasant creature! Perfectly well. Ah! that look! Ay, there it is; who could resist!—'Twas so my heart was made a captive at first, and ever since it has been in love with happy slavery.

Lady Froth. O that tongue, that dear deceitful tongue! that charming softness in your mien and your expression! and then your bow! Good, my lord, bow as you did when I gave you my picture; here, suppose this my picture—[Gives him a pocket glass.—Pray mind, my lord; ah! he bows charmingly. Nay, my lord, you shan't kiss it so much; I shall grow jealous, I vow now. [He bows profoundly low, then kisses the glass.]

Lord Froth. I saw myself there, and kissed it for your sake.

Lady Froth. Ah! gallantry to the last degree—Mr Brisk, you are a judge; was ever any thing so well bred as my lord?

Brisk. Never any thing but your ladyship, let me perish.

Lady Froth. O prettily turned again; let me die but you have a great deal of wit—Mr.

Mellefont, don't you think Mr Brisk has a world of wit?

Mel. O yes, madam.

Brisk. O dear, madam—

Lady Froth. An infinite deal!

Brisk. Oh Heavens, madam—

Lady Froth. More wit than any body.

Brisk. I am everlastingly your humble servant, deuce take me, madam.

Lord Froth. Don't you think us a happy couple?

Cyn. I vow, my lord, I think you the happiest couple in the world.

Lord Froth. I hope Mellefont will make a good husband, too.

Cyn. 'Tis my interest to believe he will, my lord.

Lord Froth. D'ye think he'll love you as well as I do my wife? I am afraid not.

Cyn. I believe he'll love me better.

Lord Froth. Heavens! that can never be; but why do you think so?

Cyn. Because he has not so much reason to be fond of himself.

Lord Froth. O your humble servant for that, dear madam. Well, Mellefont, you'll be a happy creature.

Mel. Ay, my lord, I shall have the same reason for my happiness that your lordship has; I shall think myself happy.

Lord Froth. Ah, that's all.

Brisk. [To Lady Froth.] Your ladyship is in the right; but, 'egad, I'm wholly turned into satire. I confess I write but seldom, but when I do—keen Iambics, 'egad. But my lord was telling me, your ladyship has made an essay toward an heroic poem.

Lady Froth. Did my lord tell you? Yes, I vow, and the subject is my lord's love to me. And what do you think I call it? I dare swear you won't guess—The Syllabus! ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Because my lord's title's Froth, 'egad; ha, ha, ha, ha! deuce take me, very à propos, and surprizing, ha, ha, ha!

Lady Froth. He, he! ay, is not it?—And then I call my lord Spumosa; and myself—what do you think I call myself?

Brisk. Lactilla, may be—'Egad I cannot tell.

Lady Froth. Biddy, that's all; just my own name.

Brisk. Biddy! 'Egad very pretty—Deuce take me, if your ladyship has not the art of surprizing the most naturally in the world—I hope you'll make me happy in communicating the poem.

Lady Froth. O, you must be my confident; I must ask your advice.

Brisk. I'm your humble servant, let me perish—I presume your ladyship has read Bossu?

Lady Froth. O yes, and Rapine, and Dacier upon Aristotle and Horace.—My lord, you must not be jealous! I'm communicating all to Mr Brisk.

Lord Froth. No, no, I'll allow Mr Brisk; come, have you nothing about you to shew him, my dear?

Lady Froth. Yes, I believe I have. Mr Brisk, will you go into the next room, and there I'll shew you what I have.

[Exeunt LADY FROTH and BRISK.]

Lord Froth. I'll walk a turn in the garden, and come to you. [Exit LORD FROTH.]

Mel. You are thoughtful, Cynthia.

Cyn. I am thinking, though marriage makes man and wife one flesh, it leaves them still two fools; and they become more conspicuous by setting off one another.

Mel. That's only, when two fools meet, and their follies are opposed.

Cyn. Nay, I have known two wits meet, and, by the opposition of their wit, render themselves as ridiculous as fools. 'Tis an odd game we are going to play at; what think you of drawing stakes, and giving over in time?

Mel. No, hang it, that's not endeavouring to win, because it is possible we may lose; since we have shuffled and cut, let us e'en turn up trump now.

Cyn. Then, I find it is like cards; if either of us have a good hand, it is an accident of fortune.

Mel. No, marriage is rather like a game at bowls: fortune indeed makes the match, and the two nearest, and sometimes the two farthest are together, but the game depends entirely upon judgment.

Cyn. Still it is a game, and consequently one of us must be a loser.

Mel. Not at all; only a friendly trial of skill, and the winnings to be laid out in an entertainment.

Enter SIR PAUL PLYANT and LADY PLYANT.

Sir Paul. Gads bud! I am provoked into a fermentation, as my lady Froth says; was ever the like read of in story?

Lady Ply. Sir Paul, have patience; let me alone to rattle him up.

Sir Paul. Pray your ladyship give me leave to be angry—I'll rattle him up, I warrant you, I'll firk him with a certiorari.

Lady Ply. You firk him! I'll firk him myself. Pray, sir Paul, hold you contented.

Cyn. Bless me, what makes my father in such a passion!—I never saw him thus before.

Sir Paul. Hold yourself contented, my lady Plyant—I find passion coming upon me by inflation, and I cannot submit as formerly; therefore, give way.

Lady Ply. How now! will you be pleased to retire, and—

Sir Paul. No, marry, will I not be pleased; I am pleased to be angry, that is my pleasure at this time.

Mel. What can this mean?

Lady Ply. Gads my life, the man's distracted!

why, how now, who are you? What am I? Skidkins, can't I govern you? What did I marry you for? Am I not absolute and uncontrollable? Is it fit a woman of my spirit and conduct should be contradicted in a matter of this concern?

Sir Paul. It concerns me, and only me:—Besides, I am not to be governed at all times. When I am in tranquillity, my lady Plyant shall command sir Paul; but, when I am provoked to fury, I cannot incorporate with patience and reason;—as soon may tigers match with tigers, lambs with lambs, and every creature couple with its foe, as the poet says.—

Lady Ply. He's hot-headed still! 'tis in vain to talk to you; but, remember, I have a curtain-lecture for you, you disobedient, headstrong brute.

Sir Paul. No, 'tis because I won't be headstrong, because I won't be a brute, and have my head fortified, that I am thus exasperated.—But I will protect my honour, and yonder is the violator of my fame.

Lady Ply. 'Tis my honour that is concerned, and the violation was intended to me.—Your honour! you have none but what is in my keeping, and I can dispose of it when I please—therefore, don't provoke me.

Sir Paul. Hum! gads-bud, she says true—Well, my lady, march on, I will fight under you, then; I am convinced as far as passion will permit.

[LADY PLYANT and SIR PAUL come up to MELLEFONT.]

Lady Ply. Inhuman and treacherous—

Sir Paul. Thou serpent, and first tempter of womankind—

Cyn. Bless me, sir! Madam, what mean you?

Sir Paul. Thy, Thy, come away, Thy, touch him not; come hither, girl; go not near him; there is nothing but deceit about him; snakes are in his peruke, and the crocodile of Nilus is in his belly; he will eat thee up alive.

Lady Ply. Dishonourable, impudent creature!

Mel. For Heaven's sake, madam, to whom do you direct this language?

Lady Ply. Have I behaved myself with all the decorum and nicety, befitting the person of sir Paul's wife? Have I preserved my honour, as it were, in a snow-house for these three years past? Have I been white and unsullied even by sir Paul himself?

Sir Paul. Nay, she has been an invincible wife, even to me, that's the truth on't.

Lady Ply. Have I, I say, preserved myself like a fair sheet of paper, for you to make a blot upon?

Sir Paul. And she shall make a simile with any woman in England.

Mel. I am so amazed, I know not what to say.

Sir Paul. Do you think my daughter, this pretty creature—gads-bud, she's a wife for a cherubin! Do you think her fit for nothing but to be a stalking horse, to stand before you, while you take aim at my wife? Gadsbud, I was never angry before in my life, and I'll never be appeased again.

Mel. Hell and damnation! this is my aunt; such malice can be engendered no where else.

[Aside.

Lady Ply. Sir Paul, take Cynthia from his sight; leave me to strike him with the remorse of his intended crime.

Cyn. Pray, sir, stay! hear him; I dare affirm he's innocent.

Sir Paul. Innocent! Why, hark'ee, come hither, Thy; hark'ee, I had it from his aunt, my sister Touchwood—Gads-bud, he does not care a farthing for any thing of thee, but thy portion; why, he's in love with my wife; he would have tantalized thee, and made a cuckold of thy poor father; and that would certainly have broke my heart—I am sure, if ever I should have horns, they would kill me; they would never come kindly; I should die of them, like a child that was cutting his teeth—I should, indeed, Thy—therefore, come away; but Providence has prevented all; therefore, come away when I bid you.

Cyn. I must obey.

[Exeunt SIR PAUL and CYNTHIA.

Lady Ply. Oh, such a thing! the impiety of it startles me—to wrong so good, so fair a creature, and one that loves you tenderly—'Tis a barbarity of barbarities, and nothing could be guilty of it—

Mel. But the greatest villain imagination can form, I grant it; and next to the villainy of such a fact, is the villainy of aspersing me with the guilt. How? Which way was I to wrong her? For yet I understand you not.

Lady Ply. Why, gads my life, cousin Mellefont, you cannot be so peremptory as to deny it, when I tax you with it to your face; for, now sir Paul is gone, you are corum nobis.

Mel. By Heaven, I love her more than life, or—

Lady Ply. Fiddle, faddle, don't tell me of this and that. and every thing in the world, but give me mathemacular demonstration—answer me directly—But I have not patience—Oh! the impiety of it, as I was saying, and the unparalleled wickedness! O merciful father! How could you think to reverse nature so, to make the daughter the means of procuring the mother?

Mel. The daughter to procure the mother!

Lady Ply. Ay, for though I am not Cynthia's own mother, I am her father's wife, and that's near enough to make it incest.

Mel. Incest! O! my precious aunt, and the devil in conjunction!

[Aside.

Lady Ply. O reflect upon the horror of that, and then the guilt of deceiving every body; marrying the daughter, only to make a cuckold of the father; and then seducing me, debauching my purity, and perverting me from the road of virtue, in which I have trod thus long, and never made one trip, not one faus pas; O consider it!

what would you have to answer for, if you should provoke me to frailty? Alas! humanity is feeble, Heaven knows! very feeble, and unable to support itself.

Mel. Where am I? Is it day? and am I awake? Madam—

Lady Ply. And nobody knows how circumstances may happen together;—to my thinking, now, I could resist the strongest temptation—but, yet, I know, 'tis impossible for me to know whether I could or not; there's no certainty in the things of this life.

Mel. Madam, pray give me leave to ask you one question.—

Lady Ply. O lord, ask me the question! I'll swear I'll refuse it; I'll swear I'll deny it, therefore don't ask me; nay, you shan't ask me; I swear I'll deny it. O gemini, you have brought all the blood into my face; I warrant I am as red as a turkey-cock; O fye! cousin Mellefont.

Mel. Nay, madam, hear me; I mean—

Lady Ply. Hear you? no, no; I'll deny you first, and hear you afterwards. For one does not know how one's mind may change upon hearing.—Hearing is one of the senses, and all the senses are fallible; I won't trust my honour, I assure you; my honour is infallible and uncomatible.

Mel. For Heaven's sake, madam—

Lady Ply. O name it no more—Bless me, how can you talk of Heaven, and have so much wickedness in your heart? May be you don't think it a sin!—they say, some of you gentlemen don't think it a sin!—may be it is no sin to them that don't think it so; indeed, if I did not think it a sin! but still my honour, if it were no sin!—but then to marry my daughter for the conveniency of frequent opportunities—I'll never consent to that; as sure as can be I'll break the match.

Mel. Death and amazement!—Madam, upon my knees—

Lady Ply. Nay, nay, rise up; come, you shall see my good-nature. I know love is powerful, and nobody can help his passion: 'tis not your fault, nor, I swear, it is not mine!—How can I help it, if I have charms? And how can you help it, if you are made a captive? I swear it is pity it should be a fault—but my honour—well, but your honour too—but the sin!—well, but the necessity—O lord, here's somebody coming, I dare not stay.—Well, you must consider of your crime, and strive as much as can be against it—strive, be sure—but don't be melancholic, don't despair—but never think that I'll grant you any think; O lord, no;—but be sure you lay aside all thoughts of the marriage; for though I know you don't love Cynthia, only as a blind for your passion to me, yet it will make me jealous—O Lord, what did I say? Jealous! no, no, I can't be jealous, for I must not love you—therefore, don't hope—but don't despair neither—O, they're coming, I must fly.

[Exit.

Mel. [after a pause.] So then—spite of my care and foresight, I am caught, caught in my security.—Yet this was but a shallow artifice, unworthy of my Machiavelian aunt. There must be more behind; this is but the first flash, the priming of her engine; destruction follows hard, if not most presently prevented.

Enter MASKWELL.

Maskwell, welcome! Thy presence is a view of land, appearing to my shipwrecked hopes; the witch has raised the storm, and her ministers have done their work; you see the vessels are parted.

Mask. I know it; I met sir Paul towing away Cynthia. Come, trouble not your head; I'll join you together to-morrow morning, or drown between you in the attempt.

Mel. There is comfort in a hand stretched out to one that is sinking, though never so far off.

Mask. No sinking, nor no danger—Come, cheer up; why, you do not know, that while I plead for you, your aunt has given me a retaining fee;—nay, I am your greatest enemy, and she does but journey-work under me.

Mel. Ha! how is this?

Mask. What do ye think of my being employed in the execution of all her plots? Ha, ha, ha! by Heaven, it is true; I have undertaken to break the match; I have undertaken to make your uncle disinherit you, to get you turned out of doors, and to—ha, ha, ha! I can't tell you for laughing—Oh! she has opened her heart to me—I am to turn you a grazing, and to—ha, ha, ha!—marry Cynthia myself: There's a plot for you!

Mel. Ha! O see, I see my rising sun! light breaks through clouds upon me, and I shall live in day—O my Maskwell! how shall I thank or praise thee! thou hast outwitted woman.—But tell me, how couldst thou thus get into her confidence? Ha! how? But was it her contrivance to persuade my lady Plyant into this extravagant belief?

Mask. It was; and, to tell you the truth, I encouraged it for your diversion: though it make you a little uneasy for the present, yet the reflection of it must needs be entertaining—I warrant she was very violent at first.

Mel. Ha, ha, ha! ay, a very fury; but I was most afraid of her violence at last. If you had not come as you did, I do not know what she might have attempted.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha! I know her temper.—Well, you must know, then, that all my contrivances were but bubbles; till, at last, I pretended to have been long secretly in love with Cynthia; that did my business; that convinced your aunt I might be trusted; since it was as much my interest as her's to break the match: then she thought my jealousy might qualify me to assist her in her revenge. And, in short, in that belief told me the secrets of her heart. At length, we made this agreement; if I accomplish her designs (as I told you before), she has engaged to put Cynthia, with all her fortune, into my power.

Mel. She is most gracious in her favour.—Well, and dear Jack, how hast thou contrived?

Mask. I would not have you stay to hear it now: for I don't know but she may come this way; I am to meet her anon; after that, I will tell you the whole matter: be here, in this gallery, an hour hence; by that time, I imagine, our consultation may be over.

Mel. I will; till then, success attend thee!

[Erit.]

Mask. Till then, success will attend me; for when I meet you, I meet the only obstacle to my fortune. Cynthia, let thy beauty gild my crimes; and whatsoever I commit of treachery or deceit shall be imputed to me as a merit. Treachery! What treachery? Love cancels all the bonds of friendship, and sets men right upon their first foundations. Duty to kings, piety to parents, gratitude to benefactors, and fidelity to friends—are different and particular ties; but the name of rival cuts them all asunder, and is a general acquittance—Rival is equal; and love, like death, an universal leveller of mankind. Ha! but is there not such a thing as honesty? Yes, and whosoever has it about him, bears an enemy in his breast: for your honest man, as I take it, is that nice, scrupulous, conscientious person, who will cheat nobody but himself; such another coxcomb as your wise man, who is too hard for all the world, and will be made a fool of by nobody but himself. Ha, ha, ha! well, for wisdom and honesty, give me cunning and hypocrisy. Oh, it is such a pleasure to angle for fair-faced fools! Then, that hungry gudgeon, Credulity, will bite at any thing—Why, let me see, I have the same face, the same words and accents, when I speak what I do think, and when I speak what I do not think—the very same—and dear dissimulation is the only art not to be known from nature.

Why will mankind be fools, and be deceived?
And why are friends' and lovers' oaths believed?

When each, who searches strictly his own mind,
May so much fraud and power of baseness find.

[Erit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter LORD TOUCHWOOD, and LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady Touch. My lord, can you blame my brother Plyant, if he refuse his daughter upon this provocation? The contract is void, by this unheard of impiety.

Lord Touch. I don't believe it true; he has better principles—Pho, 'tis nonsense. Come, come, I know my lady Plyant has a large eye, and would centre every thing in her own circle; 'tis not the first time she has mistaken respect for love, and made sir Paul jealous of the civility of an undesigning person, the better to bespeak his security in her unfeigned pleasures.

Lady Touch. You censure hardly, my lord; my sister's honour is very well known.

Lord Touch. Yes, I believe I know some that have been familiarly acquainted with it. This is a little trick, wrought by some pitiful contriver, envious of my nephew's merit.

Lady Touch. Nay, my lord, it may be so, and I hope it will be found so: but that will require some time; for, in such a case as this, demonstration is necessary,

Lord Touch. There should have been demonstration of the contrary, too, before it had been believed—

Lady Touch. So, I suppose, there was.

Lord Touch. How? Where? When?

Lady Touch. That I cannot tell; nay, I don't say there was—I am willing to believe as favourably of my nephew as I can.

Lord Touch. I don't know that. [Half aside.]

Lady Touch. How? Don't you believe that, say you, my lord?

Lord Touch. No, I don't say so—I confess I am troubled to find you so cold in his defence.

Lady Touch. His defence! Bless me, would you have me defend an ill thing?

Lord Touch. You believe it, then?

Lady Touch. I don't know; I am very unwilling to speak my thoughts in any thing that may be to my cousin's disadvantage. Besides, I find, my lord, you are prepared to receive an ill impression from any opinion of mine which is not consenting with your own: but, since I am like to be suspected in the end, and 'tis a pain any longer to dissemble, I own it to you: In short, I do believe it, nay, and can believe any thing worse, if it were laid to his charge—Don't ask me my reasons, my lord, for they are not fit to be told you.

Lord Touch. I am amazed! Here must be something more than ordinary in this. [Aside.] Not fit to be told me, madam? You have no interest wherein I am not concerned; and, consequently, the same reasons ought to be convincing to me, which create your satisfaction or disquiet.

Lady Touch. But those which cause my disquiet I am willing to have remote from your hearing. Good my lord, don't press me.

Lord Touch. Don't oblige me to press you.

Lady Touch. Whatever it was, it is past; and that is better to be unknown which cannot be prevented; therefore, let me beg of you to rest satisfied—

Lord Touch. When you have told me, I will—

Lady Touch. You won't.

Lord Touch. By my life, my dear, I will.

Lady Touch. What if you cannot?

Lord Touch. How? Then, I must know; nay, I will. No more trifling—I charge you tell me—By all our mutual peace to come; upon your duty—

Lady Touch. Nay, my lord, you need say no more to make me lay my heart before you; but don't be thus transported; compose yourself; it is not of concern to make you lose one minute's temper; it is not, indeed, my dear. Nay, by this kiss you shall not be angry. O Lord! I wish I had not told you any thing. Indeed, my lord, you have frightened me. Nay, look pleased, I will tell you.

Lord Touch. Well, well.

Lady Touch. Nay, but will you be calm?—Indeed, it is nothing but—

Lord Touch. But what?

Lady Touch. But will you promise me not to be angry?—Nay, you must—not to be angry with Mellefont—I dare swear he is sorry; and, were it to do again, would not—

Lord Touch. Sorry, for what? 'Death! you rack me with delay.

Lady Touch. Nay, no great matter, only—Well, I have your promise—Pho, why, nothing; only your nephew had a mind to amuse himself sometimes with a little gallantry towards me. Nay, I cannot think he meant any thing seriously, but methought it looked oddly.

Lord Touch. Confusion and hell, what do I hear!

Lady Touch. Or, may be, he thought he was not enough akin to me upon your account, and had a mind to create a nearer relation on his own; a lover, you know, my lord—ha, ha, ha! Well, but that's all. Now you have it; well, remember your promise, my lord, and don't take any notice of it to him.

Lord Touch. No, no, no—Damnation!

Lady Touch. Nay, I swear you must not—A little harmless mirth—only misplaced, that's all. But if it were more, it is over now, and all is well. For my part, I have forgot it; and so has he, I hope; for I have not heard any thing from him these two days.

Lord Touch. These two days! Is it so fresh? Unnatural villain! 'Death, I will have him stripped, and turned naked out of my doors this moment, and let him rot and perish, incestuous brute!

Lady Touch. Oh, for Heaven's sake, my lord, you will ruin me, if you take such public notice of it; it will be a town-talk: consider your own, and my honour—Nay, I told you, you would not be satisfied when you knew it.

Lord Touch. Before I have done, I will be satisfied. Ungrateful monster! How long?

Lady Touch. Lord! I don't know—I wish my lips had grown together when I told you—Almost a twelvemonth—Nay, I won't tell you any more till you are yourself. Pray, my lord, don't let the company see you in this disorder—Yet, I confess, I cannot blame you; for I think I was never so surprised in my life. Who would have thought my nephew could have so misconstrued my kindness—But will you go into your closet, and recover your temper. I will make an excuse of sudden business to the company, and come to you. Pray, good dear my lord, let me beg you do now: I will come immediately, and tell you all—Will you, my lord?

Lord Touch. I will—I am mute with wonder.

Lady Touch. Well, but go now; here is somebody coming.

Lord Touch. Well, I go—You won't stay, for I would hear more of this. [Exit.]

Lady Touch. I follow instantly—So.

Enter MASKWELL.

Mask. This was a master-piece, and did not need my help—though I stood ready for a cue to come in and confirm all, had there been occasion.

Lady Touch. Have you seen Mellefont?

Mask. I have; and am to meet him here about this time.

Lady Touch. How does he bear his disappointment?

Mask. Secure in my assistance, he seemed not much afflicted, but rather laughed at the shallow artifice, which so little time must, of necessity, discover. Yet he is apprehensive of some farther design of yours, and has engaged me to watch you. I believe he will hardly be able to prevent your plot; yet I would have you use caution and expedition.

Lady Touch. Expedition indeed; for all we do must be performed in the remaining part of this evening, and before the company break up, lest my lord should cool, and have an opportunity to talk with him privately—My lord must not see him again.

Mask. By no means; therefore, you must aggravate my lord's displeasure to a degree that will admit of no conference with him—What think you of mentioning me?

Lady Touch. How?

Mask. To my lord, as having been privy to Mellefont's design upon you; but still using my utmost endeavours to dissuade him: though my friendship and love to him has made me conceal it, yet you may say, I threatened, the next time he attempted any thing of that kind, to discover it to my lord.

Lady Touch. To what end is this?

Mask. It will confirm my lord's opinion of my honour and honesty, and create in him a new confidence in me, which (should this design miscarry) will be necessary to the forming another plot that I have in my head—to cheat you as well as the rest. [Aside.]

Lady Touch. I'll do it.

Mask. Excellent! You had best go to my lord, keep him as long as you can in his closet, and I doubt not but you will mould him to what you please; your guests are so engaged in their own follies and intrigues, they'll miss neither of you. When shall we meet?

Lady Touch. At eight this evening, in my chamber: there, rejoice at our success, and toy away an hour in mirth. [Exit.]

Mask. I will not fail. I know what she means by toying away an hour well enough. Pox, I have lost all my appetite to her; yet she's a fine woman, and I loved her once. Should she smoke my design upon Cynthia, I were in a fine pickle. She has a damned penetrating head, and knows how to interpret a coldness the right way; therefore, I must dissemble ardour and ecstasy, that's resolved: Ha! yonder comes Mellefont thoughtful. Let me think: meet her at eight—hum—ha! by Heaven I have it—if I can speak to my lord before—I will deceive them all, and yet secure myself; 'twas a lucky thought! Well, this double-dealing is a jewel. Here he comes! now for me—

[MASKWELL, pretending not to see him, walks by him, and speaks as it were to himself.]

Enter MELLEFONT, musing.

Mercy on us! what will the wickedness of this world come to?

Mel. How now, Jack? What, so full of contemplation that you run over!

Mask. I'm glad you are come, for I could not contain myself any longer, and was just going to give vent to a secret, which nobody but you ought to drink down. Your aunt is just gone from hence.

Mel. And having trusted thee with the secrets of her soul, thou art villainously bent to discover them all to me, ha?

Mask. I am afraid my frailty leans that way—but I don't know, whether I can, in honour, discover them all.

Mel. All, all, man. What, you may, in honour, betray her as far as she betrays herself. No tragical design upon my person, I hope.

Mask. No, but it is a comical design upon mine.

Mel. What dost thou mean?

Mask. Listen, and be dumb—we have been bargaining about the rate of your ruin—

Mel. Like any two guardians to an orphan heiress—Well.

Mask. And whereas pleasure is generally paid with mischief, what mischief I do is to be paid with pleasure.

Mel. So, when you've swallowed the potion, you sweeten your mouth with a plumb.

Mask. You are merry, sir, but I shall probe your constitution. In short, the price of your banishment is to be paid with the person of —

Mel. Of Cynthia, and her fortune—why, you forget you told me this before.

Mask. No, no—so far, you are right; and I am, as an earnest of that bargain, to have full and free possession of the person of——your aunt.

Mel. Ha! Pho, you trifle.

Mask. By this light, I am serious; all raillery apart—I knew 'twould stun you: this evening, at eight, she will receive me in her bed-chamber.

Mel. Hell and the devil! is she abandoned of all grace—why? the woman is possessed—

Mask. Well, will you go in my stead?

Mel. By Heaven, into a hot furnace sooner!

Mask. No, you would not—it would not be so convenient, as I can order matters.

Mel. What do you mean?

Mask. Mean! not to disappoint the lady, I assure you—Ha, ha, ha! how gravely he looks—come, come, I won't perplex you. 'Tis the only thing that Providence could have contrived to make me capable of serving you, either to my inclination, or your own necessity.

Mel. How, how, for Heaven's sake, dear Maskwell?

Mask. Why thus—I'll go according to appointment; you shall have notice, at the critical minute, to come and surprize your aunt and me together; counterfeit a rage against me, and I will make my escape through the private passage from her chamber, which I will take care to leave open: 'twill be hard, if then you can't bring her to any conditions. For this discovery will disarm her of all defence, and leave her entirely at your mercy: nay, she must ever after be in awe of you.

Mel. Let me adore thee, my better genius! by Heaven, I think it is not in the power of Fate to disappoint my hopes—my hopes! my certainty.

Mask. Well, I'll meet you here within a quarter of eight, and give you notice.

[Exit MASKWELL.]

Mel. Good fortune ever go along with thee.

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Mellefont, get out of the way; my lady Plyant's coming, and I shall never succeed, while thou art in sight—though she begins to tack about; but I made love a great while to no purpose.

Mel. Why, what's the matter? she is convinced that I don't care for her.

Care. I cannot get an answer from her, that does not begin with her honour, or her virtue, her religion, or some such cant. Then, she has told me the whole story of sir Paul's nine year's courtship; how he has lain, for whole nights together, upon the stairs before her chamber-door; and that the first favour he received from her was a piece of an old scarlet petticoat for a stomacher; which, since the day of his marriage, he has, out of a piece of gallantry, converted into a night-cap, and wears it still with much solemnity on his anniversary wedding night.

Mel. That I have seen, with the ceremony thereunto belonging—for, on that night, he creeps in at the bed's feet, like a gulled bassa that has married a relation of the grand signior. I wonder he never told you his grievances; he will, I warrant you.

Care. Excessively foolish! but that, which gives me most hopes of her, is her telling me of the many temptations she has resisted.

Mel. Nay, then you have her; for a woman's bragging to a man, that she has overcome temptations, is an argument, that they were weakly offered, and a challenge to him to engage her more irresistibly. 'Tis only an enhancing the price of the commodity, by telling you how many customers have underbid her.

Care. Nay, I don't despair—but still she has a grudging to you—I talked to her t'other night at my lord Froth's masquerade, when I am satisfied she knew me, and I had no reason to complain of my reception; but I find women are not the same bare-faced, and in masks—and a vizard disguises their inclinations as much as their faces.

Mel. Here they come. I'll leave you. Ply her close, and by and by clap a billet-doux into her hand: for a woman never thinks a man truly in love with her, till he has been fool enough to think of her out of her sight, and to lose so much time as to write to her.

[Exit MELLEFONT.]

Enter SIR PAUL and LADY PLYANT.

Sir Paul. Shan't we disturb your meditation, Mr Careless? You would be in private?

Care. You bring that along with you, sir Paul, that shall be always welcome to my privacy.

Sir Paul. O, sweet sir! you load your humble servants, both me and my wife, with continual favours.

Lady Ply. Sir Paul, what a phrase was there! You will be making answers, and taking that upon you, which ought to lie upon me: that you should have so little breeding to think Mr Careless did not apply himself to me! Pray, what have you to entertain any body's privacy? I swear and declare, in the face of the world, I am ready to blush for your ignorance.

Sir Paul. I acquiesce, my lady; but don't snub so loud.

[Aside to her.

Lady Ply. Mr Careless, if a person, that is wholly illiterate, might be supposed to be capable of being qualified to make a suitable return to those obligations, which you are pleased to confer upon one that is wholly incapable of being qualified in all those circumstances, I am sure I should rather attempt it than any thing in the world—[Courtesies—] for I am sure there is nothing in the world that I would rather. [Courtesies.] But I know Mr Careless is so great a critic, and so fine a gentleman, that it is impossible for me—

Care. Oh, Heavens! Madam, you confound me.

Sir Paul. Gad's bud, she is a fine person—

Lady Ply. O lord! sir, pardon me: we women have not those advantages: I know my own imperfections—but, at the same time, you must give me leave to declare, in the face of the world, that nobody is more sensible of favours and things; for, with the reserve of my honour, I assure you, Mr Careless, I don't know any thing in the world I would refuse to a person so meritorious—You'll pardon my want of expression.

Care. Oh, your ladyship is abounding in all excellence, particularly that of phrase.

Lady Ply. You are so obliging, sir.

Care. Your ladyship is so charming.

Sir Paul. So, now, now; now, my lady.

Lady Ply. So well bred.

Care. So surprizing.

Lady Ply. So well drest, so bonne mien, so eloquent, so unaffected, so easy, so free, so particular, so agreeable—

Sir Paul. Aye, so, so, there.

Care. O lord! I beseech you, madam, don't—

Lady Ply. So gay, so graceful, so good teeth, so fine shape, so fine limbs, so fine linen, and I don't doubt but you have a very good skin, sir.

Care. For Heaven's sake, madam—I am quite out of countenance.

Sir Paul. And my lady's quite out of breath; or else you should hear—Gad's bud, you may talk of my lady Froth.

Care. O fy, fy! not to be named of a day—my lady Froth is very well in her accomplishments—but it is, when my lady Plyant is not thought of—if that can ever be.

Lady Ply. Oh, you overcome me—that is so excessive.

Sir Paul. Nay, I swear and vow that was pretty.

Care. Oh, sir Paul, you are the happiest man alive. Such a lady! that is the envy of her own sex, and the admiration of ours!

Sir Paul. Your humble servant; I am, I thank Heaven, in a fine way of living, as I may say, peacefully and happily, and I think need not envy any of my neighbours, blessed be Providence—Aye, truly, Mr Careless, my lady is a great blessing; a fine, discreet, well-spoken woman as you shall see—if it becomes me to say so; and we live very comfortably together; she is a little hasty sometimes, and so am I; but mine is soon over; and then, I am so sorry—Oh, Mr Careless, if it were not for one thing—

Enter Boy, with a letter.

Lady Ply. How often have you been told of that, you jackanapes?

Sir Paul. Gad so, gads-bud—Tim, carry it to my lady; you should have carried it my lady first.

Boy. 'Tis directed to your worship.

Sir Paul. Well, well, my lady reads all letters first—Child, do so no more; d'ye hear, Tim?

Boy. No, and please you. [Exit.

Sir Paul. A humour of my wife's; you know women have little fancies—But as I was telling you, Mr Careless, if it were not for one thing, I should think myself the happiest man in the world; indeed, that touches me near, very near.

Care. What can that be, sir Paul?

Sir Paul. Why, I have, I thank Heaven, a very plentiful fortune, a good estate in the country, some houses in town, and some money, a pretty tolerable personal estate; and it is a great grief to me, indeed it is, Mr Careless, that I have not a son to inherit this. 'Tis true, I have a daughter, and a fine dutiful child she is, though I say it, blessed be Providence I may say; for indeed, Mr Careless, I am mightily beholden to Providence—A poor unworthy sinner—But if I had a son, ah! that's my affliction, and my only affliction; indeed, I cannot refrain tears, when it comes into my mind. [Cries.

Care. Why, methinks that might be easily remedied; my lady is a fine likely woman.

Sir Paul. Oh, a fine likely woman as you shall see in a summer's day—Indeed she is, Mr Careless, in all respects.

Care. And I should not have taken you to have been so old—

Sir Paul. Alas! that's not it, Mr Careless: ah! that's not it; no, no; you shoot wide of the mark a mile; indeed you do; that's not it, Mr Careless; no, no; that's not it.

Care. No? what can be the matter, then?

Sir Paul. You'll scarcely believe me, when I shall tell you—my lady is so nice—It is very strange, but it is true: too true—she is so very nice, that I don't believe she would touch a man for the world—Indeed, it is true, Mr Careless, it breaks my heart—I am her husband, as I may say; though far unworthy of that honour, yet I am her husband; but alas-a-day! I have no more familiarity with her person—than with my own mother—no, indeed.

Care. Alas-a-day! this is a lamentable story; my lady must be told of it; she must, in faith, sir Paul; 'tis an injury to the world.

Sir Paul. Ah? would to Heaven you would, Mr Careless! you are mightily in her favour.

Care. I warrant you; what! we must have a son some way or other.

Sir Paul. Indeed, I should be mightily bound to you, if you could bring it about, Mr Careless.

Lady Ply. Here, sir Paul, it is from your steward; here's a return of 600l. you may take fifty of it for the next half-year.

[Gives him the letter.]

Enter LORD FROTH and CYNTHIA.

Sir Paul. How does my girl? Come hither to thy father, poor lamb; thou art melancholic.

Lord Froth. Heaven, sir Paul, you amaze me of all things in the world—You are never pleased but when we are all upon the broad grin; all laugh and no company; ah! then 'tis such a sight to see some teeth—sure you are a great admirer of my lady Whifler, Mr Sneer, and sir Laurence Loud, and that gang.

Sir Paul. I vow and swear she is a very merry woman; but I think she laughs a little too much.

Lord Froth. Merry! O lord, what a character that is of a woman of quality—You have been at my lady Whifler's upon her day, madam?

Cyn. Yes, my lord—I must humour this fool.

[Aside.]

Lord Froth. Well and how? hee! What is your sense of the conversation?

Cyn. O, most ridiculous, a perpetual concert of laughing without any harmony; for sure, my lord, to laugh out of time, is as disagreeable as to sing out of time, or out of tune.

Lord Froth. Hee, hee, hee! right; and then my lady Whifler is so ready—she always comes in three bars too soon—And then, what do they laugh at? For you know laughing without a jest is as impertinent, hee! as—

Cyn. As dancing without a fiddle.

Lord Froth. Just, in faith! that was at my tongue's end.

Cyn. But that cannot be properly said of them; for I think they are all in good nature with the world, and only laugh at one another; and you must allow they have all jests in their persons, though they have none in their conversation.

Lord Froth. True, as I am a person of honour—For Heaven's sake let us sacrifice them to mirth a little.

Enter Boy, and whispers SIR PAUL.

Sir Paul. Gad so—Wife, Wife! my lady Plyant! I have a word—

Lady Ply. I am busy, sir Paul; I wonder at your impertinence—

Care. Sir Paul, harkee! I am reasoning the matter you know: Madam, if your Ladyship please, we'll discourse of this in the next room.

[Exit LADY PLYANT and CARELESS.]

Sir Paul. O ho! I wish you good success; I wish you good success. Boy, tell my lady, when she has done, I would speak with her below.

[Exit SIR PAUL.]

Enter LADY FROTH and BRISK.

Lady Froth. Then, you think that episode between Susan the dairy-maid, and our coachman, is not amiss; you know, I may suppose the dairy in town, as well as in the country.

Brisk. Incomparable, let me perish! But then, being an heroic poem, had you not better call him a charioteer? Charioteer sounds great: besides, your ladyship's coachman having a red face, and you comparing him to the sun—And you know the sun is called Heaven's charioteer.

Lady Froth. Oh, infinitely better! I am extremely beholden to you for the hint; stay, we'll read over those half a score lines again. [Pulls out a paper.] Let me see here; you know what goes before—the comparison, you know.

[Reads.]

'For as the sun shines every day,
'So, of our coachman, I may say.'

Brisk. I am afraid that simile won't do in wet weather—Because you say the sun shines every day.

Lady Froth. No, for the sun it won't, but it will do for the coachman; for you know there's most occasion for a coach in wet weather.

Brisk. Right, right; that saves all.

Lady Froth. Then, I don't say the sun shines all the day, but that he peeps now and then; yet he does shine all the day too, you know, though we don't see him.

Brisk. Right, but the vulgar will never comprehend that.

Lady Froth. Well, you shall hear—Let me see.

[Reads.]

'For as the sun shines every day,
'So of our coachman I may say;
'He shews his drunken fiery face,
'Just as the sun does, more or less.'

Brisk. That's right; all's well, all's well. More or less.

Lady Froth. [Reads.]

'And when at night his labour's done,
'Then too, like Heaven's charioteer, the sun'

Ay, charioteer does better.

'Into the dairy he descends,

'And there his whipping and his driving ends.

'There, he's secure from danger of a bilk,

'His fare is paid him, and he sets in milk.'

For Susan, you know, is Thetis, and so——

Brisk. Incomparable well and proper, 'egad—But I have one exception to make——Don't you think bilk (I know it is good rhyme) but don't you think bilk and fare too like a hackney coachman?

Lady Froth. I swear and vow I am afraid so——And yet our Jehu was a hackney coachman, when my lord took him.

Brisk. Was he? I am answered, if Jehu was a hackney coachman—You may put that in the marginal notes, though, to prevent criticism—Only, mark it with a small asterism, and say—Jehu was formerly a hackney coachman.

Lady Froth. I will; you'll oblige me extremely to write notes to the whole poem.

Brisk. With all my heart and soul, and proud of the vast honour, let me perish.

Lord Froth. Hee, hee, hee! my dear, have you done?——Won't you join with us? we were laughing at my lady Whifler and Mr Sneer.

Lady Froth.——Ay, my dear——Were you? Oh filthy Mr Sneer! he's a nauseous figure, a most fulsamic fop! foh!——He spent two days together in going about Covent-Garden to suit the lining of his coach with his complexion.

Lord Froth. O silly! yet his aunt is as fond of him as if she had brought the ape into the world herself.

Brisk. Who, my lady Toothless? O, she's a mortifying spectacle! she's always chewing the cud, like an old ewe.

Cyn. Fy, Mr Brisk! eringo is for her cough.

Lady Froth. I have seen her take them, half-chewed, out of her mouth to laugh, and then put them in again—Foh!

Lord Froth. Foh!

Lady Froth. Then she is always ready to laugh when Sneer offers to speak—and sits in expectation of his no jest, with her gums bare, and her mouth open——

Brisk. Like an oyster at low ebb, 'egad—Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Froth. Then, that t'other great strapping lady—I cannot hit of her name; the old fat fool that paints so exorbitantly.

Brisk. I know whom you mean—But deuce take me, I cannot hit of her name neither——Paints, d'ye say? Why, she lays it on with a trowel——Then she has a great beard that bristles through it, and makes her look as if she were plastered with lime and hair, let me perish.

Lady Froth. Oh, you made a song upon her, Mr Brisk.

Brisk. He! 'egad so I did——My lord can sing it. 'Tis not a song neither——It is a sort of an epigram, or rather an epigrammatic sonnet; I don't know what to call it, but it is satire.

LORD FROTH sings.

*Ancient Phillis has young graces,
'Tis a strange thing, but a true one;
Shall I tell you how?
She herself makes her own faces,
And each morning wears a new one,
Where's the wonder now?*

Brisk. Short, but there is salt in it; my way of writing, 'egad.

Enter Footman.

Lady Froth. How now?

Foot. Your Ladyship's chair is come.

Lady Froth. Is nurse and the child in it?

Foot. Yes, Madam. [Erit.

Lady Froth. O, the dear creature! let us go see it.

Lord Froth. I swear, my dear, you'll spoil that child with sending it to and again so often; this is the seventh time the chair has gone for her to-day,

Lady Froth. O la! I swear it's but the sixth—and I han't seen her these two hours——The poor dear creature——I swear, my lord, you don't love poor little Sappho,——Come, my dear Cynthia, Mr Brisk, we'll go see Sappho, though my lord won't.

Cyn. I'll wait upon your ladyship.

Brisk. Pray, madam, how old is lady Sappho?

Lady Froth. Three quarters; but I swear she has a world of wit, and can sing a tune already. My lord, won't you go? Won't you? What, not to see Saph? Pray, my lord, come see little Saph. I knew you could not stay.

[Ereunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter CARELESS and LADY PLYANT.

Lady Ply. I swear, Mr Careless, you are very alluring—and say so many fine things—and nothing is so moving to me as a fine thing. Well, I must do you this justice, and declare, in the face of the world, never any body gained so far upon me as yourself; with blushes I must own it, you have shaken, as I may say, the very foundation of my honour—Well, sure, if I escape your importunities, I shall value myself as long as I live, I swear.

Care. And despise me. [Sighing.]

Lady Ply. The last of any man in the world, by my purity! now you make me swear—O, gratitude forbid, that I should ever be wanting in a respectful acknowledgment of an entire resignation of all my best wishes for the person and parts of so accomplished a person, whose merit challenges much more, I am sure, than my illiterate praises can description!—

Care. [In a whining tone.] Ah, heavens, madam! you ruin me with kindness; your charming tongue pursues the victory of your eyes, while, at your feet, your poor adorer dies.

Lady Ply. Ah! very fine.

Care. [Still whining.] Ah! why are you so fair, so bewitching fair? O, let me grow to the ground here, and feast upon that hand! O, let me press it to my heart, my trembling heart! the nimble movement shall instruct your pulse, and teach it to alarm desire. Zoons, I am almost at the end of my cant, if she does not yield quickly. [Aside.]

Lady Ply. O, that is so passionate and fine, I cannot hear it—I am not safe if I stay, and must leave you.

Care. And must you leave me! Rather let me languish out a wretched life, and breathe my soul beneath your feet—I must say the same thing over again, and cannot help it. [Aside.]

Lady Ply. I swear I am ready to languish, too—O my honour! Whither is it going? I protest you have given me the palpitation of the heart.

Care. Can you be so cruel?

Lady Ply. O rise! I beseech you, say no more till you rise—Why did you kneel so long? I swear I was so transported I did not see it—Well, to shew you how far you have gained upon me, I assure you, if sir Paul should die, of all mankind there is none I would sooner make my second choice.

Care. O Heaven! I cannot outlive this night without your favour—I feel my spirits faint; a general dampness overspreads my face; a cold deadly dew already vents through all my pores, and will to-morrow wash me, for ever, from your sight, and drown me in my tomb.

Lady Ply. O, you have conquered, sweet, melting, moving sir! you have conquered—What heart of marble can refrain to weep, and yield to such sad sayings. [Cries.]

Care. I thank Heaven, they are the saddest that I ever said—Oh! [Aside.]

Lady Ply. Oh, I yield myself all up to your uncontrollable embraces!—say, thou dear dying man, when, where, and how?

Care. 'Slife, yonder's sir Paul! but if he were not come, I am so transported, I cannot speak—This note will inform you.

[Gives her a note. Exit.]

Enter SIR PAUL and CYNTHIA.

Sir Paul. Thou art my tender lambkin, and shalt do what thou wilt—But endeavour to forget this Mellefont.

Cyn. I would obey you to my power, sir; but if I have not him, I have sworn never to marry.

Sir Paul. Never to marry! Heavens forbid! Must I neither have sons nor grandsons? Must the family of the Plyants be utterly extinct for want of issue male? Oh, impiety! But did you swear? did that sweet creature swear! ha? How durst you swear without my consent, ah? Gads-bud, who am I?

Cyn. Pray don't be angry, sir; when I swore, I had your consent, and therefore I swore.

Sir Paul. Why, then, the revoking my consent does annul, or make of none effect, your oath; so you may unswear it again—The law will allow it.

Cyn. Ay, but my conscience never will.

Sir Paul. Gads-bud, no matter for that; conscience and law never go together; you must not expect that.

Lady Ply. Ay, but sir Paul, I conceive, if she has sworn, do ye mark me, if she has once sworn, it is most unchristian, inhuman, and obscene, that she should break it. I'll make up the match again, because Mr Careless said it would oblige him. [Aside.]

Sir Paul. Does your ladyship conceive so?—Why, I was of that opinion once, too—Nay, if your ladyship conceives so, I am of that opinion again; but I can neither find my lord nor my lady, to know what they intend.

Lady Ply. I am satisfied that my cousin Mellefont has been much wronged.

Cyn. [Aside.] I am amazed to find her of our side, for I am sure she loved him.

Lady Ply. I know my lady Touchwood has no kindness for him; and besides, I have been informed by Mr Careless, that Mellefont had never any thing more than a profound respect—That he has owned himself to be my admirer, it is true; but he was never so presumptuous to entertain any dishonourable notion of things; so that, if this be made plain—I don't see how my daughter can, in conscience, or honour, or any thing in the world——

Sir Paul. Indeed, if this be made plain, as my lady, your mother says, child——

Lady Ply. Plain! I was informed of it by Mr Careless—And I assure you Mr Careless is a person—that has a most extraordinary respect and honour for you, sir Paul.

Cyn. [Aside.] And for your ladyship, too, I believe, or else you had not changed sides so soon; now I begin to find it.

Sir Paul. I am much obliged to Mr Careless, really; he is a person that I have a great value for, not only for that, but because he has a great veneration for your ladyship.

Lady Ply. O la! no, indeed, sir Paul; it is upon your account.

Sir Paul. No, I protest and vow, I have no title to his esteem, but in having the honour to appertain, in some measure, to your ladyship; that's all.

Lady Ply. O la! now, I swear and declare it shall not be so; you are too modest, sir Paul.

Sir Paul. It becomes me, when there is any comparison made between—— Lady Ply. O fy, fy, sir Paul! you will put me out of countenance——Your very obedient and affectionate wife, that's all—And highly honoured in that title.

Sir Paul. Gads-bud, I am transported! Give me leave to kiss your ladyship's hand.

Lady Ply. My lip, indeed, sir Paul, I swear you shall.

[He kisses her, and bows very low.]

Sir Paul. I humbly thank your ladyship—I don't know whether I fly on ground, or walk in air——Gads-bud, she was never thus before——Well, I must own myself beholden to Mr Careless—As sure as can be, this is all his doing—something that he has said; well, it is a rare thing to have an ingenious friend. Well, your ladyship is of opinion, that the match may go forward.

Lady Ply. By all means—Mr Careless has satisfied me of the matter.

Sir Paul. Well, why then, lamb, you may keep your oath; but have a care of making rash vows; come hither to me, and kiss papa.

Lady Ply. I swear and declare, I am in such a twitter to read Mr Careless's letter, that I cannot forbear any longer—But though I may read all letters first by prerogative, yet I will be sure to be unsuspected this time. Sir Paul!

Sir Paul. Did your ladyship call?

Lady Ply. Nay, not to interrupt you, my dear—Only lend me your letter, which you had from your steward to-day: I would look upon the account again, and may be increase the allowance.

Sir Paul. There it is, madam. Do you want a pen and ink? [Bows and gives the letter.]

Lady Ply. No, no; nothing else, I thank you, sir Paul—So now, I can read my own letter under the cover of his. [Aside.]

Sir Paul. He! and wilt thou bring me a grandson at nine months end?—He! A brave chopping boy? I will settle a thousand pounds a-year upon the rogue as soon as ever he looks me in the face; I will, gads-bud. I am overjoyed to think I have any of my family that will bring children into the world. For I would fain have some resemblance of myself in my posterity, eh, Thy! heh! Make the young rogue as like me as you can.

Cyn. I am glad to see you so merry, sir.

Sir Paul. Merry! Gads-bud, I am serious! I will give thee five hundred pounds for every inch of him that resembles me. Ah! this eye, this left eye! this has done execution in its time, girl; why, thou hast my leer, hussy, just thy father's lecr. Let it be transmitted to the young rogue by the help of imagination—Why, 'tis the mark of our family, Thy; our house is distinguished by a languishing eye, as the house of Austria is by a thick lip. Ah! when I was of your age, hussy, I would have held fifty to one I could have drawn my own picture—Gads-bud, but I could have done—not so much as you neither—but——nay, don't blush——

Cyn. I don't blush, sir, for I vow I don't understand.

Sir Paul. Pshaw, pshaw, you fib, you baggage; you do understand, and you shall understand: Come, don't be so nice; Gads-bud, don't learn after your mother-in-law, my lady here—Marry, Heaven forbid that you should follow her example; that would spoil all indeed. Bless us, if you should take a vagary, and make a rash resolution on your wedding-night, to die a maid, as she did, all were ruined, all my hopes lost——My heart would break, and my estate would be left to the wide world, eh! I hope you are a better Christian than to think of living a nun, eh! Answer me.

Cyn. I am all obedience, sir, to your commands.

Lady Ply. [Having read the letter.] O dear Mr Careless! I swear he writes charmingly, and he looks charmingly, and he has charmed me as much as I have charmed him; and so I'll tell him in the wardrobe when 'tis dark. O Crimine! I hope sir Paul has not seen both letters—[Puts the wrong letter hastily up, and gives him her own.] Sir Paul, here's your letter, to-morrow morning I'll settle accounts to your advantage.

Enter BRISK.

Brisk. Sir Paul, Gads-bud you are an uncivil person, let me tell you, and all that; and I did not think it had been in you.

Sir Paul. O la! what's the matter now? I hope you are not angry, Mr Brisk?

Brisk. Deuce take me, I believe you intend to marry your daughter yourself; you are always brooding over her like an old hen, as if she were not well hatched, 'egad, he! he!

Sir Paul. Good strange! Mr Brisk is such a merry facetious person, he, he, he! No, no, I have done with her; I have done with her now.

Brisk. The fiddles have stayed this hour in the hall, and my lord Froth wants a partner; we can never begin without her.

Sir Paul. Go, go, child; go, get you gone and dance, and be merry; I will come and look at you by and by. Where is my son Mellefont?

Lady Ply. I'll send him to them; I know where he is—Brisk. Sir Paul, will you send Careless into the hall, if you meet him.

Sir Paul. I will, I will; I'll go and look for him on purpose. [Exeunt all but BRISK.]

Brisk. So, now, they are all gone, and I have an opportunity to practise—Ah! my dear lady Froth! She's a most engaging creature, if she were not so fond of that damned coxcombly lord of hers; and yet I am forced to allow him wit, too, to keep in with him—No matter, she's a woman of parts, and 'egad parts will carry her. She said, she would follow me into the gallery—Now, to make my approaches—Hem, hem! Ah, me—[Bows]—dam!—Pox on't, why should I disparage my parts by thinking what to say; none but dull rogues think: witty men, like rich fellows, are always ready for all expences, while your blockheads, like poor needy scoundrels, are forced to examine their stock, and forecast the charges of the day. Here she comes; I'll seem not to see her, and try to win her with a new airy invention of my own—hem!

Enter LADY FROTH.

[BRISK sings, walking about.] I'm sick with love, la, ha, ha! prithee, come cure me.

I'm sick with, &c.

O ye powers! O my lady Froth, my lady Froth! My lady Froth! Heigho! Break heart; gods, I thank you!

[Stands musing, with his arms across.]

Lady Froth. O heavens, Mr Brisk! What's the matter?

Brisk. My lady Froth! Your ladyship's most humble servant—The matter, madam? Nothing, madam; nothing at all, egad. I was fallen into the most agreeable amusement in the whole province of contemplation: That is all—I'll seem to conceal my passion, and that will look like respect.

[Aside.]

Lady Froth. Bless me! why did you call out upon me so loud?

Brisk. O lord! I, madam! I beseech your ladyship—When?

Lady Froth. Just now, as I came in—bless me! why, don't you know it?

Brisk. Not I, let me perish!—But did I? Strange! I confess your ladyship was in my thoughts; and I was in a sort of dream, that did in a manner represent a very pleasing object to my imagination; but—but did I, indeed?—To see how love and murder will out. But did I really name my lady Froth?

Lady Froth. Three times aloud, as I love letters—But did you talk of love? O Parnassus! Who would have thought Mr Brisk could have been in love? ha, ha, ha! O Heavens! I thought you could have no mistress but the nine muses.

Brisk. No more I have, 'egad, for I adore them all in your ladyship—Let me perish, I don't know whether to be splenetic or airy upon it; the deuce take me if I can tell whether I am glad or sorry that your ladyship has made the discovery.

Lady Froth. O, be merry, by all means—Prince Volscius in love! Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. O, barbarous, to turn me into ridicule! Yet, ha, ha, ha! The deuce take me, I cannot help laughing myself, ha, ha, ha! yet, by Heavens, I have a violent passion for your ladyship, seriously.

Lady Froth. Seriously! Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously, ha, ha, ha! Gad, I have, for all I laugh.

Lady Froth. Ha, ha, ha! What d'ye think I laugh at? Ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Me, 'egad, ha, ha!

Lady Froth. No; the deuce take me if I don't laugh at myself; for, hang me if I have not a violent passion for Mr Brisk, ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. Seriously?

Lady Froth. Seriously, ha, ha, ha!

Brisk. That's well enough, let me perish, ha, ha, ha! O miraculous! what a happy discovery! Ah, my dear charming lady Froth!

Lady Froth. Oh, my adored Mr Brisk!

[Embrace.]

Enter LORD FROTH.

Lord Froth. The company are all ready—How now?

Brisk. Zoons, madam, there's my lord.

[Softly to her.]

Lady Froth. Take no notice; but observe me—Now, cast off, and meet me at the lower end of the room, and then join hands again; I could teach my lord this dance purely; but I vow, Mr Brisk, I can't tell how to come so near any other man. Oh, here's my lord, now you shall see me do it with him.

[They pretend to practise part of a country dance.]

Lord Froth.—Oh, I see there's no harm yet—But I don't like this familiarity. [Aside.]

Lady Froth. Shall you and I do our close dance, to shew Mr Brisk?

Lord Froth. No, my dear, do it with him.

Lady Froth. I'll do it with him, my lord, when you are out of the way.

Brisk. That's good, 'egad, that's good; deuce take me, I can hardly hold laughing in his face.

[Aside.

Lord Froth. Any other time, my dear, or we'll dance it below.

Lady Froth. With all my heart.

Brisk. Come, my lord, I'll wait on you—My charming witty angel!

[To her.

Lady Froth. We shall have whispering time enough, you know, since we are partners.

[Exeunt.

Enter LADY PLYANT and CARELESS.

Lady Ply. O Mr Careless, Mr Careless! I'm ruined, I'm undone!

Care. What's the matter, madam?

Lady Ply. O, the unluckiest accident! I'm afraid I shan't live to tell it you.

Care. Heaven forbid! What is it?

Lady Ply. I'm in such a fright; the strangest quandary and premunire! I'm all over in an universal agitation! I dare swear, every circumstance of me trembles.—Oh, your letter, your letter! By an unfortunate mistake, I have given sir Paul your letter instead of his own.

Care. That was unlucky.

Lady Ply. O, yonder he comes reading of it! for Heaven's sake step in here, and advise me quickly, before he sees.

[Exeunt.

Enter SIR PAUL, with the letter.

Sir Paul. O Providence, what a conspiracy have I discovered!—But let me see to make an end on't—[Reads.] Hum——'After supper, in the wardrobe, by the gallery. If sir Paul should surprize us, I have a commission from him to treat with you about the very matter of fact.'—Matter of fact! Very pretty; it seems, then, I am conducing to my cuckoldom; why, this is a very traiterous position of taking up arms by my authority against my person! Well, let me see—'Till then, I languish in expectation of my adorned charmer.

Dying NED CARELESS.

Gads-bud, would that were matter of fact, too! Die and be damned, for a Judas Maccabeus and Iscariot both! O friendship, what art thou but a name! Henceforward, let no man make a friend that would not be a cuckold: for, whomsoever he receives into his bosom, will find the way to his bed, and there return his caresses, with interest, to his wife. Have I approached the marriage-bed with reverence, as to a sacred shrine, and must I now find it polluted by foreign iniquity? O my lady Plyant, you were chaste as ice; but you are melted now, and false as water.—But Providence has been constant to me in discovering this conspiracy; still I am beholden to Providence; if it were not for Providence, sure, poor sir Paul, thy heart would break.

Enter LADY PLYANT.

Lady Ply. So, sir, I see you have read the letter—Well, sir Paul, what do you think of your friend Careless? Has he been treacherous, or did you give his insolence a licence to make trial of your wife's suspected virtue? D'ye see here?—[Snatches the letter as in anger.] Look, read it! Gad's my life, if I thought it were so, I would this moment renounce all communication with you. Ungrateful monster! Ha? Is it so? Ay, I see it, a plot upon my honour; your guilty cheeks confess it: Oh, where shall wronged virtue fly for reparation! I'll be divorced this instant.

Sir Paul. Gads-bud, what shall I say? This is the strangest surprize! Why, I don't know any thing at all; nor I don't know whether there be any thing at all in the world, or no.

Lady Ply. I thought I should try you, false man. I, that never dissembled in my life; yet, to make trial of you, pretended to like that monster of iniquity, Careless, and found out that contrivance, to let you see this letter; which, now, I find, was of your own inditing—I do, heathen, I do; see my face no more; I'll be divorced presently.

Sir Paul. O strange, what will become of me! I am so amazed, and so overjoyed, so afraid, and so sorry.—But, did you give me this letter on purpose, eh? Did you?

Lady Ply. Did I? Do you doubt me, Turk, Saracen? I have a cousin that's a proctor in the Commons, I'll go to him instantly—

Sir Paul. Hold, stay, I beseech your ladyship—I am so overjoyed, stay, I'll confess all.

Lady Ply. What, will you confess, Jew?

Sir Paul. Why, now, as I hope to be saved, I had no hand in this letter—Nay, hear me, I beseech your ladyship: The devil take me, now, if he did not go beyond my commission—If I desired him to do any more than speak a good word, only just for me—Gads-bud, only for poor sir Paul—I am an Anabaptist, or a Jew, or what you please to call me.

Lady Ply. Why, is not here matter of fact?

Sir Paul. Ay, but, by your own virtue and continency, the matter of fact is all his own doing. I confess, I had a great desire to have some honours conferred upon me, which lie all in your ladyship's breast, and he being a well-spoken man, I desired him to intercede for me.—

Lady Ply. Did you so? Presumption! [Exit.

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Sir Paul, I am glad I have met with you; 'egad, I have said all I could, but cannot prevail—Then, my friendship to you has carried me a little further in this matter—

Sir Paul. Indeed—Well, sir—I'll dissemble with him a little.

[Aside.

Care. Why, faith, I have, in my time, known honest gentlemen abused by a pretended coyness in their wives, and I had a mind to try my lady's virtue—And, when I could not prevail for you, 'egad, I pretended to be in love myself—but all in vain, she would not hear a word upon that subject; then, I writ a letter to her; I don't know what effects that will have, but I'll be sure to tell you, when I do; though, by this light, I believe her virtue is impregnable.

Sir Paul. O Providence! Providence! What discoveries are here made! Why, this is better, and more miraculous than the rest.

Care. What do you mean?

Sir Paul. I cannot tell you, I am so overjoyed; come along with me to my lady; I cannot contain myself; come, my dear friend.

Care. So, so, so, this difficulty's over. [Aside.
[Ereunt.

Enter MELLEFONT and MASKWELL, from different doors.

Mel. Maskwell, I have been looking for you—It is within a quarter of eight.

Mask. My lady is just gone into my lord's closet; you had best steal into her chamber before she comes, and lie concealed there; otherwise, she may lock the door when we are together, and you not easily get in to surprize us.

Mel. Ha? You say true.

Mask. You had best make haste; for, after she has made some apology to the company for her own and my lord's absence all this while, she'll retire to her chamber instantly.

Mel. I go this moment: Now, Fortune, I defy thee. [Erit.

Mask. I confess, you may be allowed to be secure in your own opinion; the appearance is very fair; but I have an after-game to play, that shall turn the tables; and here comes the man that I must manage.

Enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

Lord Touch. Maskwell, you are the man I wished to meet.

Mask. I am happy to be in the way of your lordship's commands.

Lord Touch. I have always found you prudent and careful in any thing, that has concerned me or my family.

Mask. I were a villain else—I am bound by duty and gratitude, and my own inclination, to be ever your lordship's servant.

Lord Touch. Enough—You are my friend; I know it: Yet there has been a thing in your knowledge, which has concerned me nearly, that you have concealed from me.

Mask. My lord!

Lord Touch. Nay, I excuse your friendship to my unnatural nephew thus far—But, I know, you have been privy to his impious designs upon my wife. This evening, she has told me all: her good-nature concealed it as long as was possible; but, he perseveres so in villainy, that she has told me even you were weary of dissuading him, though you have once actually hindered him from forcing her.

Mask. I am sorry, my lord, I cannot make you an answer; this is an occasion, in which I would not willingly be silent.

Lord Touch. I know you would excuse him—And I know as well that you cannot.

Mask. Indeed, I was in hopes it had been but a youthful heat, that might have soon boiled over; but——

Lord Touch. Say on.

Mask. I have nothing more to say, my lord—but to express my concern; for I think his frenzy increases daily.

Lord Touch. How! give me but proof of it, ocular proof, that I may justify my dealing with him to the world, and share my fortunes.

Mask. O, my lord! consider that is hard: besides, time may work upon him: then, for me to do it! I have professed an everlasting friendship to him.

Lord Touch. He is your friend, and what am I?

Mask. I am answered.

Lord Touch. Fear not his displeasure; I will put you out of his and Fortune's power; and for that thou art scrupulously honest, I will secure thy fidelity to him, and give my honour never to own any discovery that you shall make me. Can you give me a demonstrative proof? Speak.

Mask. I wish I could not—To be plain, my lord, I intended this evening to have tried all arguments to dissuade him from a design, which I suspect; and, if I had not succeeded, to have informed your lordship of what I knew.

Lord Touch. I thank you. What is the villain's purpose?

Mask. He has owned nothing to me of late, and, what I mean now, is only a bare suspicion of my own. If your lordship will meet me a quarter of an hour hence, there, in that lobby, by my lady's bed-chamber, I shall be able to tell you more.

Lord Touch. I will.

Mask. My duty to your lordship makes me do a severe piece of justice.

Lord Touch. I will be secret, and reward your honesty beyond your hopes. [Ereunt.

SCENE II. opening, shows LADY TOUCHWOOD'S chamber.

MELLEFONT solus.

Mel. Pray Heaven my aunt keep touch with her assignation.—Oh, that her lord were but sweating behind this hanging, with the expectation of what I shall see—Hist, she comes—Little does she think what a minc is just ready to spring under her feet. But, to my post.

[Goes behind the hangings.

Enter LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady Touch. 'Tis eight o'clock: methinks, I should have found him here—Who does not prevent the hour of love, outstays the time; for, to be duly punctual, is too slow.—I was accusing you of neglect.

Enter MASKWELL,—MELLEFONT absconding.

Mask. I confess, you do reproach me, when I see you here before me; but, 'tis fit I should be still behind-hand, still to be more and more indebted to your goodness.

Lady Touch. You can excuse a fault too well, not to have been to blame—A ready answer shews you were prepared.

Mask. Guilt is ever at a loss, and confusion waits upon it; when innocence and bold truth are always ready for expression—

Lady Touch. Not in love; words are the weak support of cold indifference; love has no language to be heard.

Mask. Excess of joy has made me stupid! Thus, may my lips be ever closed. [Kisses her.] And thus—Oh, who would not lose his speech upon condition to have joys above it!

Lady Touch. Hold, let me lock the door first, [Goes to the door.

Mask. [Aside.] That I believed; 'twas well I left the private passage open.

Lady Touch. So, that's safe.

Mask. And so may all your pleasures be, and secret as this kiss—

Mel. And may all treachery be thus discovered! [Leaps out.

Lady Touch. Ah!

Mel. Villain!

Mask. Nay, then, there's but one way. [Runs out.

Mel. Say you so? were you provided for an escape? Hold, madam, you have no more holes to your burrow; I stand between you and this sally-port.

Lady Touch. Thunder strike thee dead for this deceit, immediate lightning blast thee, me, and the whole word!—Oh! I could rack myself, play the vulture to my own heart, and gnaw it, piece-meal, for not boding to me this misfortune.

Mel. Be patient—

Lady Touch. Be damned.

Mel. Consider, I have you on the hook; you will but flounder yourself a weary, and be, nevertheless, my prisoner.

Lady Touch. I'll hold my breath and die, but I'll be free.

Mel. O madam, have a care of dying unprepared; I doubt that you have some unrepented sins that may hang heavy, and retard your flight.

Lady Touch. Oh! what shall I do? say? Whither shall I turn? Has hell no remedy?

Mel. None. Hell has served you even as Heaven has done, left you to yourself.—You are in a kind of Erasmus paradise; yet, if you please, you may make it a purgatory; and, with a little penance and my absolution, all this may turn to a good account.

Lady Touch. [Aside.] Hold in my passion, and fall, fall a little, thou swelling heart; let me have some intermission of this rage, and one minute's coolness to dissemble. [She weeps.

Mel. You have been to blame—I like those tears, and hope they are of the purest kind—penitential tears.

Lady Touch. Oh, the scene was shifted quick before me—I had not time to think—I was surprised to see a monster in the glass, and now I find 'tis myself: can you have mercy to forgive the faults I have imagined, but never put in practice? Oh, consider, consider how fatal you have been to me, you have already killed the quiet of this life. The love of you was the first wandering fire that e'er misled my steps, and while I had only that in view, I was betrayed into unthought-of ways of ruin.

Mel. May I believe this true?

Lady Touch. Oh, be not cruelly incredulous! How can you doubt these streaming eyes? Keep the severest eye over all my future conduct, and, if I once relapse, let me not hope forgiveness! 'twill ever be in your power to ruin me—my lord shall sign to your desires; I will myself create your happiness, and Cynthia shall be this night your bride—do but conceal my failings, and forgive.

Mel. Upon such terms, I will be ever yours in every honest way.

MASKWELL softly introduces LORD TOUCHWOOD, and retires.

Mask. I have kept my word; he is here, but I must not be seen.

Lord Touch. Hell and amazement! She is in tears!

Lady Touch. [Kneeling.] Eternal blessings thank you—Ha! my lord listening! Oh, fortune has o'erpaid me all, all! all's my own!

[Aside.

Mel. Nay, I beseech you, rise.

Lady Touch. [Aloud.] Never, never! I'll grow to the ground, be buried quick beneath it, ere I'll be consenting to so damned a sin as incest! unnatural incest!

Mel. Ha!

Lady Touch. Oh, cruel man, will you not let me go! I'll forgive all that's past—O Heaven, you will not ravish me!

Mel. Damnation!

Lord Touch. Monster! dog! your life shall answer this—

[Draws, and runs at MELLEFONT; is held by LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady Touch. O Heavens, my lord! hold, hold, for Heaven's sake!

Mel. Confusion, my uncle! Oh, the damned sorceress!

Lady Touch. Moderate your rage, good my lord! He's mad, alas, he's mad—indeed he is, my lord, and knows not what he does—see how wild he looks!

Mel. By Heaven, 'twere senseless not to be mad, and see such witchcraft.

Lady Touch. My lord, you hear him, he talks idly.

Lord Touch. Hence from my sight, thou living infamy to my name! when next I see that face, I'll write villain in it with my sword's point.

Mel. Now, by my soul, I will not go, till I have made known my wrongs—nay, till I have made known yours, which (if possible) are greater—though she has all the host of hell her servants!

Lady Touch. Alas, he raves! For Heaven's sake, away, my lord! he'll either tempt you to extravagance, or commit some himself.

Mel. Death and furies! will you not hear me? why, by Heaven, she laughs, grins, points to your back; she forks out cuckoldom with her fingers, and you are running horn-mad after your fortune.

[As she is going, she turns back and smiles at him.]

Lord Touch. I fear he's mad, indeed—let's send Maskwell to him.

[Exeunt LORD and LADY TOUCHWOOD.]

Mel. Send him to her. Oh, I could curse my stars, fate, and chance; all causes and accidents of fortune in this life! but to what purpose? They talk of sending Maskwell to me; I never had more need of him—but what can he do? imagination cannot form a fairer and more plausible design, than this of his, which has miscarried—O my precious aunt! I shall never thrive without I deal with the devil, or another woman. Women, like flames, have a destroying power, Ne'er to be quenched, till they themselves devour.
[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter LADY TOUCHWOOD and MASKWELL.

Lady Touch. Was it not lucky?

Mask. Lucky! fortune is your own, and 'tis her interest so to be; by Heaven, I believe you can controul her power, and she fears it; though chance brought my lord, 'twas your own art that turned it to advantage.

Lady Touch. 'Tis true, it might have been my ruin—but yonder's my lord; I believe he is coming to find you; I'll not be seen.

[Exit.]

Mask. So; I durst not own my introducing my lord, though it succeeded well for her, for she would have suspected a design, which I should have been puzzled to excuse. My lord is thoughtful—I'll be so, too; yet he shall know my thoughts; or think he does—

Enter LORD TOUCHWOOD.

What have I done?

Lord Touch. Talking to himself!

Mask. 'Twas honest, and shall I be rewarded for it? No, 'twas honest, therefore I shall not: nay, rather, therefore, I ought not; for it rewards itself.

Lord Touch. Unequalled virtue! [Aside.]

Mask. But should it be known! then I have lost a friend! He was an ill man, and I have gained; for half myself I lent him, and that I have recalled; so, I have served myself, and, what is yet better, I have served a worthy lord, to whom I owe myself.

Lord Touch. Excellent man! [Aside.]

Mask. Yet I am wretched—Oh, there is a secret burns within this breast, which, should it once blaze forth, would ruin all, consume my honest character, and brand me with the name of villain.

Lord Touch. Ha!

Mask. Why do I love! Yet Heaven, and my waking conscience, are my witnesses, I never gave one working thought a vent, which might discover that I loved, nor ever must; no, let it prey upon my heart; for I would rather die than seem once, barely seem, once dishonest: Oh, should it once be known I love fair Cynthia, all this, that I have done, would look like rival's malice, false friendship to my lord, and base self-interest. Let me perish first, and from this hour avoid all sight and speech, and, if I can, all thought of that pernicious beauty. Ha! but what is my distraction doing? I am wildly talking to myself, and some ill chance might have directed malicious ears this way.

[Seems to start, seeing my lord.]

Lord Touch. Start not—let guilty and dishonest souls start at the revolution of their thoughts, but be thou fixed, as is thy virtue.

Mask. I am confounded, and beg your lordship's pardon for those free discourses which I have had with myself.

Lord Touch. Come, I beg your pardon that I overheard you, and yet it shall not need—honest Maskwell! thy, and my good genius, led me hither—mine, in that I have discovered so much manly virtue; thine, in that thou shalt have due reward of all thy worth. Give me thy hand—my nephew is the alone remaining branch of all our ancient family; him I thus blow away, and constitute thee, in his room, to be my heir—

Mask. Now, Heaven forbid—

Lord Touch. No more—I have resolved—the writings are ready drawn, and wanted nothing but to be signed, and have his name inserted—yours will fill the blank as well—I will have no reply—let me command this time, for 'tis the last in which I will assume authority—hereafter, you shall rule where I have power.

Mask. I humbly would petition——

Lord Touch. Is it for yourself! [MASKWELL pauses.] I'll hear of nought for any body else.

Mask. Then witness, Heaven, for me, this wealth and honour was not of my seeking, nor would I build my fortune on another's ruin: I had but one desire——

Lord Touch. Thou shalt enjoy it. If all I am worth in wealth or interest can purchase Cynthia, she is thine. I am sure sir Paul's consent will follow fortune; I will quickly shew him which way that is going.

Mask. You oppress me with bounty; my gratitude is weak, and shrinks beneath the weight, and cannot rise to thank you—what, enjoy my love! forgive the transports of a blessing so unexpected, so un hoped for, so unthought of!

Lord Touch. I will confirm it, and rejoice with thee. [Exit.]

Mask. This is prosperous indeed! why, let him find me out a villain, settled in possession of a fair estate, and full fruition of my love; I'll bear the railings of a losing gamester—but should he find me out before! 'tis dangerous to delay—let me think—should my lord proceed to treat openly of my marriage with Cynthia, all must be discovered, and Mellefont can be no longer blinded. It must not be; nay, should my lady know it—aye, then were fine work indeed! her fury would spare nothing, though she involved herself in ruin. No, it must be by stratagem—I must deceive Mellefont once more, and get my lord to consent to my private management. He comes opportunely—now will I, in my old way, discover the whole, real truth of the matter to him, that he may not suspect one word on't.

No mask like open truth to cover lies,
As to go naked is the best disguise.

Enter MELLEFONT.

Mel. Oh, Maskwell, what hopes? I am confounded in a maze of thoughts, each leading into another, and all ending in perplexity. My uncle will not see, nor hear me.

Mask. No matter, sir; don't trouble your head; all is in my power.

Mel. How, for Heaven's sake?

Mask. Little do you think, that your aunt has kept her word—how the devil she wrought my lord into this dotage, I know not; but he is gone to sir Paul about my marriage with Cynthia, and has appointed me his heir.

Mel. The devil he has! What's to be done?

Mask. I have it, it must be by stratagem; for it is in vain to make application to him. I think I have that in my head, which cannot fail.—Where is Cynthia?

Mel. In the garden.

Mask. Let us go and consult her: my life for yours, I cheat my lord.

[Exeunt.]

Enter LORD and LADY TOUCHWOOD.

Lady Touch. Maskwell your heir, and marry Cynthia!

Lord Touch. I cannot do too much for so much merit.

Lady Touch. But this is a thing of too great moment to be so suddenly resolved. Why Cynthia? Why must he be married? Is there not reward enough in raising his low fortune, but he must mix his blood with mine, and wed my niece? How know you, that my brother will consent, or she? nay, he himself, perhaps, may have affections elsewhere.

Lord Touch. No, I am convinced he loves her.

Lady Touch. Maskwell love Cynthia! impossible!

Lord Touch. I tell you, he confessed it to me.

Lady Touch. Confusion! How is this!

[Aside.]

Lord Touch. His humility long stifled his passion; and his love of Mellefont would have made him still conceal it: but, by encouragement, I wrung the secret from him, and know he is no way to be rewarded but in her. I will defer my farther proceedings in it, till you have considered it: but remember how we are both indebted to him. [Exit.]

Lady Touch. Both indebted to him! Yes, we are both indebted to him, if you knew all—villain! Oh, I am wild with this surprize of treachery: it is impossible; it cannot be—he love Cynthia! What shall I do? How shall I think? I cannot think—all my designs are lost, my love unsated, my revenge unfinished, and fresh cause of fury from unthought-of plagues!

Enter SIR PAUL.

Sir Paul. Madam, sister, my lady sister, did you see my lady, my wife?

Lady Touch. Oh! Torture!

Sir Paul. Gad's-bud, I cannot find her high nor low; where can she be, think you?

Lady Touch. Where she is serving you, as all your sex ought to be served; making you a beast. Don't you know, that you are a fool, brother?

Sir Paul. A fool; he, he, he! you are merry—no, no, not I; I know no such matter.

Lady Touch. Why, then, you don't know half your happiness.

Sir Paul. That's a jest, with all my heart, faith and troth—but hark ye, my lord told me something of a revolution of things; I don't know what to make on't—Gad's-bud, I must consult my wife—he talks of disinheriting his nephew, and I don't know what—look you, sister, I must know what my girl has to trust to; or not a syllable of a wedding, Gad's-bud—to shew you that I am not a fool.

Lady Touch. Hear me: consent to the breaking off this marriage, and the promoting any other, without consulting me, and I will renounce all blood, all relation and concern with you for ever—nay, I'll be your enemy, and pursue you to destruction; I'll tear your eyes out, and tread you under my feet.

Sir Paul. Why, what's the matter now? Good Lord, what's all this for? Pooh, here's a joke indeed—why, where's my wife?

Lady Touch. With Careless, in the close arbour; he may want you by this time, as much as you want her.

Sir Paul. Oh, if she be with Mr Careless, 'tis well enough.

Lady Touch. Fool, sot, insensible ox! but remember what I said to you, or you had better eat your own horns; by this light, you had.

Sir Paul. You are a passionate woman, Gad's bud—but, to say truth, all our family are choleric; I am the only peaceable person amongst them.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MELLEFONT, MASKWELL, and CYNTHIA.

Mel. I know no other way but this he has proposed; if you have love enough to run the venture.

Cyn. I don't know whether I have love enough—but I find I have obstinacy enough, to pursue whatever I have once resolved; and a true female courage to oppose any thing that resists my will, though it were reason itself.

Mask. That's right—well, I'll secure the writings, and run the hazard along with you.

Cyn. But how can the coach and six horses be got ready without suspicion?

Mask. Leave it to my care; that shall be so far from being suspected, that it shall be got ready by my lord's own order.

Mel. How?

Mask. Why, I intend to tell my lord the whole matter of our contrivance; that's my way.

Mel. I do not understand you.

Mask. Why, I'll tell my lord I laid this plot with you, on purpose to betray you; and that, which put me upon it, was the finding it impossible to gain the lady any other way, but in the hopes of her marrying you.

Mel. So.—

Mask. So, why so, while you are busied in making yourself ready, I'll wheedle her into the coach; and, instead of you, borrow my lord's chaplain, and so run away with her myself.

Mel. Oh, I conceive you, you'll tell him so.

Mask. Tell him so! Aye; why, you don't think I mean to do so?

Mel. No, no; ha, ha! I dare swear thou wilt not.

Mask. Therefore, for our farther security, I would have you disguised like a parson, that if my lord should have curiosity to peep, he may not discover you in the coach, but think the cheat is carried on as he would have it.

Mel. Excellent Maskwell! thou wert certainly meant for a statesman or a jesuit—but thou art too honest for the one, and too pious for the other.

Mask. Well, get yourselves ready, and meet me in half an hour, yonder, in my lady's dressing room; go by the back-stairs, and so we may slip down without being observed—I'll send the chaplain to you with his robes; I have made him my own—and ordered him to meet us to-morrow morning at St Alban's; there we will sum up this account to all our satisfactions.

Mel. Should I begin to thank or praise thee, I should waste the little time we have.

[Erit MEL.]

Mask. Madam, you will be ready.

Cyn. I will be punctual to the minute.

[Going.]

Mask. Stay, I have a doubt—Upon second thoughts, we had better meet in the chaplain's chamber here, the corner chamber at this end of the gallery; there is a back way into it, so that you need not come through this door—and a pair of private stairs leading down to the stables—it will be more convenient.

Cyn. I am guided by you—but Mellefont will mistake.

Mask. No, no, I'll after him immediately, and tell him.

Cyn. I will not fail.

[Erit.]

Mask. Why, qui vult decipi decipiatur. 'Tis no fault of mine. I have told them in plain terms how easy it is for me to cheat them; and if they will not hear the serpent's hiss, they must be stung into experience and future caution—Now to prepare my lord to consent to this—But first I must instruct my little Levite; there is no plot, public or private, that can expect to prosper without one of them has a finger in it; he promised me to be within at this hour—Mr Saygrace, Mr Saygrace!

[Goes to the chamber door, and knocks.]

[Mr SAYGRACE looking out.] Sweet sir, I will but pen the last line of an acrostic, and be with you in the twinkling of an ejaculation, in the pronouncing of an Amen, or before you can—

Mask. Nay, good Mr Saygrace, do not prolong the time by describing to me the shortness of your stay; rather, if you please, defer the finishing of your wit, and let us talk about our business; it shall be tithes in your way.

Enter SAYGRACE.

Say. You shall prevail; I would break off in the middle of a sermon to do you a pleasure.

Mask. You could not do me a greater—except—the business in hand—Have you provided a habit for Mellefont?

Say. I have; they are ready in my chamber, together with a clean starched band and cuffs.

Mask. Good: let them be carried to him—Have you stitched the gown-sleeve, that he may be puzzled, and waste time in putting it on?

Say. I have; the gown will not be indued without perplexity.

Mask. Meet me in half an hour, here, in your own chamber. When Cynthia comes, let there be no light; and do not speak, that she may not distinguish you from Mellefont. I'll urge haste to excuse your silence.

Say. You have no more commands?

Mask. None, your text is short.

Say. But pithy, and I will handle it with discretion.

Mask. It will be the first you have so served.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Lord TOUCHWOOD and MASKWELL.

Lord Touch. Sure I was born to be controuled by those I should command: my very slaves will shortly give me rules how I shall govern them.

Mask. I am concerned to see your lordship discomposed——

Lord Touch. Have you seen my wife lately, or disoblighd her?

Mask. No, my lord——What can this mean?
[Aside.]

Lord Touch. Then Mellefont has urged somebody to incense her——Something she has heard of you, which carries her beyond the bounds of patience.

Mask. This I feared. [Aside.] Did not your lordship tell her of the honours you designed me?

Lord Touch. Yes.

Mask. 'Tis that; you know my lady has a high spirit; she thinks I am unworthy.

Lord Touch. Unworthy! 'Tis an ignorant pride in her to think so——Honesty to me is true nobility. However, 'tis my will it shall be so, and that should be convincing to her as much as reason——By Heaven, I'll not be wife-ridden!—Were it possible, it should be done this night.

Mask. By Heaven! he meets my wishes. [Aside.] Few things are impossible to willing minds.

Lord Touch. Instruct me how this may be done; you shall see I want no inclination.

Mask. I had laid a small design for to-morrow (as love will be inventing) which I thought to communicate to your lordship——But it may be as well done to-night.

Lord Touch. Here is company——Come this way, and tell me.
[Exeunt.]

Enter CARELESS and CYNTHIA.

Care. Is not that he, now gone out with my lord?

Cyn. Yes.

Care. By Heaven! there's treachery.——The confusion that I saw your father in, my lady Touchwood's passion, with what imperfectly I overheard between my lord and her, confirm me in my fears. 'Where's Mellefont?

Cyn. Here he comes.

Enter MELLEFONT.

——Did Maskwell tell you any thing of the chaplain's chamber?

Mel. No: my dear, will you get ready?—The things are all in my chamber; I want nothing but the habit.

Care. You are betrayed, and Maskwell is the villain I always thought him.

Cyn. When you were gone, he said his mind was changed, and bid me meet him in the chaplain's room, pretending immediately to follow you, and give you notice.

Care. There's Saygrace tripping by, with a bundle under his arm—He cannot be ignorant that Maskwell means to use his chamber; let's follow and examine him.

Mel. 'Tis loss of time——I cannot think him false.
[Exeunt MEL. and CARE.]

Enter Lord TOUCHWOOD.

Cyn. My lord musing!

Lord Touch. He has a quick invention, if this were suddenly designed——Yet he says he had prepared my chaplain already.

Cyn. How is this! Now I fear, indeed.

Lord Touch. Cynthia here! Alone, fair cousin, and melancholy?

Cyn. Your lordship was thoughtful.

Lord Touch. My thoughts were on serious business, not worth your hearing.

Cyn. Mine were on treachery concerning you, and may be worth your hearing.

Lord Touch. Treachery concerning me! Pray, be plain——Hark! What noise!

Mask. [Within.] Will you not hear me?

Lady Touch. [Within.] No, monster! Traitor! No!

Cyn. My lady and Maskwell! This may be lucky——My lord, let me entreat you to stand behind this screen, and listen; perhaps this chance may give you proof of what you never could have believed from my suspicions.

Enter Lady TOUCHWOOD, with a dagger, and MASKWELL: CYNTHIA and Lord TOUCHWOOD abscond, listening.

Lady Touch. You want but leisure to invent fresh falsehood; and sooth me to a fond belief of all your fictions; but I will stab the lie, that's forming in your heart, and save a sin in pity to your soul.

Mask. Strike then——since you will have it so.

Lady Touch. Ha! a steady villain to the last!

Mask. Come, why do you dally with me thus?

Lady Touch. Thy stubborn temper shocks me, and you knew it would——This is cunning all, and not courage; no, I know thee well——But thou shalt miss thy aim.

Mask. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Touch. Ha! Do you mock my rage? Then this shall punish your fond, rash attempt! Again smile!
[Goes to strike.]

And such a smile as speaks in ambiguity !
Ten thousand meanings lurk in each corner of that various face.

O ! that they were written in thy heart,
That I, with this, might lay thee open to my sight !
But then 'twill be too late to know——

Thou hast, thou hast found the only way to turn my rage ; too well thou knowest my jealous soul could never bear uncertainty. Speak, then, and tell me——Yet are you silent ? Oh, I am wilder-ed in all passions ! But thus my anger melts—[Weeps.] Here, take this poniard, for my very spirits faint, and I want strength to hold it ; thou hast disarmed my soul. [Gives the dagger.

Lord Touch. Amazement shakes me—Where will this end ?

Mask. So, 'tis well——let your wild fury have a vent, and when you have temper, tell me.

Lady Touch. Now, now, now I am calm, and can hear you.

Mask. [Aside] Thanks, my invention : and now I have it for you——First tell me, what urged you to this violence ? For your passion broke out in such imperfect terms, that yet I am to learn the cause.

Lady Touch. My lord himself surprised me with the news, you were to marry Cynthia——That you had owned your love to him, and his indulgence would assist you to attain your ends.

Cyn. How, my lord !

Lord Touch. Pray forbear all resentments for awhile, and let us hear the rest.

Mask. I grant you, in appearance all is true ;
I seemed consenting to my lord ; nay, transported with the blessing——But could you think that I, who had been happy in your loved embraces, could e'er be fond of inferior slavery ?

Cyn. Nay, good my lord, forbear resentment, let us hear it out.

Lord Touch. Yes, I will contain, though I could burst. [Aside.

Mask. I, that had wantoned in the rich circle of your world of love, could be confined within the puny province of a girl ? No——Yet, though I dote on each last favour more than all the rest, though I would give a limb for every look you cheaply throw away on any other object of your love ; yet so far I prize your pleasures over my own, that all this seeming plot that I have laid, has been to gratify your taste, and cheat the world, to prove a faithful rogue to you.

Lady Touch. If this were true——But how can it be ?

Mask. I have so contrived, that Mellefont will presently, in the chaplain's habit, wait for Cynthia in your dressing-room : but I have put the change upon her, that she may be elsewhere employed.
Do you procure her night-gown, and, with your hood tied over your face, meet him in her stead ;
you may go privately by the back-stairs, and, un-perceived, there you may propose to reinstate him in his uncle's favour, if he will comply with your desires. His case is desperate, and, I believe, he will yield to any condition——If not, here, take this ; you may employ it better than in the heart of one who is nothing, when not yours. [Gives the dagger.

Lady Touch. Thou canst deceive every body—— Nay, thou hast deceived me ; but it is as I would wish——Trusty villain ! I could worship thee.

Mask. No more——It wants but a few minutes of the time ; and Mellefont's love will carry him there before his hour.

Lady Touch. I go, I fly, incomparable Mask-well ! [Exit.

Mask. So ! this was a pinch indeed ; my invention was upon the rack, and made discovery of her last plot : I hope Cynthia and my chaplain will be ready. I will prepare for the expedition.
[Exit.

CYNTHIA and LORD TOUCHWOOD come forward.

Cyn. Now, my lord !

Lord Touch. Astonishment binds up my rage !
Villainy upon villainy ! Heavens, what a long track of dark deceit has this discovered ! I am confounded when I look back, and want a clue to guide me through the various mazes of unheard-of treachery. My wife ! Damnation ! My hell !

Cyn. My lord, have patience, and be sensible how great our happiness is, that this discovery was not made too late.

Lord Touch. I thank you, yet it may be still too late, if we don't presently prevent the execution of their plots——Ha ! I'll do it. Where is Mellefont, my poor injured nephew ? How shall
I make him ample satisfaction ?

Cyn. I dare answer for him.

Lord Touch. I do him fresh wrong to question his forgiveness, for I know him to be all goodness——Yet my wife ! Damn her !——She'll think to meet him in that dressing-room——Was it not so ? And Maskwell will expect you in the chaplain's chamber——For once I'll add my plot too—— let us hasten to find out, and inform my nephew ; and do you, quickly as you can, bring all the company into this gallery. I'll expose the strumpet and the villain. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter LORD FROTH and SIR PAUL.

Lord Froth. By Heavens ! I have slept an age
——Sir Paul, what o'clock is it ? Past eight ! On my conscience, my lady's is the most inviting couch, and a slumber there is the prettiest amusement ! But where is all the company ?

Sir Paul. The company ! Gad's bud, I don't know, my lord ; but here's the strangest revolution, all turned topsy-turvy, as I hope for Providence.

Lord Froth. O Heavens ! What's the matter ?
Where is my wife ?

Sir Paul. All turned topsy-turvy, as sure as a gun.

Lord Froth. How do you mean? My wife!

Sir Paul. The strangest posture of affairs!

Lord Froth. What! my wife?

Sir Paul. No, no, I mean the family. Your lady's affairs may be in a very good posture; I saw her go into the garden with Mr Brisk.

Lord Froth. How? Where, when, what to do?

Sir Paul. I suppose they have been laying their heads together.

Lord Froth. How?

Sir Paul. Nay, only about poetry, I suppose, my lord; making couplets.

Lord Froth. Couplets!

Sir Paul. Oh, here they come.

Enter LADY FROTH and BRISK.

Brisk. My lord, your humble servant; sir Paul, yours—The finest night!

Lady Froth. My dear, Mr Brisk and I have been star-gazing I don't know how long.

Sir Paul. Does it not tire your ladyship? Are not you weary with looking up?

Lady Froth. Oh, no! I love it violently—My dear, you are melancholy.

Lord Froth. No, my dear, I am but awake.

Lady Froth. Snuff some of my spirit of harts-horn.

Lord Froth. I have some of my own, thank you, my dear.

Lady Froth. Well, I swear, Mr Brisk, you understand astronomy like an old Egyptian!

Brisk. Not comparably to your ladyship; you are the very Cynthia of the skies, and queen of stars.

Lady Froth. That's because I have no light, but what's by reflection from you, who are the sun.

Brisk. Madam, you have eclipsed me quite, let me perish—I cannot answer that.

Lady Froth. No matter—Harkee, shall you and I make an almanack together?

Brisk. With all my soul—Your ladyship has made me the man in it already, I am so full of the wounds which you have given.

Lady Froth. O, finely taken! I swear now you are even with me; O Parnassus, you have an infinite deal of wit!

Sir Paul. So he has, Gads-bud; and so has your ladyship.

Enter LADY PLYANT, CARELESS, and CYNTHIA.

Lady Ply. You tell me most surprising things; bless me, who would ever trust a man? O, my heart aches for fear they should all be deceitful alike.

Care. You need not fear, madam; you have charms to fix inconstancy itself.

Lady Ply. O dear, you make me blush.

Lord Froth. Come, my dear, shall we take leave of my lord and lady?

Cyn. They will wait upon your lordship presently.

Lady Froth. Mr Brisk, my coach shall set you down.

All. What's the matter?

[A great shriek from the corner of the stage.]

Enter LADY TOUCHWOOD, and runs out affrighted, my LORD after her, like a parson.

Lady Touch. Oh! I'm betrayed—Save me, help me!

Lord Touch. Now, what evasion, strumpet?

Lady Touch. Stand off, let me go.

Lord Touch. Go, and thy own infamy pursue thee!—You stare as you were all amazed—I do not wonder at it—But too soon you'll know mine, and that woman's shame.

Enter MELLEFONT, disguised in a parson's habit, and pulling in MASKWELL.

Mel. Nay, by Heaven! you shall be seen—Careless, your hand—Do you hold down your head? Yes, I am your chaplain; look in the face of your injured friend, thou wonder of all falsehood.

Lord Touch. Are you silent, monster?

Mel. Good Heavens! How I believed and loved this man! Take him hence, for he is a disease to my sight.

Lord Touch. Secure that manifold villain.

[Servants seize him.]

Care. Miracle of ingratitude!

Brisk. This is all very surprising, let me perish.

Lady Froth. You know I told you Saturn looked a little more angry than usual.

Lord Touch. We'll think of punishment at leisure; but let me hasten to do justice, in rewarding virtue and wronged innocence.—Nephew, I hope I have your pardon, and Cynthia's?

Mel. We are your lordship's creatures.

Lord Touch. And be each other's comfort—Let me join your hands—Mutual love, lasting health, and circling joys, tread round each happy year of your long lives.

Let secret villainy from hence be warned,
Howe'er in private mischiefs are conceived,
Torture and shame attend their open birth:
Like vipers in the womb, base treachery lies
Still gnawing that, whence first it did arise;
No sooner born, but the vile parent dies.

[Exeunt omnes.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.—SIR JOHN BRUTE'S house.

Enter SIR JOHN, solus.

WHAT cloying meat is love, when matrimony's the sauce to it! Two years marriage has debauched my five senses! Every thing I see, every thing I hear, every thing I feel, every thing I smell, and every thing I taste—methinks has wife in it! No boy was ever so weary of his tutor, or girl of her bib, no nun of doing penance, or old maid of being chaste—as I am of being married. Sure there is a secret curse entailed upon the very name of wife! My lady is a young lady, a fine lady, a witty lady, a virtuous lady—and yet I hate her. There is but one thing on earth I loath beyond her—that's fighting. Would my courage come up to a fourth part of my ill-nature, I would stand buff to her relations, and thrust her out of doors. But marriage has sunk me down so such an ebb of resolution, I dare not draw my sword, though even to get rid of my wife! But here she comes.

Enter LADY BRUTE.

Lady Brute. Do you dine at home to-day, sir John?

Sir John. Why, do you expect I should tell you what I don't know myself?

Lady Brute. I thought there was no harm in asking you.

Sir John. If thinking wrong were an excuse for impertinence, women might be justified in most things they say or do.

Lady Brute. I am sorry I have said any thing to displease you.

Sir John. Sorrow for things past is of as little importance to me, as my dining at home or abroad ought to be to you.

Lady Brute. My enquiry was only that I might have provided what you liked.

Sir John. Six to four you had been in the wrong there again; for what I liked yesterday I don't like to-day; and what I like to-day, 'tis odds I may not like to-morrow.

Lady Brute. But if I had asked you what you liked?

Sir John. Why, then, there would be more asking about it than the thing is worth.

Lady Brute. I wish I did but know how I might please you.

Sir John. Aye, but that sort of knowledge is not a wife's talent.

Lady Brute. Whatever my talent is, I am sure my will has ever been to make you easy.

Sir John. If women were to have their wills, the world would be finely governed.

Lady Brute. What reason have I given you to use me as you do of late? It once was otherwise: You married me for love.

Sir John. And you me for money; So you have your reward, and I have mine.

Lady Brute. What is it, that disturbs you?

Sir John. A parson.

Lady Brute. Why, what has he done to you?

Sir John. He has married me. [Erit SIR JOHN.]

Lady Brute. The devil's in the fellow, I think. I was told, before I married him, that thus 'twould be: But I thought I had charms enough to govern him; and that, where there was an estate, a woman must needs be happy: So my vanity has deceived me, and my ambition has made me uneasy. But there's some comfort still; if one would be revenged of him, these are good times; a woman may have a gallant, and a separate maintenance too—The surly puppy—yet he's a fool for't: For hitherto he has been no monster: But who knows how far he may provoke me? I never loved him, yet I have been ever true to him; and that, in spite of all the attacks of art and nature upon a poor weak woman's heart, in favour of a tempting lover. Methinks so noble a defence, as I have made, should be rewarded with a better usage—Or who can tell—Perhaps a good part of what I suffer from my husband, may be a judgment upon me for my cruelty to my lover—Lord, with what pleasure could I indulge that thought, were there but a possibility of finding arguments to make it good! And how do I know but there may—Let me see—What opposes!—My matrimonial vow—Why, what did I vow? I think I promised to be true to my husband. Well; and he promised to be kind to me: But he han't kept his word—Why, then I'm absolved from mine. O, but that condition was not expressed—No matter, it was understood. Well, by all I see, if I argue the matter a little longer with myself, I shall not find so many bugbears in the way, as I thought I should. Lord, what fine notions of virtue do we women take up upon the credit of old foolish philosophers! Virtue its own reward, virtue's this, virtue's that—Virtue's an ass, and a gallant's worth forty out.

Enter BELINDA.

Good-morrow, dear cousin.

Bel. Good-morrow, madam; you look pleased this morning.

Lady Brute. I am so.

Bel. With what, pray?

Lady Brute. With my husband.

Bel. Drown husbands! for yours is a provoking fellow: As he went out just now, I prayed him to tell me what time of day it was; and he asked me if I took him for the church-clock, that was obliged to tell all the parish.

Lady Brute. He has been saying some good obliging things to me too. In short, Belinda, he has used me so barbarously of late, that I could almost resolve to play the downright wife—and cuckold him.

Bel. That would be downright indeed.

Lady Brute. Why, after all, there is more to be said for it than you would imagine, child. He is the first aggressor, not I.

Bel. Ah, but you know, we must return good for evil.

Lady Brute. That may be a mistake in the translation—Prithee be of my opinion, Belinda; for I'm positive I'm in the right; and if you'll keep up the prerogative of a woman, you'll likewise be positive you are in the right, whenever you do any thing you have a mind to. But I shall play the fool and jest on, till I make you begin to think I'm in earnest.

Bel. I shall not take the liberty, madam, to think of any thing, that you desire to keep from me.

Lady Brute. Alas, my dear, I have no secrets. My heart could never yet confine my tongue.

Bel. Your eyes, you mean; for I'm sure I have seen them gadding, when your tongue has been locked up safe enough.

Lady Brute. My eyes gadding! Prithee after whom, child?

Bel. Why, after one, that thinks you hate him, as much as I know you love him.

Lady Brute. Constant, you mean?

Bel. I do so.

Lady Brute. Lord, what should put such a thing into your head?

Bel. That, which puts things into most people's heads; observation.

Lady Brute. Why, what have you observed, in the name of wonder?

Bel. I have observed you blush, when you met him; force yourself away from him; and then be out of humour with every thing about you: In a word, never was a poor creature so spurred on by desire, or so reined in with fear!

Lady Brute. How strong is fancy!

Bel. How weak is woman!

Lady Brute. Prithee, niece, have a better opinion of your aunt's inclination,

Bel. Dear aunt, have a better opinion of your niece's understanding.

Lady Brute. You'll make me angry.

Bel. You'll make me laugh.

Lady Brute. Then you are resolved to persist?

Bel. Positively.

Lady Brute. And all I can say—

Bel. Will signify nothing.

Lady Brute. Though I should swear 'twere false—

Bel. I should think it true.

Lady Brute. Then let us forgive, [kissing her] for we have both offended: I, in making a secret, you, in discovering it.

Bel. Good nature may do much: But you have more reason to forgive one, than I have to pardon the other.

Lady Brute. 'Tis true, Belinda, you have given me so many proofs of your friendship, that my reserve has been indeed a crime: But that you may more easily forgive me, remember, child, that, when our nature prompts us to a thing our honour and religion have forbid us, we would (were it possible) conceal, even from the soul itself, the knowledge of the body's weakness.

Bel. Well, I hope, to make your friend amends, you will hide nothing from her for the future, though the body should still grow weaker and weaker.

Lady Brute. No, from this moment, I have no more reserve; and, for a proof of my repentance, I own, Belinda, I am in danger. Merit and wit assault me from without, nature and love solicit me within; my husband's barbarous usage piques me to revenge; and Satan, catching at the fair occasion, throws in my way that vengeance, which, of all vengeance, pleases women best.

Bel. 'Tis well Constant don't know the weakness of the fortification; for, o' my conscience, he'd soon come on to the assault.

Lady Brute. Ay, and I'm afraid carry the town too. But whatever you may have observed, I have dissembled so well as to keep him ignorant. So you see I'm no coquet, Belinda: And, if you follow my advice, you will never be one neither. 'Tis true, coquetry is one of the main ingredients in the natural composition of a woman, and I, as well as others, could be well enough pleased to see a crowd of young fellows ogling, and glancing, and watching all occasions to do forty foolish officious things: Nay, should some of them push on, even to hanging or drowning. Why—Faith—if I should let pure woman alone, I should e'en be but too well pleased with it.

Bel. I'll swear, 'twould tickle me strangely.

Lady Brute. But, after all, 'tis a vicious practice in us, to give the least encouragement, but where we design to come to a conclusion. For it is an unreasonable thing to engage a man in a disease, which we, before-hand, resolve we will never apply a cure to,

Bel. It is true; but then a woman must abandon one of the supreme blessings of her life. For I am fully convinced, no man has half that pleasure in possessing a mistress, as a woman has in jilting a gallant.

Lady Brute. The happiest woman, then, on earth must be our neighbour.

Bel. O the impertinent composition! She has vanity and affectation enough to make her a ridiculous original, in spite of all that art and nature ever furnished to any of her sex before her.

Lady Brute. She concludes all men her captives; and whatever course they take, it serves to confirm her in that opinion.

Bel. If they shun her, she thinks it is modesty, and takes it for a proof of their passion.

Lady Brute. And if they are rude to her, it is conduct, and done to prevent town talk.

Bel. When her folly makes them laugh, she thinks they are pierced with her wit.

Lady Brute. And when her impertinence makes them dull, concludes they are jealous of her favours.

Bel. All their actions and their words, she takes for granted, aim at her.

Lady Brute. And pities all other women, because she thinks they envy her.

Bel. Pray, out of pity to ourselves, let us find a better subject; for I am weary of this. Do you think your husband inclined to jealousy?

Lady Brute. O, no; he does not love me well enough for that. Lord, how wrong men's maxims are! They are seldom jealous of their wives, unless they are very fond of them: whereas they ought to consider the women's inclinations, for there depends their fate. Well, men may talk; but they are not so wise as we—that's certain.

Bel. At least in our affairs.

Lady Brute. Nay, I believe we should out-do them in the business of the state too: For, methinks, they do, and undo, and make but bad work on't.

Bel. Why, then, don't we get into the intrigues of government as well as they?

Lady Brute. Because we have intrigues of our own, that make us more sport, child. And so, let's in and consider of them. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A dressing-room.

Enter LADY FANCYFUL, MADEMOISELLE, and CORNET.

Lady Fan. How do I look this morning?

Cor. Your ladyship looks very ill, truly.

Lady Fan. Lard, how ill-natured thou art, Cornet, to tell me so, though the thing should be true. Don't you know, that I have humility enough to be but too easily out of conceit with myself? Hold the glass; I dare swear that will have more manners than you have. Mademoiselle, let me have your opinion too.

Madem. My opinion pe, matam, dat your ladyship never look so well in your life.

Lady Fan. Well, the French are the prettiest obliging people! they say the most acceptable, well-mannered things—and never flatter.

Madem. Your ladyship say great justice inted.

Lady Fan. Nay, every thing's just in my house but Cornet. The very looking-glass gives her the dementi. But I am almost afraid it flatters me, it makes me look so very engaging.

[Looking affectedly in the glass.]

Madem. Inted, matam, your face pe handsomer den all de looking-glass in de world, croyez moy.

Lady Fan. But is it possible my eyes can be so languishing—and so very full of fire!

Madem. Matam, if de glass was burning-glass, I believe your eyes set de fire in de house.

Lady Fan. You may take that night-gown, mademoiselle; get out of the room, Cornet; I can't endure you. This wench, methinks, does look so insufferably ugly.

Madem. Every ting look ugly, matam, dat stand by your latiship.

Lady Fan. No really, mademoiselle; methinks you look mighty pretty.

Madem. Ah matam! de moon have no eclat, ven de sun appear.

Lady Fan. O pretty expression! Have you ever been in love, mademoiselle?

Madem. Ouy, matam. [sighing.]

Lady Fan. And were you beloved again?

Madem. No, matam. [sighing.]

Lady Fan. O ye gods! What an unfortunate creature should I be in such a case! But nature has made me nice for my own defence: I'm nice, strangely nice, mademoiselle. I believe, were the merit of whole mankind bestowed upon one single person, I should still think the fellow wanted something to make it worth my while to take notice of him: And yet I could love; nay, fondly love, were it possible to have a thing made on purpose for me: For I'm not cruel, mademoiselle; I'm only nice.

Madem. Ah, matam! I wish I was fine gentleman for your sake. I do all de ting in de world, to get a little way into your heart. I make song, I make verse, I give you de sèrenade, I give great many present to mademoiselle; I no eat, I no sleep, I be lean, I be mad, I hang myself, I drown myself. Ah, ma chere dame, que je vous aime-rois! [Embracing her.]

Lady Fan. Well, the French have strange obliging ways with them; you may take those two pair of gloves, mademoiselle.

Madem. Me humbly tank my sweet lady.

Enter Servant, with a letter.

Ser. Madam, here's a letter for your ladyship.

Lady Fan. 'Tis thus I am importuned every morning, mademoiselle. Pray, how do the French ladies, when they are thus accablées?

Madem. Matam, dey never complain. Au contraire. When one Frense laty have got a hundred lover—Den she do all she can—to get a hundred more.

Lady Fan. Well, let me die, I think they have le goût bon. For 'tis an unutterable pleasure to be adored by all the men, and envied by all the women—Yet I'll swear I'm concerned at the torture I give them. Lard, why was I formed to make the whole creation uneasy? But let me read my letter. [Reads.]

'If you have a mind to hear of your faults, instead of being praised for your virtues, take the pains to walk in the Green-walk in Saint James's Park, with your woman, an hour hence. You'll there meet one, who hates you for some things, as he could love you for others, and therefore is willing to endeavour your reformation—If you come to the place I mention, you'll know who I am: if you don't, you never shall: So take your choice.'

This is strangely familiar, mademoiselle; now have I a provoking fancy to know, who this impudent fellow is.

Madem. Den take your scarf and your mask, and go to de rendezvous. De Frense laty do justement comme ça.

Lady Fan. Rendezvous! What, rendezvous with a man, mademoiselle?

Madem. Eh, pourquoy non?

Lady Fan. What, and a man perhaps I never saw in my life!

Madem. Tant mieux: C'est donc quelque chose de nouveau.

Lady Fan. Why, how do I know what designs he may have? He may intend to ravish me, for aught I know.

Madem. Ravish?—Bagatelle. I would fain see one impudent rogue ravish mademoiselle; Oui, je le voudrois!

Lady Fan. O but my reputation, mademoiselle, my reputation; ah, ma chere reputation!

Madem. Matam—Quand on l'a une fois perdue—On n'en est plus embarrassée.

Lady Fan. Fe, mademoiselle, fe! reputation is a jewel.

Madem. Qui coute bien chere, matam.

Lady Fan. Why sure you would not sacrifice your honour to your pleasure?

Madem. Je suis philosophe.

Lady Fan. Bless me, how you talk! Why, what if honour be a burden, mademoiselle, must it not be borne?

Madem. Chaqu'un a sa façon—Quand quelque chose m'incommode moy—je m'en defais, vite.

Lady Fan. Get you gone, you little naughty Frenchwoman you! I vow and swear I must turn you out of doors, if you talk thus.

Madem. Turn me out of doors!—turn yourself out of doors, and go see what de gentleman have to say to you—Tenez. Voilà [giving her her things hastily.] votre esharpe, voilà votre cuife, voilà votre masque, voilà tout. Hey, Mercure, Coquin: Call one chair for matam, and one oder [calling within] for me: Va t'en, vite.

[Turning to her lady, and helping her on hastily with her things.]

Allons, matam; depechez vous donc. Mon Dieu, quelles scrupules!

Lady Fan. Well, for once, mademoiselle, I'll follow your advice, out of the intemperate desire I have to know who this ill-bred fellow is. But I have too much delicatessen to make a practice on't.

Madem. Belle chose vraiment que la delicatessen, lors qu'il s'agit de se divertir——à ça—Vous voilà équipée. Partons—Hé bien?—qu'avez vous donc?

Lady Fan. J'ai peur.

Madem. Je n'en point moi.

Lady Fan. I dare not go.

Madem. Demeurez donc.

Lady Fan. Je suis poltrone.

Madem. Tant pis pour vous.

Lady Fan. Curiosity's a wicked devil.

Madem. C'est une charmante sainte.

Lady Fan. It ruined our first parents.

Madem. Elle a bien diverti leurs enfans.

Lady Fan. L'honneur est contre.

Madem. Le plaisir est pour.

Lady Fan. Must I then go?

Madem. Must you go?—Must you eat, must you drink, must you sleep, must you live? De nature bid you do one, de nature bid you do toder. Vous me ferez enrager.

Lady Fan. But reason corrects nature, mademoiselle?

Madem. Elle est donc bien insolente; c'est sa sœur aînée.

Lady Fan. Do you then prefer your nature to your reason, mademoiselle?

Madem. Oui da.

Lady Fan. Pourquoi?

Madem. Because my nature make me merry, my reason make me mad.

Lady Fan. Ah, la méchante Francoise!

Madem. Ah, la belle Angloise!

[Forcing her lady off.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—St. James's Park.

Enter LADY FANCYFUL and MADEMOISELLE.

Lady Fan. WELL, I vow, mademoiselle, I'm strangely impatient to know who this confident fellow is.

Enter HEARTFREE.

Look, there's Heartfree. But sure it can't be him: he's a professed woman-hater. Yet who knows what my wicked eyes may have done!

Madem. Il nous approche, matam.

Lady Fan. Yes, 'tis he: Now he will be most intolerably cavalier, though he should be in love with me.

Heart. Madam, I'm your humble servant; I perceive you have more humility and good nature than I thought you had.

Lady Fan. What you attribute to humility and good nature, sir, may, perhaps, be only due to curiosity. I had a mind to know who 'twas, had all manners enough to write that letter.

[Throwing him his letter.]

Heart. Well, and now I hope you are satisfied.

Lady Fan. I am so, sir: Good-by t'ye.

Heart. Nay, hold there; though you have done your business, I han't done mine: By your ladyship's leave, we must have one moment's prattle together. Have you a mind to be the prettiest woman about town, or not? How she stares upon me! What! this passes for an impudent question with you now, because you think you are so already.

Lady Fan. Pray, sir, let me ask a question in my turn: By what right do you pretend to examine me?

Heart. By the same right that the strong govern the weak; because I have you in my power; for you cannot get so quickly to your coach, but I shall have time enough to make you hear every thing I have to say to you.

Lady Fan. These are strange liberties you take, Mr Heartfree.

Heart. They are so, madam, but there's no help for it; for know, that I have a design upon you.

Lady Fan. Upon me, sir!

Heart. Yes; and one that will turn to your glory, and my comfort, if you will but be a little wiser than you use to be.

Lady Fan. Very well, sir.

Heart. Let me see—Your vanity, madam, I take to be about some eight degrees higher than any woman's in the town, let tother be who she will; and my indifference is naturally about the same pitch. Now could you find the way to turn this indifference into fire and flames, methinks your vanity ought to be satisfied; and this, perhaps, you might bring about upon pretty reasonable terms.

Lady Fan. And pray, at what rate would this indifference be bought off, if one should have so depraved an appetite as to desire it?

Heart. Why, madam, to drive a quaker's bargain, and make but one word with you, if I do part with it—you must lay me down—your affectation.

Lady Fan. My affectation, sir!

Heart. Why, I ask you nothing but what you may very well spare.

Lady Fan. You grow rude, sir. Come, mademoiselle, 'tis high time to be gone.

Madem. Allons, allons, allons!

Heart. [stopping them.] Nay, you may as well stand still; for hear me you shall, walk which way you please.

Lady Fan. What mean you, sir?

Heart. I mean to tell you, that you are the most ungrateful woman upon earth.

Lady Fan. Ungrateful! To whom?

Heart. To nature.

Lady Fan. Why, what has nature done to me?

Heart. What you have undone by art! It made you handsome; it gave you beauty to a miracle, a shape without a fault, wit enough to make them relish, and so turned you loose to your own discretion, which has made such work with you, that you are become the pity of our sex, and the jest of your own. There is not a feature in your face, but you have found the way to teach it some affected convulsion; your feet, your hands, your very finger ends are directed never to move without some ridiculous air or other; and your language is a suitable trumpet, to draw people's eyes upon the raree show.

Madem. [aside.] Est ce qu'on fait l'amour en Angleterre comme ça?

Lady Fan. [aside.] Now could I cry for madness, but that I know he'd laugh at me for it!

Heart. Now do you hate me for telling you the truth, but that's because you don't believe 'tis so; for, were you once convinced of that, you'd reform for your own sake.

Lady Fan. Every circumstance of nice breeding must needs appear ridiculous to one, who has so natural an antipathy to good manners.

Heart. But suppose I could find the means to convince you, that the whole world is of my opinion?

Lady Fan. Sir, though you, and all the world you talk of, should be so impertinently officious, as to think to persuade me I don't know how to behave myself; I should still have charity enough for my own understanding, to believe myself in the right, and all you in the wrong.

Madem. Le voilà mort.

[Exit Lady FANCIFUL, and MADemoisELLE.]

Heart. [gazing after her.] There her single clapper has published the sense of the whole sex. Well, this once I have endeavoured to wash the black-moor white, but henceforward I'll sooner undertake to teach sincerity to a courtier, generosity to an usurer, honesty to a lawyer, than discretion to a woman, I see has once set her heart upon playing the fool.

Enter CONSTANT.

'Morrow, Constant.

Con. Good-morrow, Jack: What are you doing here this morning?

Heart. Doing! guess if you can—Why I have been endeavouring to persuade my lady Fanciful, that she's the most foolish woman about town.

Con. A pretty endeavour truly!

Heart. I have told her in as plain English as I could speak, both what the town says of her, and what I think of her. In short, I have used her as an absolute king would do Magna Charta.

Con. And how does she take it?

Heart. As children do pills; bite them, but can't swallow them.

Con. But, prithee, what has put it into your head, of all mankind, to turn reformer?

Heart. Why, one thing was, the morning hung upon my hands, I did not know what to do with myself: and another was, that as little as I care for women, I could not see with patience one, that Heaven had taken such wondrous pains about, be so very industrious to make herself the jack-pudding of the creation.

Con. Well, now could I almost wish to see my cruel mistress make the self-same use of what Heaven has done for her, that so I might be cured of the same disease, that makes me so very uneasy; for love, love is the devil, Heart-free.

Heart. And why do you let the devil govern you?

Con. Because I have more flesh and blood than grace and self-denial. My dear, dear mistress—'sdeath! that so genteel a woman should be a saint, when religion's out of fashion.

Heart. Nay, she's much in the wrong, truly; but who knows how far time and good example may prevail?

Con. O! they have played their parts in vain already: 'Tis now two years since the damned fellow her husband invited me to his wedding; and that was the first time I saw that charming woman, whom I have loved ever since; but she is cold, my friend, still cold as the northern star.

Heart. So are all women by nature, which makes them so willing to be warmed.

Con. O don't profane the sex! prithee think them all angels for her sake; for she's virtuous even to a fault.

Heart. A lover's head is a good accountable thing truly; he adores his mistress for being virtuous, and yet is very angry with her, because she won't be lewd.

Con. Well, the only relief I expect in my misery is to see thee, some day or other, as deeply engaged as myself, which will force me to be merry in the midst of all my misfortunes.

Heart. That day will never come, be assured, Ned. Not but that I can pass a night with a woman. Nay, I can court a woman too, call her nymph, angel, goddess, what you please: But here's the difference between you and I; I persuade a woman she's an angel, and she persuades you she's one. Prithee, let me tell you how I avoid falling in love; that, which serves me for prevention, may chance to serve you for a cure.

Con. Well, use the ladies moderately, then, and I'll hear you.

Heart. That using them moderately undoes us all; but I'll use them justly, and that you ought to be satisfied with. I always consider a woman, not as the taylor, the shoemaker, the tire-woman, the sempstress, and (which is more than all that) the poet makes her; but I consider her as pure nature has contrived her, and that more strictly than I should have done our old grandmother Eve, had I seen her naked in the garden; for I consider her turned inside out. Her heart well examined, I find there pride, vanity, covetousness, indiscretion; but, above all things, malice: plots eternally forging to destroy one another's reputations, and as honestly to charge the levity of mens' tongues with the scandal; hourly debates how to make poor gentlemen in love with them, with no other intent but to use them like dogs when they have done; a constant desire of doing more mischief, and an everlasting war waged against truth and good-nature.

Con. Very well, sir; an admirable composition, truly!

Heart. Then for her outside, I consider it merely as an outside; she has a thin tiffany covering over just such stuff as you and I are made of. As for her motion, her mien, her airs, and all those tricks, I know they affect you mightily. If you should see your mistress at a coronation, dragging her peacock's train, with all her state and insolence about her, 'twould strike you with all the awful thoughts, that heaven itself could pretend to from you: whereas, I turn the whole matter into a jest, and suppose her strutting in the self-same stately manner, with nothing on but her stays, and her under scanty quilted petticoat.

Con. Hold thy profane tongue; for I'll hear no more.

Heart. What, you'll love on then?

Con. Yes, to eternity.

Heart. Yet you have no hopes at all?

Con. None.

Heart. Nay, the resolution may be discreet enough; perhaps you have found out some new philosophy, that love, like virtue, is its own reward: So you and your mistress will be as well content at a distance, as others that have less learning are in coming together.

Con. No; but if she should prove kind at last, my dear Heartfree! [Embracing him.]

Heart. Nay, prithee don't take me for your mistress; for lovers are very troublesome.

Con. Well, who knows what time may do?

VOL. II.

Heart. And just now he was sure time could do nothing!

Con. Yet not one kind glance in two years, is somewhat strange.

Heart. Not strange at all; she don't like you, that's all the business.

Con. Prithee, don't distract me.

Heart. Nay, you are a good handsome young fellow, she might use you better: Come, will you go see her? perhaps, she may have changed her mind; there's some hopes as long as she's a woman.

Con. O, 'tis in vain to visit her: sometimes, to get a sight of her, I visit that beast her husband, but she certainly finds some pretence to quit the room as soon as I enter.

Heart. It's much she don't tell him you have made love to her, too; for that's another good-natured thing usual amongst women, in which they have several ends. Sometimes 'tis to recommend their virtue, that they may sin with the greater security. Sometimes 'tis to make their husbands fight, in hopes they may be killed, when their affairs require it should be so: but most commonly 'tis to engage two men in a quarrel, that they may have the credit of being fought for; and if the lover's killed in the business, they cry, Poor fellow! he had ill luck—and so they go to cards.

Con. Thy injuries to women are not to be forgiven. Look to it, if ever you fall into their hands—

Heart. They can't use me worse than they do you, that speak well of them. O ho! here comes the knight.

Enter SIR JOHN BRUTE.

Your humble servant, sir John.

Sir John. Servant, sir.

Heart. How does all your family?

Sir John. Pox on my family!

Con. How does your lady? I han't seen her abroad a good while.

Sir John. Do? I don't know how she does, not I; she was well enough yesterday; I han't been at home to-night.

Con. What, were you out of town?

Sir John. Out of town! No, I was drinking.

Con. You are a true Englishman; don't know your own happiness. If I were married to such a woman, I would not be from her a night for all the wine in France.

Sir John. Not from her!—'Oons—what a time should a man have of that!

Heart. Why, there's no division, I hope.

Sir John. No; but there's a conjunction, and that's worse; a pox of the parson—Why the plague don't you two marry! I fancy I look like the devil to you.

Heart. Why, you don't think you have horns, do you?

2 C

Sir John. No, I believe my wife's religion will keep her honest.

Heart. And what will make her keep her religion?

Sir John. Persecution; and therefore she shall have it.

Heart. Have a care, knight; women are tender things.

Sir John. And yet, methinks, 'tis a hard matter to break their hearts.

Con. Fy, fy! you have one of the best wives in the world, and yet you seem the most uneasy husband.

Sir John. Best wives!—the woman's well enough; she has no vice, that I know of, but she's a wife, and—damn a wife! if I were married to a hogshead of claret, matrimony would make me hate it.

Heart. Why did you marry then? You were old enough to know your own mind.

Sir John. Why did I marry? I married, because I had a mind to lie with her, and she would not let me.

Heart. Why, did you ravish her?

Sir John. Yes, and so have hedged myself into forty quarrels with her relations, besides buying my pardon: but, more than all that, you must know I was afraid of my soul in those days; for I kept sneaking, cowardly, company; fellows, that went to church, said grace to their meat, and had not the least tincture of quality about them.

Heart. But I think you are got into a better gang, now.

Sir John. Zoons, sir, my lord Rake and I are hand and glove: I believe we may get our bones broke together, to-night; have you a mind to share a frolic?

Con. Not I, truly; my talent lies to softer exercises.

Sir John. What, a down-bed and a strumpet? A pox of venery, I say. Will you come and drink with me this afternoon?

Con. I can't drink to-day, but we'll come and sit an hour with you, if you will.

Sir John. Phugh! pox, sit an hour! why can't you drink?

Con. Because I am to see my mistress.

Sir John. Who's that?

Con. Why, do you use to tell?

Sir John. Yes.

Con. So wont I.

Sir John. Why?

Con. Because, 'tis a secret.

Sir John. Would my wife knew it! 'twould be no secret long.

Con. Why, do you think she can't keep a secret?

Sir John. No more than she can keep Lent.

Heart. Prithee, tell it her to try, Constant.

Sir John. No, prithee don't, that I mayn't be plagued with it.

Con. I'll hold you a guinea you don't make her tell it you.

Sir John. I'll hold you a guinea I do.

Con. Which way?

Sir John. Why, I'll beg her not to tell it me.

Heart. Nay, if any thing does it, that will.

Con. But do you think, sir—

Sir John. 'Oons, sir, I think a woman and a secret are the two impertinentest themes in the universe: therefore, pray let's hear no more of my wife, nor your mistress. Damn them both, with all my heart, and every thing else, that daggles a petticoat, except four generous whores, who are drunk with my lord Rake and I, ten times in a fortnight.

[Exit SIR JOHN.]

Con. Here's a dainty fellow for you! And the veriest coward, too. But his usage of his wife makes me ready to stab the villain.

Heart. Lovers are short-sighted: all their senses run into that of feeling. This proceeding of his is the only thing on earth can make your fortune. If any thing can prevail with her to accept of a gallant, 'tis his ill usage of her. Prithee, take heart, I have great hopes for you: and, since I can't bring you quite off her, I'll endeavour to bring you quite on; for a whining lover is the damned'st companion upon earth.

Con. My dear friend, flatter me a little more with these hopes; for, whilst they prevail, I have Heaven within me, and could melt with joy.

Heart. Pray, no melting yet; let things go farther first. This afternoon, perhaps, we shall make some advance. In the mean while, let's go dine at Locket's, and let hope get you a stomach. [Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—LADY FANCIFUL's house.

Enter LADY FANCIFUL, and MADEMOISELLE.

Lady Fan. Did you ever see any thing so importune, mademoiselle?

Madem. Inteed, matam, to say de trute, he want leetel good-breeding.

Lady Fan. Good-breeding! He wants to be caned, mademoiselle: an insolent fellow! and yet, let me expose my weakness, 'tis the only man on earth I could resolve to dispense my favours on, were he but a fine gentleman. Well! did men but know how deep an impression a fine gentleman makes in a lady's heart, they would reduce all their studies to that of good-breeding alone.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Will your ladyship please to dine yet?

Lady Fan. Yes, let them serve. [Exit Servant.] Sure this Heartfree has bewitched me, Mademoiselle. You can't imagine how oddly he mixt himself in my thoughts, during my rapture, even now. I vow 'tis a thousand pities he is not more polished; don't you think so?

Madem. Matam, I tink it so great pity, dat if I was in your ladyship's place, I take him home in my house, I lock him up in my closet, and I never let him go till I teach him every ting dat fine lady expect from fine gentelman.

Lady Fan. Why, truly, I believe I should soon subdue his brutality; for, without doubt, he has a strange penchant to grow fond of me, in spite of his aversion to the sex. else he would ne'er have taken so much pains about me. Lord, how proud would some poor creatures be of such a conquest! but I, alas! I don't know how to receive as a favour, what I take to be so infinitely my due. But what shall I do to new-mould him, mademoiselle? for, till then, he is my utter aversion.

Madem. Matam, you must laugh at him in all de place dat you meet him, and turn into de ridicule all he say, and all he do.

Lady Fan. Why, truly, satire has ever been of wondrous use to reform ill manners. Besides, 'tis my particular talent to ridicule folks. I can be severe, strangely severe, when I will, mademoiselle. Give me the pen and ink—I find myself whimsical—I'll write to him—or, I'll let it alone, and be severe upon him that way. [Sitting down to write, rising up again.] Yet active severity is better than passive. [Sitting down.] 'Tis as good to let it alone, too; for every lash I give him, perhaps he'll take for a favour. Yet, 'tis a thousand pities so much satire should be lost. [Sitting.] But, if it should have a wrong effect upon him, 'twould distract me.—
[Rising.] Well, I must write though, after all.
[Sitting.] Or, I'll let it alone, which is the same thing. [Rising.]

Madem. La voilà déterminée.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

SIR JOHN, LADY BRUTE, and BELINDA rising from the table.

Sir John. HERE; take away the things; I expect company. But first bring me a pipe; I'll smoke. [To a servant.]

Lady Brute. Lord, Sir John, I wonder you won't leave that nasty custom.

Sir John. Prithee, don't be impertinent.

Bel. [To LADY BRUTE.] I wonder who those are, he expects this afternoon?

Lady Brute. I would give the world to know: perhaps 'tis Constant; he comes here sometimes; if it does prove him, I am resolved I'll share the visit.

Bel. We'll send for our work, and sit here.

Lady Brute. He'll choak us with his tobacco.

Bel. Nothing will choak us, when we are doing what we have a mind to. Lovewell!

Enter LOVEWELL.

Love. Madam.

Lady Brute. Here; bring my cousin's work and mine hither.

[Exit LOVEWELL, and re-enters with their work.]

Sir John. Why, pox, can't you work somewhere else?

Lady Brute. We shall be careful not to disturb you, sir.

Bel. Your pipe would make you too thoughtful, uncle, if you were left alone; our prittle prattle will cure your spleen.

Sir John. Will it so, Mrs Pert! Now I believe it will so increase it, [Sitting and smoking.] I shall take my own house for a paper-mill.

Lady Brute. [To BELINDA aside.] Don't let's mind him; let him say what he will.

Sir John. A woman's tongue a cure for the spleen! 'Oons—[Aside.—] If a man had got the head-ache, they would be for applying the same remedy.

Lady Brute. You have done a great deal, Belinda, since yesterday.

Bel. Yes, I have worked very hard; how do you like it?

Lady Brute. Oh, 'tis the prettiest fringe in the world! Well, cousin, you have the happiest fancy: prithee, advise me about altering my crimson petticoat.

Sir John. A pox o' your petticoat! here's such a prating, a man can't digest his own thoughts for you.

Lady Brute. Don't answer him.—[Aside.—] Well, what do you advise me?

Bel. Why, really, I would not alter it at all. Methinks, 'tis very pretty as it is.

Lady Brute. Aye, that's true: but, you know, one grows weary of the prettiest things in the world, when one has had them long.

Sir John. Yes, I have taught her that.

Bel. Shall we provoke him a little?

Lady Brute. With all my heart. Belinda, don't you long to be married?

Bel. Why, there are some things in it which I could like well enough.

Lady Brute. What do you think you should dislike?

Bel. My husband, a hundred to one else.

Lady Brute. O ye wicked wretch! sure you don't speak as you think?

Bel. Yes, I do: especially if he smoked tobacco? [He looks earnestly at them.]

Lady Brute. Why, that many times takes off worse smells.

Bel. Then he must smell very ill indeed.

Lady Brute. So some men will, to keep their wives from coming near them.

Bel. Then those wives should cuckold them at a distance.

[He rises in a fury, throws his pipe at them, and drives them out. As they run off, CONSTANT and HEARTFREE enter. LADY BRUTE runs against CONSTANT.]

Sir John. 'Oons, get you up stairs, you confederating strumpets, you; or I'll cuckold you with a vengeance!

Lady Brute. O Lord, he'll beat us, he'll beat us! Dear, dear Mr Constant, save us.

[Exeunt.]

Sir John. I'll cuckold you, with a pox!

Con. Heaven! sir John, what's the matter?

Sir John. Why, these two gentlewomen did but hear me say I expected you here this afternoon; upon which, they presently resolved to take up the room, o' purpose to plague me and my friends.

Con. Was that all? Why, we should have been glad of their company.

Sir John. Then I should have been weary of yours; for I can't relish both together. They found fault with my smoking tobacco, too; and said men stunk. But I have a good mind—to say something.

Con. No, nothing against the ladies, pray.

Sir John. Split the ladies! Come, will you sit down? Give us some wine, fellow. You won't smoke?

Con. No, nor drink neither, at this time; I must ask your pardon.

Sir John. What, this mistress of yours runs in your head! I'll warrant it's some such squeamish minx as my wife, that's grown so dainty of late, she finds fault even with a dirty shirt.

Heart. That a woman may do, and not be very dainty neither.

Sir John. Pox of the women! let's drink.—Come, you shall take one glass, though I send for a box of lozenges to sweeten your mouth after it.

Con. Nay, if one glass will satisfy you, I'll drink it, without putting you to that expence.

Sir John. Why, that's honest. Fill some wine, sirrah: so here's to you, gentlemen—a wife's the devil. To your being both married.

[They drink.]

Heart. O, your most humble servant, sir.

Sir John. Well, how do you like my wine?

Con. 'Tis very good, indeed.

Heart. 'Tis admirable.

Sir John. Then give us t'other glass.

Con. No, pray excuse us now: we'll come another time, and then we won't spare it.

Sir John. This one glass, and no more. Come, it shall be your mistress's health: and that's a great compliment from me, I assure you.

Con. And 'tis a very obliging one to me: so give us the glasses.

Sir John. So; let her live. [SIR JOHN coughs in the glass.]

Heart. And be kind.

Con. What's the matter? does it go the wrong way?

Sir John. If I had love enough to be jealous, I should take this for an ill omen: for I never drank my wife's health in my life, but I puked in the glass.

Con. Oh, she's too virtuous to make any reasonable man jealous.

Sir John. Pox of her virtue! If I could but catch her adulterating, I might be divorced from her by law.

Heart. And so pay her a yearly pension, to be a distinguished cuckold.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, there's my lord Rake, colonel Bully, and some other gentlemen, at the Blue Posts, desire your company.

Sir John. Cod's so, we are to consult about playing the devil to-night.

Heart. Well, we won't hinder business.

Sir John. Methinks, I don't know how to leave you two: but, for once, I must make bold. Or look you; may be the conference may'nt last long: so, if you'll wait here half an hour, or an hour; if I don't come then—why then—I won't come at all.

Heart. [To CONSTANT.] A good modest proposition, truly! [Aside.]

Con. But let's accept on't, however. Who knows what may happen?

Heart. Well, sir, to shew you how fond we are of your company, we'll expect your return as long as we can.

Sir John. Nay, may be I may'nt stay at all; but business, you know, must be done. So, your servant—or, hark you, if you have a mind to take a frisk with us, I have an interest with my lord; I can easily introduce you.

Con. We are much beholden to you; but, for my part, I am engaged another way.

Sir John. What! to your mistress, I'll warrant. Prithee, leave your nasty punk to entertain herself with her own lewd thoughts, and make one with us to-night.

Con. Sir, 'tis business that is to employ me.

Heart. And me; and business must be done, you know.

Sir John. Aye, women's business, though the world were consumed for it.

[Exit SIR JOHN.]

Con. Farewell, beast; and now, my dear friend, would my mistress be but as complaisant as some men's wives, who think it a piece of good breeding to receive the visits of their husband's friend, in his absence!

Heart. Why, for your sake, I could forgive her, though she should be so complaisant to receive something else in his absence. But what way shall we invent to see her?

Con. Oh, ne'er hope it: invention will prove as vain as wishes.

Enter LADY BRUTE and BELINDA.

Heart. What do you think now, friend?

Con. I think I shall swoon.

Heart. I'll speak first, then, whilst you fetch breath.

Lady Brute. We think ourselves obliged, gentlemen, to come and return you thanks for your knight errantry. We were just upon being devoured by the fiery dragon.

Bel. Did not his fumes almost knock you down, gentlemen?

Heart. Truly, ladies, we did undergo some hardships; and should have done more, if some greater heroes than ourselves, hard by, had not diverted him.

Con. Though I am glad of the service you are pleased to say we have done you, yet I am sorry we could do it in no other way, than by making ourselves privy to what you would, perhaps, have kept a secret.

Lady Brute. For sir John's part, I suppose he designed it no secret, since he made so much noise. And, for myself, truly, I am not much concerned, since 'tis fallen only into this gentleman's hands and yours; who, I have many reasons to believe, will neither interpret nor report any thing to my disadvantage.

Con. Your good opinion, madam, was what I feared I never could have merited.

Lady Brute. Your fears were vain then, sir; for I'm just to every body.

Heart. Prithee, Constant, what is't you do to get the ladies' good opinions; for I'm a novice at it?

Bel. Sir, will you give me leave to instruct you?

Heart. Yes, that I will, with all my soul, madam.

Bel. Why, then, you must never be slovenly; never be out of humour, never smoke tobacco, nor drink but when you are dry.

Heart. That's hard.

Con. Nay, if you take his bottle from him, you break his heart, madam.

Bel. Why, is it possible the gentleman can love drinking?

Heart. Only by way of antidote.

Bel. Against what, pray?

Heart. Against love, madam.

Lady Brute. Are you afraid of being in love, sir?

Heart. I should, if there were any danger of it.

Lady Brute. Pray, why so?

Heart. Because I always had an aversion to being used like a dog.

Bel. Why, truly, men in love are seldom used better.

Lady Brute. But was you never in love, sir?

Heart. No, I thank Heaven, madam.

Bel. Pray, where got you your learning, then?

Heart. From other people's expence.

Bel. That's being a spunger, sir, which is scarce honest: If you'd buy some experience with your own money, as 'twould be fairlier got, so 'twould stick longer by you.

Enter FOOTMAN.

Foot. Madam, here's my lady Fancyful, to wait upon your ladyship.

Lady Brute. Shield me, kind Heaven! What an inundation of impertinence is here coming upon us!

Enter LADY FANCYFUL, who runs first to LADY BRUTE, then to BELINDA, kissing them.

Lady Fan. My dear lady Brute, and sweet Belinda, methinks, 'tis an age since I saw you!

Lady Brute. Yet 'tis but three days; sure you have passed your time very ill, it seems so long to you.

Lady Fan. Why, really, to confess the truth to you, I am so everlastingly fatigued with the addresses of unfortunate gentlemen, that, were it not for the extravagancy of the example, I should e'en tear out these wicked eyes with my own fingers, to make both myself and mankind easy. What think you on't, Mr Heartfree, for I take you to be my faithful adviser?

Heart. Why, truly, madam—I think——every project, that is for the good of mankind, ought to be encouraged.

Lady Fan. Then I have your consent, sir?

Heart. To do whatever you please, madam.

Lady Fan. You had a much more limited complaisance this morning, sir. Would you believe it, ladies? The gentleman has been so exceeding generous, to tell me of above fifty faults, in less time than it was well possible for me to commit two of them.

Con. Why, truly, madam, my friend there is apt to be something familiar with the ladies.

Lady Fan. He is indeed, sir; but, he's wondrous charitable with it: He has had the goodness to design a reformation, even down to my fingers ends.—'Twas thus, I think, sir, [Opening her fingers in an awkward manner.] you'd have them stand——My eyes, too, he did not like: How was't you would have directed them? Thus, I think. [Staring at him.]—Then there was something amiss in my gait, too: I don't know well how 'twas, but, as I take it, he would have me walk like him. Pray, sir, do me the favour to take a turn or two about the room, that the company may see you—He's sullen, ladies, and won't. But, to make short, and give you as true an idea as I can of the matter, I think 'twas much about this figure in general, he would have moulded me to; but I was an obstinate woman, and could not resolve to make myself mistress of his heart, by growing as awkward as his fancy.

[She walks awkwardly about, staring and looking ungainly; then changes, on a sudden, to the extremity of her usual affectation.]

Heart. Just thus women do, when they think we are in love with them, or when they are so with us.

[Here CONSTANT and LADY BRUTE talk together apart.]

Lady Fan. 'Twould, however, be less vanity for me to conclude the former, than you the latter, sir.

Heart. Madam, all I shall presume to conclude, is, that, if I were in love, you'd find the means to make me soon weary on't.

Lady Fan. Not by over-fondness, upon my word, sir. But, pray, let's stop here; for you are so much governed by instinct, I know you'll grow brutish at last.

Bel. [Aside.] Now am I sure she's fond of him: I'll try to make her jealous. Well, for my part, I should be glad to find some-body would be so free with me, that I might know my faults, and mend them.

Lady Fan. Then, pray let me recommend this gentleman to you: I have known him some time, and will be surety for him, that, upon a very limited encouragement on your side, you shall find an extended impudence on his.

Heart. I thank you, madam, for your recommendation: But hating idleness, I'm unwilling to enter into a place, where I believe there would be nothing to do. I was fond of serving your ladyship, because I knew you'd find me constant employment.

Lady Fan. I told you he'd be rude, Belinda.

Bel. O, a little bluntness is a sign of honesty, which makes me always ready to pardon it. So, sir, if you have no other exceptions to my service, but the fear of being idle in it, you may venture to list yourself: I shall find you work, I warrant you.

Heart. Upon those terms I engage, Madam; and this, with your leave, I take for earnest.

[Offering to kiss her hand.]

Bel. Hold there, sir; I'm none of your earnest givers. But, if I'm well served, I give good wages, and pay punctually.

[HEARTFREE and BELINDA seem to continue talking familiarly.]

Lady Fan. [Aside.] I don't like this jesting between them—Methinks the fool begins to look, as if he were in earnest—but then he must be a fool indeed.—Lard, what a difference there is between me and her! [Looking at BELINDA scornfully.] How I should despise such a thing, if I were a man!—What a nose she has—What a chin—What a neck—Then her eyes—And the worst kissing lips in the universe—No, no, he can never like her, that's positive—Yet I can't suffer them together any longer. Mr Heartfree, do you know, that you and I must have no quarrel for all this? I can't forbear being a little severe now and then: But women, you know, may be allowed any thing.

Heart. Up to a certain age, madam,

Lady Fan. Which I'm not yet past, I hope.

Heart. [Aside.] Nor ever will, I dare swear.

Lady Fan. [To LADY BRUTE.] Come, madam, will your ladyship be witness to our reconciliation?

Lady Brute. You, agree, then at last?

Heart. [Slightly.] We forgive.

Lady Fan. [Aside.] That was a cold, ill-natured reply.

Lady Brute. Then there's no challenges sent between you?

Heart. Not from me, I promise. [Aside to CONSTANT.] But that's more than I'll do for her; for I know she can as well be damned as forbear writing to me.

Con. That I believe. But I think we had best be going, lest she should suspect something, and be malicious.

Heart. With all my heart.

Con. Ladies, we are your humble servants. I see sir John is quite engaged, 'twould be in vain to expect him. Come, Heartfree. [Exit CONSTANT.]

Heart. Ladies, your servant. [To BELINDA.] I hope, madam, you won't forget our bargain; I'm to say what I please to you.

[Exit HEARTFREE.]

Bel. Liberty of speech, entire, sir.

Lady Fan. [Aside.] Very pretty, truly—but how the blockhead went out languishing at her; and not a look toward me—Well, people may talk, but miracles are not ceased. For it is more than natural, such a rude fellow as he, and such a little impertinent as she, should be capable of making a woman of my sphere uneasy. But I can bear her sight no longer—methinks she's grown ten times uglier than Cornet. I must home, and study revenge. [To LADY BRUTE.] Madam, your humble servant; I must take my leave.

Lady Brute. What, going already, madam?

Lady Fan. I must beg you'll excuse me this once; for really I have eighteen visits to return this afternoon: So you see I'm importuned by the women as well as the men.

Bel. [Aside.] And she's quits with them both.

Lady Fan. [Going.] Nay, you shan't go one step out of the room.

Lady Brute. Indeed, I'll wait upon you down.

Lady Fan. No, sweet lady Brute, you know I swoon at ceremony.

Lady Brute. Pray give me leave.

Lady Fan. You know I won't.

Lady Brute. Indeed I must.

Lady Fan. Indeed you shan't.

Lady Brute. Indeed I will.

Lady Fan. Indeed you shan't.

Lady Brute. Indeed I will.

Lady Fan. Indeed you shan't. Indeed, indeed, indeed, you shan't.

[Exit LADY FANCYFUL, running; they follow.]

Re-enter LADY BRUTE.

Lady Brute. This impertinent woman has put me out of humour for a fortnight—What an agreeable moment has her foolish visit interrupted! Lord, what a pleasure there is in doing what we should not do!

Re-enter CONSTANT.

Ha! here again?

Con. Though the renewing my visit may seem a little irregular, I hope I shall obtain your pardon for it, madam, when you know I only left the room, lest the lady, who was here, should have been as malicious in her remarks, as she is foolish in her conduct.

Lady Brute. He, who has discretion enough to be tender of a woman's reputation, carries a virtue about him, that may atone for a great many faults.

Con. If it has a title to atone for any, its pretensions must needs be strongest, where the crime is love. I therefore hope I shall be forgiven the attempt I have made upon your heart, since my enterprize has been a secret to all the world but yourself.

Lady Brute. Secrecy, indeed, in sins of this kind, is an argument of weight to lessen the punishment; but nothing's a plea, for a pardon entire, without a sincere repentance.

Con. If sincerity in repentance consists in sorrow for offending, no cloister ever inclosed so true a penitent as I should be. But I hope it cannot be reckoned an offence to love, where it is a duty to adore.

Lady Brute. 'Tis an offence, a great one, where it would rob a woman of all she ought to be adored for, her virtue.

Con. Virtue!—Virtue, alas! is no more like the thing that's called so, than 'tis like vice itself.

Lady Brute. If it be a thing of so very little value, why do you so earnestly recommend it to your wives and daughters?

Con. We recommend it to our wives, madam, because we would keep them to ourselves; and to our daughters, because we would dispose of them to others.

Lady Brute. It is, then, of some importance, it seems, since you can't dispose of them without it.

Con. That importance, madam, lies in the humour of the country, not in the nature of the thing. Pray, what does your ladyship think of a powdered coat for deep mourning?

Lady Brute. I think, sir, your sophistry has all the effect, that you can reasonably expect it should have; it puzzles, but don't convince.

Con. I'm sorry for it.

Lady Brute. I'm sorry to hear you say so.

Con. Pray, why?

Lady Brute. Because, if you expected more from it, you have a worse opinion of my understanding than I desire you should have.

Con. [Aside.] I comprehend her: She would have me set a value upon her chastity, that I might think myself the more obliged to her, when she makes me a present of it.—[To her.] I beg you will believe I did but rally, madam; I know you judge too well of right and wrong, to be deceived by arguments like those. I hope you will have so favourable an opinion of my understanding, too, to believe the thing called virtue has worth enough with me, to pass for an eternal obligation, wherever it is sacrificed.

Lady Brute. It is, I think, so great a one, as nothing can repay.

Con. Yes; the making the man you love your everlasting debtor.

Lady Brute. When debtors once have borrowed all we have to lend, they are very apt to grow shy of their creditor's company.

Con. That, madam, is only when they are forced to borrow of usurers, and not of a generous friend. Let us chuse our creditors, and we are seldom so ungrateful as to shun them.

Lady Brute. What think you of sir John, sir? I was his free choice.

Con. I think he is married, madam.

Lady Brute. Does marriage, then, exclude men from your rule of constancy?

Con. It does. Constancy is a brave, free, haughty, generous agent, that cannot buckle to the chains of wedlock.

Lady Brute. Have you no exceptions to this general rule, as well as to the other?

Con. Yes, I would, after all, be an exception to it myself, if you were free in power and will to make me so.

Lady Brute. Compliments are well placed, where it is impossible to lay hold on them.

Con. I would to Heaven it were possible for you to lay hold on mine, that you might see it is no compliment at all. But since you are already disposed of, beyond redemption, to one who does not know the value of the jewel you have put into his hands, I hope you would not think him greatly wronged, though it should sometimes be looked on by a friend, who knows how to esteem it as he ought.

Lady Brute. If looking on it alone would serve his turn, the wrong, perhaps, might not be very great.

Con. Why, what if he should wear it now and then a day, so he gave good security to bring it home again at night?

Lady Brute. Small security, I fancy, might serve for that. One might venture to take his word.

Con. Then, where's the injury to the owner?

Lady Brute. It is an injury to him, if he think it one. For if happiness be seated in the mind, unhappiness must be so, too.

Con. Here I close with you, madam, and draw my conclusive argument from your own position: If the injury lie in the fancy, there needs nothing but secrecy to prevent the wrong.

Lady Brute. [Going.] A surer way to prevent it, is to hear no more arguments in its behalf.

Con. [Following her.] But, madam—

Lady Brute. But, sir, it is my turn to be discreet now, and not suffer too long a visit.

Con. [Catching her hand.] By Heaven! you shall not stir, till you give me hopes, that I shall see you again at some more convenient time and place.

Lady Brute. I give you just hopes enough—[Breaking from him.] to get loose from you; and that's all I can afford you at this time.

[Exit running.]

Con. Now, by all that's great and good, she is a charming woman! In what ecstasy of joy has she left me! For she gave me hope, did she not say she gave me hope? Hope! Ay; what hope—enough to make me let her go—Why, that's enough, in conscience. Or, no matter how it was spoke—Hope was the word; it came from her, and it was said to me.

Enter HEARTFREE.

Ha, Heartfree! Thou hast done me noble service, in prattling to the young gentlewoman without there: Come to my arms, thou venerable bawd, and let me squeeze thee, [Embracing him eagerly.] as a new pair of stays does a fat country girl, when she is carried to court to stand for a maid of honour.

Heart. Why, what the devil is all this rapture for?

Con. Rapture! There is ground for rapture, man; there is hopes, my Heartfree; hopes, my friend!

Heart. Hopes! of what?

Con. Why, hopes that my lady and I together (for it is more than one body's work) should make sir John a cuckold.

Heart. Prithee, what did she say to thee?

Con. Say! What did she not say? She said, that—says she—she said—Zoons, I don't know what she said; but she looked as if she said every thing I'd have her; and so, if thou wilt go to the tavern, I'll treat you with any thing, that gold can buy; I'll give all my silver amongst the drawers, make a bonfire before the door; say the plenipo's have signed the peace, and the bank of England's grown honest.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.

LORD RAKE, SIR JOHN, &c. at a table, drinking.

All. Huzza!

Lord Rake. Come boys, charge again—So—

Confusion to all order! Here's liberty of conscience.

All. Huzza!

Lord Rake. Come, sing the song I made this morning. [Lord Rake. Rep.] And in peace I'll jog on to the devil. Well, how do you like it, gentlemen?

All. Oh, admirable!

Sir John. I would not give a fig for a song that is not full of sin and impudence.

Lord Rake. Then my muse is to your taste. But drink away; the night steals upon us; we shall want time to be lewd in. Hey, page, sally out, sirrah, and see what's doing in the camp; we'll beat up their quarters presently.

Page. I'll bring your lordship an exact account. [Exit Page.]

Lord Rake. Now let the spirit of Clary go round. Here's to our forlorn hope. Courage, knight, victory attends you.

Sir John. And laurels shall crown me—Drink away, and be damned.

Lord Rake. Again, boys; t'other glass, and damn morality.

Sir John. [drunk.] Ay—damn morality—and damn the watch. And let the constable be married.

All. Huzza!

Re-enter Page.

Lord Rake. How are the the streets inhabited, sirrah?

Page. My lord, 'tis sunday-night, they are full of drunken citizens.

Lord Rake. Along, then, boys! we shall have a feast.

Col. Bully. Along, noble knight.

Sir John. Ay—along, Bully; and he that says sir John Brute is not as drunk, and as religious as the drunkennest citizen of them all—is a liar, and the son of a whore.

Col. Bully. Why, that was bravely spoke, and like a free-born Englishman.

Sir John. What's that to you, sir, whether I am an Englishman or a Frenchman?

Col. Bully. Zoons, you are not angry, sir?

Sir John. Zoons, I am angry, sir—for if I'm a freeborn Englishman, what have you to do, even to talk of my privileges?

Lord Rake. Why, prithee, knight, don't quarrel here; leave private animosities to be decided by day-light; let the night be employed against the public enemy.

Sir John. My lord, I respect you, because you are a man of quality. But I'll make that fellow know I am within a hair's breadth as absolute by my privileges, as the king of France is by his prerogative. He, by his prerogative, takes money, where it is not his due; I, by my privilege, refuse paying it, where I owe it. Liberty and property, and Old England—Huzza!

All Huzza!

[Exit SIR JOHN reeling, all following him.]

SCENE III.—A bed-chamber.

Enter LADY BRUTE and BELINDA.

Lady Brute. Sure 'tis late, Belinda; I begin to be sleepy.

Bel. Yes, 'tis near twelve. Will you go to bed?

Lady Brute. To bed, my dear! And by that time I am fallen into a sweet sleep, (or perhaps a sweet dream, which is better and better) sir John will come home roaring drunk, and be overjoyed he finds me in a condition to be disturbed.

Bel. O, you need not fear him; he is in for all night. The servants say he is gone to drink with my lord Rake.

Lady Brute. Nay, 'tis not very likely, indeed, such suitable company should part presently. What hogs men turn, Belinda, when they grow weary of women!

Bel. And what owls they are, whilst they are fond of them!

Lady Brute. But that we may forgive well enough, because they are so upon our accounts. But, prithee, one word of poor Constant before we go to bed, if it be but to furnish matter for dreams: I dare swear he is talking of me now, or thinking of me, at least.

Bel. So he ought, I think; for you were pleased to make him a good round advance to-day, madam.

Lady Brute. Why, I have even plagued him enough to satisfy any reasonable woman: He has besieged me these two years to no purpose.

Bel. And if he besieged you two years more, he'd be well enough paid, so he had the plundering of you at last.

Lady Brute. That may be; but I'm afraid the town won't be able to hold out much longer: for, to confess the truth to you, Belinda, the garrison begins to grow mutinous.

Bel. Then the sooner you capitulate, the better.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Covent Garden.

Enter LORD RAKE, SIR JOHN, &c. with swords drawn.

Lord Rake. Is the dog dead?

Col. Bully. No, damn him; I heard him wheeze.

Lord Rake. How the witch his wife howled!

Col. Bully. Ay, she'll alarm the watch presently.

Lord Rake. Appear, knight, then; come, you have a good cause to fight for; there's a man murdered.

Sir John. Is there? then let his ghost be sa-

VOL. II.

Lady Brute. Yet, methinks, I would fain stay a little longer, to see you fixed, too, that we might start together, and see who could love longest. What think you, if Heartfree should have a month's mind to you?

Bel. Why, faith, I could almost be in love with him, for despising that foolish, affected lady Fanciful; but I'm afraid he is too cold ever to warm himself by my fire.

Lady Brute. Then he deserves to be froze to death. Would I were a man for your sake, dear rogue! [Kissing her.]

Bel. You'd wish yourself a woman for your own, or the men are mistaken. But if I could make a conquest of this son of Bacchus, and rival his bottle, what should I do with him? He has no fortune; I can't marry him; and sure you would not have me—do I don't know what with him.

Lady Brute. Why, if you did, child, it would be but a good friendly part; if it were only to keep me in countenance, whilst I play the fool with Constant.

Bel. Well, if I can't resolve to serve you that way, I may perhaps some other, as much to your satisfaction. But pray, how shall we contrive to see these blades again quickly?

Lady Brute. We must e'en have recourse to the old way; make them an appointment betwixt jest and earnest: it will look like a frolick; and that, you know, is a very good thing to save a woman's blushes.

Bel. You advise well; but where shall it be?

Lady Brute. In Spring Garden. But they shan't know their women, till they pull off their masks; for a surprise is the most agreeable thing in the world: And I find myself in a very good humour, ready to do them any good turn I can think on.

Bel. Then, pray write them the necessary billet, without farther delay.

Lady Brute. Let's go into your chamber, then; and whilst you say your prayers, I'll do it, child.

[Ereunt.]

tified; for I'll sacrifice a constable to it presently, and burn his body upon his wooden chair.

Enter a Tailor, with a bundle under his arm.

Col. Bully. How now? what have we got here? a thief?

Tai. No, an't please you, I'm no thief.

Lord Rake. That we'll see presently: Here, let the general examine him.

Sir John. Ay, ay, let me examine him, and I'll lay a hundred pounds I find him guilty in spite of his teeth; for he looks—like a—sneaking rascal. Come, sirrah, without equivocation or mental reservation, tell me of what opinion you are, and what calling; for by them—I shall guess at your morals.

2 D

Tai. An't please you, I'm a dissenting journeyman tailor.

Sir John. Then, sirrah, you love lying by your religion, and theft by your trade: And so, that your punishments may be suitable to your crimes—I'll have you first gagged—and then hanged.

Tai. Pray, good worthy gentleman, don't abuse me! indeed I'm an honest man, and a good workman, though I say it, that should not say it.

Sir John. No words, sirrah, but attend your fate.

Lord Rake. Let me see what's in that bundle.

Tai. An't please you, it's my lady's short cloak and wrapping gown.

Sir John. What lady, you reptile, you?

Tai. My lady Brute, an't please your honour.

Sir John. My lady Brute! my wife! the robe of my wife—with reverence let me approach it. The dear angel is always taking care of me in danger, and has sent me this suit of armour to protect me in this day of battle—on they go.

All. O brave knight!

Lord Rake. Live Don Quixotte the second!

Sir John. Sancho, my 'squire, help me on with my armour.

Tai. O dear gentlemen! I shall be quite undone if you take the sack.

Sir John. Retire, sirrah! and since you carry off your skin, go home, and be happy. So! how d'ye like my shapes now?

Lord Rake. To a miracle! He looks like a queen of the Amazons—But to your arms, gentlemen! The enemy's upon their march—here's the watch—

Sir John. 'Oons! if it were Alexander the Great, at the head of his army, I would drive him into a horse-pond.

All. Huzza! O brave knight!

Enter Watchmen.

Sir John. See! Here he comes, with all his Greeks about him—

Watch. Hey-day! Who have we got here!—Stand.

Sir John. May-hap not.

Watch. What are you all doing here in the streets at this time o'night? And who are you, madam, that seems to be at the head of this noble crew?

Sir John. Sirrah, I'm Bonduca, queen of the Welchmen; and with a leek as long as my pedigree, I will destroy your Roman legion in an instant—Britons, strike home!

[Snatches a watchman's staff, strikes at the watch, and falls down, his party drove off.]

Watch. So! We have got the queen, however. We'll make her pay well for her ransom—Come, madam, will your majesty please to walk before the constable?

Sir John. The constable's a rascal! and you are a son of a whore!

Watch. A most noble reply, truly! If this be her royal style, I'll warrant her maids of honour prattle prettily: But we'll teach you some of our court-dialect, before we part with you, princess—Away with her to the round-house.

Sir John. Hands off, you ruffians! My honour's dearer to me than my life; I hope you won't be uncivil.

Watch. Away with her.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—A bed-chamber.

Enter HEARTFREE.

What the plague ails me?—Love? No, I thank you for that, my heart's rock still—Yes, 'tis Belinda that disturbs me, that's positive—Well, what of all that? Must I love her for being troublesome? At that rate, I might love all the women I meet, 'egad. But hold!—though I don't love her for disturbing me, yet she may disturb me, because I love her—Ay, that may be, faith! I have dreamt of her, that's certain—Well, so I have of my mother; therefore, what's that to the purpose? Ay, but Belinda runs in my mind waking—and so does many a damned thing, that I don't care a farthing for—Methinks, though, I would fain be talking to her, and yet I have no business—Well, am I the first man that has had a mind to do an impertinent thing?

Enter CONSTANT.

Con. How now, Heartfree? What makes you up and dressed so soon? I thought none but lovers quarrelled with their beds; I expected to have found you snoring, as I used to do.

Heart. Why, faith, friend, 'tis the care I have of your affairs, that makes me so thoughtful. I have been studying all night how to bring your matter about with Belinda.

Con. With Belinda!

Heart. With my lady, I mean: And, faith, I have mighty hopes of it. Sure you must be very well satisfied with her behaviour to you yesterday?

Con. So well, that nothing but a lover's fears can make me doubt of success. But what can this sudden change proceed from?

Heart. Why, you saw her husband beat her, did you not?

Con. That's true: A husband is scarce to be borne upon any terms, much less when he fights with his wife. Methinks, she should e'en have cuckolded him upon the very spot, to shew, that after the battle she was master of the field.

Heart. A council of war of women would infallibly have advised her to it. But, I confess, so agreeable a woman as Belinda deserves better usage.

Con. Belinda again!

Heart. My lady, I mean. What a pox makes me blunder so to-day? [Aside.] A plague of this treacherous tongue.

Con. Pr'ythee look upon me seriously, Heart-free—Now answer me directly: Is it my lady, or Belinda, employs your careful thoughts thus?

Heart. My lady, or Belinda?

Con. In love, by this light! in love.

Heart. In love!

Con. Nay, ne'er deny it; for thou'lt do it so awkwardly, 'twill but make the jest sit heavier about thee. My dear friend, I give thee much joy.

Heart. Why, pr'ythee, you won't persuade me to it, will you?

Con. That she's mistress of your tongue, that's plain; and I know you are so honest a fellow, your tongue and heart always go together. But how—but how the devil? Pha, ha, ha, ha, ha!

Heart. Hey-day! Why sure you don't believe it in earnest?

Con. Yes, I do, because I see you deny it in jest.

Heart. Nay, but look you, Ned—a—deny in jest—a—gadzooks, you know I say—a—when a man denies a thing in jest—a—

Con. Pha, ha, ha, ha, ha!

Heart. Nay, then, we shall have it: What, because a man stumbles at a word! Did you never make a blunder?

Con. Yes; for I am in love, I own it.

Heart. Then, so am I—Now laugh till thy soul's glutted with mirth. [Embracing him.] But, dear Constant, don't tell the town on't.

Con. Nay, then, 'twere almost pity to laugh at thee, after so honest a confession. But tell us a little, Jack, by what new invented arms has this mighty stroke been given?

Heart. E'en by that unaccountable weapon, called je-ne sçai-quoi: For every thing, that can come within the verge of beauty, I have seen it with indifference.

Con. So, in few words then, the je-ne sçai-quoi has been too hard for the quilted petticoat.

Heart. 'Egad, I think the je-ne sçai-quoi is in the quilted petticoat; at least 'tis certain, I ne'er think on't without—a—a je-ne sçai-quoi in every part about me.

Con. Well, but have all your remedies lost their virtue! Have you turned her inside out yet?

Heart. I dare not so much as think on't.

Con. But don't the two years fatigue I have had, discourage you?

Heart. Yes: I dread what I foresee; yet cannot quit the enterprize. Like some soldiers, whose courage dwells more in their honour than their nature: On they go, though the body trembles at what the soul makes it undertake.

Con. Nay, if you expect your mistress will use you, as your profanations against her sex deserve, you tremble justly. But how do you intend to proceed, friend?

Heart. Thou know'st I'm but a novice; be friendly, and advise me.

Con. Why, look you then; I'd have you—Serenade and a—write a song—Go to church; look like a fool—be very officious: Ogle, write and lead out: And who knows, but in a year or two's time, you may be—called a troublesome puppy, and sent about your business.

Heart. That's hard.

Con. Yet thus it oft falls out with lovers, sir.

Heart. Pox on me for making one of the number!

Con. Have a care; say no saucy things; 'twill but augment your crime; and if your mistress hears on't, increase your punishment.

Heart. Pr'ythee say something then to encourage me; you know I helped you in your distress.

Con. Why, then, to encourage you to perseverance, that you may be thoroughly ill used for your offences, I'll put you in mind, that even the coyest ladies of them all are made up of desires, as well as we; and though they do hold out a long time, they will capitulate at last. For that thundering engineer, Nature, does make such havoc in the town, they must surrender at the long-run, or perish in their own flames.

Enter FOOTMAN.

Foot. Sir, there's a porter without, with a letter; he desires to give it into your own hands.

Con. Call him in.

Enter PORTER.

What, Joe! Is it thee?

Por. An't please you, sir, I was ordered to deliver this into your own hands, by two well-shaped ladies at the New Exchange. I was at your honour's lodgings, and your servants sent me hither.

Con. 'Tis well; are you to carry any answer?

Por. No, my noble master!

Con. Very well; there. [Gives him money.]

Por. God bless your honour! [Exit PORTER.]

Con. Now let's see what honest, trusty Joe has brought us. [Reads.]

'If you and your play-fellow can spare time
'from your business and devotions, don't fail to 'be at Spring Garden about eight in the evening.
'You'll find nothing there but women, so you 'need bring no other arms than what you usually
'carry about you.'

So, play-fellow: here's something to stay your stomach, till your mistress's dish is ready for you.

Heart. Some of our old battered acquaintance; I won't go, not I.

Con. Nay, that you can't avoid; there's honour in the case; 'tis a challenge, and I want a second.

Heart. I doubt I shall be but a very useless one to you; for I'm so disheartened by this wound Belinda has given me, I don't think I shall have courage enough to draw my sword.

Con. O, if that be all, come along; I'll warrant you find sword enough for such enemies as we have to deal withal. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—A street.

Enter CONSTABLE and WATCHMEN, with SIR JOHN.

Const. Come, forsooth, come along, if you please! I once, in compassion, thought to have seen you safe home this morning; but you have been so rampant and abusive all night, I shall see what the justice of peace will say to you.

Sir John. And you shall see what I'll say to the justice of peace, sirrah!

[WATCHMAN knocks at the door.]

Enter SERVANT.

Const. Is Mr Justice at home?

Ser. Yes.

Const. Pray acquaint his worship we have got an unruly woman here, and desire to know what he'll please to have done with her.

Ser. I'll acquaint my master. [Exit SERV.]

Sir John. Hark you, constable, what cuckoldy justice is this?

Const. One that knows how to deal with such romps as you are, I'll warrant you.

Enter JUSTICE.

Just. Well, Mr constable; what is the matter there?

Const. An't please your worship, this here comical sort of a gentlewoman has committed great outrages to-night. She has been frolicking with my lord Rake and his gang; they attacked the watch, and I hear there has been a man killed: I believe 'tis they have done it.

Sir John. Sir, there may have been murder for aught I know; and 'tis a great mercy there has not been a rape, too—that fellow would have ravished me.

2d Watch. Ravish! ravish! O lud! O lud! O lud! Ravish her! Why, please your worship, I heard Mr Constable say he believed she was little better than a maphrodite.

Just. Why, truly, she does seem a little masculine about the mouth.

2d Watch. Yes, and about the hands too, an't please your worship. I did but offer in mere civility, to help her up the steps into our apartment, and with her gripen fist thus—

[SIR JOHN knocks him down.]

Sir John. Just so, sir, I felled him to the ground like an ox.

Just. Out upon this boisterous woman! Out upon her!

Sir John. Mr Justice, he would have been un-civil: It was in defence of my honour, and I demand satisfaction.

2d Watch. I hope your worship will satisfy her honour in Bridewell; that fist of hers will make an admirable hemp-beater.

Sir John. Sir, I hope you will protect me against that libidinous rascal: I am a woman of quality, and virtue too, for all I am in an undress this morning.

Just. Madam, if you expect I should be favourable to you, I desire I may know who you are.

Sir John. Sir, I am any body at your service.

Just. Lady, I desire to know your name?

Sir John. Sir, my name's Mary.

Just. Ay, but your surname, madam?

Sir John. Sir, my surname's the very same with my husband's.

Just. A strange woman this! Who is your husband, pray?

Sir John. Sir John.

Just. Sir John who?

Sir John. Sir John Brute.

Just. Is it possible, madam, you can be my lady Brute?

Sir John. That happy woman, sir, am I; only a little in my merriment to night.

Just. I am concerned for sir John.

Sir John. Truly, so am I.

Just. I have heard he's an honest gentleman.

Sir John. As ever drank.

Just. Good lack! Indeed, lady, I'm sorry he has such a wife.

Sir John. I am sorry he has any wife at all.

Just. And so perhaps may he—I doubt you have not given him a very good taste of matrimony.

Sir John. Taste, sir! sir, I have scorned to stint him to a taste; I have given him a full meal of it.

Just. Indeed, I believe so. But pray, fair lady, may he have given you any occasion for this extraordinary conduct? does he not use you well?

Sir John. A little upon the rough, sometimes.

Just. Ay, any man may be out of humour now and then.

Sir John. Sir, I love peace and quiet, and when a woman don't find that at home, she's apt sometimes to comfort herself with a few innocent diversions abroad.

Just. I doubt he uses you but too well. Pray, how does he as to that weighty thing, money? Does he allow you what is proper of that?

Sir John. Sir, I have generally enough to pay the reckoning, if this son of a whore of a drawer would but bring his bill.

Just. A strange woman this!—Does he spend a reasonable portion of his time at home, to the comfort of his wife and children?

Sir John. He never gave his wife cause to repine at his being abroad in his life.

Just. Pray, madam, how may he be in the grand matrimonial point—Is he true to your bed?

Sir John. Chaste! Oons! This fellow asks so many impertinent questions! I'gad I believe it is the justice's wife, in the justice's clothes.

Just. Pray, madam, (and then I've done) what may be your ladyship's common method of life, if I may presume so far?

Sir John. Why, sir, much that of a woman of quality.

Just. Pray, how may you generally pass your time, madam? your morning, for example?

Sir John. Sir, like a woman of quality—I wake about two o'clock in the afternoon—I stretch—and make a sign for my chocolate—When I have drank three cups—I slide down again upon my back, with my arms over my head, while my two maids put on my stockings. Then, hanging upon their shoulders, I am trailed to my great chair, where I sit—and yawn—for my breakfast—If it don't come presently, I lie down upon my couch to say my prayers, while my maid reads me the play-bills.

Just. Very well, madam.

Sir John. When the tea is brought in, I drink twelve regular dishes, with eight slices of bread and butter—And half an hour after, I send to the cook to know if the dinner is almost ready.

Just. So! madam!

Sir John. By that time my head is half drest, I hear my husband swearing himself into a state of perdition, that the meat's all cold upon the table; to amend which, I come down in an hour more, and have it sent back to the kitchen, to be all dressed over again.

Just. Poor man!

Sir John. When I have dined, and my idle servants are presumptuously set down at their ease, to do so too, I call for my coach, to go visit dear friends, of whom I hope I never shall find one at home, while I shall live.

Just. So! There's the morning and afternoon pretty well disposed of—Pray, madam, how do you pass your evenings?

Sir John. Like a woman of spirit, sir, a great spirit. Give me a box and dice—Seven's the main, Oons! Sir, I set you a hundred pounds! Why, do you think women are married now a-days, to sit at home and mend napkins? Sir, we have nobler ways of passing time.

Just. Mercy upon us, Mr Constable, what will this age come to?

Const. What will it come to, indeed, if such women as these are not set in the stocks?

Sir John. Sir, I have a little urgent business calls upon me; and therefore, I desire the favour of you to bring matters to a conclusion.

Just. Madam, if I were sure that business were not to commit more disorders, I would release you.

Sir John. None—By my virtue.

Just. Then, Mr Constable, you may discharge her.

Sir John. Sir, your very humble servant. If you please to accept of a bottle—

Just. I thank you kindly, madam; but I never drink in a morning. Good-by-t'ye, madam, good-by-t'ye.

Sir John. Good-by-t'ye, good sir. [Exit Justice. So—now, Mr Constable, shall you and I go pick up a whore together?

Const. No, thank you, madam; my wife's enough to satisfy any reasonable man.

Sir John. [Aside.] He, he, he, he, he! the fool is married then. Well, you won't go?

Const. Not I, truly.

Sir John. Then I'll go by myself; and you and your wife may go to the devil.

[Exit Sir John. Constable gazing after her.] Why, god-a-mercy, lady! [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.—Spring-Garden.

CONSTANT and HEARTFREE cross the Stage.
As they go off, enter LADY FANCIFUL and MADEMOISELLE masked, and dogging them.

Con. So; I think we are about the time appointed: Let us walk up this way. [Exeunt.]

Lady Fan. Good: Thus far I have dogged them without being discovered. 'Tis infallibly some intrigue that brings them to Spring-Garden. How my poor heart is torn and wrackt with fear and jealousy! Yet let it be any thing but that flirt Belinda, and I'll try to bear it. But if it proves her, all that's woman in me shall be employed to destroy her.

[Exeunt after CONSTANT and HEARTFREE.]

Re-enter CONSTANT and HEARTFREE. LADY FANCIFUL and MADEMOISELLE still following at a distance.

Con. I see no females yet, that have any thing to say to us. I'm afraid we are bantered.

Heart. I wish we were; for I'm in no humour to make either them or myself merry.

Con. Nay, I'm sure you'll make them merry enough, if I tell them why you are dull. But, prithee, why so heavy and sad before you begin to be ill used?

Heart. For the same reason, perhaps, that you are so brisk and well pleased; because both pains and pleasures are generally more considerable in prospect, than when they come to pass.

Enter LADY BRUTE and BELINDA, masked, and poorly dressed.

Con. How now! who are these? Not our game, I hope.

Heart. If they are, we are e'en well enough served, to come a hunting here, when we had so much better game in chase elsewhere.

Lady Fan. [to Mademoiselle.] So, those are their ladies without doubt. But I'm afraid that doily stuff is not worn for want of better clothes. They are the very shape and size of Belinda and her aunt.

Madem. So dey be inteed, matam.

Lady Fan. We'll slip into this close arbour, where we may hear all they say.

[Ereunt LADY FANCYFUL and MADemoisELLE.]

Lady Brute. What, are you afraid of us, gentlemen?

Heart. Why, truly, I think we may, if appearances don't lie.

Bel. Do you always find women what they appear to be, sir?

Heart. No, forsooth; but I seldom find them better than they appear to be.

Bel. Then the outside's best, you think?

Heart. 'Tis the honestest.

Con. Have a care, Heartfree; you are relapsing again.

Lady Brute. Why, does the gentleman use to rail at women?

Con. He has done formerly.

Bel. I suppose he had very good cause for it. They did not use you so well, as you thought you deserved, sir.

Lady Brute. They made themselves merry at your expence, sir.

Bel. Laughed, when you sighed.

Lady Brute. Slept, while you were waking.

Bel. Had your porter beat.

Lady Brute. And threw your billet-doux in the fire.

Heart. Hey-day! I shall do more than rail presently.

Bel. Why, you won't beat us, will you?

Heart. I don't know but I may.

Con. What the devil's coming here? Sir John in a gown—And drunk, i'faith.

Enter SIR JOHN.

Sir John. What a pox—here's Constant, Heartfree—and two whores 'egad—O, you covetous rogues! what, have you never a spare punk for your friend?—But I'll share with you.

[He seizes both the women.]

Heart. Why, what the plague have you been doing, knight?

Sir John. Why, I have been beating the watch, and scandalizing the clergy.

Heart. A very good account, truly.

Sir John. And what do you think I'll do next?

Con. Nay, that no man can guess.

Sir John. Why, if you'll let me sup with you, I'll treat both your strumpets.

Lady Brute. [Aside.] O Lord, we're undone.

Heart. No, we can't sup together, because we have some affairs elsewhere. But if you'll accept of these two ladies, we'll be so complaisant to you, to resign our right in them.

Bel. [Aside.] Lord, what shall we do?

Sir John. Let me see, their clothes are such damned clothes, they won't pawn for the reckoning.

Heart. Sir John, your servant. Raptures attend you.

Con. Adieu, ladies; make much of the gentleman.

Lady Brute. Why, sure you won't leave us in the hands of a drunken fellow to abuse us!

Sir John. Who do you call a drunken fellow, you slut you? I'm a man of quality; the king has made me a knight.

Heart. Ay, ay, you are in good hands; adieu, adieu. [HEARTFREE runs off.]

Lady Brute. The devil's hands: Let me go, or I'll—For Heaven's sake, protect us.

[She breaks from him, runs to CONSTANT, twitching off her mask, and clapping it on again.]

Sir John. I'll devil you, you jade you. I'll demolish your ugly face.

Re-enter HEARTFREE. BELINDA runs to him, and shews her face.

Heart. Hold, thou mighty man! look ye, sir, we did but jest with you. These are ladies of our acquaintance, that we had a mind to frighten a little, but now you must leave us.

Sir John. Oons, I won't leave you, not I.

Heart. Nay, but you must, though; and, therefore, make no words on't.

Sir John. Then, you are a couple of damned uncivil fellows. And I hope your punks will give you sauce to your mutton.

[Exit SIR JOHN.]

Lady Brute. Oh, I shall never come to myself again, I'm so frightened!

Con. 'Tis a narrow escape, indeed.

Bel. Women must have frolics, you see, whatever they cost them.

Heart. This might have proved a dear one, though.

Lady Brute. You are the more obliged to us for the risk we run upon your accounts.

Con. And I hope you'll acknowledge something due to our knight-errantry, ladies. This is the second time we have delivered you.

Lady Brute. 'Tis true; and since we see fate has designed you for our guardians, 'twill make us the more willing to trust ourselves in your hands. But you must not have the worse opinion of us for our innocent frolic.

Heart. Ladies, you may command our opinions in every thing, that is to your advantage.

Bel. Then, sir, I command you to be of opinion, that women are sometimes better than they appear to be.

[LADY BRUTE and CONSTANT talk apart.]

Heart. Madam, you have made a convert of me in every thing. I'm grown a fool. I could be fond of a woman.

Bel. I thank you, sir, in the name of the whole sex.

Heart. Which sex, nothing but yourself could ever have atoned for.

Bel. Now has my vanity a devilish itch to know in what my merit consists.

Heart. In your humility, madam, that keeps you ignorant it consists at all.

Bel. One other compliment, with that serious face, and I hate you for ever after.

Heart. Some women love to be abused: Is it that you would be at?

Bel. No, not that neither: But I'd have men talk plainly what's fit for women to hear; without putting them either to a real, or an affected blush.

Heart. Why, then, in as plain terms as I can find to express myself, I could love you even to matrimony itself a-most, egad.

Bel. Just as Sir John did her ladyship there.—What think you? Don't you believe one month's time might bring you down to the same indifference, only clad in a little better manners, perhaps? Well, you men are unaccountable things! mad, till you have your mistresses, and then stark mad, till you are rid of them again. Tell me honestly, is not your patience put to a much severer trial after possession than before?

Heart. With a great many, I must confess it is, to our eternal scandal; but I—dear creature, do but try me!

Bel. That's the surest way, indeed, to know, but not the safest. [To LADY BRUTE.] Madam, are not you for taking a turn in the great walk? It is almost dark, nobody will know us.

Lady Brute. Really, I find myself something idle, Belinda: Besides, I doat upon this little odd private corner. But don't let my lazy fancy confine you.

Con. [Aside.] So, she would be left alone with me, that's well.

Bel. Well, we'll take one turn, and come to you again. [To HEARTFREE.] Come, sir, shall we go pry into the secrets of the garden? Who knows what discoveries we may make?

Heart. Madam, I'm at your service.

Con. [To HEARTFREE, Aside.] Don't make too much haste back; for, d'ye hear—I may be busy.

Heart. Enough.

[Exeunt BELINDA and HEARTFREE.]

Lady Brute. Sure you think me scandalously free, Mr Constant; I'm afraid I shall lose your good opinion of me.

Con. My good opinion, madam, is like your cruelty, ne'er to be removed.

Lady Brute. Indeed, I doubt you much: why, suppose you had a wife, and she should entertain a gallant?

Con. If I gave her just cause, how could I justly condemn her?

Lady Brute. Ah! but you differ widely about just causes.

Con. But blows can bear no dispute.

Lady Brute. Nor ill manners much, truly.

Con. Then no woman upon earth has so just a cause as you have.

Lady Brute. But, can a husband's faults release my duty?

Con. In equity, without doubt. And, where laws dispense with equity, equity should dispense with laws.

Lady Brute. Pray, let's leave this dispute; for you men have as much witchcraft in your arguments, as women have in their eyes.

Con. But, whilst you attack me with your charms, 'tis but reasonable I assault you with mine.

Lady Brute. The case is not the same. What mischief we do, we can't help, and therefore are to be forgiven.

Con. Beauty soon obtains pardon for the pain that it gives, when it applies the balm of compassion to the wound: but a fine face, and a hard heart, is almost as bad as an ugly face, and a soft one; both very troublesome to many a poor gentleman.

Lady Brute. Yes, and to many a poor gentlewoman, too, I can assure you. But pray, which of them is it, that most afflicts you?

Con. Your glass and conscience will inform you, madam. But, for Heaven's sake, (for now I must be serious) if pity, or if gratitude can move you; [Taking her hand.]—If constancy and truth have power to tempt you; if love, if adoration can affect you, give me at least some hopes, that time may do, what you, perhaps, mean never to perform; 'twill ease my sufferings, though not quench my flame.

Lady Brute. Your sufferings eased, your flame would soon abate: and that I would preserve, not quench it, sir.

Con. Would you preserve it, nourish it with favours: for that's the food it naturally requires.

Lady Brute. Yet on that natural food 'twould surfeit soon, should I resolve to grant all you would ask.

Con. And in refusing all, you starve it. Forgive me, therefore, since my hunger rages, if I at last grow wild, and in my frenzy force at least this from you. [Kissing her hand.] Or, if you would have my flame soar higher still, then grant me this, and this, and thousands more; [Kissing first her hand, then her neck.] [Aside.] For now's the time she melts into compassion.

Lady Brute. O Heavens! let me go.

Con. Aye, go, aye: where shall we go, my charming angel—into this private arbour—nay, let's lose no time—moments are precious.

Lady Brute. And lovers wild. Pray, let us stop here; at least for this time.

Con. 'Tis impossible: he, that has power over you, can have none over himself.

[As he is forcing her into the arbour, LADY FANCIFUL and MADEMOISELLE bolt out upon them, and run over the stage.]

Lady Brute. Ah, I'm lost!

Lady Fan. Fe, fe, fe, fe, fe!

Madem. Fe, fe, fe, fe, fe!

Con. Death and furies ! who are these ?

Lady Brute. O Heavens, I'm out of my wits ! if they knew me, I am ruined.

Con. Don't be frightened : ten thousand to one, they are strangers to you.

Lady Brute. Whatever they are, I won't stay here a moment longer.

Con. Whither will you go ?

Lady Brute. Home, as if the devil were in me ; Lord ! where's this Belinda now ?

Enter BELINDA and HEARTFREE.

Oh ! 'tis well you are come ; I'm so frightened, my hair stands on end. Let's be gone, for Heaven's sake !

Bel. Lord ! what's the matter ?

Lady Brute. The devil's the matter ! here's a couple of women have done the most impertinent thing—away, away, away, away, away !

[Exit running.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—LADY FANCIFUL'S house.

Enter LADY FANCIFUL and MADemoisELLE.

Lady Fan. WELL, mademoiselle ; did you dodge the filthy things ?

Madem. O que ouy, madame.

Lady Fan. And where are they ?

Madem. Au logis.

Lady Fan. What, men and all ?

Madem. Tous ensemble.

Lady Fan. O confidence ! what ! carry their fellows to their own house ?

Madem. C'est que le mari n'y est pas.

Lady Fan. No, so I believe, truly. But he shall be there, and quickly, too, if I can find him out. Well, 'tis a prodigious thing, to see when men and women get together, how they fortify one another in their impudence. But if that drunken fool, her husband, be to be found in e'er a tavern in town, I'll send him amongst them ; I'll spoil their sport.

Madem. En vérité, madame, ce seroit dommage.

Lady Fan. 'Tis in vain to oppose it, mademoiselle ; therefore, never go about it. For I am the steadiest creature in the world, when I have determined to do mischief. So, come along.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—SIR JOHN BRUTE'S house.

Enter CONSTANT, HEARTFREE, LADY BRUTE, BELINDA, and LOVEWELL.

Lady Brute. But are you sure you don't mistake, Lovewell ?

Love. Madam, I saw them all go into the tavern together, and my master was so drunk he could scarce stand.

Lady Brute. Then, gentlemen, I believe we may venture to let you stay, and play at cards with us, an hour or two : for they'll scarce part, till morning.

Bel. I think, 'tis pity they should ever part.

Con. The company that's here, madam ?

Lady Brute. Then, sir, the company, that's here, must remember to part itself in time.

Con. Madam, we don't intend to forfeit your future favours by an indiscreet usage of this.—

The moment you give us the signal, we sha'nt fail to make our retreat.

Lady Brute. Upon those conditions, then, let us sit down to cards.

Enter LOVEWELL.

Love. O Lord, madam ! here's my master just staggering in upon you ; he has been quarrelsome, yonder, and they have kicked him out of the company.

Lady Brute. Into the closet, gentlemen, for Heaven's sake ! I'll wheedle him to bed, if possible.

[CONSTANT and HEARTFREE run into the closet.]

Enter SIR JOHN, all dirt and bloody.

Lady Brute. Ah—ah—he's all over blood !

Sir John. What the plague does the woman squall for ? Did you never see a man in pickle before ?

Lady Brute. Lord, where have you been ?

Sir John. I have been at—cuffs.

Lady Brute. I fear that is not all. I hope you are not wounded ?

Sir John. Sound as a roach, wife.

Lady Brute. I'm mighty glad to hear it.

Sir John. You know I think you lie.

Lady Brute. You do me wrong to think so. For, Heaven's my witness, I had rather see my own blood trickle down, than yours.

Sir John. Then will I be crucified.

Lady Brute. 'Tis a hard fate I should not be believed.

Sir John. 'Tis a damned atheistical age, wife.

Lady Brute. I am sure I have given you a thousand tender proofs, how great my care is of you. But, spite of all your cruel thoughts, I'll still persist, and, at this moment, if I can, persuade you to lie down and sleep a little.

Sir John. Why, do you think I am drunk, you slut, you ?

Lady Brute. Heaven forbid I should : but I am afraid you are feverish. Pray, let me feel your pulse.

Sir John. Stand off, and be damned !

Lady Brute. Why, I see your distemper in your very eyes. You are all on fire. Pray, go to bed; let me intreat you.

Sir John. Come, kiss me, then.

Lady Brute. [Kissing him.]—There: now go.

—[Aside.]—He stinks like poison!

Sir John. I see it goes damnably against your stomach. And therefore—kiss me again.

Lady Brute. Nay, now you fool me.

Sir John. Do it, I say.

Lady Brute. [Aside.]—Ah, Lord have mercy upon me! Well; there: now, will you go?

Sir John. Now, wife, you shall see my gratitude. You gave me two kisses—I'll give you two hundred.

[Kisses and tumbles her.]

Lady Brute. O Lord! pray, sir John, be quiet. Heavens, what a pickle am I in!

Bel. [Aside.]—If I were in her pickle, I would call my gallant out of the closet, and he should cudgel him soundly.

Sir John. So, now, you being as dirty and as nasty as myself, we may go pig together. But first, I must have a cup of your cold tea, wife.

[Going to the closet.]

Lady Brute. Oh, I am ruined! There's none there, my dear.

Sir John. I'll warrant you, I'll find some, my dear.

Lady Brute. You can't open the door, the lock's spoiled; I have been turning and turning the key, this half hour, to no purpose. I'll send for the smith to-morrow.

Sir John. There's ne'er a smith in Europe can open a door with more expedition than I can do—as for example—now.—[He bursts open the door with his foot.]—How now! what the devil have we got here? Constant!—Heartfree!—and two whores again, I gad!—this is the worst cold tea that ever I met with in my life—

Enter CONSTANT and HEARTFREE.

Lady Brute. [Aside.]—O Lord, what will become of us?

Sir John. Gentlemen, I am your very humble servant—I give you many thanks—I see you take care of my family—I shall do all I can to return the obligation.

Con. Sir, how oddly soever this business may appear to you, you would have no cause to be uneasy, if you knew the truth of all things; your lady is the most virtuous woman in the world, and nothing has past but an innocent frolic.

Heart. Nothing else, upon my honour, sir.

Sir John. You are both very civil gentlemen—and my wife, there, is a very civil gentlewoman; therefore, I don't doubt but many civil things have past between you. Your very humble servant.

Lady Brute. [Aside to CONSTANT.] Pray be gone: he's so drunk he can't hurt us to-night, and to-morrow morning you shall hear from us.

Con. I'll obey you, madam. Sir, when you are cool, you will understand reason better. So, then, I shall take the pains to inform you. If not—I wear a sword, sir, and so good-bye-t'ye. Come along, Heartfree.

[Exit CONSTANT and HEARTFREE.

Sir John. Wear a sword, sir!—and what of all that, sir? he comes to my house; eats my meat; lies with my wife; dishonours my family; gets a bastard to inherit my estate—and when I ask a civil account of all this—sir, says he, I wear a sword—wear a sword, sir? Yes, sir, says he, I wear a sword. It may be a good answer to cross purposes; but 'tis a damned one to a man in my whimsical circumstances—sir, says he, I wear a sword! [To LADY BRUTE.] And what do you wear, now? ha! tell me.—[Sitting down in a great chair.]—What, you are modest, and can't—why, then, I'll tell you, you slut, you. You wear—an impudent lewd face—a damned, designing heart—and a tail—and a tail full of—

[He falls fast asleep, snoring.]

Lady Brute. So; thanks to kind Heaven, he's fast for some hours.

Bel. 'Tis well he is so, that we may have time to lay our story handsomely; for we must lie like the devil to bring ourselves off.

Lady Brute. What shall we say, Belinda?

Bel. [Musing.] I'll tell you: it must all light upon Heartfree and me. We'll say he has courted me some time, but, for reasons unknown to us, has ever been very earnest the thing might be kept from sir John. That, therefore, hearing him upon the stairs, he run into the closet, though against our will, and Constant with him, to prevent jealousy. And, to give this a good impudent face of truth, (that I may deliver you from the trouble you are in) I'll even, if he please, marry him.

Lady Brute. I am beholden to you, cousin; but that would be carrying the jest a little too far, for your own sake: you know he's a younger brother, and has nothing.

Bel. 'Tis true: but I like him, and have fortune enough to keep above extremity: I can't say, I would live with him in a cell, upon love, and bread and butter: but I had rather have the man I love, and a middle state of life, than that gentleman in the chair, there, and twice your ladyship's splendour.

Lady Brute. In truth, niece, you are in the right on't: but 'tis late: let's end our discourse for to-night, and, out of an excess of charity, take a small care of that nasty drunken thing there—do but look at him, Belinda.

Bel. Ah, 'tis a savoury dish!

Lady Brute. As savoury as 'tis, I am cloyed with it. Prithce, call the butler to take away—

Bel. Call the butler! call the scavenger! [To a servant within.] Who's there? Call Razor! Let him take away his master, scour him clean with a little soap and sand, and so put him to bed.

Lady Brute. Come, Belinda, I'll e'en lie with you to-night: and, in the morning, we'll send for our gentlemen, to set this matter even.

Bel. With all my heart.

Lady Brute. Good night, my dear.

[Making a low courtesy to SIR JOHN.]

Both. Ha, ha, ha!

[Exeunt LADY BRUTE and BELINDA.]

Enter RAZOR.

Raz. My lady there's a wag—my master there's a cuckold. Marriage is a slippery thing—women have depraved appetites—my lady's a wag; I have heard all; I have seen all; I understand all; and I'll tell all; for my little Frenchwoman loves news dearly. This story will gain her heart, or nothing will.—[To his master.] —Come, sir, your head's too full of fumes at present, to make room for your jealousy; but I reckon we shall have rare work with you, when your pate's empty. Come to your kennel, you cuckoldy, drunken sot, you.

[Carries him out on his back.]

SCENE III.—LADY FANCIFUL'S house.

Enter LADY FANCIFUL and MADEMOISELLE.

Lady Fan. But, why did you not tell me before, mademoiselle, that Razor and you were fond?

Madem. De modesty hinder me, matam.

Lady Fan. Why, truly, modesty does often hinder us from doing things, we have an extravagant mind to. But does he love you well enough yet, to do any thing you bid him? Do you think, to oblige you, he would speak scandal?

Madem. Matam, to oblige your ladyship, he shall speak blasphemy.

Lady Fan. Why, then, mademoiselle, I'll tell you what you shall do. You shall engage him to tell his master all that past at Spring Garden: I have a mind he should know what a wife and a niece he has got.

Madem. Il le fera, madame.

Enter a Footman, who speaks to MADEMOISELLE apart.

Foot. Mademoiselle, yonder's Mr Razor desires to speak with you.

Madem. Tell him, I come presently. [Exit Footman.] Razor be dere, matam.

Lady Fan. That's fortunate: well, I'll leave you together. And if you find him stubborn, mademoiselle—hark you—don't refuse him a few little reasonable liberties, to put him into humour.

Madem. Laissez moi faire.

[Exit LADY FANCIFUL.]

[RAZOR peeps in; and, seeing LADY FANCIFUL gone, runs to MADEMOISELLE, takes her about the neck, and kisses her.]

Madem. How now, confidence!

Raz. How now, modesty!

Madem. Who make you so familiar, sirrah?

Raz. My impudence, hussy.

Madem. Stand off, rogue face!

Raz. Ah, mademoiselle! great news at our house.

Madem. Why, vat be de matter?

Raz. The matter? why, uptails all's the matter.

Madem. Tu te moque de moi.

Raz. Now, do you long to know the particulars: the time when: the place where: the manner how. But I won't tell you a word more.

Madem. Nay, den dou kill me, Razor.

Raz. Come, kiss me, then.

[Clapping his hands behind.]

Madem. Nay, pridee tell me.

Raz. Good-by-t'ye! [Going.]

Madem. Hold, hold: I will kiss dee.

[Kissing him.]

Raz. So, that's civil: why now, my pretty poll; my goldfinch; my little waterwagtail—you must know, that—come, kiss me again.

Madem. I won't kiss de no more.

Raz. Good-by-t'ye. [Going.]

Madem. Doucement; dere; es tu content?

[Kissing him.]

Raz. So: now I'll tell thee all. Why, the news is, that cuckoldom, in folio, is newly printed; and matrimony, in quarto, is just going into the press. Will you buy any books, mademoiselle?

Madem. Tu parle comme un libraire; de devil no understand dee.

Raz. Why, then, that I may make myself intelligible to a waiting-woman, I'll speak like a valet de chambre. My lady has cuckolded my master.

Madem. Bon.

Raz. Which we take very ill from her hands, I can tell her that. We can't yet prove matter of fact upon her.

Madem. N'importe.

Raz. But we can prove, that matter of fact had like to have been upon her.

Madem. Ouy-da.

Raz. For we have such terrible circumstances—

Madem. Sans doute.

Raz. That any man of parts may draw tickling conclusions from them.

Madem. Fort bien.

Raz. We found a couple of tight, well-built gentlemen, stuf into her ladyship's closet.

Madem. Le diable!

Raz. And I, in my particular person, have discovered a most damnable plot, how to persuade my poor master, that all this hide and seek, this

Will in the Wisp, has no other meaning than a christian marriage for sweet Mrs Belinda.

Madem. Une marriage? Ah les droless!

Raz. Don't you interrupt me, hussy; 'tis agreed, I say. And my innocent lady, to wriggle herself out at the back-door of the business, turns marriage-bawd to her niece, and resolves to deliver up her fair body, to be tumbled and mumbled by that young liquorish whipster, Heartfree. Now, are you satisfied?

Madem. No.

Raz. Right woman; always gaping for more.

Madem. Dis be all den, dat you know?

Raz. All? Ay, and a great deal too, I think.

Madem. Dou be fool, dou know noting. Ecoute, mon pauvre Razor. Dou sees des two eyes?—Des two eyes have see de devil.

Raz. The woman's mad.

Madem. In Spring-Garden, dat rogue Constant meet dy lady.

Raz. Bon.

Madem. I'll tell dee no more.

Raz. Nay, prithee, my swan.

Madem. Come, kiss me den.

[Clapping her hands behind her, as he did before.]

Raz. I won't kiss you, not I.

Madem. Adieu!

[Going.]

Raz. Hold—Now proceed.

[Gives her a hearty kiss.]

Madem. A ça—I hide myself in one cunning place, where I hear all, and see all. First, dy drunken master come mal à propos; but de sot so know his own dear wife, so he leave her sport.—Den de game begin. De lover say soft ting: De lady look upon de ground. [As she speaks, RAZOR still acts the man, and she the woman.] He take her by de hand: She turn her head on oder way. Den he squeeze very hard: Den she pull—very softly. Den he take her in his arm: Den she give him leetel pat. Den he kiss her. Den she say—pish, nay fee. Den he tremble: Den she sigh. Den he pull her into de arbour: Den she pinch him.

Raz. Ay, but not so hard, you baggage you.

Madem. Den he grow bold: she grow weak, he tro her down, il tombe dessus, le diable assist, il emport tout; [RAZOR struggles with her, as if he would throw her down.] stand off, sirrah!

Raz. You have set me a-fire, you jade, you.

Madem. Den go to de river, and quench dyself.

Raz. What an unnatural harlot this!

Madem. Razor.

[Looking languishingly on him.]

Raz. Mademoiselle!

Madem. Dou no love me?

Raz. Not love thee?—More than a Frenchman does soup.

Madem. Den dou will refuse nothing dat I bid dee?

Raz. Don't bid me be damned then.

Madem. No, only tell dy master, all I have tell dee of dy laty.

Raz. Why, you little malicious strumpet, you; should you like to be served so?

Madem. Dou dispute den?—Adieu.

Raz. Hold—But why wilt thou make me be such a rogue, my dear?

Madem. Voilà un vrai Anglois! il est amoureux, et cependant il veut raisonner. Va t'en au diable!

Raz. Hold once more: In hopes thou'lt give me up thy body, I'll make thee a present of my honesty.

Madem. Bon, écoute donc;—If dou fail me—I never see de more—if dou obey me—Je m'abandonne a toy à toy. [She takes him about the neck, and gives him a smacking kiss.]

[Exit MADemoiselle.]

Raz. [Licking his lips.] Not be a rogue?—Amor vincit omnia.

[Exit RAZOR.]

Enter LADY FANCIFUL and MADemoiselle.

Lady Fan. Marry, say ye? Will the two things marry?

Madem. On le va faire, madame.

Lady Fan. Look you, mademoiselle, in short, I can't bear it—No; I find I can't—If once I see them a-bed together I shall have ten thousand thoughts in my head will make me run distracted. Therefore, run and call Razor back immediately; for something must be done to stop this impertinent wedding. If I can but defer it four and twenty hours, I'll make such work about town, with that little pert slut's reputation, he shall as soon marry a witch.

Madem. [Aside.] La voilà bien intentionnée.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—CONSTANT's lodgings.

Enter CONSTANT and HEARTFREE.

Con. But what dost think will become of this business?

Heart. 'Tis easier to think what will not come of it.

Con. What's that?

Heart. A challenge. I know the knight too well for that; his dear body will always prevail upon his noble soul to be quiet.

Con. But though he dare not challenge me, perhaps he may venture to challenge his wife.

Heart. Not if you whisper him in the ear, you won't have him do't; and there's no other way left that I see. For as drunk as he was, he'll remember you and I were where we should not be; and I don't think him quite blockhead enough yet, to be persuaded we were got into his wife's closet only to peep into her prayer-book.

Enter a Servant, with a letter.

Serv. Sir, here's a letter; a porter brought it.

Con. O ho ! here's instructions for us. [Reads.

'The accident, that has happened, has touched
'our invention to the quick. We would fain
'come off without your help; but find that's im'possible. In a word, the whole business must 'be thrown upon a matrimonial intrigue between 'your friend and mine. But if the parties are 'not fond enough to go quite through with the 'matter, 'tis sufficient for our turn, they own the 'design. We'll find pretences enough to break
'the match. Adieu.'

—Well, women for invention ! How long would my block head have been producing this !
Hey, Heartfree. What, musing, man ? Prithce be cheerful : What say'st thou, friend, to this matrimonial remedy ?

Heart. Why, I say, it's worse than the disease.

Con. Here's a fellow for you ! There's beauty and money on her side : and love up to the ears on his : And yet—

Heart. And yet, I think, I may reasonably be allowed to boggle at marrying the niece in the very moment that you are debauching the aunt.

Con. Why, truly, there may be something in that. But have not you a good opinion enough of your own parts, to believe you could keep a wife to yourself ?

Heart. I should have, if I had a good opinion enough of hers, to believe she could do as much by me. For, to do them right, after all, the wife seldom rambles, till the husband shews her the way.

Con. 'Tis true, a man of real worth scarce ever is a cuckold, but by his own fault. Women are not naturally lewd ; there must be something to urge them to it. They'll cuckold a churl, out of revenge ; a fool, because they despise him ; a beast, because they loath him. But, when they make bold with a man they once had a well-grounded value for,
'tis, because they first see themselves neglected
by him.

Heart. Well then, shall I marry, or die a maid ?

Con. Why faith, Heartfree, matrimony is like an army going to engage. Love's the forlorn hope, which is soon cut off ; the marriage knot is the main body, which may stand buff a long long time ; and repentance is the rearguard, which rarely gives ground, as long as the main body has a being.

Heart. Conclusion, then ; you advise me to whore on as you do.

Con. That's not concluded yet. For though marriage be a lottery, in which there are a wondrous many blanks ; yet there is one inestimable lot, in which the only heaven on earth is written. Would your kind fate but guide your hand to that, though I were wrapt in all, that luxury itself could clothe me with, I still should envy you.

Heart. And justly, too ; for to be capable of loving one, doubtless, is better than to possess a thousand. But how far that capacity's in me, alas, I know not.

Con. But you would know.

Heart. I would so.

Con. Matrimony will inform you. Come, one flight of resolution carries you to the land of experience ; where, in a very moderate time, you'll know the capacity of your soul and your body both, or I'm mistaken. [Exeunt.

SCENE V.—SIR JOHN BRUTE'S house.

Enter LADY BRUTE and BELINDA.

Bel. Well, madam, what answer have you from them ?

Lady Brute. That they'll be here this moment.
I fancy 'twill end in a wedding : I'm sure he's a fool, if it don't. Ten thousand pounds, and such a lass as you are, is no contemptible offer to a younger brother. But are you not under strange agitations ? Prithce, how does your pulse beat ?

Bel. High and low ; I have much ado to be valiant : Is it not very strange to go to bed with a man ?

Lady Brute. Um—it is a little odd at first, but it will soon grow easy to you.

Enter CONSTANT and HEARTFREE.

Good-morrow, gentlemen ! How have you slept after your adventure ?

Heart. Some careful thoughts, ladies, on your accounts, have kept us waking.

Bel. And some careful thoughts on your own,
I believe, have hindered you from sleeping. Pray, how does this matrimonial project relish with
you ?

Heart. Why, faith, even as storming towns does with soldiers, where the hopes of delicious plunder banishes the fear of being knocked on the head.

Bel. Is it then possible, after all, that you dare think of downright lawful wedlock ?

Heart. Madam, you have made me so foolhardy, I dare do any thing.

Bel. Then, sir, I challenge you ; and matrimony's the spot, where I expect you.

Heart. 'Tis enough ; I'll not fail [Aside.] So, now, I am in for Hobbe's voyage ; a great leap in the dark.

Lady Brute. Well, gentlemen, this matter being concluded, then, have you got your lessons ready ; for sir John is grown such an atheist of late, he'll believe nothing upon easy terms ?

Con. We'll find ways to extend his faith, madam. But, pray, how do you find him this morning ?

Lady Brute. Most lamentably morose, chewing the cud after last night's discovery ; of which, however, he has but a confused notion even now. But I'm afraid the valet de chambre has told him all; for they are very busy together at this moment. When I told him of Belinda's marriage, I had no other answer but a grunt: From which you may draw what conclusions you think fit.—But to your notes, gentlemen, he's here.

Enter SIR JOHN and RAZOR.

Con. Good-morrow, sir.

Heart. Good-morrow, sir John; I'm very sorry my indiscretion should cause so much disorder in your family.

Sir John. Disorders generally come from indiscretion, sir; 'tis no strange thing at all.

Lady Brute. I hope, my dear, you are satisfied there was no wrong intended you.

Sir John. None, my dove.

Bel. If not, I hope my consent to marry Mr Heartfree will convince you. For as little as I know of amours, sir, I can assure you, one intrigue is enough to bring four people together, without further mischief.

Sir John. And I know, too, that intrigues tend to procreation of more kinds than one. One intrigue will beget another, as soon as beget a son or a daughter.

Con. I am very sorry, sir, to see you still seem unsatisfied with a lady, whose more than common virtue, I am sure, were she my wife, should meet a better usage.

Sir John. Sir, if her conduct has put a trick upon her virtue, her virtue's the bubble, but her husband's the loser.

Con. Sir, you have received a sufficient answer already, to justify both her conduct and mine. You'll pardon me for meddling in your family-affairs; but I perceive I am the man you are jealous of, and therefore it concerns me.

Sir John. Would it did not concern me! and then I should not care who it concerned.

Con. Well, sir, if truth and reason won't content you, I know but one way more, which, if you think fit, you may take.

Sir John. Lord, sir, you are very hasty: If I had been found at prayers in your wife's closet, I should have allowed you twice as much time to come to yourself in.

Con. Nay, sir, if time be all you want, we have no quarrel.

Heart. I told you how the sword would work upon him.

[SIR JOHN muses]

Con. Let him muse: however, I'll lay fifty pounds our foreman brings us in, not guilty.

Sir John [Aside.] 'Tis well—'tis very well—In spite of that young jade's matrimonial intrigue, I am a downright stinking cuckold—Here they are—Boo—[Putting his hand to his forehead.] Methinks I could butt with a bull. What the plague did I marry her for? I knew she did not like me; if she had, she would have lain with me; for I would have done so, because I liked her;

but that's past, and I have her. And now, what shall I do with her?—If I put my horns into my pocket, she'll grow insolent—if I don't, that goat there, that stallion, is ready to whip me through the guts—The debate, then, is reduced to this; shall I die a hero, or live a rascal?—Why, wiser men than I have long since concluded, that a living dog is better than a dead lion.—[To Con. and Heart.] Gentlemen, now my wine and my passion are governable; I must own, I never observed any thing in my wife's course of life, to back me in my jealousy of her: But jealousy's a mark of love; so she need not trouble her head about it, as long as I make no more words on't.

LADY FANCYFUL enters disguised, and addresses BELINDA aside.

Con. I'm glad to see your reason rule at last. Give me your hand: I hope you'll look upon me as you are wont.

Sir John. Your humble servant.—[Aside.] A wheedling son of a whore!

Heart. And that I may be sure you are friends with me, too, pray give me your consent to wed your niece.

Sir John. Sir, you have it with all my heart: Damn me if you han't.—[Aside.] 'Tis time to get rid of her. A young pert pimp: she'll make an incomparable bawd in a little time.

Enter a servant, who gives HEARTFREE a letter.

Bel. Heartfree your husband, say you? 'Tis impossible!

Lady Fan. Would to kind Heaven it were! But 'tis too true; and in the world there lives not such a wretch. I'm young; and, either I have been flattered by my friends, as well as glass, or nature has been kind and generous to me. I had a fortune, too, was greater far than he could ever hope for; but with my heart I am robbed of all the rest. I am slighted and I'm beggared both at once: I have scarce a bare subsistence from the villain, yet dare complain to none; for he has sworn, if ever 'tis known I am his wife, he'll murder me. [Weeping.]

Bel. The traitor!

Lady Fan. I accidentally was told he courted you: Charity soon prevailed upon me to prevent your misery: And, as you see, I'm still so generous, even to him, as not to suffer he should do any thing, for which the law might take away his life. [Weeping.]

Bel. Poor creature! How I pity her!

[They continue talking aside.]

Heart. [Aside.] Death and damnation!—Let me read it again. [Reads.] 'Though I have 'a particular reason not to let you know who I 'am till I see you; yet you'll easily believe 'tis 'a faithful friend, that gives you this advice. I 'have lain with Belinda.' (Good!) 'I have a child 'by her,' (Better and better!) 'which is now at 'nurse;' (Heaven be praised!) 'and I think the 'foundation laid for another;' (Ha!—Old true-penny!) 'No rack could have tortured this story from me; but friendship has done it. I heard of your design to marry her, and could not see you abused. Make use of my advice, but keep my secret till I ask you for it again. Adieu.'

[Exit LADY FANCYFUL.

Con. to Bel. Come, madam, shall we send for the parson? I doubt here's no business for the lawyer: Younger brothers have nothing to settle but their hearts; and that, I believe, my friend here has already done very faithfully.

Bel. [Scornfully.] Are you sure, sir, there are no old mortgages upon it?

Heart. [Coldly.] If you think there are, madam, it mayn't be amiss to defer the marriage, till you are sure they are paid off.

Bel. We'll defer it as long as you please, sir.

Heart. The more time we take to consider on't, madam, the less apt we shall be to commit oversights; therefore, if you please, we will put it off for just nine months.

Bel. Guilty consciences make men cowards—I don't wonder you want time to resolve.

Heart. And they make women desperate—I don't wonder you were so quickly determined.

Bel. What does the fellow mean?

Heart. What does the lady mean?

Sir John. Zoons, what do you both mean?

[HEART. and BEL. walk chafing about.

Raz. [Aside.] Here is so much sport going to be spoiled, it makes me ready to weep again. A pox o' this impertinent lady Fancyful, and her plots, and her Frenchwoman, too; she's a whimsical, ill-natured bitch; and, when I have got my bones broke in her service, 'tis ten to one but my recompense is a slap: I hear them tittering without still. Ecod! I'll e'en go lug them both in by the ears, and discover the plot, to secure my pardon.

[Exit RAZOR.

Con. Prithce, explain, Heartfree.

Heart. A fair deliverance; thank my stars and my friend.

Bel. 'Tis well it went no farther; a base fellow!

Lady Brute. What can be the meaning of all this?

Bel. What's his meaning, I don't know; but mine is, that if I had married him—I had had no husband.

Heart. And what's her meaning, I don't know; but mine is, that if I had married her—I had had wife enough.

Sir John. Your people of wit have got such cramp ways of expressing themselves, they seldom comprehend one another. Pox take you both! will you speak that you may be understood?

Enter RAZOR in sackcloth, pulling in LADY FANCYFUL and MADEMOISELLE.

Raz. If they won't, here comes an interpreter.

Lady Brute. Heavens! What have we here?

Raz. A villain—but a repenting villain.

All. Razor!

Lady Brute. What means this?

Raz. Nothing without my pardon.

Lady Brute. What pardon do you want?

Raz. Imprimis, Your ladyship's, for a damnable lie upon your spotless virtue, and set to the tune of Spring Garden.—[To SIR JOHN.] Next, at my generous master's feet I bend, for interrupting his more noble thoughts with phantoms of disgraceful cuckoldom.—[To CON.] Thirdly, I to this gentleman apply, for making him the hero of my romance.—[To HEART.] Fourthly, your pardon, noble sir, I ask, for clandestinely marrying you, without either bidding of banns, bishop's licence, friends, consent—or your own knowledge!—[To BEL.] And, lastly, to my good young lady's clemency I come, for pretending corn was sowed in the ground, before ever the plough had been in the field.

Sir John. [Aside.] So that, after all, 'tis a moot point, whether I am a cuckold or not.

Bel. Well, sir, upon condition you confess all, I'll pardon you myself, and try to obtain as much from the rest of the company. But I must know, then, who 'tis has put you upon all this mischief.

Raz. Satan, and his equipage: woman tempted me; vice weakened me—and so the devil overcame me.

Bel. Then, pray, will you make us acquainted with your tempter?

Raz. [To MADEM.] Unmask, for the honour of France.

All. Mademoiselle!

Madem. Me ask ten thousand pardon of all de good company.

Sir John. Why, this mystery thickens, instead of clearing up.—[To RAZ.] You son of a whore you, put us out of our pain!

Raz. One moment brings sunshine. [Shewing MADEM.] 'Tis true, this is the woman that tempted me; but this is the serpent that tempted the woman: and, if my prayers might be heard, her punishment, for so doing, should be like the serpent's of old—[Pulls off LADY FANCYFUL's mask.] She should lie upon her face all the days of her life.

All. Lady Fancyful!

Bel. Impertinent!

Lady Brute. Ridiculous!

All. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha!

Bel. I hope your ladyship will give me leave to wish you joy, since you have owned your marriage yourself?—[To HEART.] I vow 'twas strangely wicked in you to think of another wife, when you had one already so charming as her ladyship.

All. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha!

Lady Fan. [Aside.] Confusion seize them, as it seizes me!

Madem. Que le diable étouffe ce maraut de Razor!

Bel. Your ladyship seems disordered: A breeding qualm, perhaps, Mr Heartfree ! Your bottle of Hungary water to your lady ! Why, madam, he stands as unconcerned, as if he were your husband in earnest.

Lady Fan. Your mirth's as nauseous as yourself. Belinda, you think you triumph over a rival, now ; Helas, ma pauvre fille ! Where'er I'm rival, there's no cause for mirth. No, my poor wretch, 'tis from another principle I have acted. I knew that thing there would make so perverse a husband, and you so impertinent a wife, that, lest your mutual plagues should make you both run mad, I charitably would have broke the match. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha !

[Exit laughing affectedly, MADEMOISELLE following her.]

Madem. He, he, he, he, he !

All. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha !

Sir John. [Aside.] Why now, this woman will be married to somebody, too.

Bel. Poor creature ! what a passion she's in ! But I forgive her.

Heart. Since you have so much goodness for her, I hope you'll pardon my offence, too, madam.

Bel. There will be no great difficulty in that, since I am guilty of an equal fault.

Heart. So, madam ; now, had the parson but done his business——

Bel. You'd be half weary of your bargain.

Heart. No, sure, I might dispense with one night's lodging.

Bel. I'm ready to try, sir.

Heart. Then let's to church :
And if it be our chance to disagree——

Bel. Take heed—the surly husband's fate you see.
[Exeunt omnes.]

ACT. I.

SCENE I.—A hall.

Enter ANTONIO and CHARINO.

Ant. WITHOUT compliment, my old friend, I shall think myself much honoured in your alliance; our families are both ancient; our children young, and able to support them; and, I think, the sooner we set them to work the better.

Cha. Sir, you offer fair and nobly, and shall find I dare meet you in the same line of honour: and, I hope, since I have but one girl in the world, you won't think me a troublesome old fool, if I endeavour to bestow her to her worth; therefore, if you please, before we shake hands, a word or two by the by; for I have some considerable questions to ask you.

Ant. Ask them.

Cha. Well, in the first place, you say you have two sons?

Ant. Exactly.

Cha. And you are willing that one of them shall marry my daughter?

Ant. Willing.

Cha. My daughter Angelina?

Ant. Angelina.

Cha. And you are likewise content that the said Angelina shall survey them both, and (with my allowance) take to her lawful husband which of them she pleases?

Ant. Content.

Cha. And you farther promise, that the person by her (and me) so chosen (be it elder or younger) shall be your sole heir: that is to say, shall be in a conditional possession of at least three parts of your estate. You know the conditions, and this you positively promise?

Ant. To perform.

Cha. Why, then, as the last token of my full consent and approbation, I give you my hand.

Ant. There's mine.

Cha. Is't a match?

Ant. A match.

Cha. Done.

Ant. Done.

Cha. And done—that's enough—Carlos, the elder, you say, is a great scholar, spends his whole life in the university, and loves his study.

Ant. Nothing more, sir.

Cha. But Clodio, the younger, has seen the world, and is very well known in the court of France; a sprightly fellow, ha?

Ant. Mettle to the back, sir.

Cha. Well, how far either of them may go with my daughter, I can't tell; she'll be easily pleased where I am—I have given her some documents already. Hark! what noise without?

Ant. Odso! 'tis they—they're come—I have expected them these two hours. Well, sirrah, who's without?

Enter a SERVANT.

Ser. 'Tis Sancho, sir, with a waggon-load of my master's books.

Cha. What, does he always travel with his whole study?

Ant. Never without them, sir; 'tis his humour.

Enter SANCHE, laden with books.

San. Pedro, unload part of the library; bid the porter open the great gates, and make room for 'other dozen of carts; I'll be with you presently.

Ant. Ha! Sancho! where's my Carlos?—Speak, boy, where didst thou leave thy master?

San. Jogging on, sir, in the highway to knowledge, both hands employed, in his book, and his bridle, sir; but he has sent his duty before him in this letter, sir.

Ant. What have we here, pothooks and andirons?

San. Pothooks! Oh, dear sir!—I beg your pardon—No, sir, this is Arabic; 'tis to the lord Abbot, concerning the translation, sir, of human bodies—a new way of getting out of the world—There's a terrible wise man has written a very smart book of it.

Cha. Pray, friend, what will that same book teach a man?

San. Teach you, sir! why, to play a trump upon death, and shew yourself a match for the devil.

Cha. Strange!

San. Here, sir, this is your letter. [To ANT.]

VOL. II.

Cha. Pray, sir, what sort of life may your master lead?

San. Life, sir! no prince fares like him; he breaks his fast with Aristotle, dines with Tully, drinks tea at Helicon, sups with Seneca, then walks a turn or two in the milky way, and after six hours conference with the stars, sleeps with old Erra Pater.

Cha. Wonderful!

Ant. O, Carlos will be here presently—Here, take the knave in, and let him eat.

San. And drink too, sir?

Ant. And drink too, sir—and pray see your master's chamber ready. [Knocking again.]—Well, sir, who's at the gate?

Enter a SERVANT.

Ser. Monsieur, sir, from my young master, Clodio.

Enter MONSIEUR.

Ant. Well, Monsieur, what says your master? When will he be here?

Mons. Sire, he vill be here in de less time dan von quarter of de hour; he is not quite tirty mile off.

Ant. And what came you before for?

Mons. Sire, me come to provide de pulville, and de essence for his perique, dat he may approche to your vorshipe vid de reverence, and de belle air.

Ant. What, is he unprovided, then?

Mons. Sire, he vas enrage, and did break his bottel d'orangerie, because it vas not de same dat is prepare for Monseigneur le Dauphin.

Ant. Well, sir, if you'll go to the butler, he'll help you to some oil for his periwig.

Mons. Sire, me tank you. [Exit MONSIEUR.]

Cha. A very notable spark, thus Clodio. Ha! what noise is that without?

Enter a SERVANT.

Ser. Sir, my young masters are both come.

Ant. That's well! Now, sir, now! now observe their several dispositions.

Enter CARLOS.

Car. My father! sir, your blessing.

Ant. Thou hast it, Carlos; and now, pray know this gentleman, Charino, sir, my old friend, and one in whom you may have a particular interest.

Car. I'll study to deserve his love, sir.

Cha. Sir, as for that matter, you need not study at all. [They salute.]

Clo. [Within.] Hey! La Valiere! bid the groom take care our hunters be well rubbed and clothed; they're hot, and have out-stripped the wind.

Cha. Av, marry, sir, there's mettle in this young fellow.

Enter CLODIO.

Clo. Where's my father?

Ant. Ha, my dear Clody, thou'rt welcome!

Clo. Sir, being my father's friend, I am your most obliged, faithful, humble servant. [To CHA.

Cha. Sir—I—I—I like you. [Eagerly.

Clo. Thy hand.

Cha. Faith, thou art a pretty humoured fellow.

Clo. Who's that? Pray, sir, who's that?

Ant. Your brother, Clody.

Clo. Odso! I beg his pardon with all my heart—Ha, ha, ha! did ever mortal see such a book-worm!—Brother, how is't! [Carelessly.

Car. I'm glad you are well, brother. [Reads.

Clo. What, does he draw his book upon me? Then I will draw my wit upon him—Gad, I'll puzzle him—Hark you, brother; pray, what's—Latin for a sword-knot?

Car. The Romans wore none, brother.

Clo. No ornament upon their swords, sir?

Car. Oh, yes, several; conquest, peace, and honour—an old unfashionable wear.

Clo. Sir, no man in France (I may as well say breathing; for not to live there, is not to breathe) wears a more fashionable sword than I do; he cost me fifteen louis d'ors in Paris—There, sir, —feel him—try him, sir.

Car. I have no skill, sir.

Clo. No skill, sir! why, this sword would make a coward fight—aha! sa, sa! ha! rip—ha! there I had him. [Fencing.

Car. Take heed; you'll cut my clothes, brother.

Clo. Cut 'em! ha, ha!—no, no, they are cut already, brother, to the grammar rules exactly: psha! prithee, man, leave off this college-air.

Car. No, brother, I think it wholesome, the soil and situation pleasant.

Clo. A put, by Jupiter! he don't know the air of a gentleman, from the air of the country—Sir, I mean the air of your clothes; I would have you change your tailor, and dress a little more en cavalier: lay by your book, and take out your snuff-box; cock, and look smart, ha!

Cha. Faith, a pretty fellow.

Car. I read no use in this, brother; and for my clothes, the half of what I wear already seems to me superfluous. What need I outward ornaments, when I can deck myself with understanding? Why should we care for any thing but knowledge? Or look upon the follies of mankind, but to condemn or pity those that seek them?

[Reads again.

Clo. Stark mad, split me!

Cha. Psha! this fellow will never do—he has no soul in him.

Clo. Hark you, brother, what do you think of a pretty, plump wench now?

Car. I seldom think that way; women are books I have not read yet.

Clo. Gad, I could set you a sweet lesson, brother.

Car. I am as well here, sir.

[Reads.

Cha. Good for no earthly thing—a stock—Ah, that Clody!

Enter MONSIEUR.

Mons. Sire, here be de several sort of de jessamine d'orangerie vidout, if you please to make your choice.

Clo. Mum, sir, I must beg pardon for a moment; a most important business calls me aside, which I will dispatch with all imaginable celerity, and return to the repetition of my desire to continue, sir, your most obliged, and faithful humble servant. [Exit CLODIO, bowing.

Cha. Faith, he's a pretty fellow.

Ant. Now, sir, if you please, since we have got the other alone, we'll put the matter a little closer to him.

Cha. 'Tis to little purpose, I'm afraid: but use your pleasure, sir.

Car. Plato differs from Socrates in this.

[To himself.

Ant. Come, come, prithee, Charles, lay them by, let them agree at leisure—What, no hour of interruption?

Car. Man's life, sir, being so short, and then the way that leads us to the knowledge of ourselves, so hard and tedious, each minute should be precious.

Ant. Aye, but to thrive in this world, Charles, you must part a little with this bookish contemplation, and prepare yourself for action. If you will study, let it be to know what part of my land's fit for the plough; what for pasture; to buy and sell my stock to the best advantage; and cure my cattle when they are overgrown with labour. This, now, would turn to some account.

Car. This, sir, may be done from what I've read; for, what concerns tillage, who can better deliver it than Virgil in his Georgics? And, for the cure of herds, his Bucolics are a masterpiece; but when his art describes the commonwealth of bees, their industry, their more than human knowledge of the herbs from which they gather honey; their laws, their government among themselves, their order in going forth, and coming laden home, their strict obedience to their king, his just rewards to such as labour, his punishment, inflicted only on the slothful drone; I'm ravished with it: then reap, indeed, my harvest, receive the grain my cattle bring me, and there find wax and honey.

Ant. Hey day! Georges, and Blue-sticks, and bees-wax! What, art thou mad?

Cha. Raving, raving!

Car. No, sir, the knowledge of this guards me from it.

Ant. But can you find, amongst all your musty manuscripts, what pleasure he enjoys, that lies in the arms of a young, rich, well-shaped, healthy bride? Answer me that, ha, sir!

Car. 'Tis frequent, sir, in story; there I read of all kinds of virtuous, and of vicious women; the ancient Spartan dames, the Roman ladies, their beauties, their deformities; and when I light upon a Portia, or a Cornelia, crowned with ever-blooming truth and virtue, with such a feeling I peruse their fortunes, as if I then had lived, and tasted of their lawful, envied love. But when I meet a Messalina, tired and unsated in her foul desires; a Clytemnestra, bathed in her husband's blood; an impious Tullia, whirling her chariot over her father's breathless body, horror invades my faculties. Comparing, then, the numerous guilty, with the easy count of those that die in innocence, I detest and loath them as ignorance, or atheism.

Ant. And you do resolve, then, not to make payment of the debt you owe me?

Car. What debt, good sir!

Ant. Why, the debt I paid my father, when I got you, sir, and made him a grandsire; which I expect from you. I won't have my name die.

Car. Nor would I; my laboured studies, sir, may prove in time a living issue.

Ant. Very well, sir; and so I shall have a general collection of all the quiddits, from Adam till this time, to be my grandchild.

Car. I'll take my best care, sir, that what I leave, may not shame the family.

Cha. A sad fellow, this! this is a very sad fellow! [Aside.]

Ant. So, in short, you would not marry an empress!

Car. Give me leave to enjoy myself. The closet, that contains my chosen books, to me's a glorious court; my venerable companions there, the old sages and philosophers, sometimes the greatest kings and heroes, whose counsels I have leave to weigh, and call their victories, if unjustly got, unto a strict account, and, in my fancy, dare deface their ill-placed statues. Can I then part with solid, constant pleasures, to clasp uncertain vanities? No, sir, be it your care to swell your heap of wealth; marry my brother, and let him get you bodies of your name; I rather would inform it with a soul. I tire you, sir—your pardon and your leave. Lights there, for my study. [Erit CARLOS.]

Ant. Was ever man thus transported from the common sense of his own happiness! a stupid wise rogue! I could beat him. Now, if it were not for my hopes in young Clody, I might fairly conclude my name were at a period.

Cha. Aye, aye, he's the match for my money, and my girl's too, I warrant her. What say you, sir, shall we tell them a piece of our mind, and turn them together instantly?

Ant. This minute, sir; and here comes my young rogue, in the very nick of his fortune.

Enter CLODIO.

Ant. Clody, a word—

Clo. To the wise is enough. Your pleasure, sir?

Ant. In the mean time, sir, if you please to send your daughter notice of our intended visit.

[To CHARINO.]

Cha. I'll do it—hark you, friend—

[Whispers a servant,

Enter SANCHE behind.

San. I doubt my master has found but rough welcome; he's gone supperless into his study; I'd fain know the reason—it may be, somebody has borrowed one of his books, or so—I must find it out. [Stands aside.]

Clo. Sir, you could not have started any thing more agreeable to my inclination; and for the young lady's, sir, if this old gentleman will please to give me a sight of her, you shall see me whip into her's, in the cutting of a caper.

Cha. Well, pursue and conquer; though, let me tell you, sir, my girl has wit, and will give you as good as you bring; she has a smart way, sir.

Clo. Sir, I will be as smart as she; I have my share of courage; I fear no woman alive, sir, having always found that love and assurance ought to be as inseparable companions, as a beau and a snuff-box, or a curate and a tobacco-stopper.

Cha. Faith, thou art a pleasant rogue! E'gad she must like thee.

Clo. I know how to tickle the ladies, sir—in Paris, I had constantly two challenges every morning came up with my chocolate, only for being pleasant company the night before with the first ladies of quality.

Cha. Ah, silly envious rogues! Prithee, what do you do to the ladies?

San. Positively, nothing. [Aside.]

Clo. Why, the truth is, I did make the jades drink a little too smartly; for which the poor dogs, the princes, could not endure me.

Cha. Why, hast thou really conversed with the royal family?

Clo. Conversed with them! aye, rot them, aye, aye—You must know, some of them came with me half a day's journey, to see me a little on my way hither; but e'gad, I sent young Louis back again to Marli, as drunk as a tinker, by Jove! Ha, ha, ha! I can't but laugh to think how old Monarchy growled at him next morning.

Cha. Gad-a-mercy, boy! Well, and I warrant thou wert as intimate with their ladies, too?

San. Just alike, I dare answer for him.

[Aside.]

Clo. Why, you shall judge now, you shall judge—let me see—there was I and Monsieur—no, no, no! Monsieur did not sup with us—there was I and prince Grandmont, duke de Bon-grace—duke de Bellegrade—(Bellegrade—yes—yes—Jack was there) count de l'Esprit, marshal Bombard, and that pleasant dog, the prince de Hautenbas. We six, now, were all at supper, all in good humour; champagne was the word, and wit flew about the room, like a pack of losing cards—now, sir, in Madame's adjacent lodgings, there happened to be the self-same number of ladies, after the fatigue of a ballet, diverting themselves with ratina and the spleen; so dull, they were not able to talk, though it were scandalously, even of their best friends. So, sir, after a profound silence, at last, one of them gaped—Oh, gad! says she, would that pleasant dog, Clody, were here, to badiner a little! hey! says a second, and stretched—Ah, mon dieu! says a third, and waked—Could not one find him? says a fourth, and leered—Oh, burn him, says a fifth, I saw him go out with the nasty rakes of the blood again—in a pet—did you so? says a sixth. Pardie! we'll spoil that gang presently—in a passion. Whereupon, sir, in two minutes, I received a billet in four words—'Chien, nous vous demandons;' subscribed, Grandmont, Bongrace, Bellegrade, L'Esprit, Bombard, and Hautenbas.

Cha. Why, these are the very names of the princes you supped with.

Clo. Every soul of them the individual wife or sister of every man in the company, split me! ha, ha, ha!

Cha. & Ant. Ha, ha!

San. Did ever two old gudgeons swallow so greedily? [Aside.]

Ant. Well, and didst thou make a night on't, boy?

Clo. Yes, e'gad, and morning too, sir; for about eight o'clock the next day, slap they all soused upon their knees, kissed round, burned their commodos, drank my health, broke their glasses, and so parted.

Ant. Gad-a-mercy, Clody! Nay, 'twas always a wild young rogue!

Cha. I like him the better for't—he's a pleasant one, I'm sure.

Ant. Well, the rogue gives him a rare account of his travels.

Clo. E'gad, sir, I have a cure for the spleen. Ah, ha! I know how to wriggle myself into a lady's favour—give me leave when you please, sir.

Cha. Sir, you shall have it this moment—faith, I like him—you remember the conditions, sir; three parts of your estate to him and his heirs.

Ant. Sir, he deserves it all; 'tis not a trifle shall part them. You see Charles has given over the world: I'll undertake to buy his birth-right for a shelf of new books.

Cha. Aye, aye; get you the writings ready, with your other son's hand to them; for, unless he signs, the conveyance is of no validity.

Ant. I know it, sir—they shall be ready with his hand in two hours.

Cha. Why, then, come along, my lad; and now I'll shew thee to my daughter.

Clo. I dare be shown, sir—Allons! Hey, suivons l'ainour. [Exeunt all but SANCHO.]

San. How! my poor master to be disinherited, for monsieur Sa-sa, there, and I a looker on too! If we have studied our majors and our minors, our antecedents and consequents, to be concluded coxcombs at last, we have made a fair hand on't. I'm glad I know of this roguery, however. I'll take care my master's uncle, old don Lewis, shall hear of it; for, though he can hardly read a proclamation, yet he doats upon his learning; and if he be that old, rough, testy blade he used to be, we may chance to have a rubbers with them first—here he comes, profecto.

Enter DON LEWIS.

D. Lew. Sancho, where's my boy Charles? What, is he at it? Is he at it? Deep—deep—I warrant him—Sancho—a little peep now—one peep at him, through the key-hole—I must have a peep.

San. Have a care, sir, he's upon a magical point.

D. Lew. What, has he lost any thing?

San. Yes, sir, he has lost, with a vengeance.

D. Lew. But what, what, what, what, sirrah! what is't?

San. Why, his birth-right, sir; he is di—di—dis—disinherited. [Sobbing.]

D. Lew. Ha! how! when! what! where! who! what dost thou mean?

San. His brother, sir, is to marry Angelina, the great heiress, to enjoy three parts of his father's estate; and my master is to have a whole acre of new books, for setting his hand to the conveyance.

D. Lew. This must be a lie, sirrah; I will have it a lie.

San. With all my heart, sir; but here comes my old master, and the pickpocket the lawyer: they'll tell you more.

Enter ANTONIO, and a Lawyer.

Ant. Here, sir, this paper has your full instructions: pray, be speedy, sir; I don't know but we may couple them to-morrow; be sure you make it firm.

Law. Do you secure his hand, sir, I defy the law to give him his title again.

[Exit Lawyer.]

San. What think you now, sir?

D. Lew. Why, now, methinks I'm pleased—this is right—I'm pleased—must cut that lawyer's throat, though—must bone him—aye, I'll have him boned—and potted.

Ant. Brother, how is it?

D. Lew. Oh, mighty well—mighty well—let's feel your pulse—feverish—

[Looks earnestly in ANTONIO's face, and, after some pause, whistles a piece of a tune.]

Ant. You are merry, brother.

D. Lew. It's a lie.

Ant. How, brother!

D. Lew. A damned lie—I am not merry.

[Smiling.]

Ant. What are you, then?

D. Lew. Very angry.

Ant. Hi, hi, hi! At what, brother?

[Mimicking him.]

D. Lew. Why, at a very wise settlement I have made lately.

Ant. What settlement, good brother? I find he has heard of it. [Aside.]

D. Lew. What do you think I have done? I have—this deep head of mine has—disinherited my elder son, because his understanding is an honour to my family; and given it all to my younger, because he's a puppy—a puppy.

Ant. Come, I guess at your meaning, brother.

D. Lew. Do you so, sir? Why, then, I must tell you, flat and plain, my boy Charles must, and shall inherit it.

Ant. I say no, unless Charles had a soul to value his fortune. What! he should manage eight thousand crowns a year out of the metaphysics? astronomy should look to my vineyards; Horace should buy off my wines; tragedy should kill my mutton; history should cut down my hay; Homer should get in my corn; Tityre tu patule look to my sheep; and geometry bring my harvest home! Hark you, brother, do you know what learning is?

D. Lew. What if I don't, sir? I believe it's a fine thing, and that's enough—though I can speak no Greek, I love and honour the sound of it, and Charles speaks it loftily; E'gad, he thunders it out, sir: and let me tell you, sir, if you had ever the grace to have heard but six lines of Hesiod, or Homer, or Iliad, or any of the Greek poets, od's-heart! would have made your hair stand on end; sir, he has read such things in my hearing—

Ant. But did you understand them, brother?

D. Lew. I tell you, no. What does that signify! The very sound's sufficient comfort to an honest man.

Ant. Fie, fie! I wonder you talk so, you that are old, and should understand.

D. Lew. Should, sir! Yes, and do, sir. Sir, I'd have you to know, I have studied, I have run over history, poetry, philosophy.

Ant. Yes, like a cat over a harpsichord, rare music—You have read catalogues, I believe. Come, come, brother, my younger boy is a fine gentleman.

D. Lew. A sad dog—I'll buy a prettier fellow in a pennyworth of ginger-bread.

Ant. What I propose, I'll do, sir, say you your pleasure—here comes one I must talk with—well, brother, what news?

Enter CHARINO.

Cha. Oh, to our wishes, sir! Clody's a right bait for a girl, sir; a budding, sprightly fellow: she's a little shy at first; but I gave him his cue, and the rogue does so whisk, and frisk, and sing, and dance her about! Odsbud, he plays like a greyhound. Noble Don Lewis, I am your humble servant. Come, what say you? Shall I prevail with you to settle some part of your estate upon young Clody.

D. Lew. Clody!

Cha. Aye, your nephew, Clody.

D. Lew. Settle upon him!

Cha. Aye.

D. Lew. Why, look you, I ha'nt much land to spare; but I have an admirable horse-pond—I'll settle that upon him, if you will.

Ant. Come, let him have his way, sir; he's old and hasty; my estate's sufficient. How does your daughter, sir?

Cha. Ripe, and ready, sir, like a blushing rose; she only waits for the pulling.

Ant. Why, then, let to-morrow be the day.

Cha. With all my heart; get you the writings ready, my girl shall be here in the morning.

D. Lew. Hark you, sir, do you suppose my Charles shall—

Cha. Sir, I suppose nothing; what I'll do, I'll justify; what your brother does, let him answer.

Ant. That I have already, sir, and so good morrow to your patience, brother.

[Erit ANTONIO.]

D. Lew. Sancho!

San. Sir?

D. Lew. Fetch me some gunpowder—quick—quick.

San. Sir?

D. Lew. Some gun-powder, I say—a barrel—quickly—and, d'ye hear, three pennyworth of ratsbane; hey! aye, I'll blow up one, and poison the other.

San. Come, sir, I see what you would be at; and if you dare take my advice, (I don't want wit at a pinch, sir) e'en let me try, if I can fire my master enough with the praises of the young lady, to make him rival his brother; that would blow them up, indeed, sir.

D. Lew. Psha! impossible; he never spoke six words to any woman in his life, but his bed-maker.

San. So much the better, sir; therefore, if he speaks at all, it's the more likely to be out of the road. Hark, he rings!—I must wait upon him.

[Erit SANCHO.]

D. Lew. These damned old rogues! I can't look my poor boy in the face: but come, Charles; let them go on; thou shalt not want money to buy thee books, yet—that old fool, thy father, and his young puppy, shall not share a groat of mine between them; nay, to plague them, I could find in my heart to fall sick in a pet, give thee my estate in a passion, and leave the world in a fury.

[Erit.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.

Enter ANTONIO and SANCHE.

Ant. SIR, he shall have what's fit for him.

San. No inheritance, sir!

Ant. Enough to give him books, and a moderate maintenance: that's as much as he cares for; you talk like a fool, a coxcomb; trouble him with land——

San. Must master Clodio have all, sir?

Ant. All, all; he knows how to use it; he's a man bred in this world; t'other in the skies, his business is 'altogether above stairs; [bell rings.] go, see what he wants.

San. A father, I'm sure.

[Erit SANCHE.]

Ant. What, will none of my rogues come near me now? Oh, here they are.

Enter three Servants.

Well, sir, in the first place, can you procure me a plentiful dinner for about fifty, within two hours? Your young master is to be married this morning; will that spur you, sir?

Cook. Young master, sir! I wish your honour had given me a little more warning.

Ant. Sir, you have as much as I had: I was not sure of it half an hour ago.

Cook. Sir, I will try what I can do—hey, Pedro! Gusman! Come, stir, ho!

[Erit Cook.]

Ant. Butler, open the cellar to all good fellows; if any man offers to sneak away sober, knock him down! [Ereunt.]

CARLOS alone in his study. [A noise of chopping within.]

Car. What a perpetual noise these people make! my head is broken with several noises, and in every corner. I have forgot to eat and sleep, with reading; all my faculties turn into study. What a misfortune 'tis in human nature, that the body will not live on that, which feeds the mind! How unprofitable a pleasure is eating!——Sancho!

Enter SANCHE.

San. Did you call, sir? [Chopping again.]

Car. Prithee, what noise is this?

San. The cooks are hard at work, sir, chopping herbs, and mincing meat, and breaking marrow-bones.

Car. And is it thus at every dinner?

San. No, sir; but we have high doings to-day.

Car. Well, set this folio in its place again; then make me a little fire, and get a manchet; I'll dine alone—Does my younger brother speak any Greek yet, Sancho?

San. No, sir, but he spits French like a magpie, and that's more in fashion.

Car. He steps before me there; I think I read it well enough to understand it; but, when I am to give it utterance, it quarrels with my tongue. Again that noise! Prithee tell me, Sancho, are there any princes to dine here?

San. Some there are as happy as princes, sir; your brother's married to-day.

Car. What of that? might not six dishes serve them? I never have but one, and eat of that but sparingly.

San. Sir, all the country round is invited; not a dog that knows the house, but comes, too: all open, sir.

Car. Prithee, who is it my brother marries?

San. Old Charino's daughter, sir, the great heiress; a delicate creature; young, soft, smooth, fair, plump, and ripe as a cherry—and, they say, modest too.

Car. That's strange; prithee, how do these modest women look? I never yet conversed with any but my own mother; to me, they ever were but shadows, seen and unregarded.

San. Ah, would you saw this lady, sir! she would draw you farther than your Archimedes; she has a better secret than any's in Aristotle, if you studied for it. E'gad you'd find her the prettiest natural philosopher to play with!

Car. Is she so fine a creature?

San. Such eyes! such looks! such a pair of pretty plump, pouting lips! such softness in her voice! such music, too! and, when she smiles, such roguish dimples in her cheeks! such a clear skin! white neck, and, a little lower, such a pair of round, hard, heaving, what d'ye call—ums—ah!

Car. Why, thou art in love, Sancho.

San. Ay, so would you be, if you saw her, sir.

Car. I don't think so. What settlement does my father make them?

San. Only all his dirty land, sir, and makes your brother his sole heir.

Car. Must I have nothing?

San. Books in abundance; leave to study your eyes out, sir.

Car. I'm the elder born, and have a title, though.

San. No matter for that, sir, he'll have possession—of the lady, too!

Car. I wish him happy—he'll not inherit my little understanding, too!

San. Oh, sir, he's more a gentleman than to do that—Ods me, sir! sir, here comes the very lady, the bride, your sister that must be, and her father.

Enter CHARINO and ANGELINA.

Stand close; you'll both see and hear, sir.

Car. I ne'er saw any yet so fair; such sweetness in her look ! such modesty ! If we may think the eye the window to the heart, she has a thousand treasured virtues there.

Sax. So ! the book is gone. [Aside.

Cha. Come, prithee, put on a brisker look ; ods-heart, dost thou think in conscience, that's fit for thy wedding-day ?

Ang. Sir, I wish it were not quite so sudden ; a little time for farther thought, perhaps, had made it easier to me : to change for ever, is no trifle, sir.

Car. A wonder !

Cha. Look you, his fortune I have taken care of, and his person you have no exceptions to.—What, in the name of Venus, would the girl have ?

Ang. I never said, of all the world I made him, sir, my choice : nay, though he be yours, I cannot say I am highly pleased with him, nor yet am averse ; but I had rather welcome your commands and him, than disobedience.

Cha. Oh, if that be all, madam, to make you easy, my commands are at your service.

Ang. I have done with my objections, sir.

Car. Such understanding in so soft a form ! Happy—happy brother ! may he be happy, while I sit down in patience and alone ! I have gazed too much—Reach me an Ovid.

[Exeunt CARLOS and SANCHE.

Cha. I say put on your best looks, hussy—for here he comes, faith.

Enter CLODIO.

Ah, my dear Clody !

Clo. My dear, [Kisses him.] dear dad. Ha ! Ma princesse ! estes vous là donc ? Ah, ha ! Non, non. Je ne m'y connois guères, &c. [Sings.] Look, look—look, o'slyboots ; what, she knows nothing of the matter ! But you will, child—E'gad, I shall count the clock extremely to-night. Let me see—what time shall I rise to-morrow ? Not till after nine, ten, eleven, for a pistole.—Ah—C'est à dire, votre cœur insensible est enfin vaincu. Non, non, &c. [Sings a second verse.

Enter ANTONIO, DON LEWIS, and Lawyer.

Ant. Well said, Clody ! my noble brother, welcome ! my fair daughter, I give you joy !

Clo. And so will I, too, sir. Allons ! Vivons ! Chantons, dansons ! Hey ! L'autre jour, &c.

[Sings and dances, &c.

Ant. Well said again, boy. Sir, you and your writings are welcome. What, my angry brother ! nay, you must have your welcome, too, or we shall make but a flat feast on it.

D. Lew. Sir, I am not welcome, nor I won't be welcome, nor no-body's welcome, and you are all a parcel of—

Cha. What, sir ?

D. Lew. —Miserable wretches—sad dogs.

Ant. Come, pray, sir, bear with him, he's old and hasty : but he'll dine and be good company for all this.

D. Lew. A strange lie, that :

Clo. Ha, ha, ha ! poor Testy, ha, ha !

D. Lew. Don't laugh, my dear rogue, prithee, don't laugh now ; faith, I shall break thy head, if thou dost.

Clo. Gad so ! why, then, I find you are angry at me, dear uncle !

D. Lew. Angry at thee, hey puppy ! Why, what ?—what dost thou see in that lovely hatchet face of thine, that is worth my being out of humour at ? Blood and fire, ye dog ! get out of my sight, or—

Ant. Nay, brother, this is too far—

D. Lew. Angry at him ! a son of a——son's son of a whore !

Cha. Ha, ha ! poor peevish—

D. Lew. I'd fain have some body poison him. [To himself.] Ah, that sweet creature ! Must this fair flower be cropped to stick up in a piece of rascally earthen ware ? I must speak to her—Puppy, stand out of my way.

Clo. Ha, ha ! ay, now for it.

D. Lew. [To ANGELINA.] Ah ! ah ! ah ! Madam—I pity you ; you're a lovely young creature, and ought to have a handsome man yoked to you, one of understanding, too ;—I am sorry to say it, but this fellow's skull's extremely thick—he can never get any thing but muffs and snuff-boxes ; or, say, he should have a thing shaped like a child, you can make nothing of it but a tailor.

Clo. Odds me ! why, you are testy, my dear uncle.

D. Lew. Will nobody take that troublesome dog out of my sight—I cannot stay where he is—I'll go see my poor boy Charles—I've disturbed you, madam ; your humble servant.

Ant. You'll come again, and drink the bride's health, brother ?

D. Lew. That lady's health I may ; and, if she'll give me leave, perhaps sit by her at table, too.

Clo. Ha, ha ! bye, nuncle.

D. Lew. Puppy, good bye—

[Exit D. LEWIS.

Ang. An odd-humoured gentleman.

Ant. Very odd indeed, child ; I suppose, in pure spite, he'll make my son Charles his heir.

Ang. Methinks I would not have a light head, nor one laden with too much learning, as my father says this Carlos is ; sure there's something hid in that gentleman's concern for him, that speaks him not so mere a log.

Ant. Come, shall we go and seal, brother ? The priest stays for us. When Carlos has signed the conveyance, as he shall presently, we'll then to the wedding, and so to dinner.

Cha. With all my heart, sir.

Clo. Allons, ma chere princesse !

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.

CARLOS in his study, with DON LEWIS, and SANCHE.

D. Lew. Nay, you are undone.

Car. Then—I must study, sir, to bear my fortune.

D. Lew. Have you no greater feeling?

San. You were sensible of the great book, sir, when it fell upon your head; and won't the ruin of your fortune stir you?

Car. Will he have my books, too?

D. Lew. No, no; he has a book, a fine one, too, called 'The Gentleman's Recreation; or, The Secret Art of getting Sons and Daughters:' such a creature! a beauty in folio! Would thou hadst her in thy study, Carlos, though it were but to new-clasp her!

San. He has seen her, sir.

D. Lew. Well, and—and——

San. He flung away his book, sir.

D. Lew. Did he faith? would he had flung away his humour, too, and spoke to her.

Car. Must my brother then have all?

D. Lew. All, all.

San. All that your father has, sir.

Car. And that fair creature, too?

San. Aye, sir.

D. Lew. Hey!

Car. He has enough, then. [Sighing.]

D. Lew. He have her, Charles! why would, would, that is——hey!

Car. May not I see her, sometimes, and call her sister? I'll do her no wrong.

D. Lew. I can't bear this! 'Sheart, I could cry for madness! Flesh and fire! do but speak to her, man.

Car. I cannot, sir; her look requires something of that distant awe, words of that soft respect, and yet such force and meaning, too, that I should stand confounded to approach her, and yet I long to wish her joy. Oh, were I born to give it, too!

D. Lew. Why, thou shalt wish her joy, boy; faith she is a good-humoured creature; she'll take it kindly.

Car. Do you think so, uncle?

D. Lew. I'll to her, and tell of you.

Car. Do sir——Stay, uncle——will she not think me rude? I would not for the world offend her.

D. Lew. 'Fend a fiddle-stick—let me alone—I'll—I'll——

Car. Nay, but, sir! dear uncle!

D. Lew. A hum! a hum!

[Exit DON LEWIS.]

Enter ANTONIO and the Lawyer, with a writing.

Ant. Where's my son?

San. There, sir, casting a figure what chopping children his brother shall have, and where he shall find a new father for himself.

Ant. I shall find a stick for you, rogue, I shall. Charles, how dost thou do? Come, hither, boy.

Car. Your pleasure, sir?

Ant. Nay, no great matter, child; only to put your name here a little, to this bit of parchment: I think you write a reasonable good hand, Charles.

Car. Pray, sir, to what use may it be?

Ant. Only to pass your title in the land I have to your brother Clodio.

Car. Is it no more, sir?

Law. That's all, sir.

Ant. No, no, 'tis nothing else; look you, you shall be provided for; you shall have what books you please, and your means shall come in without your care, and you shall always have a servant to wait on you.

Car. Sir, I thank you; but if you please, I had rather sign it before the good company below; it being, sir, so frank a gift, 'twill be some small compliment to have done it before the lady, too: there I shall sign it cheerfully, and wish my brother fortune.

Ant. With all my heart, child; it is the same thing to me.

Car. You'll excuse me, sir, if I make no great stay with you.

Ant. Do as thou wilt; thou shalt do any thing thou hast a mind to. [Exit.]

San. Now has he undone himself for ever; odds-heart, I'll down into the cellar, and be stark drunk for anger. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—Changes to a dining-room: a large table spread.

Enter CHARINO with ANGELINA, CLODIO, DON LEWIS, Ladies, Priests, and a Lawyer.

Law. Come, let him bring his son's hand, and all's done. Are you ready, sir?

Priest. Sir, I shall dispatch them presently, immediately; for, in truth, I am an hungry.

Clo. Egad, I warrant you, the priest and I could both fall to without saying grace——Ha, you little rogue! what, you think it long too?

Ang. I find no fault, sir; better things were well done, than done too hastily——Sir, you look melancholy. [To DON LEWIS.]

D. Lew. Sweet-smelling blossom! Ah, that I had the gathering of thee: I would stick thee in the bosom of a pretty young fellow——Ah, thou hast missed a man (but that he is so bewitched to his study, and knows no other mistress than his mind) so far above this feather-headed puppy——

Ang. Can he talk, sir?

D. Lew. Like an angel——to himself——the devil a word to a woman: his language is all upon the high business: to heaven, and heaven—— ly wonders, to nature, and her dark and secret causes.

Ang. Does he speak so well there, sir?

D. Lew. To admiration! Such curiosities! but he can't look a woman in the face; if he does, he blushes like fifteen.

Ang. But a little conversation, methinks——

D. Lew. Why, so I think, too; but the boy's bewitched, and the devil can't bring him to it: shall I try if I can get him to wish you joy?

Ang. I shall receive it as becomes his sister, sir.

Clo. Look, look, old Testy will fall in love by and by; he's hard at it, split me!

Cha. Let him alone; she'll fetch him about, I warrant you.

Clo. So, here my father comes! Now priest. Hey, my brother too! that's a wonder; broke like a spirit from his cell.

Enter ANTONIO and CARLOS.

D. Lew. Odsso, here he is; that's he; a little inclining to the lean, or so, but his understanding's the fatter for it.

Ant. Come, Carlos, 'twere your desire to see my fair daughter and the good company, and to seal before them all, and give your brother joy.

Cha. He does well; I shall think the better of him as long as I live.

Car. Is this the lady, sir?

Ant. Ay, that's your sister, Charles.

Car. Forbid it, love! [Aside.] Do you not think she'll grace our family?

Ant. No doubt on it, sir.

Car. Should I not thank her for so unmerited a grace?

Ant. Ay, and welcome, Charles.

D. Lew. Now, my boy; give her a gentle twist by the finger; lay your lips softly, softly, close and plump to her. [Apart to CARLOS.

Car. Pardon a stranger's freedom, lady—— [Salutes ANGELINA.] Dissolving softness! Oh, the drowning joy!—Happy, happy he, that sips eternally such nectar down, that, unconfined, may lave and wanton there in sateless draughts of ever-springing beauty!—But you, fair creature, share by far the higher joy; if, as I've read, (nay, now am sure) the sole delight of love lies only in the power to give.

Ang. How near his thoughts agree with mine! this the mere scholar I was told of! [Aside.]—I find, sir, you have experienced love; you seem acquainted with the passion.

Car. I've had indeed, a dead pale glimpse in theory, but never saw the enlivening light before.

Ang. Ha, before!

[Aside.

Ant. Well, these are very fine compliments, Charles; but you say nothing to your brother yet.

Car. Oh, yes, and wish him, sir, with any other beauty (if possible) more lasting joy than I could taste with her!

Ang. He speaks unhappily.

Clo. Ha!—what do you say, brother?

Ant. Nay, for my part, I don't understand him.

Cha. Nor I.

D. Lew. Stand clear! I do—and that sweet creature too, I hope.

Ang. Too well, I fear.

Ant. Come, come, to the writing, Charles; prithee, leave thy studying, man.

Car. I'll leave my life first; I study now to be a man; before, what man was, was but my argument;—I am now on the proof; I find, I feel myself a man—nay, I fear it, too.

D. Lew. He has it! he has it! my boy's in for it.

Clo. Come, come, will you——

D. Lew. Stand out of the way, puppy.

[Interposing with his back to CLODIO.

Car. Whence is it, fair, that while I offer speech to you, my thoughts want words, my words their free and honest utterance? Why is it thus I tremble at your touch, and fear your frown, as would a frightened child the dreadful lightning? Yet should my dearest friend or brother dare to check my vain deluded wishes, Oh, I should turn, and tear him like an offended lion—Is this, can it, must it be in a sister's power?

Clo. Come, come, will you sign, brother?

D. Lew. Time enough, puppy.

Car. O! if you knew with what precipitated haste you hurry on a deed, that makes you blessed or miserable for ever, even yet, near as you are to happiness, you'd find no danger in a moment's pause.

Clo. I say, will you sign, brother?

Car. Away, I have no time for trifles! room for an elder brother.

D. Lew. Why, did not I bid thee stand out of the way now?

Ant. Ay, but this is trifling, Charles! Come, come, your hand, man.

Car. Your pardon, sir, I cannot seal yet; had you only shewed me land, I had resigned it free, and proud to have bestowed it to your pleasure: 'tis care, 'tis dirt, and trouble: but you have opened to me such a treasure, such unimagined mines of solid joy, that I perceive my temper stubborn now, ev'n to a churlish avarice of love!—Heaven direct my fortune!

Ant. And so you won't part with your title, sir

Car. Sooner with my soul of reason, be a plant, a beast, a fish, a fly, and only make the number of things up, than yield one foot of land—if she be tied to it.

Cha. I don't like this; he talks oddly, methinks.

Ang. Yet with a bravery of soul might warm the coldest heart. [Aside.]

Clo. Pshaw, pox! prithee, brother, you had better think of those things in your study, man!

Car. Go you and study, for 'tis time, young brother: turn o'er the tedious volumes I have read; think, and digest them well! the wholesomest food for green consumptive minds; nor dare to dream of marriage-vows, till thou hast taught thy soul, like mine, to love—Is it for thee to wear a jewel of this inestimable worth?

D. Lew. Ah, Charles! [Kisses him.] What say you to the scholar now, chicken?

Ang. A wonder!—Is this gentleman your brother, sir! [To CLODIO.]

Clo. Hey! No, my—Madam, not quite—that is, he is a little a-kin by the—Pox on him! would he were buried—I can't tell what to say to him, split me!

Ant. Positively, you will not seal then, ha?

Car. Neither—I should not blindly say I will not seal—Let me entreat a moment's pause—for, even yet, perhaps I may. [Sighing.]

Ang. Forbid it, fortune!

Ant. O, may you so, sir!

Clo. Ay! sir, hey! What, you are come to yourself I find, 'sheart!

Cha. Ay, ay, give him a little time, he'll think better on't, I warrant you.

Car. Perhaps, fair creature, I have done you wrong, whose plighted love and hope went hand in hand together; but, I conjure you, think my life were hateful after so base, so barbarous an act as parting them: What! to lay waste at once for ever all the gay blossoms of your forward fortune! O forbid it, Love! forbid it, Nature and Humanity! I have no land, no fortune, life, or being, while your necessity or peace requires them. Say! or give me need to think your smallest hope depends on my objected ruin; my ruin is my safety there; my fortune, or my life resigned with joy, so your account of happy hours were thence but raised to any added number.

Cha. Why ay! there's some civility in this.

Clo. The fellow really talks very prettily.

Car. But if, in bare compliance to a father's will, you now but suffer marriage, or, what's worse, give it as an extorted bond, imposed on the simplicity of your youth, and dare confess you wish some honest friend would save, or free you from its hard conditions; I then again have land, have life, and resolution, waiting still upon your happier fortune.

Clo. Ha, ha! pert enough, that! 'Egad! I long to see what this will come to!

Priest. In truth, unless somebody is married presently, the dinner will be spoiled, and then—no body will be able to eat it.

Ant. Brother, I say, let's remove the lady.

Cha. Force her from him!

Car. 'Tis too late! I have a figure here!—

Sooner shall bodies leave their shade; so fixed, so rooted here, is every growing thought of her.

Clo. Gads me! what, now its troublesome again, is it?

Car. Consider, fair one, now's the very crisis of our fate: you cannot have it, sure, to ask, if honour be the parent of my love: if you can love for love, and think your heart rewarded there, like two young vines we'll curl together, circling our souls in never-ending joy: we'll spring together, and we'll bear one fruit; one joy shall make us smile, one sorrow mourn: one age go with us, one hour of death shall close our eyes, and one cold grave shall hold us happy—Say but you hate me not! O speak! Give but the softest breath to that transporting thought!

Ang. Need I then speak, to say, I am far from hating you—I would say more, but there is nothing fit for me to say.

Cha. I'll bear it no longer—

Ang. On this you may depend, I cannot like that marriage was proposed me.

Car. How shall my soul requite this goodness?

Cha. Beyond patience! this is downright insolence! roguery! rape!

Ant. Part them.

Clo. Ay, ay! part them, part them.

D. Lew. Doll! dum! dum!—

[Sings, and draws in their defence.]

Cha. Call an officer! I'll have them forced asunder.

Ang. Nay, then I am reduced to take protection here. [Goes to CARLOS.]

Car. O ecstasy of heart! transporting joy!

D. Lew. Lorra! Dorrol! Loll!

[Sings and dances.]

Cha. A plot! a plot against my honour! Murder! Treason! Gunpowder! I'll be revenged!

Ant. Sir, you shall have satisfaction.

Cha. I'll be revenged!

Ant. Carlos, I say, forego the lady.

Car. Never, while I have sense of being, life, or motion.

Clo. You won't! Gadso! What, then I find I must lug out upon this business? Allons! the lady, sir!

D. Lew. Lorra! Dorrol! Loll!

[Presenting his point to CLODIO.]

Cha. I'll have his blood! by all the scars and wounds of honour in my family! [Exit CHAR.]

Car. Hold, uncle! come, brother! sheath your anger—I'll do my best to satisfy you all—but first I would intreat a blessing here.

Ant. Out of my doors! thou art no son of mine. [Exit ANT.]

Car. I am sorry I have lost a father, sir—For you, brother, since once you had a seeming hope in lieu of what you've lost, half of my birth-right—

Clo. No halves! no halves, sir! the whole lady!

Car. Why, then, the whole, if you can like the terms.

Clo. What terms? What terms? Come, quick, quick.

Car. The first is this——[Snatches Don Lewis's sword.] Win her, and wear her; for, on my soul, unless my body fail, my mind shall never yield thee up a thought in love.

D. Lew. Gramercy, Charles! To him, boy! E'gad, this love has made a man of him.

Car. This is the first good sword I ever poised in anger yet; 'tis sharp I'm sure; if it but hold my putting home, I shall so hunt your insolence!——I feel the fire of ten strong spirits in me: wert thou a native fencer, in so fair a cause, I thus should hold thee at the worst defiance.

Clo. Look you, brother, take care of yourself; I shall certainly be in you the first thrust; but if you had rather, d'ye see, we'll talk a little calmly about this business.

Car. Away, trifle! I would be loth to prove thee a coward, too.

Clo. Coward! why, then really, sir, if you please, midriff's the word, brother; you are a son of a whore—Allons!——

[They fight, and CLODIO is disarmed.]

Car. There, sir, take your life——and mend it——

Ang. Are you wounded, sir?

Car. Only in my fears for you: how shall we bestow us, uncle?

D. Lew. Positively, we are not safe here, this lady being an heiress. Follow me.

Car. Good angels guard us!

[Exeunt with ANG.]

Clo. Gadso! I never fenced so ill in all my life——never in my life, split me!

Enter MONSIEUR.

Mons. Sire, here be de trompete, de haute-boy, de musique, de maitre danser, dat deseer to know if you sal be please to 'ave de masque begin.

Clo. Ha! what does this puppy say now?

Mons. Sire, de musique.

Clo. Why, ay——that's true——but——tell them——plague on them, tell them they are not ready tuned.

Mons. Sire, dare is all tune, all prepare.

Clo. Ay! Why, then, tell them that my brother's wise again, and has spoiled all, and I am bubbled, and so I shan't be married till next time: but I have fought with him, and he has disarmed me; and so he won't release the land, nor give me my mistress again; and I——I am undone, that's all. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter CHARINO, ANTONIO, Officers and Servants.

Cha. Officer, do your duty: I say, seize them all.

Ant. Carry them this minute before a——How now! What! all fled?

Cha. Ha! my girl! my child! my heiress! I am abused! I am cheated! I am robbed! I am ravished! murdered! and flung in a ditch!

Ant. Who let them out? Which way went they, villains?

Serv. Sir, we had no order to stop them; but they went out at the door not six minutes ago.

Cha. I'll pursue them with bills, warrants, actions, writs, and malice: I'm a lawyer, sir; they shall find I understand ruin.

Ant. Nay, they shall be found, sir: Run you to the port, sirrah, see if any ships are going off, and bring us notice immediately.

[Exeunt Officers and Servants.]

Enter SANCHEO drunk.

San. Ban, ban, Cac-caliban. [Sings.]

Ant. Here comes a rogue, I'll warrant, knows the bottom of all! Where's my son, villain?

San. Son, sir!

Cha. Where's my daughter, sirrah?

San. Daughter, sir!

Cha. Ay, my daughter, rascal!

San. Why, sir, they told me just now, sir——that she's——she's run away.

Ant. Dog, where's your master?

San. My master! why, they say he is——

Ant. Where, sirrah?

San. Why, he is——he is——gone along with her.

Ant. Death! you dog, discover him, or——

San. Sir, I will—I will.

Ant. Where is he, villain!

San. Where, sir? Why, to be sure, he is——he is——upon my soul, I don't know, sir.

Ant. No more trifling, rascal!

San. If I do, sir, I wish this may be my poison. [Drinks.]

Ant. Death! you dog, get out of my house, or I'll——So, sir, have you found him?

Re-enter the Servant, hastily, and CLODIO.

Clo. Ay, sir, have you found them?

Serv. Yes, sir, I had a sight of them; but they were just got on board a small vessel before I could overtake them.

Cha. Death and furies!

Ant. Whither were they bound, sirrah?

Serv. Sir, I could not discover that: but they were full before the wind, with a very smart gale.

Ant. What shall we do, brother?

Clo. Be as smart as they, sir; follow them, follow them.

Cha. Send to the port this moment, and secure a ship; I'll pursue them through all the elements.

Clo. I'll follow you by the northern star.

Ant. Run to the port again, rogue; hire a ship, and tell them they must hoist sail immediately.

Enter MONSIEUR.

Clo. And you, rogue, run to my chamber, fill up my snuff-box—Cram it hard, you dog, and be here again before you get thither.

Ant. What, will you take nothing else, boy?

Clo. Nothing, sir, but snuff and opportunity—we're in haste. Allons! hey! Je vole. [Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Lisbon.

Enter ELVIRA, DON DUART, and Governor.

Eto. DEAR brother, let me intreat you, stay; why will you provoke your danger?

D. Du. Madam, my honour must be satisfied.

Eto. That's done already, by the degrading blow you gave him.

Gov. Pray, niece, what is it has incensed him?

Eto. Nothing but a needless quarrel.

Gov. I am sorry for him—To whom is all this fury, nephew?

D. Du. To you, sir, or any man that dares oppose me.

Gov. Come, you are too boisterous, sir; and this vain opinion of your courage, taken on your late success in duelling, makes you daily shunned by men of civil conversation. For shame, leave off these senseless brawls; if you are valiant, as you would be thought, turn out your courage to the wars; let your king and country be the better for't.

D. Du. Yes, so I might be general—Sir, no man living shall command me.

Gov. Sir, you shall find that here in Lisbon I will: I'm every hour followed with complaints of your behaviour from men of almost all conditions; and my authority, which you presume will bear you out, because you are my nephew, no longer shall protect you now: expect your next disorder to be punished with as much severity as his that is a stranger to my blood.

D. Du. Punish me! you, nor your office, dare not do it.

Gov. Away! Justice dares do any thing she ought.

Eto. Brother, this brutal temper must be cast off: when you can master that, you shall gladly command my fortune. But if you still persist, expect my prayers and vows for your conversion only; but never means, or favour.

D. Du. Fire! and furies! I'm tutored here like a mere school-boy! Women shall judge of injuries in honour?—For you, sir—I was born free, and will not curb my spirit, nor is it for your authority to tempt it: give me the usage of a man of honour, or 'tis not your government shall protect you. [Exit.]

Gov. I am sorry to see this, niece, for your sake.

Eto. Would he were not my brother!

Enter DON MANUEL, and Sailors, with ANGELINA.

D. Man. Divide the spoil amongst you; this fair captive I only challenge for myself,

Gov. Ha! some prize brought in.

Sail. Sir, she's yours; you fought, and well deserve her.

Gov. Noble Don Manuel! welcome on shore! I see you are fortunate; for I presume that's some uncommon prize.

D. Man. She is, indeed—These ten years I have known the seas, and many rough engagements there; but never saw so small a bark so long defended, with such incredible valour, and by two men scarce armed, too.

Gov. Is it possible?

D. Man. Nay, and their contempt of death, when taken, exceeds even all they acted in their freedom.

Gov. Pray tell us, sir.

D. Man. When they were brought aboard us, both disarmed and ready to be fettered, they looked as they had sworn never to take the bread of bondage, and on a sudden snatching up their swords, (the younger taking first from this fair maid a farewell only with his eyes) both leapt into the sea.

Gov. 'Tis wonderful, indeed!

D. Man. It wrought so much upon me, had not our own safety hindered, (at that time a great ship pursuing us) I would, in charity, have taken them up, and, with their lives, they should have had their liberty.

Ang. Too late, alas! they're lost! (heart-wounding thought!) for ever lost!—I now am friendless, miserable, and a slave!

D. Man. Take comfort, fair one; perhaps you yet again may see them; they were not quite a league from shore, and, with such strength and courage broke through the rolling waves, they could not fail of life and safety.

Ang. In that last hope, I brook a wretched being; but if they're dead, my woes will find so many doors to let out life, I shall not long survive them.

Eto. Alas, poor lady! Come, sir, misery but weeps the more when she is gazed on—we trouble her.

Gov. I wait on you; your servant, sir—

[Exeunt ELVIRA and GOVERNOR.]

D. Man. Now, my fair captive, though I confess you beautiful, yet give me leave to own my heart has long been in another's keeping; therefore, the favour I am about to ask, you may, at least, hear with safety.

Ang. This has engaged me, sir, to hear.

D. Man. These three years have I honourably loved a noble lady; her name Louisa, the beautiful niece of great Ferrara's duke: her person and fortune uncontrouled, sole mistress of herself and me, who long have languished in a hopeless constancy. Now, I perceive, in all your language, and your looks, a softening power; nor can a suit, by you promoted, be denied: therefore, I would awhile entreat your leave to recommend you, as her companion, to this lady's favour; and, (as I'm sure you'll soon be near her closest thoughts) if you can think upon the honest courtesies I hitherto have shewn your modesty, and, in your happy talk, but name, with any mark of favour, me, or my unwearied love, 'twould be a generous act would fix me ever grateful to its memory.

Ang. Such poor assistance, sir, as one distressed like me can give, shall willingly be paid: if I can steal but any thoughts from my own misfortunes, rest assured, they'll be employed in healing yours.

D. Man. I'll study to deserve this goodness: for the present, think my poor house your own; at night I'll wait upon you to the lady—till when, I am your guard.

Ang. You have bound me to your service.

[Exeunt D. MANUEL and ANGELINA.]

SCENE II.—Changes to a church, the vespers supposed to be just ended, several walking out. CARLOS and DON LEWIS rising near LOUISA and HONORIA. LOUISA observing CARLOS.

Hon. Come, madam, shall we walk out? The crowd's pretty well over now.

Lou. But, then, that melancholy softness in his look!

[To herself.]

Hon. Cousin! Donna Louisa!

Lou. Even in his devotions, too; such graceful adorations—so sweet a—

Hon. Cousin, will you go?

Lou. Pshaw, time enough—Prithee, let's walk a little this way.

Hon. What's the matter with her?

[They walk from D. LEWIS and CARLOS.]

Car. For what are we reserved?

D. Lew. For no good, I'm afraid—My ill-luck don't use to give over when her hand's in; she's always in haste—One misfortune generally comes galloping in upon the back of another—Drowning we have escaped miraculously; would the fear of hanging were over, too! our being so strangely saved from one, smells damnably rank of the other. Though I am obliged to thee, Charles, for what life I have, and I'll thank thee for't, if ever I set foot upon my estate again. Faith, I was just gone; if thou hadst not taken me upon thy back the last hundred yards, by this time I had been food for herrings and mackrel—But 'tis pretty well as it is; for there is not much difference between starving and drowning—All in good time—We are poor enough, in conscience, and I don't know but two days more fasting might really make us hungry, too.

Lou. They are strangers, then, and seem in some necessity.

[Aside.]

Car. These are light wants to me; I find them none, when weighed with Angelina's loss; when I reflect on her distress, the hardships and the cries of helpless bondage; the insolent, the deaf desires of men in power; O, I could wish the fate, that saved us from the ocean's fury, in kinder pity of our love's distress, had buried us in one wave, embracing!

Lou. How tenderly he talks! This were, indeed, a lover!

[Aside.]

D. Lew. A most unhappy loss, indeed! But come, don't despair, boy; the ship, that took us, was a Portuguese, of Lisbon too, I believe; who knows but some way or other we may hear of her yet? Come, don't be melancholy.

Car. Have I not cause? Were not my force of faith superior to my hopeless reason, I could not bear the insults of my fortune; but I have raised myself by elevated faith, as far above despair, as reason lifts me from the brute.

D. Lew. Why, now, would not this make any one weep, to hear a young man talk so finely, when he is almost famished?

Lou. What were you saying, cousin?

Hon. I would have said, madam, but you would not hear me.

Lou. Prithee forgive me, I was in the oddest thought: let's walk a little. Did you observe those strangers that have walked by us?

Hon. Not much; but what of them?

Lou. Did you hear nothing of their talk?

Hon. I think I did; one of them, the younger, seemed concerned for a lost mistress.

Lou. Ay, but so near, so tenderly concerned, his looks as well as words, speaking an inward grief, that could not flow from every common passion. I must know more of him.

Ho. What do you mean?

Lou. Must speak to him.

Hon. By no means.

Lou. Why, you see they are strangers; I believe, in some necessity; and since they seem not born to beg relief, to offer it, unasked, would add some merit to the charity.

Hon. Consider.

Lou. I hate it—sir—sir—

D. Lew. Would you speak with me, madam?

Lou. If you please, with your friend—not to interrupt you, sir.

Car. Your pleasure, lady?

Lou. You seem a stranger, sir.

Car. A most unfortunate one.

Lou. If I am not deceived, in want: pardon my freedom—if I have erred, as freely tell me so; if not, as earnest of your better fortune, this trifle sues for your acceptance.

[Gives him money.]

D. Lew. Take it, boy.

Car. A bounty so unmerited, and from a hand unknown, fills me with surprise and wonder. But give me leave, in honesty, to warn you, lady, of a too heedless purchase; for, if you mean it as a bribe to any evil you would have me practise, be not offended, if I dare not take it.

Lou. You are too scrupulous; I have no hard designs upon your honesty—only this—be wise and cautious, if you should follow me; I am observed; farewell. Jaques!—Will you walk, cousin?—[Whispers JAQUES.] and bring me word immediately—I am going home.

[Exeunt LOUISA and HONORIA.]

D. Lew. Let's see; odsheart! follow her, man—why, 'tis all gold!

Car. Dispose it as you please.

D. Lew. I'll first have a better title to't—No, 'tis all thine, boy—I hold an hundred pistoles she's some great fortune in love with you—I say, follow her—since you have lost one wife before you had her, I'd have you make sure of another before you lose her.

Car. Fortune, indeed, has dispossessed her of my person; but her firm title to my heart, not all the subtle arts or laws of love can shake or violate.

D. Lew. Prithee follow her now; methinks I'd fain see thee in bed with somebody before I die.

Car. Be not so poor in thought; let me intreat you rather to employ them, sir, with mine, in search of Angelina's fortune.

D. Lew. Well, dear Charles, don't chide me now. I do love thee, and will follow thee.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter ANTONIO and CHARINO.

Ant. You heard what the sailor said, brother; such a ship has put in here, and such persons were taken in it. Therefore, my advice is, immediately to get a warrant from the government, to search and take them up, wherever we can find them.

Cha. Sir, you must not tell me—I won't be choused out of my daughter; I shall expect her, sir; if not, I'll take my course; I know the law. [Walks about.]

Ant. You really have a great deal of dark wit, brother; but if you know any course better than a warrant to search for her, in the name of wisdom, take it; if not, here's my oath, and yours, and—how now, where's Clody?—Oh, here he comes—

Enter CLODIO, searching his pockets.

How now! what's the matter, boy?

Clo. Ay, it's gone, split me!

Ant. What's the matter?

[Louder.]

Clo. The best joint in Christendom.

Ant. Clody!

Clo. Sir, I have lost my snuff-box.

Ant. Psha! a trifle; get thee another, man.

Clo. Sir, 'tis not to be had—besides, I dare not shew my face at Paris without it. What do you think her grace will say to me?

Cha. Well, upon second thoughts, I am content to search.

Clo. I have searched all my pockets fifty times over, to no purpose.

Cha. Pockets!

Clo. It's impossible to fellow it, but in Paris—I'll go to Paris, split me! [Aside.]

Cha. To Paris! Why, you don't suppose my daughter's there, sir?

Clo. I don't know but she may, sir: but I am sure they make the best joints in Europe there.

Cha. Joints!—my son-in-law, that should have been, seems strangely altered for the worse. But, come, let's to the governor.

Clo. I'll have it cried, faith; or, if that won't do, I have a lucky thought; I'll offer thirty pistoles to the finder, in the Paris Gazette, in pure compliment to the favours of Madame la Duchesse de—Mum. I'll do't, faith.

Ant. Come along, Clody.

[Exeunt ANTONIO and CHARINO.]

Clo. Sir, I must look a little; I'll follow you presently. My poor, pretty box! Ah, plague o' my sea-voyage!

Enter a Servant hastily, with a flambeau.

Serv. By your leave, sir, my master's coming; pray, sir, clear the way.

Clo. Ha! why, thou art pert, my love; prithee, who is thy master, child?

Serv. The valiant Don Duart, sir, nephew to the governor of Lisbon.

Clo. Well, child; and what, does he eat every man he meets?

Serv. No, sir; but he challenges every man, that takes the wall of him, and always sends me before to clear the way.

Clo. Ha! a pretty harmless humour that! Is this he, child?—You may look as terrible as you please; I must banter you, split me. [Aside.]

Enter DON DUART, stalking up to CLODIO.

D. Du. Do you know me, sir?

Clo. Hey, ho!

[Looks carelessly on him, and gapes.]

D. Du. Do you know me, sir?

Clo. You did not see my snuff-box, sir, did you?

D. Du. Sir, in Lisbon, no man asks me a question covered. [Strikes off CLODIO's hat.] Now, you know me.

Clo. Perfectly well, sir.—Hi, hi! I like you mightily—you are not a bully, sir?

D. Du. You are saucy, friend.

Clo. Ay, it's a way I have, after I'm affronted—Thou art really the most extraordinary—umph—that ever I met with. Now, sir, do you know me, split me?

D. Du. Know thee! take that, peasant!

[Strikes him, and both drag.]

Clo. I can't, upon my soul, sir; allons! now we shall come to a right understanding. [They fight.

Serv. Help! murder! help!

Clo. Allons! to our better acquaintance, sir—Ah, ha! [DON DUART falls.] he has it! Never pushed better in my life, never in my life, split me!

Serv. Oh, my master's killed! help, ho! murder! help!

Clo. Hey! why, faith, child, that's very true, as thou sayest; and so, the devil take the hindmost. [Erit CLODIO.

Enter Officers.

1 Off. How now! Who's that cries murder?

Serv. Oh, my master's murdered! some of you follow me; this way he took; let's after him—help! murder! help! [Erit.

2 Off. 'Tis Don Duart.

1 Off. So, pride has got a fall; he has paid for't now; you have met with your match, faith, sir. Come, let's carry the body to the good lady, his sister, Donna Elvira; you pursue the murderer. I'll warrant him some civil gentleman; ye need not make too much haste; for, if he does escape, 'tis no great matter—Come along.

[Exeunt with the body.

Enter CARLOS and DON LEWIS.

D. Lew. Come along, Charles; I'm sure 'tis she, by their description; and, if that brawny dog, the captain, has played her no foul play, she shan't want ransom, if all my estate can purchase it.

Car. Now, fortune guide us. [Exeunt.

Enter JACQUES and Bravoes, with a chair.

Jacques. That's he, the tallest—be sure you spare his person—only force him into this chair, and carry him as directed.

1 Brav. What must be done with the old fellow?

Jacques. We must have him, too, lest he should dog the other, and be troublesome. If he won't come quietly, bring him any how—Follow softly; we shall snap them as they turn the corner.

[Exeunt after them.

A noise of follow, &c.—Enter CLODIO hastily from the other side.

Clo. Ah, pox of their noses! the dogs have smelted me out! What shall I do? If they take me I shall be hanged, split me—Ha! a door open! faith, I'll in, at a venture. [Erit.

Re-enter Bravoes with CARLOS in a chair; some hauling in DON LEWIS.

D. Lew. Oh, my poor boy, Charles!—Charles!—help! murder!—

1 Brav. Hold your peace, fool, if you'd be well used.

D. Lew. Sir, I will not hold my peace; dogs! rogues! villains! help! murder!

1 Brav. Nay, then, by your leave, old gentleman.—So, bring him along.

D. Lew. Aw, aw, aw!

[They gag him, and carry him head and heels.
[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.—A chamber.

ELVIRA and her Servants, with lights.

Elv. Is not my brother come home yet?

Serv. I have not seen him, madam.

Elv. Go and seek him; go, all of ye, everywhere—I'll not rest 'till your return; take away your lights too; for my devotions are written in my heart, and I shall read them without a taper.

[Exeunt Servants.

Enter CLODIO, stealing in.

Clo. Ah, poor Clody! what will become of thee? Thy condition, I'm afraid, is but very indifferent—Followed behind, stopped before, and beset on both sides! Ah, pox o' my wit! I must be bantering, must I? But let me see—where am I?—An odd sort of a house, this—all the doors open, and nobody in't; no noise, no whisper, no dog stirring!

Elv. Who's that?

Clo. Ha! a woman's voice!

Elv. Who are you? Who waits there? Stephano! Julia!

Clo. Gadso! 'tis the lady of the house: she can't see my unfortunate face, however. Faith, I'll e'en make a grave speech, tell her my case, and beg her protection.

Elv. Speak! what are you?

Clo. Madam, a most unfortunate young gentleman.

Elv. I am sure you are a man of most ill manners, to press thus boldly to my private chamber. Whither would you? What want you?

Clo. Gracious madam, hear me; I am a stranger most unfortunate, and my distress has made me rudely press for your protection: if you refuse it, madam, I am undone for ever, by—I say, madam, I am utterly undone—'Twas coming, faith!

[Aside.

Elv. Alas! his fear confounds him. What is it pursues you, sir?

Clo. An outcry of officers; the law's at my heels, madam, though justice I'm not afraid of.

Elv. How could you offend the one and not the other?

Clo. Being provoked, madam, by the insolence of my enemy, in my own defence, I just now left him dead in the street. I am a very young man, madam, and I would not willingly be hanged in a strange country, methinks; which I certainly shall be, unless your tender charity protects me—Gad, I have a rare tongue! I have a rare tongue, faith!

[Aside.

Elv. Poor wretch, I pity him!

Clo. Madam, your house is now my only sanctuary, my altar; therefore, I beg you, upon my knees, madam, take pity of a poor bleeding victim.

Elv. Are you a Castilian?

Clo. No, madam, I was born in—in—in—what d'ye call'um—in—

Elv. Nay, I ask not with purpose to betray you; were you ten thousand times a Spaniard, the nation we Portuguese most hate, in such distress, I yet would give you my protection.

Clo. May I depend upon you, madam? Am I safe?

Elv. Safe as my power, my word, or vow can make you. Enter that door, which leads you to a closet; should the officers come, as you expect, they owe such reverence to my lodgings, they'll search no further than my leave invites them.

Clo. D'ye think, madam, you can persuade them?

Elv. Fear not; I'll warrant you; away!

Clo. The breath of gods, and eloquence of angels, go long with you. [Erit.]

Elv. Alas! who knows but that the charity I afford this stranger, perhaps my brother, elsewhere, may stand in need of? How he trembles! I hear his breath come short, hither. Be of comfort, sir; once more I give you my solemn promise for your safety.

Enter Servant and Officers with DON DUART'S body.

Serv. Here, bring in the body—Oh, madam! my master's killed!

Elv. What sayest thou?

Serv. Your brother, madam, my master, young Don Duart, is dead! he just now quarrelled with a gentleman, who unfortunately killed him in the street.

Elv. Ah, me!

1 Offi. We are informed, madam, that the murderer was seen to enter this house, which made us press into it, to apprehend him.

Elv. Oh! [Faints.]

Serv. Help, ho! my lady faints!

Offi. Give her air; she'll recover.

[CLUDIO peeps in.]

Clo. Hey!—Why, what the devil! Am I safer than I would be now?—Exactly—I have nicked the house to a hair—Just so I did at Paris, too, when I took a lodging at a bailiff's, that had three writs against me—This damned closet, too, has ne'er a chimney to creep out at—Ah, poor Clody! would thou wert fairly in a storm at sea again! for I'm plaguily afraid thou were not born to be drowned.

[Retires.]

Elv. Stand off; my sorrows will have way. Oh, my unhappy brother! such an end as this, thy haughty mind did long since prophesy; and to encrease my misery, thy wretched sister wilfully must make a breach of what she has vowed, or thou fall unrevenged.

Enter Governor and Servant.

Gov. Where's this unhappy sight?—Alas! he's gone past all recovery.—Reproof comes now too late.

Elv. It shall be so; I'll take the lighter evil of the two, and keep the solemn vow, to which just Heaven was witness: the wounds of perjury never can be cured; but justice may again o'ertake the murderer, when no rash vows protect him.

Gov. Take comfort, niece.

Elv. O forbear! Search for the murderer, and remove the body at your discretion, sir, to be interred, while I shut out the offensive day, and here, in solitude, indulge my sorrow; therefore, I beg my nearest friends, and you, my lord, for some few days, to spare your charitable visits.

Gov. I grieve for your misfortune, niece; but since you'll have it so, we take our leaves. Farewell—bring forth the body.

[Excunt Governor, Servants, &c.]

Clo. Hey! what, are they gone away without me, and by her contrivance, too!—Gads!—

Elv. Whoe'er thou art, to whom I've given means of life, to let thee see with what religion I have kept my vow, come fearless forth, while night's thy friend, and pass unknown!

Clo. If this is not love, the devil's in it.

[Aside.]

Elv. Fly with thy utmost speed, where I may never see thee more.

Clo. Ay, that's her modesty. [Aside.]

Elv. And let that charitable faith, thou hast found in me, persuade thee to atone thy crime by penitence.

Clo. Poor soul! I may find a better way to thank thee for it.

Elv. You are at the door now; farewell for ever! [Erit ELVIRA.]

Clo. Which is as much as to say, what would I give to see you again!—All in good time, child—

[Erit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

Enter LOUISA and JAQUES.

Lou. Were they both seized?

Jag. Both, madam, and will be here immediately. I ran before, to give your ladyship notice.

Lou. You know my orders; when they are entered, bar all the doors, and, on your lives, let every one be mute, as I directed—I must retire a while. [Exeunt.]

Enter Bravoes, who let CARLOS out of the chair, while others throw down DON LEWIS, gagged and bound.

Car. So, gentlemen, you find I've not resisted you—but now, pray, let me know my crime? Why have you brought me hither? Where am I? If in prison, look in my face; perhaps you have mistaken me for another—[JAQUES holds up his lanthorn, nods and exit with the rest.] You seem to know me, sir—All dumb and vanished! my fortune's humorous; she sports with me.

D. Lew. Aw, aw!

Car. Do you speak no other language?

D. Lew. Aw, aw aw! [Louder.]

Car. Nay, that's the same.

D. Lew. Oh! [Sighing.]

Car. Poor wretch! I am afraid he would speak, if he could.

Re-enter JAQUES, and Servants with lights, who release DON LEWIS.

Sure they think I walk in my sleep, and won't speak, for fear of waking me.

D. Lew. Sir, your most humble servant; and now my tongue's at liberty, pray, will you do me the favour to shew me the way home again? What a pox? are you all dumb!—[Exeunt mute.] Well, sir, and pray what are —Charles! ah! my dear boy! [Kisses him.]

Car. My uncle! Nay, then, my fortune has not quite forsaken me. How came you hither, sir?

D. Lew. Faith, like a corpse into a church, boy, with my heels foremost; but, prithee, how didst thou come?

Car. You saw the men, that seized us; they forced me into a chair, and brought me.

D. Lew. Well, but a pox plague them, what is all this for? What would they have?

Car. That we must wait their pleasure to be informed of; they have indeed alarmed my reason, not my conscience; that's still at rest, fearless of any danger.

D. Lew. The sons of whores won't speak neither. Hey day! what's to be done, now?

VOL. II.

Enter JAQUES, and Servant, with a banquet, wine, and lights.

Car. More riddles yet; I dream sure!

[JAQUES compliments DON LEWIS to take his chair.]

D. Lew. For me? Sir, your most humble servant: [Sits.] Charles, sit down, boy. Ha, ha, ha! a parcel of silly dumb dogs! Is this all the business? Puppies! did they think I would not come to supper, without being brought neck and heels to it?

Car. Amazement all! What can it end in?

D. Lew. Never trouble thy head, prithee; pox of questions: fall to, man—Delicate food truly—Here—Dumb! prithee give's a glass of wine, to wet the way a little. Come, Charles, here's, here's—honest Dumb's health to thee: [Drinks.] Dumb's a very honest fellow, faith.

[Claps JAQUES on the head.]

Car. What harmony's this? [A flourish.]

D. Lew. Rare music, indeed; let's eat, and hear it. [Music here.] Mighty fine, truly—I have not made a heartier meal a great while.—[Here JAQUES offers a night-cap and gown to DON LEWIS.] Well, and what's to do now, lad? For me, boy? Odso, we lie here, do we? mighty well that again, faith; (for I was just thinking to go home, but that I had ne'er a lodging:) nay, I always said honest Dumb knew how to make his friends welcome—Well, but it's time enough yet; sha'nt we crack a bottle first? Charles is melancholy. [JAQUES shakes his head.] What, that's as much as to say, if I won't go, I shall be carried—Sir, your humble servant. [Puts on the gown.] Well, Charles, good-night, since they won't let me have a mind to stay any longer.—I'd give a pistole, though, to know what this will come to! Dumb, come along.

[Exeunt DON LEWIS and JAQUES.]

Car. I am buried in amazement—[Music is heard.] Ha, more music? I could almost say, 'twere welcome now.

[Music again. Don LEWIS appears above.]

D. Lew. So, at last I have groped out a window, that will let me into the secret; now, if any foul play should happen, I am pretty near the street, too, and can bawl out murder to the watch—But, mum, the door opens.

Enter LOUISA.

Hey! ah! what dull rogues were we not to suspect this before!—Dumb's a sly dog: 'tis she, faith—tum, dum, dum—here will be fine work presently, toll, dum, di, dum—Now, I shall see what mettle the boy's made of; tum, dum, dum.

Lou. You seem amazed, sir.

Car. Your pardon, lady, if I confess it raises much my wonder, why a stranger, friendless and unknown, should meet, unmerited, such floods of courtesy: for, if I mistake not, once this day before, I've tasted of your bounty.

2 H

Lou. I have forgot that; but I confess I saw you, sir.

Car. Why, then, was I forced hither? If you relieved me only from a soft compassion of my fortune, you could not think but such humanity might, on the slightest hint, have drawn me to be grateful.

Lou. I own I could not trust you to my fortune; I knew not but some other might have seen you—beside, methought you spoke less kind to me before.

Car. If my poor thanks were offered in too plain a dress, (as I confess, I am little practised in the rules of graced behaviour) rather think me ignorant, than rude, and pity what you cannot pardon.

Lou. Fie, you are too modest—how could you charge yourself with such a thought? I scarce can think 'tis in your nature to be rude—at least to our sex.

Car. 'Twere more unpardonable there.

Lou. Nay, now you are too strict on the other side; for there may happen times, when, what the world calls rudeness, a woman might be brought to pardon; seasons, when even modesty were ignorance——Pray be seated, sir—nay, I'll have it so. Suppose a woman were reduced to offer love; suppose yourself the man so loved; where could you find, at such a time, excuses for your modesty?

Car. If I could love again, my eyes would tell her; if not, I should not easily believe, at least, in manners, would not seem to understand her.

Lou. Oh, they have such subtle ways to steal into a lover's heart! nay, if she's resolute, not all your strength of modesty can guard you: she'd press you still with plainer, stronger proofs; her life, her fortune should be yours: for, where a woman loves, such gifts as these are trifles. Thus, like the lazy minutes, would she steal them on, which once but past, are quite forgotten.

[Gives him jewels.]

Car. Is't possible! can there be such a woman?

Lou. Fie! I could chide you now; you would not, sure, be thought so slow of apprehension.

Car. I would not willingly be thought so vain, or so uncharitable, to suppose there could be such a one.

Lou. Nay, now, you force me to forsake my sex, and tell you plain—I cannot speak it—yet you must know—I am this creature so reduced for you.

Car. Monstrous!

Lou. What is't you start at?

Car. Not for your beauty; though I confess you fair to a perfection, complete in all, that may engage the eye: but, when that beauty fades (as time leaves none unvisited) what charm shall then secure my love? Your riches? No—an honest mind's above the bribes of fortune:—for, though distressed, a stranger, and in want, I thus return them thankless. Be modest, and be virtuous, I'll admire you; all good men will adore you; and, when your beauty and your fortune are no more, will still deliver down your name revered to ages.

Lou. If I appear too free a lover, and talk beyond the usual courage of my sex, forgive me; I'll be again the fearful, softening wretch, that you would have me: my wishes shall be dumb, unless my eyes may speak them: for pity speak, for I confess your hard reproofs have struck upon my heart! Oh! say you will be mine, and make your own conditions. If you suspect my temper, bind me by the most sacred tie, and let my love, my person, and my fortune, lawfully be yours.

Car. Take heed! Consider yet, if even this humility be not the offspring of your first unruly passion: but since, at least, it carries something a better claim to my concern, I'll be at once sincere, and tell you, 'tis impossible that we should ever meet in love.

Lou. Impossible! Oh, why?

Car. Because my love, my vows, and faith, are given to another: therefore, since you find I dare be honest, be early wise, and now release me to my fortune.

Lou. I cannot part with you.

Car. You must! I cannot with my reason—Pray, let me pass! Why do you thus hang upon my arm, and strain your eyes, as if they had power to hold me?

Lou. Ungrateful! Will you go? Take heed! for you have proved I am not mistress of my temper.

Car. I see it, and am sorry, but needed not this threat to drive me; for still I dare be just, and force myself away.

[Exit CARLOS.]

Lou. Oh, torture! left! refused! despised! Have I thrown off my pride for this? Oh, insupportable! If I am not revenged, may all the—well.

[Walks disordered.]

D. Lew. What a pox! are all these fine things come to nothing, then?—Poor soul! she's in great heat, truly—Ah, silly rogue!—now, could I find in my heart to put her into good humour again—I have a great mind, faith—Odd, she's a hummer!—A strange mind, I ha'nt had such a mind a great while—Hey! ay; I'll do't faith—if she does but stay now; ah, if she does but stay! [As he is getting from the balcony, LOUISA is speaking to JACQUES.]

Lou. Who waits there?

Enter JACQUES.

Where's the stranger?

Jaq. Madam, I met him just now walking hastily about the gallery.

Lou. Are all the doors fast?

Jaq. All barred, madam.

Lou. Put out all your lights, too, and on your lives let no one ask or answer him any question: but be you still near to observe him.

[Exit JAQUES.

Ah!

[DON LEWIS drops down.

D. Lew. Odso, my back!

Lou. Bless me, who's this? what are you?

D. Lew. Not above fifty, madam.

Lou. Whence come you? What is your business?

D. Lew. Finishing.

Lou. Who shewed, who brought you hither?

D. Lew. Dumb, honest Dumb.

Lou. Will you be gone, sir? I have no time to fool away.

D. Lew. Yes, but you have; what! don't I know?

Lou. Pray, sir, who? What is't you take me for?

D. Lew. A delicate piece of work, truly, but not finished; you understand me?

Lou. You are mad, sir!

D. Lew. I say, don't you be so modest; for there are times, do you see, when even modesty is ignorance, (pray be seated, madam—nay, I'll have it so) ah!

[Sits down, and mimics her behaviour to CARLOS.

Lou. Confusion! have I exposed myself to this wretch, too!—had witnesses to my folly! nay, I deserve it. [Stands mute.

D. Lew. So, so, I shall bring her to terms presently—you have a world of pretty jewels here, madam—ay, these now—these are a couple of fine large stones, truly; but, where a woman loves, such gifts as these are trifles. [Mimics again.

Lou. Insupportable! within there!

Enter Servants and Bravoes.

D. Lew. Hey!

[Rising.

Ser. Did your ladyship call, madam?

D. Lew. I don't like her looks, faith. [Aside.

Lou. Here, take this fool, let him be gagged, tied neck and heels, and locked into a garret; away with him!

D. Lew. Dumb! Dumb! help, Dumb! Dumb! stand by me, Dumb! a pox of my finishing, awe! awe!

[They gag him, and carry him off.

Lou. The insolence of this fool was more provoking than the other's scorn; but I shall yet find ways to measure my revenge. [Exit LOUISA.

Re-enter CARLOS in the dark.

Car. What can this evil woman mean me? The doors all barred; the lights put out; the servants mute, and she with fury in her eyes now shot regardless by me. I would the worst would shew itself! Ha! yonder's a light; I'll follow it, and provoke my fortune. [Exit.

SCENE II.—Changes to another room.

Enter ANGELINA with a light.

Ang. I cannot like this house; for now, as going to my rest, my ears were alarmed with the cries of one, that called for help. I've seen strange faces, too, that carry guilt and terror in their looks; and yet the officer, that placed me here, appeared of honest thought—what can this mean? no matter what, since nothing but the loss of him I love, can worse befall me! hark, what noise! is the door fast? ah!

[Going to shut it.

Re-enter CARLOS and JAQUES, listening.

Car. Ha, another lady! and alone!

Ang. Ha, that voice! [Amazed.

Car. Save me, ye powers! and give me strength to bear this insupportable surprise of rushing joy!

Ang. My Carlos—oh!

Car. 'Tis she! my long lost love, my living Angelina!

[Embraces her.

Jaq. Say you so, sir? this shall to my lady.

[Exit JAQUES.

Ang. Oh, let me hold you ever thus, lest fate again should part us.

Car. 'Twas death, indeed, to part; but from so hard a separation, thus again to meet, is life restored.

Ang. Oh! I were happy, blessed above my sex, could but my plain simplicity of love deserve your kind endearments.

Car. Is't possible, thou miracle of goodness, that thou canst thus forget the misery, the want, the ruin my unhappy love has brought thee to? Trust me, that stormy thought has clouded even the very joy I had to see thee.

Enter JAQUES and LOUISA at a distance.

Jaq. They are there; from hence, your ladyship may hear them.

Lou. Leave me.

[Exit JAQUES, and LOUISA listens.

Ang. I cannot bear to see you thus: for my sake, don't despond; for, while you seem in hope, I shall easily be cheerful.

Car. Oh, thou engaging softness! thy courage has revived me; no, we'll not despair; the guardian power, that hitherto has saved us, may now protect, and fix us happy.

Lou. Ha! so near acquainted—

[Behind.

Car. And yet our safety bids us part this moment. How came you hither?

Ang. The officer, that made me captive, proved a worthy man, and placed me here, as a companion to the lady of this dwelling.

Car. Ha, to what end?

Ang. He said, to be the advocate of his successful love; for he confessed he wooed her honourably.

Car. Is't possible? Is there a wretch, so cursed among mankind, to be her honourable lover?

Lou. So! [In anger.]

Car. Take heed, my love; avoid her as a disease to modesty.

Lou. Very well!

Car. Oh, I have a shameful tale to tell thee of her intemperance, as would subject her even to thy loathing.

Lou. Insolent!—well!

Ang. You amaze me! pray, what is it?

Car. This is no time to tell; I had forgot my danger. Let it suffice, the doors are barred against me; now, this moment I am a prisoner to her fury; if thou canst help me to any means of safety, or escape, ask me no questions, but be quick, and tell me.

Ang. Now, you frighten me; but here, through my apartment, leads a passage to the garden; at the lower end, you'll find a mount; if you dare drop from thence, I'll shew you: but can't you say, when I may hope again to see you?

Car. About an hour hence, walking in the garden, ready for your escape; for if I live, I'll come provided with the means to make it sure—Now I dare thank thee, fortune.

Ang. You will not fail?

Car. If I survive, depend on me. Till when, may Heaven support thy innocence!

Ang. Follow me— [Exeunt hastily.]

Lou. Are you so nimble, sir? Who waits there?

Enter JAQUES.

Run, take help, and stop the stranger; he is now making his escape through the garden; fly!— [Exit JAQUES.]—Love, and revenge, like vipers, gnaw upon my quiet, and I must change their food, or leave my being. No, if I forego a second time that dear support, my pride, may I become as miserable as that wretch, that destined fool, he doats on! Ha! she is returned! yonder she passes; with what assured contentment in her looks!—how pleased the thing is!—strangely impudent—sure! the ugly creature thinks I won't strangle her.

Enter JAQUES.

Now, have you brought him?

Jaq. Madam, we made what haste we could, but the gentleman reached the mount before us, and escaped over the garden wall.

Lou. Escaped, villain! durst thou tell me so?

Jaq. If your ladyship had called me a little sooner, we had taken him. Who the devil is this stranger?

[Aside.]

Lou. Fool, that I am! I betray myself to my own servants. Well, 'tis no matter, bid the bravoes stay; I have directions for them. Go.— [Exit JAQUES.]—He has not left me hopeless, yet; an hour hence, he promised to be here again; and, if he keeps his word, (as I've an odious cause to fear he will) he yet, at least in my revenge, shall prove me woman. [Exit LOUISA.]

SCENE III.—The Street.

Enter D. DUART disguised, with a servant.

D. Du. Where did you find him!

Ser. Hard by, sir, at an house of civil recreation; he's now coming forth; that's he.

Enter CLODIO.

D. Du. I scarce remember him. I would not willingly mistake—I'll observe him.

Clo. So! now if I can but pick up an honest fellow, to crack one healing bottle, I think I shall finish the day as smartly as the grand signior—Hold, let me see, what has my hasty refreshment cost me here; umb—umb—umb—[Counts his money.]—seven pistoles, by Jupiter; why, what a plaguy income this jade must have in a week, if she's thus paid by the hour!

D. Du. 'Tis the same! leave me—[Exit Servant.]—Your servant, sir.

Clo. Sir—your humble servant.

D. Du. Pardon a stranger's freedom, sir; but when you know my business—

Clo. Sir, if you'll take a bottle, I shall be proud of your acquaintance; and if I don't do your business before we part, I'll knock under the table.

D. Du. Sir, I shall be glad to drink with you; but at present am incapable of sitting to it.

Clo. Why, then, sir, you shall only drink as long as you can stand; we'll have a bottle here, sir. Hey, Madonna! [Calls at the door.]

D. Du. A very frank honoured gentleman; I'll know him further—I presume, sir, you are not of Portugal?

Clo. No, sir—I am a kind of a—what d'ye call 'um—a sort of a here—and—thereian; I am a stranger no where.

D. Du. Have you travelled far, sir?

Clo. My tour of Europe, or so, sir—

Enter Servant with wine.

Clo. So, so! here's the wine! come; sir, to our better acquaintance—faith, I like you mightily—Allons!—[Drinks.]—Morbieu! ce n'est pas mauvais! Allons, encore, hey! Vive l'amour! Quand Iris, &c. [Sings.]

D. Du. I find, sir, you have taken a taste of all the countries you have travelled through: but I presume your chief amusement has lain among the ladies. You fared well in France, I hope?

Clo. Yes, faith, as far as my pocket would go: the devil a stroke without it: no money, no mademoiselle; no ducat, no duchess; no pistole, no princess—By the way, let me tell you, sir, your Lisbonites are held up at a pretty smart rate, too—I was forced to come down to the tune of seven pistoles here—a man may keep a pad of his own, cheaper than he can ride post, split me!

D. Du. I find, sir, you know England, then.

Clo. Aye, sir, and every woman there that's worth knowing.

D. Du. But I wonder, sir, that in a country so famed for handsome women, the men are so generally blamed for their scandalous usage of them.

Clo. Oh, damned scandalous, sir—they use their mistresses as bad as their wives, faith. I tell you what, sir; I knew a citizen's daughter there, that run away with a lord, who, in the first six months of her preferment, never stirred out, but she made the ladies cry at her equipage; and, about eight months after, I think, one morning reeling pretty early into a certain house in the Savoy, I found the self-same, cast-off, solitary lady, in a room with bare walls, dressing her dear, pretty head there, in the corner bit of a looking-glass, prudently supported by a quartern brandy-pot, upon the head of an oyster-barrel.

D. Du. I find few mistresses make their fortunes there; but pray, sir, among all your adventures, has no particular lady's merit encouraged you to advance your own marriage?

Clo. Sir, I have been so near marriage, that my wedding-day has been come; but it was never over yet, split me!

D. Du. How so, sir?

Clo. Why, the priest, the bride, and the dinner, were all ready dressed, faith; but, before I could fall to, my elder brother, sir, comes me in, with a damned long stride, and a sharp stomach—says a short grace, and—whipped her up like an oyster.

D. Du. You had ill fortune, sir.

Clo. Sir, fortune is not much in my debt; for you must know, sir, though I lost my wife, I have escaped hanging since, here in Lisbon.

D. Du. That I know you have; be not amazed, sir.

Clo. Hey! what the devil? have I been all this while treating an officer, that has a warrant against me—Pray, sir, if it be no offence—may I beg the favour to know who you are?

D. Du. Let it suffice, I own myself your friend—I am your debtor, sir; you fought a gentleman they call Don Duart—I knew him well; he was a proud insulting fellow, and my mortal foe: but you killed him, and I thank you; nay, I saw you do it fairly, too; and for the action,

I desire you will command my sword or fortune.

Clo. Pray, sir—is there no joke in all this?

D. Du. There, sir, the little all I'm master of, may serve, at present, to convince you of my sincerity; I ask for no return, but to be informed how I may do you farther service.

[Gives him a purse.]

Clo. Sir, your health—I'll give you information presently.—[Drinks.]—Pray, sir, do you know the gentleman's sister, that I fought with? That is, do you know what reputation, what fortune she has?

D. Du. I know her fortune to be worth above twelve thousand pistoles; her reputation yet unsullied; but pray, sir, why may you ask this?

Clo. Now, I'll tell you, sir—twelve thousand pistoles, you say?

D. Du. I speak the least, sir.

Clo. Why, this very lady, after I had killed her brother, gave me the protection of her house; hid me in her closet, while the officers that brought in the dead body came to search for me; and, as soon as their backs were turned, poor soul! hurried me out at a private door, with tears in her eyes, faith! Now, sir, what think you? Is not this hint broad enough for a man to make love upon?

D. Du. Confusion!

[Aside.]

Clo. Look you, sir, now, if you dare, give me a proof of your friendship; will you do me the favour to carry a letter to her?

D. Du. Let me consider, sir—death and fire! is all her height of sorrow but dissembled, then? A prostitute, even to the man supposed my murderer! If it be true, the consequence is soon resolved—but this requires my farther search.—[Aside.]—May I depend on this for truth, sir?

Clo. Why, sir, you don't suppose I'd banter a lady of her quality?

D. Du. Damnation!—[Aside.]—Well, sir, I'll take your letter; but first let me be well acquainted with my errand.

Clo. Sir, I'll write this moment; if you please, we'll step into the house here, and finish the business over another bottle.

D. Du. With all my heart.

Clo. Allons! Entrez.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

ELVIRA is discovered alone in mourning, a lamp by her. DON DUART enters behind, disguised.

D. Du. Thus far I am passed, unknown to any of the servants—now for the proof of what I fear—Ha! yonder she is—This close retirement, those sable colours, the solemn silence that attends her, no friends admitted, nor even the day to visit her—These seem to speak a real sorrow; if not, the counterfeit is deep indeed—I'll fathom it—madam—

Elv. Who's there? another murderer! where are my servants? will nothing but my sorrows wait upon me?

D. Du. Your pardon, lady; I have no evil meaning; this letter will inform you of my business, and excuse this rude intrusion.

Elv. For me! whence comes it, sir?

D. Du. The contents, madam, will explain to you—She seems amazed! looks almost through the letter—I should suspect the stranger had belied her, but that he gave me such convincing circumstances—Ha, she pauses! 'sdeath! a smile too—I fear her now!

Elv. My prayers are heard; justice at length has overtaken the murderer: his vowed protection having been strictly paid, I now, unperjured, may revenge my brother's blood. It lies on me, if I neglect this fair occasion: but 'twere not safe to shew my thought; therefore, to be just, I must dissemble. [Aside.] I ask your pardon for my rudeness, sir; upon your friend's account, you might, indeed, have claimed a better welcome.

D. Du. So; then she's damned, I find. But I'll have more, and bring them face to face. [Aside.] My friend, madam, thought his visits would be unseasonable, before the sad solemnity of your brother's funeral.

Elv. A needless fear! My brother, sir! Alas, I owe your friend my thanks, for having eased our family of so scandalous a burthen! A riotous, unmannered fellow; I blush to speak of him.

D. Du. Oh, patience! patience! [Aside.]

Elv. Pray, let him know, his absence was the real cause of this mistaken mourning: 'tis true, indeed, I gave it out 'tis for my brother's death; but womens' hearts and tongues, you know, must not always hold alliance; you'd think us fond and forward, should not we now and then dissemble.

D. Du. How shall I forbear her? [Aside.]

Elv. I grow impatient till he's wholly mine—to-morrow! 'tis an age! I'll make him mine to-night—I'll write to him this minute—Can you have patience, sir, till I prepare a letter for you?

D. Du. You may command me, madam.

Elv. I'll dispatch immediately—will you walk this way, sir?

D. Du. Madam, I wait on you—Revenge and daggers!
[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—LOUISA'S house.

Enter LOUISA and JACQUES.

Lou. Is the lady seized?

Jaq. Yes, madam, and half dead with the fright.

Lou. Let them be ready to produce her, as I directed. When the stranger's taken, bring me immediate notice: 'tis near his time, away.—[Erit JACQUES.] Had he not loved another, methinks I could have borne this usage, sat me down alone content, and found a secret pleasure in complaining; but to be slighted for a girl, a sickly, poor, unthinking wretch, incapable of love: that, that stabs home! 'Tis poison to my thoughts, and swells them to revenge! My rival! no, she shall never triumph. Hark! what noise! they have him sure! How now!

Enter JACQUES.

Jaq. Madam, the gentleman is taken.

Lou. Bring him in—Revenge, I thank thee now!

Enter Bravoes with CARLOS disarmed.

So, sir, you are returned, it seems; you can love then! You have an heart, I find, though not for me! Perhaps you came to seek a worthier mistress here; 'would be uncharitable to disappoint your love—I'll help your search: if she be here, be sure she's safe—Open that door there.

Enter more Bravoes with ANGELINA, an handkerchief on her neck, which they hold ready to strangle her.

Now, sir, is this the lady?

Car. My Angelina! Oh!

Lou. Now, let me see you smile, and rudely throw me from your arms; now scorn my love, my passion, and my fortune; now, let your squeamish virtue fly me as a disease to modesty; and tell her, now, your shameful tale of my intemperance!

Car. Oh, cruelty of fate! that could betray such innocence.

Lou. What, not a word to soften yet thy obstinate aversion! thou wretched fool, thus to provoke thy ruin—End her! [to the Bravoes.]

Car. Oh, hold! for pity hold, and hear me!

Lou. I've learned from you to use my pity—On one condition yet she lives an hour; but, if refused—

Car. Name not a refusal; be it danger, death, or tortures; any thing that life can do to save her.

Lou. Presuming fool! were I inclined to save her life, (which, by my hopes of peace, I do not mean) canst thou believe this insolent concern for her to my face would not provoke my vengeance?

Car. Yet hold! forgive my rashness, I was to blame, indeed; but passion has transported both of us.

Lou. How he disarms my anger! But must my rival triumph, then?

Ang. Charge me not with such abhorred ingratitude: be witness, Heaven, I'll for ever serve you, court you, and confess you my preserver.

Car. For pity, yet resolve, and force your temper to a moment's pause. See, at your feet, my humbled scorn imploring, crushed, and prostrate, like a vile slave, that falls below your last contempt, and, trembling, begs for mercy.

Lou. He buries my revenge in blushes. Now, live long and happily; forgive my follies past, and you have overpaid me. [Joins their hands.]

Car. My Angelina! do I then live to hold thee thus? Oh, I have a thousand things to say, to ask, to weep, and hear of thee—But, first, let's kneel and pay our thanks to Heaven, and this our kind preserver.

Lou. Nay, now, you give me a confusion.—[Raises them.] But if you dare trust me with the story of your love's distress, as far as my fortune can, command it freely to supply your present wants, or any future means proposed to give you lasting happiness.

Car. Eternal rounds of never-ending peace reward your wondrous bounty!—But I have been too busy in my joy; I almost had forgot my friendly uncle, the ancient gentleman that first came hither with me; how have you disposed of him?

Lou. I think he's here, and safe—who waits there? [Enter JAQUES.] Release the gentleman above, and tell him, that his friends desire him. [Exit JAQUES.] You'll pardon, sir, the treatment I have shewn him; he made a little too merry with my folly, which, I confess, at that time, something too far incensed me.

Car. He's old and cheerful, apt to be free; but he'll be sorry when his humour gives offence.

Enter DON LEWIS, JAQUES bowing to him.

D. Lew. Prithee, honest Dumb, don't be so ceremonious. A pox on thee! I tell thee its very well as it is, (only my jaws ache a little :) but as long as we're all friends, its no great matter—My dear Charles, I must buss thee, faith!—Madam, your humble servant—I beg your pardon, d'ye see—you understand me?

[Exit JAQUES.]

Lou. I hope we are all friends, sir.

D. Lew. I hope we are, madam—I am an honest old fellow, faith: though, now and then, I'm a little odd, too.

Car. Here's a stranger, uncle.

D. Lew. What, my little blossom! my gilliflower! my rose! my pink! my tulip! faith, I must smell thee. [Salutes ANGELINA.] Odd, she's a delicate nosegay! I must have her touzed a little—Charles, you must gather to-night: I can stay no longer—Well, faith, I am heartily joyed to see thee, child.

Ang. I thank you, sir, and wish I may deserve your love: our fortune, once again, is kind; but how it comes about—

D. Lew. Does not signify three-pence; when fortune pays me a visit, I seldom trouble myself to know which way she came—I tell you, I am glad to see you.

Enter JAQUES.

Jaq. Madam, here's the lord governor come to wait upon your ladyship.

Lou. At this late hour! What can his business be? Desire his lordship to walk in.

Enter GOVERNOR.

Gov. Pardon, madam, this unseasonable visit.

Lou. Your lordship does me honour.

Gov. At least, I hope, my business will excuse it. Some strangers, here below, upon their offered oaths, demanded my authority to search your house for a lost young lady, to whom the one of them affirms himself the father: but the respect I owe your ladyship, made me refuse their search, till I had spoken with you.

Ang. It must be they—Now, madam, your protection, or we yet are lost.

Lou. Be not concerned! would you avoid them?

Car. No, we must be found; let them have entrance; we have an honest cause, and would provoke its trial.

Lou. Conduct the gentlemen without. [Exit JAQUES.] My lord, I'll answer for their honesty; and, as they are strangers, where the law's severe, must beg you'd favour and assist them.

Gov. You may command me, madam; though there's no great fear: for having heard the most that they could urge against them, I found, in their complaints, more spleen and humour than any just appearance of a real injury.

Enter CHARINO, ANTONIO, and CLODIO.

Cha. I'll have justice.

Ant. Don't be too hot, brother.

Cha. Sir, I demand justice.

Car. My father! Sir, your pardon and your blessing.

Ant. Why truly, Charles, I begin to be a little reconciled to the matter; I wish you well, though I can't join you together; for my friend and brother here is very obstinate, and will admit of no satisfaction: but, however, Heaven will bless you, in spite of his teeth.

Cha. This is all contrivance, roguery! I am abused! I say, deliver my daughter—she is an heiress, sir; and to detain her is a rape in law, sir, and I'll have you all hanged; therefore, no more delays, sir; for I tell you beforehand, I am a wise man, and 'tis impossible to trick me.

Ant. I say, you are too positive, brother; and when you learn more wisdom, you'll have some.

Cha. I say, brother, this is mere malice, when you know, in your own conscience, I have ten times your understanding; for you see I am quite of another opinion: and so, once more, my lord, I demand justice against that ravisher.

Gov. Does your daughter, sir, complain of any violence?

Cha. Your lordship knows young girls never complain, when the violence is over; he has taught her better, I suppose.

Ang. [To CHARINO, kneeling.] Sir, you are my father, bred me, cherished me, gave me my affections, taught me to keep them hitherto within the bounds of honour and of virtue; let me conjure you, by the chaste love my mother bore you, when she preferred, to her mistaken parents' choice, her being yours without a dower, not to bestow my person, where those affections ne'er can follow—I cannot love that gentleman more than a sister ought; but here my heart's subdued, even to the last compliance with my fortune: he, sir, has nobly wooed, and won me; and I am only his, or miserable.

Cha. Get up again.

Gov. Come, sir, be persuaded; your daughter has made an honourable and happy choice; this severity will but expose yourself and her.

Cha. My lord, I don't want advice: I'll consider with myself, and resolve upon my own opinion.

Enter JAQUES.

Jaq. My lord, here's a stranger without, enquires for your lordship, and for a gentleman that calls himself Clodio.

Clo. Hey! Ah, mon cher ami!

Enter DON DUART, disguised.

Well, what news, my dear? Has she answered my letter!

D. Du. There, sir—This to your lordship.

[Gives him a letter, and whispers.]

Gov. Married to night! and to this gentleman, sayest thou? I'm amazed!

D. Du. Here is her choise, my lord.

Clo. [Reading the latter.]—Um—um—charms—irresistible—excuse—so soon—passion—blushes—consent—provision—children—settlement—marriage—If this is not plain, the devil's in't—Hold, here's more, faith— [Reads to himself.]

Gov. 'Tis very sudden—but give my service, I'll wait upon her.

Clo. Ha, ha, ha! poor soul! I'll be with her presently; and, faith, since I have made my own fortune, I'll e'en patch up my brother's, too. Hark you, my dear dad, that should ha' been—

This business is all at an end—for, look you, I find your daughter's engaged; and, to tell you the truth, so am I, faith. If my brother has a mind to marry her; let him; for I shall not, split me—And now, gentlemen and ladies, if you will do me the honour to grace mine and the lady Elvira's wedding, such homely entertainment, as my poor house affords, you shall be all heartily welcome to.

D. Lew. Thy house! ha, ha! Well said, puppy!

Clo. Ha! old Testy!

Cha. What dost thou mean, man?

[To CLODIO.]

Gov. 'Tis even so, I can assure you, sir; I have, myself, an invitation from the lady's own hand, that confirms it: I know her fortune well, and am surprised at it.

Ang. Blessed news! This seems a forward step to reconcile us all.

Cha. If this be true, my lord, I have been thinking to no purpose; my design is all broke to pieces.

Ant. Come, brother, we'll mend it as well as we can; and since that young rogue has rudely turned tail upon your daughter, I'll fill up the blank with Charles's name, and let the rest of the settlement stand as it was.

Cha. Hold! I'll first see this wedding, and then give you my final resolution.

Clo. Come, ladies, if you please, my friend will shew you.

Lou. Sir, we wait upon you.

Cha. This wedding's an odd thing.

D. Lew. Ha, ha! if it should be a lie, now.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—ELVIRA'S apartment.—ELVIRA alone, with CLODIO'S letter in her hand.

Elv. At how severe a price do women purchase an unspotted fame, when even the justest title cannot assure possession? When we reflect upon the insolent and daily wrongs, which men and scandal throw upon our actions, 'twere enough to make an honest mind despair: If we are fair and chaste, we are proud; if free, we are wanton; cold, we are cunning; and if kind, forsaken—nothing we do or think on, be the motive ever so just or generous, but still the malice, or the guilt of men, interprets to our shame. Why should this stranger, else, this wretched stranger, whose forfeit life I rashly saved, presume, from that mistaken charity, to tempt me with his love?

Enter a Servant.

Hark! what music's that?

[Flourish.]

Serv. Madam, the gentlemen are come.

Elv. 'Tis well; are the officers ready?

Serv. Yes, madam, and know your ladyship's orders.

Elv. Conduct the company. Now, justice shall uncloud my fame, and see my brother's death revenged.

Enter hautboys playing, CLUDIO singing, D. DUART, GOVERNOR, D. MANUEL, LOUISA, CARLOS, ANGELINA, ANTONIO, CHARINO, and D. LEWIS.

Clo. Well, madam, you see I'm punctual—you've nicked your man, faith; I'm always critical—to a minute. You'll never stay for me. Ladies and gentlemen, I desire you'll do me the honour of being better acquainted here—my lord—

Gov. Give you joy, madam.

Clo. Nay, madam, I have brought you some near relations of my own, too—I his Don Antonio, who will shortly have the honour to call you daughter.

Ant. The young rogue has made a pretty choice, faith!

Clo. This Don Charino, who was very near having the honour of calling me son. This my elder brother—and this my noble uncle, Don Cholerick Snapshorto de Testy.

D. Lew. Puppy!

Clo. Peevish!

D. Lew. Madam, I wish you joy with all my heart; but, truly, I can't much advise you to marry this gentleman; because, in a day or two, you'll really find him extremely shocking: those, that know him, generally give him the title of Don Dismallo Thickscullo de Halfwitto.

Clo. Well said, nuncle—ha, ha!

D. Du. Are you provided of a priest, sir?

Clo. Ay, ay, pox on him! would he were come, though!

D. Du. So would I; I want the cue to act this justice, on my honour; yet I cannot read the folly in her looks. [Aside.]

Gov. You have surprised us, madam, by this sudden marriage.

Eto. I may yet surprise you more, my lord.

D. Du. Sir, don't you think your bride looks melancholy?

Clo. Ay, poor fool, she's modest—but I have a cure for that—Well, my princess, why that demure look, now?

Eto. I was thinking, sir—

Clo. I know what you think of—you don't think at all—you don't know what to think—you neither see, hear, feel, smell, nor taste—you han't the right use of one of your senses—in short, you have it. Now, my princess, have not I nicked it?

Eto. I am sorry, sir, you know so little of yourself, or me.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Madam, the priest is come.

Eto. Let him wait, we've no occasion yet—Within, there—seize him.

[Several Officers rush in, who seize CLUDIO, and bind him.]

VOL. II.

D. Du. Ha!

Gov. What can this mean?

Clo. Gads me! what, is my deary in her frolics already?

Eto. And now, my lord, your justice on that murderer.

Gov. How, madam!

Clo. That bitch, my fortune!

D. Lew. Madam, upon my knees, I beg you don't carry the jest too far; but if there be any real hopes of his having a halter, let's know it in three words, that I may be sure at once for ever, that no earthly thing but a reprieve can save him.

[Apart to ELVIRA.]

Ant. Pray, madam, who accuses him?

Eto. His own confession, sir.

Cha. Of murder, say you, madam?

Eto. The murder of my brother.

Gov. Where was that confession made?

Eto. After the fact was done, my lord, this man, pursued by justice, took shelter here, and, trembling, begged of me for my protection; he seemed, indeed, a stranger, and his complaints so pitiful, that I, little suspicious of my brother's death, promised, by a rash and solemn vow, I would conceal him: which vow, Heaven can witness with what distraction in my thoughts I strictly kept, and paid; but he, alas! mistaking this my hospitable charity, for the effects of a most vile, preposterous love, proceeds upon his error, and in his letter, here, addresses me for marriage; which I, once having paid my vow, answered in such prevailing terms, upon his folly, as now have, unprotected, drawn him into the hands of justice.

D. Du. She is innocent, and well has disappointed my revenge. [Aside.]

D. Lew. So, now, I am a little easy—the puppy will be hanged.

Gov. Give me leave, madam, to ask you yet some farther questions.

Clo. Ay,—I shall be hanged, I believe.

Cha. Nay, then, 'tis time to take care of my daughter; for I am convinced that my friend Clody is disposed of—and so, without compliment, do you see, children, Heaven bless you together.

[Joins CARLOS and ANGELINA's hands.]

Car. This, sir, is a time unfit to thank you as we ought.

Ant. Well, brother, I thank you, however; Charles is an honest lad, and well deserves her; but poor Clody's ill fortune I could never have suspected.

D. Lew. Why, you would be positive, though you know, brother, I always told you, Dismal would be hanged; I must plague him a little, because the dog has been pert with me—Clody, how dost thou do? Ha! why you are tied!

Clo. I hate this old fellow, split me!

D. Lew. Thou hast really made a damned blunder here, child, to invite so many people to a marriage-knot, and, instead of that, it is like to be one under the left ear.

Clo. I'd fain have him die.

D. Lew. Well, my dear, I'll provide for thy going off, however; let me see—you'll only have occasion for a nosegay, a pair of white gloves, and a coffin: look you, take you no care about the surgeons, you shall not be anatomized—I'll get the body off with a wet finger—Though, methinks, I'd fain see the inside of the puppy, too.

Clo. Oh, rot him! I can't bear this.

D. Lew. Well, I won't trouble you any more now, child; if I am not engaged, I don't know but I may come to the tree, and sing a stave or two with thee—Nay, I'll rise on purpose—though you will hardly suffer before twelve o'clock, neither—ay, just about twelve—about twelve you'll be turned off.

Clo. Oh, curse consume him!

Gov. I am convinced, madam; the fact appears too plain.

D. Lew. Yes, yes, he'll suffer. [Aside.

Gov. What says the gentleman? Do you confess the fact, sir?

Clo. Will it do me any good, my lord?

Gov. Perhaps it may, if you can prove it was not done in malice.

Clo. Why, then, to confess the truth, my lord, I did pink him, and am sorry for it; but it was none of my fault, split me.

Eto. Now, my lord, your justice.

D. Du. Hold, madam, that remains in me to give; for know, your brother lives, and happy in the proof of such a sister's virtue.

[Discovers himself.

Eto. My brother! Oh, let my wonder speak my joy!

Clo. Hey!

[CLODIO and his friends seem surprised.

Gov. Don Duart! living and well! How came this strange recovery?

D. Du. My body's health the surgeon has restored: but here's the true physician of my mind: the hot, distempered blood, which lately rendered me offensive to mankind, his just, resenting sword let forth, which gave me leisure to reflect upon my follies past; and, by reflection, to reform.

Eto. This is indeed a happy change.

Gov. Release the gentleman.

Clo. Here, Testy, prithee do so much as untie this a little.

D. Lew. Why, so I will, sirrah; I find thou hast done a mettled thing; and I don't know whether it is worth my while to be shocked at thee any longer.

Eto. I ask your pardon for the wrong I have done you, sir; and blush to think how much I owe you, for a brother thus restored.

Clo. Madam, your very humble servant; it is mighty well as it is.

D. Du. We are, indeed, his debtors both; and sister, there's but one way now of being grateful. For my sake, give him such returns of love, as he may yet think fit to ask, or you, with modesty, can answer.

Clo. Sir, I thank you; and when you don't think it impudence in me to wish myself well with your sister, I shall beg leave to make use of your friendship.

D. Du. This modesty commends you, sir.

Ant. Sir, you have proposed like a man of honour; and if the lady can but like it, she shall find those among us, that will make up a fortune to deserve her.

Car. I wish my brother well; and as I once offered him to divide my birth-right, I'm ready still to put my words into performance.

D. Lew. Nay, then, since I find the rogue's no longer like to be an enemy to Charles, as far as a few acres go, I'll be his friend, too.

D. Du. Sister!

Eto. This is no trifle, brother; allow me a convenient time to think, and if the gentleman continues to deserve your friendship, he shall not much complain I am his enemy.

D. Lew. So, now it will be a wedding again, faith!

Car. Come, my Angelina,
Our bark, at length, has found a quiet harbour,
And the distressful voyage of our loves
Ends not alone in safety, but reward.
Now we unlade our freight of happiness,
Of which, from thee alone my share's derived;
For all my former search in deep philosophy,
Not knowing thee, was a mere dream of life:
But love, in one soft moment, taught me more
Than all the volumes of the learned could reach;
Gave me the proof, when nature's birth began,
To what great end the ETERNAL formed a man.

[Exeunt.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—A chocolate house.

MIRABELL and FAINALL, rising from cards.
BETTY waiting.

Mira. You are a fortunate man, Mr Fainall.

Fain. Have we done?

Mira. What you please. I'll play on to entertain you.

Fain. No, I'll give you your revenge another time, when you are not so indifferent; you are thinking of something else now, and play too negligently; the coldness of a losing gamester lessens the pleasure of the winner. I'd no more play with a man, that slighted his ill fortune, than I'd make love to a woman, who undervalued the loss of her reputation.

Mira. You have a taste extremely delicate, and are for refining on your pleasures.

Fain. Prithee, why so reserved? something has put you out of humour.

Mira. Not at all: I happen to be grave to-day; and you are gay; that's all.

Fain. Confess, Millamant and you quarrelled last night, after I left you; my fair cousin has some humours, that would tempt the patience of a stoic. What, some coxcomb came in, and was well received by her, while you were by?

Mira. Witwould and Petulant! and what was worse, her aunt, your wife's mother, my evil genius; or, to sum up all in her own name, my old lady Wishfort came in——

Fain. O, there it is, then!—She has a lasting passion for you, and with reason—What! then my wife was there?

Mira. Yes, and Mrs Marwood, and three or four more, whom I never saw before; seeing me, they all put on their grave faces, whispered one another, then complained aloud of the vapours, and after, fell into a profound silence.

Fain. They had a mind to be rid of you.

Mira. For which reason, I resolved not to stir. At last, the good old lady broke through her painful taciturnity with an invective against long visits. I would not have understood her, but Millamant joining in the argument, I rose, and, with a constrained smile, told her, I thought nothing was so easy as to know, when a visit began to be troublesome. She reddened, and I withdrew without expecting her reply.

Fain. You were to blame to resent what she spoke only in compliance with her aunt.

Mira. She is more mistress of herself than to be under the necessity of such resignation.

Fain. What ! though half her fortune depends upon her marrying with my lady's approbation ?

Mira. I was then in such a humour, that I should have been better pleased, if she had been less discreet.

Fain. Now I remember, I wonder not they were weary of you : last night was one of their cabal nights ; they have them three times a-week, and meet by turns at one another's apartments, where they come together, like the coroner's inquest, to sit upon the murdered reputations of the week. You and I are excluded ; and it was once proposed, that all the male sex should be excepted ; but somebody moved, that, to avoid scandal, there might be one man of the community ; upon which motion Witwould and Petulant were enrolled members.

Mira. And who may have been the foundress of this sect ? My lady Wishfort, I warrant, who publishes her detestation of mankind ; and, full of the vigour of fifty-five, declares for a friend and ratafia ; and let posterity shift for itself, she'll breed no more.

Fain. The discovery of your sham addresses to her, to conceal your love to her niece, has provoked this separation : had you dissembled better, things might have continued in the state of nature.

Mira. I did as much as man could, with any reasonable conscience ; I proceeded to the very last act of flattery with her, and was guilty of a song in her commendation. Nay, I got a friend to put her into a lampoon, and compliment her with the addresses of a young fellow. The devil's in't if an old woman is to be flattered farther. But for the discovery of this amour, I am indebted to your friend, or your wife's friend, Mrs Marwood.

Fain. What should provoke her to be your enemy, unless she has made you advances, which you have slighted ? Women do not easily forgive omissions of that nature.

Mira. She was always civil to me, till of late. I confess, I am not one of those coxcombs, who are apt to interpret a woman's good manners to her prejudice ; and think, that she, who does not refuse them every thing, can refuse them nothing.

Fain. You are a gallant man, Mirabell ; and though you may have cruelty enough not to answer a lady's advances, you have too much generosity, not to be tender of her honour. Yet, you speak with an indifference, which seems to be affected ; and confesses you are conscious of a negligence.

Mira. You pursue the argument with a distrust, that seems to be unaffected, and confesses you are conscious of a concern, for which the lady is more indebted to you, than is your wife.

Fain. Fy, fy, friend ! if you grow censorious, I must leave you ;—I'll look upon the gamesters in the next room.

Mira. Who are they ?

Fain. Petulant and Witwould—Bring me some chocolate. [Exit.]

Mira. Betty, what says your clock ?

Bet. Turned of the last canonical hour, sir.

Mira. How pertinently the jade answers me ! ha ! almost one o'clock ! [Looking on his watch.] O, ye are come—

Enter FOOTMAN.

Well, is the grand affair over ? You have been something tedious.

Foot. Sir, there's such coupling at Pancras, that they stand behind one another, as 'twere in a country dance. Ours was the last couple to lead up ; and no hopes appearing of dispatch, besides, the parson growing hoarse, we were afraid his lungs would have failed before it came to our turn ; so we drove round to Duke's Place ; and there they were rivetted in a trice.

Mira. So, so, you are sure they are married.

Foot. Incontestably, sir : I am witness.

Mira. Have you the certificate ?

Foot. Here it is, sir.

Mira. Has the taylor brought Waitwell's clothes home, and the new liveries ?

Foot. Yes, sir.

Mira. That's well. Do you go home again, d'ye hear, and bid Waitwell shake his ears, and dame Partlet rustle up her feathers, and meet me at one o'clock by Rosamond's pond ; that I may see her before she returns to her lady : and, as you tender your ears, be secret. [Exit Footman.]

Enter FAINALL.

Fain. Joy of your success, Mirabell ; you look pleased.

Mira. Ay, I have been engaged in a matter of some sort of mirth, which is not yet ripe for discovery. I am glad this is not a cabal-night. I wonder, Fainall, that you, who are married, and, of consequence, should be discreet, will suffer your wife to be of such a party.

Fain. Faith, I am not jealous. Besides, most, who are engaged, are women and relations ; and, for the men, they are of a kind too contemptible to give scandal.

Mira. I am of another opinion. The greater the coxcomb, always the more the scandal : for, a woman, who is not a fool, can have but one reason for associating with a man, who is one.

Fain. Are you jealous as often as you see Witwould entertained by Millamant ?

Mira. Of her understanding I am, if not of her person.

Fain. You do her wrong; for, to give her her due, she has wit.

Mira. She has beauty enough to make any man think so; and complaisance enough not to contradict him, who shall tell her so.

Fain. For a passionate lover, methinks you are a man somewhat too discerning in the failings of your mistress.

Mira. And for a discerning man, somewhat too passionate a lover; for I like her with all her faults; nay, like her for her faults. Her follies are so natural, or so artful, that they become her; and those affectations, which, in another woman, would be odious, serve but to make her more agreeable. I'll tell thee, Fainall; she once used me with that insolence, that, in revenge, I took her to pieces; sifted her, and separated her failings; I studied them, and got them by rote. The catalogue was so large, that I was not without hopes, one day or other, to hate her heartily; to which end I so used myself to think of them, that at length, contrary to my design and expectation, they gave me every hour less disturbance, till, in a few days, it became habitual to me to remember them without being displeased. They are now grown as familiar to me as my own frailties; and, in all probability, in a little time longer I shall like them as well.

Fain. Marry her, marry her; be half as well acquainted with her charms as you are with her defects, and my life on't you are your own man again.

Mira. Say you so?

Fain. I have experience: I have a wife, and so forth.

Enter Messenger.

Mes. Is one 'squire Witwould here?

Bet. Yes; what's your business?

Mes. I have a letter for him, from his brother, sir Wilful, which I am charged to deliver into his own hands.

Bet. He's in the next room, friend——That way. [Exit Messenger.]

Mira. What, is the chief of that noble family in town? sir Wilful Witwould?

Fain. He is expected to-day. Do you know him?

Mira. I have seen him; he promises to be an extraordinary person; I think you have the honour to be related to him?

Fain. Yes, he is half-brother to this Witwould by a former wife, who was sister to my lady Wishfort, my wife's mother. If you marry Milamant, you must call cousins too.

Mira. I would rather be his relation than his acquaintance.

Fain. He comes to town in order to equip himself for travel.

Mira. For travel! Why, the man, that I mean, is above forty.

Fain. No matter for that; 'tis for the honour of England, that all Europe should know we have blockheads of all ages.

Mira. I wonder there is not an act of parliament to save the credit of the nation, and prohibit the exportation of fools.

Fain. By no means, 'tis better as it is; 'tis better to trade with a little loss, than to be quite eaten up with being overstocked.

Mira. Pray, are the follies of this knight-errant, and those of the 'squire his brother, any thing related?

Fain. Not at all; Witwould grows by the knight, like a medlar grafted on a crab. One will melt in your mouth, and t'other set your teeth on edge; one is all pulp, and the other all core.

Mira. So, one will be rotten before he be ripe, and the other will be rotten without ever being ripe at all.

Fain. Sir Wilful is an odd mixture of bashfulness and obstinacy. But when he's drunk, he's as loving as the monster in the tempest; and much after the same manner. To give t'other his due, he has something of good-nature, and does not always want wit.

Mira. Not always: but as often as his memory fails him, and his common-place of comparisons. He is a fool with a good memory, and some few scraps of other folks wit. He is one, whose conversation can never be approved, yet it is now and then to be endured. He has, indeed, one good quality—he is not exceptionous; for he so so passionately affects the reputation of understanding raillery, that he will construe an affront into a jest; and call downright rudeness and ill language, satire and fire.

Fain. If you have a mind to finish his picture, you have an opportunity to do it at full length. Behold the original.

Enter WITWOULD.

Wit. Afford me your compassion, my dears; pity me, Fainall! Mirabell, pity me!

Mira. I do, from my soul.

Fain. Why, what's the matter?

Wit. No letters for me, Betty?

Bet. Did not a messenger bring you one but now, sir?

Wit. Aye, but no other?

Bet. No, sir.

Wit. That's hard, that's very hard; a messenger, a mule, a beast of burden; he has brought me a letter from the fool, my brother, as heavy as a panegyric in a funeral sermon, or a copy of commendatory verses from one poet to another. And what's worse, 'tis as sure a forerunner of the author, as an epistle dedicatory.

Mira. A fool, and your brother, Witwould!

Wit. Aye, aye, my half brother. My half brother he is; no nearer, upon honour.

Mira. Then, 'tis possible he may be but half a fool.

Wit. Good, good, Mirabell, le drole! Good, good! hang him! don't let us talk of him. Fainall, how does your lady? gad, I say any thing in the world to get this fellow out of my head. I beg pardon, that I should ask a man of pleasure, and the town, a question at once so foreign and domestic. But I talk like an old maid at a marriage; I don't know what I say: but she is the best woman in the world.

Fain. 'Twas well you don't know what you say, or else your commendation would go near to make me either vain or jealous.

Wit. No man in town lives well with a wife but Fainall. Your judgment, Mirabell?

Mira. You had better step and ask his wife, if you would be credibly informed.

Wit. Mirabell——

Mira. Aye——

Wit. My dear, I ask ten thousand pardons;—gad, I have forgot what I was going to say to you.

Mira. I thank you heartily, heartily.

Wit. No, but prithee, excuse me—my memory is such a memory.

Mira. Have you a care of such apologies, Witwould; for I never knew a fool but he affected to complain, either of the spleen or his memory.

Fain. What have you done with Petulant?

Wit. He's reckoning his money; my money it was—I have had no luck to-day.

Fain. You may allow him to win of you at play; for you are sure to be too hard for him at repartee: Since you monopolize the wit, that is between you, the fortune must be his of course.

Mira. I don't find, that Petulant confesses the superiority of wit to be your talent, Witwould.

Wit. Come, come, you are malicious now, and would breed debates—Petulant's my friend, and a very pretty fellow, and a very honest fellow, and has a smattering—faith and troth a pretty deal of an odd sort of small wit: nay, I do him justice, I'm his friend, I won't wrong him. And, if he had any judgement in the world, he would not be altogether contemptible. Come, come, don't detract from the merits of my friend.

Fain. You don't take your friend to be over-nicely bred?

Wit. No, no, hang him, the rogue has no manners at all, that I must own—No more breeding than a bum-bailly, that I grant you—'Tis pity; the fellow has fire and life.

Mira. What, courage?

Wit. Hum, faith I don't know as to that,—I can't say as to that. Yes, faith, in controversy, he'll contradict any body.

Mira. Though it were a man, whom he feared; or a woman, whom he loved.

Wit. Well, well, he does not always think before he speaks; we have all our failings: you are too hard upon him; you are, faith. Let me excuse him—I can defend most of his faults, except one or two; one he has, that's the truth on't; if he were my brother, I could not acquit him—that, indeed, I could wish were otherwise.

Mira. Aye marry, what's that, Witwould?

Wit. O pardon me! expose the infirmities of a friend! No, my dear, excuse me there.

Fain. What, I warrant he's insincere, or 'tis some such trifle.

Wit. No, no; what if he be? 'tis no matter for that; his wit will excuse that; a wit should no more be sincere, than a woman constant; one argues a want of parts, as t'other of beauty.

Mira. May be you think him too positive?

Wit. No, no, his being positive is an incentive to argument, and keeps up conversation.

Fain. Too illiterate.

Wit. That! that's his happiness—his want of learning gives him the more opportunity to shew his natural parts.

Mira. He wants words.

Wit. Aye; but I like him for that, now; for his want of words gives me the pleasure very often to explain his meaning.

Fain. He's impudent.

Wit. No, that's not it.

Mira. Vain.

Wit. No.

Mira. What, he speaks unseasonable truths sometimes, because he has not wit enough to invent an evasion.

Wit. Truth! ha, ha, ha! No, no; since you will have it, I mean, he never speaks truth at all, that's all. He will lie like a chambermaid, or a woman of quality's porter. Now, that is a fault.

Enter COACHMAN.

Coach. Is master Petulant here, mistress?

Bet. Yes.

Coach. Three gentlewomen in a coach would speak with him.

Fain. O brave Petulant! three!

Bet. I'll tell him.

Coach. You must bring two dishes of chocolate, and a glass of cinnamon-water.

[Exeunt COACHMAN and BETTY.]

Wit. That should be for two fasting bona robas, and a procuress troubled with wind. Now, you may know what the three are.

Mira. You are very free with your friend's acquaintance.

Wit. Aye, aye, friendship without freedom is as dull as love without enjoyment, or wine without toasting; but, to tell you a secret, these are trulls, whom he allows coach-hire, and something more, by the week, to call on him once a day at public places.

Mira. How!

Wit. You shall see he wont go to them, because there's no more company here to take notice of him. Why this is nothing to what he used to do: before he found out this way, I have known him call for himself——

Fain. Call for himself! what dost thou mean?

Wit. Mean! why he would slip you out of this chocolate-house, just when you had been talking to him. As soon as your back was turned——whip he was gone; then trip to his lodging, clap on a hood and a scarf, and a mask, slap into a hackney-coach, and drive hither to the door again in a trice; where he would send in for himself, that is, I mean, call for himself, wait for himself, nay, and what's more, not finding himself, sometimes leave a letter for himself.

Mira. I confess this is something extraordinary. I believe he waits for himself now, he is so long a coming: O, I ask his pardon.

Enter PETULANT and BETTY.

Bet. Sir, the coach stays.

Pet. Well, well; I come—'Sbud, a man had as good be a professed midwife, as a professed gallant, at this rate; to be knocked up, and raised at all hours, and in all places. Deuce on them, I wont come—D'ye hear, tell them I wont come——Let them snivel and cry their hearts out. [Exit BETTY.]

Fain. You are very cruel, Petulant.

Pet. All's one, let it pass——I have a humour to be cruel.

Mira. I hope they are not persons of condition, that you use at this rate,

Pet. Condition! condition's a dried fig, if I am not in humour——By this hand, if they were your——a——a——your what-d'ye-call-'ems themselves, they must wait, or rub off, if I am not in the vein.

Mira. What-d'ye-call-'ems! what are they, Witwould?

Wit. Empresses, my dear——By your what-d'ye-call-'ems he means Sultana queens.

Pet. Aye, Roxalanas!

Mira. Cry you mercy.

Fain. Witwould says they are——

Pet. What does he say they are?

Wit. I? fine ladies, I say.

Pet. Pass on, Witwould——Harkee, by this light his relations——Two co-heiresses, his cousins, and an old aunt, who loves intriguing better than a conventicle.

Wit. Ha, ha, ha! I had a mind to see how the rogue would come off——Ha, ha, ha! gad, I can't be angry with him, if he had said they were my mother and my sisters.

Mira. No!

Wit. No; the rogue's wit and readiness of invention charm me, dear Petulant.

Enter BETTY.

Bet. They are gone, sir, in great anger.

Pet. Enough, let them trundle. Anger helps complexion, saves paint.

Fain. This continence is all dissembled; this is in order to have something to brag of the next time he makes court to Millamant, and swear he has abandoned the whole sex for her sake.

Mira. Have you not left off your impudent pretensions there yet? I shall cut your throat, some time or other, Petulant, about that business.

Pet. Aye, aye, let that pass——There are other throats to be cut——

Mira. Meaning mine, sir?

Pet. Not I; I mean nobody; I know nothing; But there are uncles and nephews in the world; and there may be rivals——What, then? all's one for that——

Mira. Now, harkee, Petulant, come hither——Explain, or I shall call your interpreter.

Pet. Explain! I know nothing——Why you have an uncle, have you not, lately come to town, and lodges by my lady Wishfort's?

Mira. True.

Pet. Why that's enough; you and he are not friends: and if he should marry and have a child, you may be disinherited, ha!

Mira. Where hast thou stumbled upon all this truth!

Pet. All's one for that; why, then, say I know something.

Mira. Come, thou art an honest fellow, Petulant, and shalt make love to my mistress; thou shalt, faith. What hast thou heard of my uncle?

Pet. I! nothing; I! If throats are to be cut, let swords clash: snug's the word; I shrug and am silent.

Mira. O raillery, raillery! Come, I know thou art in the women's secrets——what, you're a cabalist? I know you staid at Millamant's last night, after I went. Was there any mention made of my uncle or me? tell me. If thou hadst but good nature equal to thy wit, Petulant, Tony Witwould, who is now thy competitor in fame, would shew as diin by thee as a dead whiting's eye by a pearl of orient; he would no more be seen by thee, than Mercury is by the sun. Come, I'm sure thou wo't tell me.

Pet. If I do, will you grant me common sense, then, for the future?

Mira. Faith I'll do what I can for thee; and I'll pray that it may be granted thee in the mean time.

Pet. Well, harkee.

[They talk apart.]

Fain. Petulant and you, both, will find Mirabell as warm a rival as a lover.

Wit. 'Pshaw, 'pshaw! that she laughs at Petulant, is plain. And, for my part—but that it is almost a fashion to admire her, I should——harkee—to tell you a secret, but let it go no farther—between friends, I shall never break my heart for her.

Fain. How!

Wit. She's handsome; but she's a sort of an uncertain woman.

Fain. I thought you had died for her.

Wit. Umph—no—

Fain. She has wit.

Wit. 'Tis what she will hardly allow any body else—now, I should hate that, if she were as handsome as Cleopatra. Mirabell is not so sure of her, as he thinks for.

Fain. Why do you think so?

Wit. We staid pretty late there last night; and heard something of an uncle to Mirabell, who is lately come to town, and is between him and the best part of his estate; Mirabell and he are at some distance, as my lady Wishfort has been told; and, you know, she hates Mirabell worse than a quaker hates a parrot, or than a fishmonger hates a hard frost. Whether this uncle has seen Mrs Millamant or not, I cannot say; but there were items of such a treaty being in embryo; and, if it should come to life, poor Mirabell would be, in some sort, unfortunately fobbed, i'faith!

Fain. 'Tis impossible Millamant should hearken to it.

Wit. Faith, my dear, I can't tell; she's a woman, and a kind of a humourist.

Mira. And this is the sum of what you could collect last night?

Pet. The quintessence. May be Wit would knows more; he staid longer—besides, they never mind him; they say any thing before him.

Mira. I thought you had been the greatest favourite.

Pet. Aye, tête à tête; but not in public, because I make remarks.

Mira. You do?

Pet. Aye, aye; I'm malicious, man. Now, he's soft, you know; they are not in awe of him—the fellow's well-bred; he's what you call a—what d'ye-call them, a fine gentleman; but he's silly withal.

Mira. I thank you, I know as much as my curiosity requires. Fainall, are you for the Mall?

Fain. Aye, I'll take a turn before dinner.

Wit. Aye, we'll all walk in the park; the ladies talk of being there.

Mira. I thought you were obliged to watch for your brother sir Wilfull's arrival.

Wit. No, no; he comes to his aunt's, my lady Wishfort: plague on him, I shall be troubled with him, too; what shall I do with the fool?

Pet. Beg him for his estate, that I may beg you afterwards; and so have but one trouble with you both.

Wit. O rare Petulant! thou art as quick as fire in a frosty morning; thou shalt to the Mall with us, and we'll be very severe.

Pet. Enough, I'm in a humour to be severe.

Mira. Are you? Pray, then, walk by yourselves—let not us be accessory to your putting the ladies out of countenance with your senseless ribaldry, which you roar out aloud as often as they pass by you; and, when you have made a handsome woman blush, then you think you have been severe.

Pet. What, what? then let them either shew their innocence, by not understanding what they hear, or else shew their discretion by not hearing what they would not be thought to understand.

Mira. But hast not thou, then, sense enough to know, that thou ought'st to be most ashamed thyself, when thou hast put another out of countenance?

Pet. Not I, by this hand—I always take blushing either for a sign of guilt, or ill-breeding.

Mira. I confess you ought to think so. You are in the right, that you may plead the error of your judgment, in defence of your practice.

Where modesty's ill manners, 'tis but fit
That impudence and malice pass for wit.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—St James's Park.

Enter MRS FAINALL, and MRS MARWOOD

Mrs Fain. AYE, aye, dear Marwood, if we will be happy, we must find the means in ourselves, and among ourselves. Men are ever in extremes; either doating, or averse. While they are lovers, if they have fire and sense, their jealousies are insupportable: and, when they cease to love, (we ought to think at least) they lothe: they look upon us with horror and distaste; they meet us like the ghosts of what we were, and, as from such, fly from us.

Mrs Mar. True; 'tis an unhappy circumstance of life, that love should ever die before us; and that the man so often should outlive the lover. But, say what you will, 'tis better to be left, than never to have been loved. To pass our youth in dull indifference, to refuse the sweets of life, because they once must leave us, is as preposterous, as to wish to have been born old, because we one day must be old. For my part, my youth may wear and waste, but it shall never rust in my possession.

Mrs Fain. Then, it seems, you dissemble an aversion to mankind, only in compliance to my mother's humour.

Mrs Mar. Certainly. To be free; I have no taste of those insipid, dry discourses, with which our sex, of force, must entertain themselves apart from men. We may affect endearments to each other, profess eternal friendships, and seem to dote like lovers; but 'tis not in our natures long to persevere. Love will resume his empire in our breasts, and every heart, or soon or late, resume and re-admit him as its lawful tyrant.

Mrs Fain. Bless me! how have I been deceived? Why, you're a professed libertine.

Mrs Mar. You see my friendship by my freedom. Come, be as sincere; acknowledge that your sentiments agree with mine.

Mrs Fain. Never.

Mrs Mar. You hate mankind?

Mrs Fain. Heartily, inveterately.

Mrs Mar. Your husband?

Mrs Fain. Most transcendently; aye, though I say it, meritoriously.

Mrs Mar. Give me your hand upon it.

Mrs Fain. There.

Mrs Mar. I join with you; what I have said, has been to try you.

Mrs Fain. Is it possible? dost thou hate those vipers, men?

Mrs Mar. I have done hating them, and am now come to despise them; the next thing I have to do, is eternally to forget them.

Mrs Fain. There spoke the spirit of an Amazon, a Penthesilea.

Mrs Mar. And yet I am thinking sometimes to carry my aversion farther.

Mrs Fain. How?

Mrs Mar. By marrying; if I could but find one, that loved me very well, and would be thoroughly sensible of ill usage, I think I should do myself the violence of undergoing the ceremony.

Mrs Fain. You would not dishonour him?

Mrs Mar. No, but I'd make him believe I did, and that's as bad.

Mrs Fain. Why, had you not as good do it?

Mrs Mar. Oh, if he should ever discover it, he would then know the worst, and be out of his pain; but I would have him ever to continue upon the rack of fear and jealousy.

Mrs Fain. Ingenious mischief! would thou wert married to Mirabell!

Mrs Mar. Would I were!

Mrs Fain. You change colour?

Mrs Mar. Because I hate him.

Mrs Fain. So do I; but I can hear him named. But what reason have you to hate him in particular?

Mrs Mar. I never loved him; he is, and always was, insufferably proud.

Mrs Fain. By the reason you give for your aversion, one would think it dissembled; for you have laid a fault to his charge, of which his enemies must acquit him.

Mrs Mar. Oh, then, it seems you are one of his favourable enemies. Methinks you look a little pale, and now you flush again.

Mrs Fain. Do I? I think I am a little sick o' the sudden.

Mrs Mar. What ails you?

Mrs Fain. My husband. Don't you see him? He turned short upon me unawares, and has almost overcome me.

Enter FAINALL and MIRABELL.

Mrs Mar. Ha, ha, ha! he comes opportunely for you.

Mrs Fain. For you; for he has brought Mirabell with him.

Fain. My dear!

Mrs Fain. My soul!

Fain. You don't look well to-day, child.

Mrs Fain. D'ye think so?

Mira. He's the only man that does, madam.

Mrs Fain. The only man that would tell me so, at least; and the only man from whom I could hear it without mortification.

Fain. Oh, my dear, I am satisfied of your tenderness; I know you cannot resent any thing from me; especially what is an effect of my concern.

Mrs Fain. Mr Mirabell, my mother interrupted you in a pleasant relation, last night; I could fain hear it out.

Mira. The persons, concerned in that affair, have yet a tolerable reputation. I am afraid Mr Fainall will be censorious.

Mrs Fain. He has a humour more prevailing than his curiosity, and will willingly dispense with the hearing of one scandalous story, to avoid giving an occasion to make another, by being seen to walk with his wife. This way, M Mirabell, and, I dare promise, you will oblige us both.

[Exeunt MRS FAINALL and MIRABELL.]

Fain. Excellent creature! well, sure, if I should live to be rid of my wife, I should be a miserable man.

Mrs Mar. Aye?

Fain. For, having only that one hope, the accomplishment of it, of consequence, must put an end to all my hopes; and what a wretch is he, who must survive his hopes! nothing remains, when that day comes, but to sit down and weep like Alexander, when he wanted other worlds to conquer.

Mrs Mar. Will you not follow them?

Fain. No, I think not.

Mrs Mar. Pray let us; I have a reason.

Fain. You are not jealous?

Mrs Mar. Of whom?

Fain. Of Mirabell.

Mrs Mar. If I am, is it inconsistent with my love to you, that I am tender of your honour?

Fain. You would intimate, then, as if there were a particular understanding between my wife and him?

Mrs Mar. I think she does not hate him to that degree she would be thought.

Fain. But he, I fear, is too insensible.

Mrs Mar. It may be, you are deceived.

Fain. It may be so. I do not now begin to apprehend it.

Mrs Mar. What?

Fain. That I have been deceived, madam, and you are false.

Mrs Mar. That I am false! What mean you?

Fain. To let you know, I see through all your little arts—come, you both love him, and both have equally dissembled your aversion. Your mutual jealousies of one another have made you clash, till you have both struck fire. I have seen the warm confession reddening on your cheeks, and sparkling from your eyes.

Mrs Mar. You do me wrong.

Fain. I do not—'Twas for my ease to over see and wilfully neglect the gross advances made him by my wife; that, by permitting her to be engaged, I might continue unsuspected in my pleasures; and take you oftener to my arms in full security. But could you think, because the nodding husband would not wake, that e'er the watchful lover slept?

Mrs Mar. And wherewithal can you reproach me?

Fain. With infidelity; with loving another; with love of Mirabell.

Mrs Mar. 'Tis false. I challenge you to shew an instance, that can confirm your groundless accusation. I hate him.

Fain. And wherefore do you hate him? He is insensible, and your resentment follows his neglect. An instance! The injuries you have done him are a proof: your interposing in his love. What cause had you to make discoveries of his pretended passion? to undeceive the credulous aunt, and be the officious obstacle of his match with Millamant?

Mrs Mar. My obligations to my lady urged me: I had professed a friendship to her; and could not see her easy nature so abused by that dissembler.

Fain. What, was it conscience, then? Professed a friendship! O the pious friendships of the female sex!

Mrs Mar. More tender, more sincere, and more enduring, than all the vain and empty vows of men, whether professing love to us, or mutual faith to one another.

Fain. Ha, ha, ha! you are my wife's friend, too.

Mrs Mar. Shame and ingratitude! Do you reproach me? You, you upbraid me! Have I been false to her through strict fidelity to you, and sacrificed my friendship to keep my love inviolate? and have you the baseness to charge me with the guilt, unmindful of the merit! To you it should be meritorious, that I have been vicious; and do you reflect that guilt upon me, which should lie buried in your bosom?

Fain. You misinterpret my reproof. I meant but to remind you of the slight account you once could make of strictest ties, when set in competition with your love to me.

Mrs Mar. 'Tis false; you urged it with deliberate malice—'Twas spoke in scorn, and I never will forgive it.

Fain. Your guilt, not your resentment, begets your rage. If yet you loved, you could forgive a jealousy: but you are stung to find, you are discovered.

Mrs Mar. It shall be all discovered. You, too, shall be discovered; be sure you shall. I can but be exposed—If I do it myself I shall prevent your baseness.

Fain. Why, what will you do?

Mrs Mar. Disclose it to your wife; own what has past between us.

Fain. Frenzy!

Mrs Mar. By all my wrongs, I'll do it!—I'll publish to the world the injuries you have done me, both in my fame and fortune: with both I trusted you; you, bankrupt in honour, as indigent of wealth.

Fain. Your fame I have preserved. Your fortune has been bestowed, as the prodigality of your love would have it, in pleasures, which we both have shared. Yet, had not you been false, I had, ere this, repaid it—'Tis true—had you permitted Mirabell with Millamant to have stolen their marriage, my lady had been incensed beyond all means of reconciliation: Millamant had forfeited the moiety of her fortune, which then would have descended to my wife. And wherefore did I marry, but to make lawful prize of a rich widow's wealth, and squander it on love and you?

Mrs Mar. Deceit and frivolous pretence.

Fain. Death! am I not married? what's pretence? Am I not imprisoned, fettered? have I not a wife? nay, a wife, that was a widow, a young widow, a handsome widow; and would be again a widow, but that I have a heart of proof, and something of a constitution to bustle through the ways of wedlock and this world? Will you be reconciled to truth and me?

Mrs Mar. Impossible, Truth and you are inconsistent—I hate you, and shall for ever.

Fain. For loving you?

Mrs Mar. I loath the name of love after such usage; and next to the guilt, with which you would asperse me, I scorn you most. Farewell.

Fain. Nay, we must not part thus.

Mrs Mar. Let me go.

Fain. Come, I'm sorry.—

Mrs Mar. I care not—Let me go.—Break my hands, do—I'd leave them to get loose.

Fain. I would not hurt you for the world. Have I no other hold to keep you here?

Mrs Mar. Well, I have deserved it all.

Fain. You know I love you.

Mrs Mar. Poor dissembling! O that—
Well, it is not yet—

Fain. What? what is it not? what is not yet? is it not yet too late—

Mrs Mar. No, it is not yet too late—I have that comfort.

Fain. It is, to love another.

Mrs Mar. But not to loath, detest, abhor mankind, myself, and the whole treacherous world.

Fain. Nay, this is extravagance—Come, I ask your pardon—No tears—I was to blame; I could not love you and be easy in my doubts—Pray forbear—I believe you; I'm convinced I've done you wrong; and any way, every way will make amends;—I'll hate my wife yet more, damn her; I'll part with her, rob her of all she's worth, and we'll retire somewhere, any where, to another world. I'll marry thee—Be pacified—'Sdeath! they come, hide your face, your tears—You have a mask, wear it a moment. This way, this way—be persuaded!
[Exeunt.]

Enter MIRABELL and MRS FAINALL.

Mrs Fain. They are here yet.

Mira. They are turning into the other walk.

Mrs Fain. While I only hated my husband, I could bear to see him; but since I have despised him, he is too offensive.

Mira. O you should hate with prudence.

Mrs Fain. Yes, for I have loved with indiscretion.

Mira. You should have just so much disgust for your husband, as may be sufficient to make you relish your lover.

Mrs Fain. You have been the cause, that I have loved without bounds; and would you set limits to that aversion, of which you have been the occasion? why did you make me marry this man?

Mira. Why do we daily commit disagreeable and dangerous actions? To save that idol reputation. If the familiarities of our loves had produced that consequence, of which you were apprehensive, where could you have fixed a father's name with credit, but on a husband? I knew Fainall to be a man lavish of his morals, an interested and professing friend, a false and a designing lover; yet one whose wit and outward fair behaviour have gained a reputation with the town, enough to make that woman stand excused, who has suffered herself to be won by his addresses. A better man ought not to have been sacrificed to the occasion; a worse had not answered to the purpose. When you are weary of him, you know your remedy.

Mrs Fain. I ought to stand in some degree of credit with you, Mirabell.

Mira. In justice to you, I have made you privy to my whole design, and put it in your power to ruin or advance my fortune.

Mrs Fain. Whom have you instructed to represent your pretended uncle?

Mira. Waitwell, my servant.

Mrs Fain. He is a humble servant to Foible, my mother's woman, and may win her to your interest.

Mira. Care is taken for that—she is won and won by this time. They were married this morning.

Mrs Fain. Who?

Mira. Waitwell and Foible. I would not tempt my servant to betray me by trusting him too far. If your mother, in hopes to ruin me, should consent to marry my pretended uncle, he might, like Mosca in the Fox, stand upon terms; so I made him sure before-hand.

Mrs Fain. So, if my poor mother is caught in a contract, you will discover the imposture betimes; and release her, by producing a certificate of her gallant's former marriage?

Mira. Yes, upon condition that she consent to my marriage with her niece, and surrender the moiety of her fortune in her possession.

Mrs Fain. She talked last night of endeavouring at a match between Millamant and your uncle.

Mira. That was by Foible's direction, and my instruction, that she might seem to carry it more privately.

Mrs Fain. Well, I have an opinion of your success; for I believe my lady will do any thing to get a husband, and when she has this, which you have provided for her, I suppose she will submit to any thing to get rid of him.

Mira. Yes, I think the good lady would marry any thing that resembled a man, though 'twere no more than what a butler could pinch out of a napkin.

Mrs Fain. Female frailty! we must all come to it, if we live to be old, and feel the craving of a false appetite, when the true is decayed.

Mira. An old woman's appetite is depraved like that of a girl—'tis the green-sickness of a second childhood; and, like the faint offer of a latter spring, serves but to usher in the fall, and withers in an affected bloom.

Mrs Fain. Here's your mistress.

Enter MRS MILLAMANT, WITWOULD, and MINCING.

Mira. Here she comes, i'faith, full sail, with her fan spread, and streamers out, and a shoal of fools for tenders—ha, no; I cry her mercy.

Mrs Fain. I see but one poor empty sculler; and he tows her woman after him.

Mira. You seem to be unattended, madam—You used to have the beau-monde throng after you, and a flock of gay fine perukes hovering round you.

Wit. Like moths about a candle—I had like to have lost my comparison for want of breath.

Mill. O I have denied myself airs to-day. I have walked as fast through the crowd——

Wit. As a favourite just disgraced; and with as few followers.

Mill. Dear Mr Witwould, truce with your similitudes: for I am as sick of them——

Wit. As a physician of a good air—I cannot help it, madam, though 'tis against myself.

Mill. Yet again! Mincing, stand between me and his wit.

Wit. Do Mrs Mincing, like a screen before a great fire. I confess I do blaze to-day; I am too bright.

Mrs Fain. But, dear Millamant, why were you so long?

Mill. Long! lud! have I not made violent haste? I have asked every living thing I met for you; I have inquired after you, as after a new fashion.

Wit. Madam, truce with your similitudes—no, you met her husband, and did not ask him for her.

Mir. By your leave, Witwould, that were like inquiring after an old fashion, to ask a husband for his wife.

Wit. Hum! a hit, a hit, a palpable hit, I confess it.

Min. You were dressed before I came abroad.

Mill. Ay, that's true—O but then I had——Mincing, what had I? why was I so long?

Min. O mem, your la'ship staid to peruse a packet of letters.

Mill. O ay, letters—I had letters—I am persecuted with letters—I hate letters—nobody knows how to write letters; and yet one has them, one does not know why—they serve one to pin up one's hair.

Wit. Is that the way? Pray, madam, do you pin up your hair with all your letters? I find I must keep copies.

Mill. Only with those in verse, Mr Witwould. I never pin up my hair with prose. I think, I tried once, Mincing?

Min. O mem, I shall never forget it.

Wit. Ay, poor Mincing tift and tift all the morning.

Min. Till I had the cramp in my fingers, I'll vow, mem, and all to no purpose. But when your la'ship pins it up with poetry, it sits so pleasant the next day as any thing, and is so pure and so crips.

Wit. Indeed! so crips?

Min. You're such a critic, Mr Witwould.

Mill. Mirabell, did you take exceptions last night? O ay, and went away——Now I think on't I'm angry—No, now I think on't I'm pleased——For I believe I gave you some pain.

Mir. Does that please you?

Mill. Infinitely; I love to give pain.

Mir. You would affect a cruelty, which is not in your nature; your true vanity is in the power of pleasing.

Mill. O, I ask your pardon for that—One's cruelty is one's power, and when one parts with one's cruelty, one parts with one's power; and when one has parted with that, I fancy one's old and ugly.

Mir. Ay, ay, suffer your cruelty to ruin the object of your power, to destroy your lover—And then, how vain, how lost a thing you'll be! Nay, 'tis true: you are no longer handsome, when you have lost your lover; your beauty dies upon the instant; for beauty is the lover's gift; 'tis he bestows your charms——Your glass is all a cheat. The ugly and the old, whom the looking-glass mortifies, yet, after commendation, can be flattered by it, and discover beauties in it; for that reflects our praises, rather than your face.

Mill. O the vanity of these men! Fainall, d'ye hear him? If they did not commend us, we were not handsome! Now, you must know, they could not commend one, if one was not handsome. Beauty the lover's gift!——Dear me, what is a lover, that it can give? Why, one makes lovers as fast as one pleases, and they live as long as one pleases, and they die as soon as one pleases: and then, if one pleases, one makes more.

Wit. Very pretty! Why you make no more of making of lovers, madam, than of making so many card-matches.

Mill. One no more owes one's beauty to a lover, than one's wit to an echo: they can but reflect what we look and say; vain, empty things if we are silent or unseen, and want a being.

Mir. Yet, to those two vain, empty things, you owe two of the greatest pleasures of your life.

Mill. How so?

Mir. To your lover you owe the pleasure of hearing yourselves praised; and to an echo, the pleasure of hearing yourselves talk.

Wit. But I know a lady, that loves talking so incessantly, she won't give an echo fair play; she has that everlasting rotation of tongue, that an echo must wait till she dies, before it can catch her last words.

Mill. O fiction! Fainall, let us leave these men.

Mira. Draw off Witwould.

[Aside to Mrs FAINALL.

Mrs Fain. Immediately: I have a word or two for Mr Witwould.

[Ereunt Mrs FAINALL and WITWOULD.

Mira. I would beg a little private audience, too——You had the tyranny to deny me last night; though you knew I came to impart a secret to you, that concerned my love.

Mill. You saw I was engaged.

Mira. Unkind! You had the leisure to entertain a herd of fools; things, who visit you from their excessive idleness; bestowing on your easiness that time, which is the incumbrance of their lives. How can you find delight in such society? It is impossible they should admire you; they are not capable; or if they were, it should be to you as a mortification; for sure to please a fool is some degree of folly.

Mill. I please myself—Besides, sometimes to converse with fools is for my health.

Mira. Your health! Is there a worse disease than the conversation of fools?

Mill. Yes, the vapours; fools are physic for it next to assafoetida.

Mira. You are not in a course of fools?

Mill. Mirabell, if you persist in this offensive freedom—you'll displease me—I think I must resolve, after all, not to have you—We shan't agree.

Mira. Not in our physic, it may be.

Mill. And yet our distemper, in all likelihood, will be the same; for we shall be sick of one another. I shan't endure to be reprimanded, nor instructed; 'tis so dull to act always by advice, and so tedious to be told of one's faults—I can't bear it. Well, I won't have you, Mirabell—I'm resolved—I think—you may go—Ha, ha, ha! What would you give, that you could help loving me?

Mira. I would give something that you did not know I could not help it.

Mill. Come, don't look grave, then. Well, what do you say to me?

Mira. I say, that a man may as soon make a friend by his wit, or a fortune by his honesty, as win a woman with plain-dealing and sincerity.

Mill. Sententious, Mirabell? Prithee don't look with that violent and inflexible wise face, like Solomon at the dividing of the child, in an old tapestry hanging.

Mira. You are merry, madam; but I would persuade you for a moment to be serious.

Mill. What, with that face? No, if you keep your countenance, 'tis impossible I should hold mine. Well, after all, there is something very moving in a love-sick face. Ha, ha, ha!—Well, I won't laugh, don't be peevish—Heigho! now I'll be melancholy; as melancholy as a watch-light. Well, Mirabell, if ever you will win me, woo me now—Nay, if you are so tedious, fare you well; I see they are walking away.

Mira. Can you not find in the variety of your disposition one moment—

Mill. To hear you tell me Foible's married, and your plot like to speed—No!

Mira. But how you came to know it—

Mill. Without the help of conjuration, you can't imagine; unless she should tell me herself. Which of the two it may have been, I will leave you to consider; and when you have done thinking of that, think of me.

[Exeunt MILLAMANT and MINCING.]

Mira. I have something more—Gone—Think of you! to think of a whirlwind, though 'twere in a whirlwind, were a case of more steady contemplation; a very tranquillity of mind and mansion. A fellow, that lives in a windmill, has not a more whimsical dwelling than the heart of a man, that is lodged in a woman. There is no point of the compass, to which they cannot turn, and by which they are not turned; and by one as well as another; for motion, not method, is their occupation. To know this, and yet continue to be in love, is to be made wise from the dictates of reason, and yet persevere to play the fool by the force of instinct—O here come my pair of turtles—What! billing so sweetly! is not Valentine's day over with you yet? [Enter WAITWELL and FOIBLE.] Sirrah, Waitwell, why sure you think you were married for your own recreation, and not for my conveniency.

Wait. Your pardon, sir. With submission, we have indeed been billing; but still with an eye to business, sir. I have instructed her as well as I could. If she can take your directions as readily as my instructions, sir, your affairs are in a prosperous way.

Mira. Give you joy, Mrs Foible.

Foi. O-las, sir, I'm so ashamed—I'm afraid my lady has been in a thousand inquietudes for me. But I protest, sir, I made as much haste as I could.

Wait. That she did indeed, sir. It was my fault that she did not make more.

Mira. That I believe.

Foi. I told my lady as you instructed me, sir: that I had a prospect of seeing Sir Rowland, your uncle; and that I would put her ladyship's picture in my pocket to shew him; which, I'll be sure to say has made him so enamoured of her beauty, that he burns with impatience to lie at her ladyship's feet, and worship the original.

Mira. Excellent Foible! Matrimony has made you eloquent in love.

Wait. I think she has profited, sir; I think so.

Foi. You have seen madam Millamant, sir?

Mira. Yes.

Foi. I told her, sir, because I did not know that you might find an opportunity; she had so much company last night.

Mira. Your diligence will merit more—in the mean time—

[Gives money.]

Foi. O dear sir, your humble servant!

Wait. Spouse!

Mira. Stand off, sir, not a penny—Go on and prosper, Foible—The lease shall be made good, and the farm stocked, if we succeed.

Foi. I don't question your generosity, sir: and you need not doubt of success. If you have no more commands, sir, I'll be gone; I'm sure my lady is at her toilet, and can't dress till I come—O dear, I'm sure that [looking out] was Mrs Marwood that went by in a mask; if she has seen me with you I'm sure she'll tell my lady. I'll make haste home and prevent her. Your servant, sir. B'w'ye, Waitwell. [Erit.]

Wait. Sir Rowland, if you please. The jade's so pert upon her preferment, she forgets herself.

Mira. Come, sir, will you endeavour to forget yourself—and transform into sir Rowland?

Wait. Why, sir, it will be impossible I should remember myself. [Exit MIRABELL.] Married, knighted, and attended all in one day! 'tis enough to make any man forget himself. The difficulty will be how to recover my acquaintance and familiarity with my former self; and fall from my transformation to a reformation into Waitwell. Nay, I shan't be quite the same Waitwell, neither; for now, I remember, I'm married, and can't be my own again.

Ay, there's my grief; that's the sad change of life;

To lose my title, and yet keep my wife.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—A room in LADY WISHFORT'S house.

LADY WISHFORT at her toilet, PEG waiting.

Lady Wish. MERCIFUL, no news of Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam.

Lady Wish. I have no more patience—If I have not fretted myself till I am pale again, there's no veracity in me. Fetch me the red—the red, do you hear, sweet-heart! an arrant ash-colour, as I'm a person. Look you how this wench stirs! why dost thou not fetch me a little red? didst thou not hear me, mopus?

Peg. The red ratafia, does your ladyship mean, or the cherry-brandy?

Lady Wish. Ratafia, fool! no, fool, not the ratafia, fool!—Grant me patience! I mean the Spanish paper, idiot; complexion. Darling paint, paint, paint! dost thou understand that, changeling? dangling thy hands like bobbins before thee! why dost thou not stir, puppet? thou wooden thing upon wires.

Peg. Lord, madam, your ladyship is so impatient—I cannot come at the paint, madam; Mrs Foible has locked it up, and carried the key with her.

Lady Wish. Plague take you both—Fetch me the cherry-brandy, then. [Exit PEG.] I'm as pale and as faint—I look like Mrs Qualmsick, the curate's wife, that's always breeding—Wench, come, come, wench, what art thou doing? sipping! tasting! save thee, dost thou not know the bottle?

Enter PEG with a bottle and china cup.

Lady Wish. A cup, save thee! and what a cup hast thou brought! dost thou take me for a fairy, to drink out of an acorn? why didst thou not bring thy thimble? hast thou ne'er a brass thimble clinking in thy pocket, with a bit of nutmeg? I warrant thee. Come, fill, fill—So—again. See who that is. [One knocks.] Set down the bottle first.—Here, here, under the table—What would'st thou go with the bottle in thy hand, like a tapster? [Exit PEG.] As I'm a person, this wench has lived in an inn upon the road, before she came to me, like Maritornes, the Asturian, in Don Quixote.

Enter PEG.

No Foible yet?

Peg. No, madam, Mrs Marwood.

Lady Wish. O, Marwood! let her come in. Come in, good Marwood.

Enter MRS MARWOOD.

Mrs Mar. I'm surprised to find your ladyship in dishabille at this time of day.

Lady Wish. Foible's a lost thing; has been abroad since morning, and never heard of since.

Mrs Mar. I saw her but now, as I came masked through the park, in conference with Mirabell.

Lady Wish. With Mirabell! you call my blood into my face, with mentioning that traitor. She durst not have the confidence. I sent her to negotiate an affair, in which, if I'm detected, I'm undone. If that wheedling villain has wrought upon Foible to detect me, I'm ruined. Oh, my dear friend! I'm a wretch of wretches, if I'm detected.

Mrs Mar. O, madam, you cannot suspect Mrs Foible's integrity.

Lady Wish. O, he carries poison in his tongue, that would corrupt integrity itself. If she has given him an opportunity, she has as good as put her integrity into his hands. Ah, dear Marwood! what's integrity to an opportunity?—Hark, I hear her!—Dear friend, retire into my closet, that I may examine her with more freedom—You'll pardon me, dear friend, I can make bold with you—There are books over the chimney—Quarles and Pryn, and the Short View of the Stage, with Bunyan's works, to entertain you—

[Exit MRS MARWOOD.]

Go, you thing, and send her in. [Exit PEG.]

Enter FOIBLE.

Lady Wish. O, Foible! where hast thou been? what hast thou been doing?

Foi. Madam, I have seen the party.

Lady Wish. But what hast thou done?

Foi. Nay, 'tis your ladyship has done, and are to do; I have only promised. But a man so enamoured!—so transported! well, if worshipping of pictures be a sin—poor sir Rowland, I say.

Lady Wish. The miniature has been counted like—But hast thou not betrayed me, Foible? hast thou not detected me to that faithless Mirabell?—What hadst thou to do with him in the park? answer me, has he got nothing out of thee?

Foi. So, mischief has been before-hand with me; what shall I say? [Aside.] Alas! madam, could I help it, if I met that confident thing? was I in fault? If you had heard how he used me, and all upon your ladyship's account, I'm sure you would not suspect my fidelity. Nay, if that had been the worst, I could have borne it: but he had a fling at your ladyship, too; and, then, I could not hold: but, i'faith, I gave him his own.

Lady Wish. Me! what did the filthy fellow say?

Foi. O, madam! 'tis a shame to say what he said—With his taunts and his fleers, tossing up his nose. 'Humph,' says he, 'what, you are a hatching some plot,' says he, 'you are so early abroad, or catering,' says he, 'ferreting for some disbanded officer, I warrant—Half-pay is but thin subsistence!'—says he. 'Well, what pension does your lady propose? Let me see;' says he, 'what, she must come down pretty deep now; she's superannuated,' says he, 'and—'

Lady Wish. Odds my life, I'll have him—I'll have him murdered! I'll have him poisoned! Where does he eat? I'll marry a drawer, to have him poisoned in his wine.

Foi. Poison him! poisoning's too good for him. Starve him, madam, starve him; marry sir Rowland, and get him disinherited. O, you would bless yourself, to hear what he said.

Lady Wish. A villain! superannuated!

Foi. 'Humph,' says he, 'I hear you are laying designs against me, too;' says he, 'and Mrs Millamant is to marry my uncle;'—he does not suspect a word of your ladyship: 'but,' says he, 'I'll fit you for that; I warrant you;' says he, 'I'll hamper you for that,' says he, 'you, and your old frippery, too,' says he, 'I'll handle you—'

Lady Wish. Audacious villain! handle me! would he durst?—Frippery! old frippery! Was there ever such a foul-mouthed fellow? I'll be married to-morrow; I'll be contracted to-night.

Foi. The sooner the better, madam.

Lady Wish. Will sir Rowland be here, say'st thou? when, Foible?

Foi. Incontinently, madam. No new sheriff's wife expects the return of her husband after knighthood, with that impatience, in which sir Rowland burns for the dear hour of kissing your ladyship's hand after dinner.

Lady Wish. Frippery! superannuated frippery! I'll frippery the villain; I'll reduce him to frippery and rags: A tatterdemallion—I hope, to see him hung with tatters, like a Long-lane pent-house, or a gibbet thief: A slander-mouthed railer! I warrant the spendthrift prodigal is in debt as much as the million lottery, or the whole court upon a birth-day. I'll spoil his credit with his taylor. Yes, he shall have my niece with her fortune, he shall.

Foi. He! I hope to see him lodge in Ludgate first, and angle into Black Friars for brass farthings, with an old mitten.

Lady Wish. Ay, dear Foible; thank thee for that, dear Foible. He has put me out of all patience. I shall never recompose my features, to receive sir Rowland with any œconomy of face. The wretch has fretted me, that I am absolutely decayed. Look, Foible!

Foi. Your ladyship has frowned a little too rashly, indeed, madam. There are some cracks discernible in the white varnish.

Lady Wish. Let me see the glass—Cracks, say'st thou? why, I am arrantly flayed!—I look like an old peeled wall. Thou must repair me, Foible, before sir Rowland comes, or I shall never keep up to my picture.

Foi. I warrant you, madam; a little art once made your picture like you; and, now, a little of the same art must make you like your picture. Your picture must sit for you, madam.

Lady Wish. But art thou sure sir Rowland will not fail to come? or will he not fail, when he does come? will he be importunate, Foible? for, if he should not be importunate—I shall never break decorums—I shall die with confusion, if I am forced to advance—Oh, no! I can never advance!—I shall swoon if he should expect advances. No, I hope sir Rowland is better bred, than to put a lady to the necessity of breaking her forms. I won't be too coy, neither.—I won't give him despair—But a little disdain is not amiss; a little scorn is alluring.

Foi. A little scorn becomes your ladyship.

Lady Wish. Yes, but tenderness becomes me best—A sort of a dyingness!—You see that picture has a—sort of a—Ha, Foible? a swimmingness in the eyes!—Yes, I'll look so!—My niece affects it, but she wants features. Is sir Rowland handsome? let my toilet be removed—I'll dress above. I'll receive sir Rowland here. Is he handsome? don't answer me. I won't know: I'll be surprised; I'll be taken by surprise.

Foi. By storm, madam, sir Rowland's a brisk man.

Lady Wish. Is he? O, then, he'll importune, if he's a brisk man. Let my things be removed. good Foible. [Exit LADY WISHFORT.]

Enter MRS FAINALL.

Mrs Fain. O, Foible, I have been in a fright lest I should come too late! That devil, Marwood, saw you in the park with Mirabell, and, I'm afraid, will discover it to my lady.

Foi. Discover what, madam!

Mrs Fain. Nay, nay, put not on that strange face. I am privy to the whole design, and know that Waitwell, to whom thou wert this morning married, is to personate Mirabell's uncle, and, as such, winning my lady, to involve her in those difficulties, from which Mirabell only must release her, by his making his conditions to have my cousin, and her fortune, left to her own disposal.

Foi. O, dear madam, I beg your pardon! It was not my confidence in your ladyship, that was deficient; but, I thought the former good correspondence between your ladyship and Mr Mirabell might have hindered his communicating this secret.

Mrs Fain. Dear Foible, forget that.

Foi. O, dear madam, Mr Mirabell is such a sweet winning gentleman—But your ladyship is the pattern of generosity—Sweet lady, to be so good! Mr Mirabell cannot chuse but be grateful. I find your ladyship has his heart still. Now, madam, I can safely tell your ladyship our success. Mrs Marwood has told my lady; but, I warrant, I managed myself. I turned it all for the better. I told my lady that Mr Mirabell railed at her. I laid horrid things to his charge, I'll vow; and my lady is so incensed, that she'll be contracted to sir Rowland to-night, she says;—I warrant I worked her up, that he may have her for asking for, as they say of a Welch maidenhead.

Mrs Fain. O rare Foible!

Foi. Madam, I beg your ladyship to acquaint Mr Mirabell of his success. I would be seen as little as possible to speak to him; besides, I believe madam Marwood watches me—She has a penchant; but, I know Mr Mirabell can't abide her.—[Calls.]—John—remove my lady's toilet. Madam, your servant. My lady is so impatient, I fear she'll come for me, if I stay.

Mrs Fain. I'll go with you up the back-stairs, lest I should meet her. [Exeunt.]

Enter MRS MARWOOD, from the closet.

Mrs Mar. Indeed, Mrs Engine, is it thus with you? Are you become a go-between of this importance? Yes, I shall watch you. Why, this wench is the pass-partout, a very master-key to every body's strong-box. My friend Fainall, have you carried it so swimmingly? I thought there was something in it; but it seems it is over with you. Your loathing is not from a want of appetite, then, but from a surfeit; else you could never be so cool to fall from a principal to be an assistant: to procure for him! a pattern of generosity, that I confess. Well, Mr Fainall, you have met with your match. O man, man! woman, woman! The devil's an ass! if I were a painter, I would draw him like an idiot, a driveller, with a bib and bells. Man should have his head and horns, and woman the rest of him. Poor simple fiend! Madam Marwood has a penchant, but he can't abide her—'Twere better for him you had not been his confessor in that affair, without you could have kept his counsel closer. I shall not prove another pattern of generosity—he has not obliged me to that with those excesses of himself; and now I'll have none of him. Here comes the good lady, panting ripe; with a heart full of hope, and a head full of care, like any chemist upon the day of projection.

Enter LADY WISFORT.

Lady Wish. O dear Marwood, what shall I say for this rude forgetfulness? But my dear friend is all goodness.

Mrs Mar. No apologies, dear madam. I have been very well entertained.

Lady Wish. As I'm a person, I am in a very chaos to think I should so forget myself—But I have such an olio of affairs, really I know not what to do—[Calls.]—Foible!—I expect my nephew, sir Wilfull, every moment, too—Why, Foible—He means to travel for improvement.

Mrs Mar. Methinks sir Wilfull should rather think of marrying, than travelling at his years. I hear he is turned of forty.

Lady Wish. O, he's in less danger of being spoiled by his travels—I am against my nephew's marrying too young. It will be time enough, when he comes back, and has acquired discretion to chuse for himself.

Mrs Mar. Methinks Mrs Millamant and he would make a very fit match. He may travel afterwards. 'Tis a thing very usual with young gentlemen.

Lady Wish. I promise you I have thought on't—And, since 'tis your judgment, I'll think on't again. I assure you I will; I value your judgment extremely. On my word I'll propose it. [Enter FOIBLE.] Come, come, Foible—I had forgot my nephew will be here before dinner—I must make haste.

Foi. Mr Witwould and Mr Petulant are come to dine with your ladyship.

Lady Wish. O dear, I can't appear, till I am dressed. Dear Marwood, shall I be free with you again, and beg you to entertain them? I'll make all imaginable haste. Dear friend, excuse me. [Exeunt LADY WISFORT and FOIBLE.]

Enter MRS MILLAMANT and MINCING.

Mill. Sure, never any thing was so unbred as that odious man. Marwood, your servant.

Mrs Mar. You have a colour; what's the matter?

Mill. That horrid fellow, Petulant, has provoked me into a flame—I have broke my fan—Mincing, lend me yours—is not all the powder out of my hair?

Mrs Mar. No. What has he done?

Mill. Nay, he has done nothing; he has only talked—Nay, he has said nothing, neither; but he has contradicted every thing, that has been said. For my part, I thought Witwould and he would have quarrelled.

Mia. I vow, mem, I thought once they would have fit.

Mill. Well, 'tis a lamentable thing, I swear, that one has not the liberty of chusing one's acquaintance, as one does one's clothes.

Mrs Mar. If we had that liberty, we should be as weary of one set of acquaintance, though never so good, as we are of one suit, though never so fine. A fool and a Divilly stuff would now and then find days of grace, and be worn for variety.

Mill. I could consent to wear them, if they would wear alike; but fools never wear out—They are such drop-de-berry things! without one could give them to one's chambermaid, after a day or two.

Mrs Mar. 'Twere better so, indeed. Or what think you of the play-house? A fine gay glossy fool should be given there, like a new masking habit after the masquerade is over, and we have done with the disguise. For a fool's visit is always a disguise; and never admitted by a woman of wit, but to blind her affair with a lover of sense. If you would but appear bare-faced now, and own Mirabell, you might as easily put off Petulant and Witwould, as your hood and scarf. And indeed 'tis time, for the town has found it: the secret is grown too big for the pretence. Indeed, Millamant, you can no more conceal it, than my lady Strammel can her face, that goodly face, which, in defiance of her Rhemish-wine tea, will not be comprehended in a mask.

Mill. I'll take my death, Marwood, you are more censorious than a decayed beauty, or a discarded toast. Mincing, tell the men they may come up. My aunt is not dressing here; their folly is less provoking than your malice. [Exit MINCING.] The town has found it! what has it found? That Mirabell loves me, is no more a secret, than it is a secret, that you discovered it to my aunt, or than the reason why you discovered it is a secret.

Mrs Mar. You are nettled.

Mill. You're mistaken. Ridiculous!

Mrs Mar. Indeed, my dear, you'll tear another fan, if you don't mitigate those violent airs.

Mill. Oh silly! Ha, ha, ha! I could laugh immoderately. Poor Mirabell! His constancy to me has quite destroyed his complaisance for all the world beside. I swear, I never enjoined it him, to be so coy—If I had the vanity to think he would obey me, I would command him to shew more gallantry. 'Tis hardly well-bred to be so particular on one hand, and so insensible on the other. But I despair to prevail, and so let him follow his own way. Ha, ha, ha! Pardon me, dear creature, I must laugh, ha, ha, ha! though, I grant you, 'tis a little barbarous, ha, ha, ha!

Mrs Mar. What pity 'tis, so much fine railery, and delivered with so significant gesture, should be so unhappily directed to misecarry!

VOL. II.

Mill. Ha? Dear creature, I ask your pardon—I swear I did not mind you.

Mrs Mar. Mr Mirabell, and you both, may think a thing impossible, when I tell him, by telling you—

Mill. O dear! what? for 'tis the same thing, if I hear it—Ha, ha, ha!

Mrs Mar. That I detest him, hate him, madam.

Mill. O madam! why, so do I—And yet the creature loves me; ha, ha, ha! How can one forbear laughing to think of it?—I am a sybil, if I am not amazed to think what he can see in me. I'll take my death, I think you are handsomer—and within a year or two as young—If you could but stay for me, I should overtake you—But that cannot be—Well, that thought makes me melancholic—Now I'll be sad.

Mrs Mar. Your merry note may be changed sooner than you think.

Mill. Do ye say so? Then, I'm resolved I'll have a song to keep up my spirits.

Enter MINCING.

Min. The gentlemen stay but to comb, madam; and will wait on you.

Enter PETULANT and WITWOULD.

Mill. Is your animosity composed, gentlemen?

Wit. Raillery, raillery, madam; we have no animosity—We hit off a little wit now and then, but no animosity—The falling-out of wits is like the falling-out of lovers—We agree in the main, like treble and base. Ha, Petulant!

Pet. Ay, in the main—But when I have a humour to contradict—

Wit. Ay, when he has a humour to contradict, then I contradict, too. What, I know my cue. Then we contradict one another like two battle-dores; for contradictions beget one another, like Jews.

Pet. If he says black's black—If I have a humour to say 'tis blue—Let that pass—All's one for that. If I have a humour to prove it, it must be granted.

Wit. Not positively must—But it may—it may.

Pet. Yes, it positively must, upon proof positive.

Wit. Ay, upon proof positive it must; but upon proof presumptive it only may. That's a logical distinction, now, madam.

Mrs Mar. I perceive your debates are of importance, and very learnedly handled.

Pet. Importance is one thing, and learning is another; but a debate's a debate, that I assert.

Wit. Petulant's an enemy to learning; he relies altogether on his parts.

Pet. No, I'm no enemy to learning; it hurts not me.

Mrs Mar. That's a sign indeed 'tis no enemy to you.

2 L

Pet. No, no, 'tis no enemy to any body, but them that have it.

Mill. Well, an illiterate man's my aversion. I wonder at the impudence of an illiterate man, to offer to make love.

Wit. That, I confess, I wonder at, too.

Mill. Ah! to marry an ignorant! that can hardly read or write.

Pet. Why should a man be any further from being married though he can't read, than he is from being hanged? The ordinary's paid for setting the psalm, and the parish priest for reading the ceremony. And for the rest which is to follow in both cases, a man may do it without book—So all's one for that.

Mill. D'ye hear the creature? Lord, here's company! I'll be gone.

[Exeunt MILLAMANT and MINCING.]

Enter SIR WILFULL WITWOULD, in a riding dress, and Footman.

Wit. In the name of Bartholomew and his fair, what have we here?

Mrs Mar. 'Tis your brother, I fancy. Don't you know him?

Wit. Not I—Yes, I think it is he—I've almost forgot him; I have not seen him since the revolution.

Foot. Sir, my lady's dressing. Here's company; if you please to walk in, in the mean time.

Sir Wil. Dressing! What, 'tis but morning here, I warrant, with you in London; we should count it towards afternoon in our parts, down in Shropshire—Why, then, belike my aunt han't dined yet—Ha, friend?

Foot. Your aunt, sir?

Sir Wil. My aunt, sir! yes, my aunt, sir, and your lady, sir; your lady is my aunt, sir—Why, what, dost thou not know me, friend? Why, then, send somebody hither, that does. How long hast thou lived with thy lady, fellow, ha?

Foot. A week, sir; longer than any in the house, except my lady's woman.

Sir Wil. Why, then, belike thou dost not know thy lady, if thou seest her; ha, friend?

Foot. Why, truly, sir, I cannot safely swear to her face in a morning, before she is dressed. 'Tis like I may give a shrewd guess at her by this time.

Sir Wil. Well, prithee, try what thou canst do; if thou canst not guess, inquire her out;—dost hear, fellow? and tell her, her nephew, Sir Wilful Witwould, is in the house.

Foot. I shall, sir.

Sir Wil. Hold ye—hear me, friend; a word with you in your ear: Prithee, who are these gallants?

Foot. Really, sir, I cannot tell; there come so many here, 'tis hard to know them all. [Exit.]

Sir Wil. Oons, this fellow knows less than a starling; I don't think a' knows his own name.

Mrs Mar. Mr Witwould, your brother is not behind-hand in forgetfulness—I fancy he has forgot you, too.

Wit. I hope so—The deuce take him, that remembers first, I say.

Sir Wil. Save you, gentleman and lady.

Mrs Mar. For shame, Mr. Witwould! why, won't you speak to him? And you, sir.

Wit. Petulant, speak.

Pet. And you, sir.

Sir Wil. No offence, I hope.

[Salutes MARWOOD.]

Mrs Mar. No sure, sir.

Wit. This is a vile dog, I see that already.—No offence! Ha, ha, ha! to him; to him, Petulant; smoke him.

Pet. It seems as if you had come a journey, sir; hem, hem. [Surveying him round.]

Sir Wil. Very likely, sir, that it may seem so.

Pet. No offence, I hope, sir,

Sir Wil. May be not, sir; thereafter as 'tis meant, sir.

Wit. Smoke the boots, the boots; Petulant, the boots; ha, ha, ha!

Pet. Sir, I presume upon the information of your boots.

Sir Wil. Why, 'tis like you may, sir: if you are not satisfied with the information of my boots, sir, if you will step to the stable, you may inquire further of my horse, sir.

Pet. Your horse, sir! your horse is an ass, sir!

Sir Wil. Do you speak by way of offence, sir?

Mrs Mar. The gentleman's merry, that's all, sir—S'life, we shall have a quarrel betwixt a horse and an ass, before they find one another out. You must not take any thing amiss from your friends, sir. You are among your friends, here, though it may be you don't know it—If I am not mistaken, you are sir Wilfull Witwould.

Sir Wil. Right, lady; I am sir Wilfull Witwould; so I write myself; no offence to any body, I hope; and nephew to the lady Wishfort of this mansion.

Mrs Mar. Don't you know this gentleman, sir?

Sir Wil. Hum! What, sure 'tis not—Yea, by'r lady but 'tis—Sheart! I know not whether 'tis or no—Yea, but 'tis, by the wrekin. Brother Anthony! what Tony, i'faith! what, dost thou not know me? By'r lady nor I thee, thou art so belaced, and so beperiwigged—Sheart! what dost not speak? art thou o'erjoyed?

Wit. 'Odso, brother, is it you? your servant, brother.

Sir Wil. Your servant! why yours, sir. Your servant again—Sheart, and your friend and servant to that—And a—(puff) and a flap-dragon for your service, sir; and a hare's foot, and a hare's scut for your service, sir; an' you be so cold and so courtly!

Wit. No offence, I hope, brother.

Sir Wil. 'Sheart, sir, but there is, and much offence—A plague! is this your inns o'court breeding, not to know your friends and your relations, your elders, and your betters?

Wit. Why, brother Wilfull of Salop, you may be as short as a Shrewsbury cake, if you please; but I tell you, 'tis not modish to know relations in town. You think you're in the country, where great lubberly brothers slabber and kiss one another, when they meet, like a call of sergeants—'Tis not the fashion here; 'tis not, indeed, dear brother.

Sir Wil. The fashion's a fool: and you're a fop, dear brother. 'Sheart, I have suspected this—By'r lady, I conjectured you were a fop, since you began to change the style of your letters, and write in a scrap of paper gilt round the edges, no bigger than a subpoena. I might expect this, when you left off honoured brother; and hoping you are in good health—To begin with a Rat me, knight, I'm so sick of a last night's debauch—Ods heart, and then tell a familiar tale of a cock and a bull, and a wench and a bottle, and so conclude—You could write news before you were out of your time, when you lived with honest Pimple-Nose, the attorney of Furnival's inn—You could intreat to be remembered then to your friends round the wrekin. We could have gazettes, then, and Dawk's letter, and the Weekly Bill, till of late days.

Pet. 'Slife, Witwould, were you ever an attorney's clerk? of the family of the Furnival's—Ha, ha, ha!

Wit. Aye, aye, but that was but for a while. Not long, not long; pshaw, I was not in my own power, then. An orphan, and this fellow was my guardian; ayë, ayë, I was glad to consent to that, man, to come to London. He had the disposal of me, then. If I had not agreed to that, I might have been bound 'prentice to a felt-maker in Shrewsbury; this fellow would have bound me to a maker of felts.

Sir Wil. 'Sheart, and better than be bound to a maker of fops, where, I suppose, you have served your time; and now you may set up for yourself.

Mrs Mar. You intend to travel, sir, as I'm informed.

Sir Wil. Belike I may, madam. I may chance to sail upon the salt seas, if my mind hold.

Pet. And the wind serve.

Sir Wil. Serve or not serve, I sha'nt ask licence of you, sir; nor the weather-cock your companion. I direct my discourse to the lady, sir; 'tis like my aunt may have told you, madam—Yes, I have settled my concerns, I may say now, and am minded to see foreign parts.—If an bow that the peace hold, whereby, that is, taxes abate.

Mrs Mar. I thought you had designed for France at all adventures.

Sir Wil. I can't tell that; 'tis like I may, and 'tis like I may not. I am somewhat dainty in making a resolution; because, when I make it, I keep it. I don't stand shill I, shall I, then; if I say't, I'll do't: but I have thoughts to tarry a small matter in town, to learn somewhat of your lingo first, before I cross the seas. I'd gladly have a spice of your French, as they say, whereby to hold discourse in foreign countries.

Mrs Mar. Here's an academy in town for that and dancing, and curious accomplishments, calculated purely for the use of grown gentlemen.

Sir Wil. Is there? 'tis like there may.

Mrs Mar. No doubt, you will return very much improved.

Wit. Yes, refined like a Dutch skipper from the whale-fishing.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FAINALL.

Lady Wish. Nephew, you are welcome.

Sir Wil. Aunt, your servant.

Fain. Sir Wilfull, your most faithful servant.

Sir Wil. Cousin Fainall, give me your hand.

Lady Wish. Cousin Witwould, your servant; Mr Petulant, your servant——Nephew, you are welcome again. Will you drink any thing after your journey, nephew, before you eat? dinner's almost ready.

Sir Wil. I'm very well, I thank you, aunt—However, I thank you for your courteous offer. 'Sheart, I was afraid you would have been in the fashion, too, and have remembered to have forgot your relations. Here's your cousin Tony; belike I may'nt call him brother for fear of offence.

Lady Wish. O he's a rallier, nephew—My cousin's a wit: and your great wits always rally their best friends to chuse. When you have been abroad, nephew, you'll understand raillery better.

[FAINALL and Mrs MARWOOD talk apart.

Sir Wil. Why, then, let him hold his tongue in the mean time; and rail, when that day comes.

Enter MINCING.

Min. Mem, I am come to acquaint your la'ship that dinner is impatient.

Sir Wil. Impatient! why, then, belike it won't stay, till I pull off my boots. Sweet-heart, can you help me to a pair of slippers? My man is with his horses, I warrant.

Lady Wish. Fy, fy, nephew! you would not pull off your boots here—Go down into the hall. Dinner shall stay for you—— [Exeunt MINCING and SIR WILFULL. My nephew's a little unbred; you'll pardon him, madam. Gentlemen, will you walk? Marwood?

Mrs Mar. I follow you, madam, before sir Wilfull is ready.

[Exeunt LADY WISHFORT, PETULANT, and WITWOULD.

Fain. Why, then, Foible's a procuress; an ar-rant, rank, match-making procuress. And I, it seems, am a husband, a rank husband; and my wife a very arrant, rank wife—all in the way of the world. 'Sdeath! to be a cuckold by anticipation, a cuckold in embryo! Sure I was born with budding antlers like a young satyr, or a citizen's child. 'Sdeath! to be outwitted, out-jilted, out-matrimonied! If I had kept my speed like a stag, 'twere somewhat! but to crawl after, with my horns like a snail, and be out-stripped by my wife—tis scurvy wedlock.

Mrs Mar. Then shake it off; you have often wished for an opportunity to part; and now you have it. But first prevent their plot; the half of Millamant's fortune is too considerable to be parted with to a foe, to Mirabell.

Fain. Aye, that had been mine, had you not made that fond discovery; that had been forfeited, had they been married. My wife had added lustre to my dishonour by that increase of fortune. I could have worn them tipt with gold, though my forehead had been furnished like a deputy-lieutenant's hall.

Mrs Mar. They may prove a cap of maintenance to you still, if you can away with your wife. And she's no worse than when you had her. You married her to keep you; and if you can contrive to have her keep you better than you expected, why should you not keep her longer than you intended?

Fain. The means, the means.

Mrs Mar. Discover to my lady your wife's conduct; threaten to part with her; my lady loves her, and will come to any composition to save her reputation. Take the opportunity of breaking it, just upon the discovery of this imposture. My lady will be enraged beyond bounds, and sacrifice niece, and fortune, and all at that conjuncture. And let me alone to keep her warm; if she should flag in her part, I will not fail to prompt her.

Fain. This has an appearance.

Mrs Mar. I'm sorry I hinted to my lady to endeavour a match between Millamant and sir Wilfull; that may be an obstacle.

Fain. O, for that matter, leave me to manage him; I'll disable him for that; he will drink like a Dane: after dinner, I'll set his hand in.

Mrs Mar. Well, how do you stand affected towards your lady?

Fain. Why, faith, I am thinking of it. Let me see—I am married already; so that's over. My wife has played the jade with me—Well, that's over too—I never loved her, or if I had, why that would have been over, too, by this time—

Jealous of her I cannot be, for I am certain; so there's an end of jealousy. Weary of her, I am, and shall be—No, there's no end of that; no, no, that were too much to hope. Thus far concerning my repose. Now, for my reputation. As to my own, I married not for it; so that's out of the question. And as to my part in my wife's—why, she had parted with hers before; so, bringing none to me, she can take none from me; 'tis against all rule of play, that I should lose to one, who has not wherewithal to stake.

Mrs Mar. Besides you forget, marriage is honourable.

Fain. Hum! faith, and that's well thought on; marriage is honourable, as you say; and, if so, wherefore should cuckoldom be a discredit, being derived from so honourable a root?

Mrs Mar. Nay, I know not; if the root be honourable, why not the branches?

Fain. So, so, why this point is clear—Well, how do we proceed?

Mrs Mar. I will contrive a letter, which shall be delivered to my lady at the time, when that rascal, who is to act sir Rowland, is with her. It shall come as from an unknown hand—for the less I appear to know of the truth, the better I can play the incendiary. Besides, I would not have Foible provoked, if I could help it, because you know she knows some passages: Nay, I expect all will come out; but let the mine be sprung first; and then I care not, if I am discovered.

Fain. If the worst come to the worst, I'll turn my wife to grass—I have already a deed of settlement to the best part of her estate, which I wheedled out of her; and that you shall partake at least.

Mrs Mar. I hope you are convinced, that I hate Mirabell now? you'll be no more jealous?

Fain. Jealous! no—by this kiss—let husbands be jealous; but let the lover still believe: or, if he doubt, let it be only to endear his pleasure, and prepare the joy that follows, when he proves his mistress true. But let husbands' doubts convert to endless jealousy; or, if they have belief, let it corrupt to superstition, and blind credulity. I am single, and will herd no more with them. True, I wear the badge, but I'll disown the order. And, since I take my leave of them, I care not if I leave them a common motto to their common crest.

All husbands must of pain or shame endure;
The wise too jealous are, fools too secure.

[Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Continues.

Enter LADY WISHFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady Wish. Is sir Rowland coming, say'st thou, Foible? and are things in order?

Foi. Yes, madam, I have put wax-lights in the sconces, and placed the footmen in a row in the hall, in their best liveries, with the coachman and postilion to fill up the equipage.

Lady Wish. Have you pulvilled the coachman and postilion, that they may not stink of the stable, when sir Rowland comes by?

Foi. Yes, madam.

Lady Wish. And are the dancers and the music ready, that he may be entertained in all points with correspondence to his passion?

Foi. All is ready, madam.

Lady Wish. And—well—and how do I look, Foible?

Foi. Most killing well, madam.

Lady Wish. Well, and how shall I receive him? in what figure shall I give his heart the first impression? there is a great deal in the first impression. Shall I sit? No, I won't sit—I'll walk—aye, I'll walk from the door upon his entrance; and then turn full upon him—no, that will be too sudden. I'll lie—aye, I'll lie down—I'll receive him in my little dressing room.—There's a couch—Yes, yes, I'll give the first impression on a couch—I won't lie neither, but loll and lean upon one elbow, with one foot a little dangling off, jogging in a thoughtful way—yes—and then, as soon as he appears, start, aye, start and be surprised, and rise to meet him in a pretty disorder—yes—oh! nothing is more alluring than a levee from a couch in some confusion—it shews the foot to advantage, and furnishes with blushes, and recomposing airs beyond comparison. Hark! there's a coach.

Foi. 'Tis he, madam.

Lady Wish. O dear! has my nephew made his addresses to Millamant? I ordered him.

Foi. Sir Wilfull is set in to drinking, madam, in the parlour.

Lady Wish. Odds my life, I'll send him to her. Call her down, Foible; bring her hither. I'll send him as I go—when they are together, then come to me, Foible, that I may not be too long alone with sir Rowland.

[Exit LADY WISHFORT.]

Enter MILLAMANT and MRS FAINALL.

Foi. Madam, I staid here, to tell your ladyship that Mr Mirabell has waited this half hour for an opportunity to talk with you, though my lady's orders were to leave you and sir Wilfull together. Shall I tell Mr Mirabell that you are at leisure?

Mil. No—what would the dear man have? I am thoughtful, and would amuse myself. Bid him come another time.

*There never yet was woman made,
Nor shall, but to be cursed,*

[Repeating and walking about,

That's hard!

Mrs Fain. You are very fond of sir John Suckling to-day, Millamant, and the poets.

Mil. He? aye, and filthy verses—So I am.

Foi. Sir Wilfull is coming, madam. Shall I send Mr Mirabell away?

Mil. Aye, if you please, Foible, send him away—or send him hither—just as you will, dear Foible. I think I'll see him—shall I? aye, let the wretch come.

Thyrsis, a youth of the inspired train.

[Repeating

Dear Fainall, entertain sir Wilfull—thou hast philosophy to undergo a fool; thou art married, and hast patience—I would confer with my own thoughts.

Mrs Fain. I am obliged to you, that you would make me your proxy in this affair; but I have business of my own.

Enter SIR WILFULL.

Oh! sir Wilful, you are come at the critical instant. There's your mistress up to the ears in love and contemplation; pursue your point; now or never.

Sir Wil. Yes; my aunt will have it so—I would gladly have been encouraged with a bottle or two, because I'm somewhat wary at first, before I am acquainted; but I hope, after a time, I shall break my mind—that is, upon further acquaintance—[This while MILLAMANT walks about, repeating to herself.—So, for the present, cousin, I'll take my leave—if so be, you'll be so kind to make my excuse: I'll return to my company—

Mrs Fain. O fy, sir Wilfull! what, you must not be daunted.

Sir Wil. Daunted! no, that's not it; it is not so much for that—for, if so be that I set on't, I'll do't. But only for the present, 'tis sufficient till further acquaintance, that's all—your servant.

Mrs Fain. Nay, I'll swear you shall never lose so favourable an opportunity, if I can help it—I'll leave you together, and lock the door.

[Exit MRS FAINALL and FOIBLE.

Sir Wil. Nay, nay, cousin—I have forgot my gloves. What d'ye do? 'Sheart, a' has locked the door, indeed. I think—nay, cousin Fainall, open the door—'Pshaw, what a vixen trick is this!—nay, now, a' has seen me, too—cousin, I made bold to pass through, as it were—I think this door's enchanted—

Mil. [Repeating.]

*I prithee, spare me, gentle boy,
Press me no more for that slight toy.*

Sir Wil. Anan! cousin, your servant.

Mill. That foolish trifle of a heart——

—Sir Wilfull!

Sir Wil. Yes—your servant. No offence, I hope, cousin.

Mill. [Repeating.]

I swear it will not do its part,

Though thou dost thine, employ'st thy power and art.

Natural, easy Suckling!

Sir Wil. Anan! Suckling! No such suckling, neither, cousin, nor stripling; I thank Heaven, I'm no minor.

Mill. Ah, rustic! ruder than Gothic!

Sir Wil. Well, well, I shall understand your lingo one of these days, cousin; in the mean while, I must answer in plain English.

Mill. Have you any business with me, sir Wilfull?

Sir Wil. Not at present, cousin. Yes, I made bold to see, to come and know if that how you were disposed to fetch a walk this evening; if so be, that I might not be troublesome, I would have sought a walk with you.

Mill. A walk? what then?

Sir Wil. Nay, nothing—only for the walk's sake, that's all——

Mill. I nauseate walking; 'tis a country diversion; I loath the country, and every thing that relates to it.

Sir Wil. Indeed! ha! look ye, look ye, you do? nay 'tis like you may—here are choice of pastimes here, in town, as plays, and the like; that must be confessed, indeed.

Mill. Ah l'étourdie! I hate the town, too.

Sir Wil. Dear heart, that's much—ha! that you should hate them both! ha! 'tis like you may; there are some can't relish the town, and others can't away with the country—'tis like you may be one of those, cousin.

Mill. Ha, ha, ha! Yes, 'tis like I may. You have nothing further to say to me?

Sir Wil. Not at present, cousin. 'Tis like, when I have an opportunity to be more private, I may break my mind in some measure—I conjecture you partly guess—however, that's as time shall try—but spare to speak, and spare to speed, as they say.

Mill. If it is of no great importance, sir Wilfull, you will oblige me by leaving me. I have, just now, a little business——

Sir Wil. Enough, enough, cousin; yes, yes, all a case—when you're disposed. Now's as well as another time; and another time as well as now. All's one for that—yes, yes, if your concerns call you, there's no haste; it will keep cold, as they say—cousin, your servant. I think this door's locked.

Mill. You may go this way, sir.

Sir Wil. Your servant, then; with your leave I'll return to my company. [Exit SIR WILFULL.]

Mill. Aye, aye; ha, ha, ha!

Like Phæbus sung the no less am'rous boy.

Enter MIRABELL.

Mira. Like Daphne she, as lovely and as coy.

Do you lock yourself up from me, to make my search more curious? Or is this pretty artifice contrived, to signify that here the chase must end, and my pursuit be crowned, for you can fly no further?

Mill. Vanity! No—I'll fly, and be followed to the last moment; though I am upon the very verge of matrimony, I expect you should solicit me as much, as if I were wavering at the grate of a monastery, with one foot over the threshold. I'll be solicited to the very last, nay, and afterwards.

Mira. What, after the last?

Mill. Oh! I should think I was poor, and had nothing to bestow, if I were reduced to an inglorious ease, and freed from the agreeable fatigues of solicitation.

Mira. But do you not know, when favours are conferred upon instant and tedious solicitation, that they diminish in their value, and that both the giver loses the grace, and the receiver lessens his pleasure.

Mill. It may be in things of common application; but never, sure, in love. Oh! I hate a lover, that can dare to think he draws a moment's air, independent on the bounty of his mistress. There is not so impudent a thing in nature, as the saucy look of an assured man, confident of success. The pedantic arrogance of a very husband has not so pragmatical an air. Ah! I'll never marry, unless I am first made sure of my will and pleasure.

Mira. Would you have them both before marriage? Or will you be acquainted with only the first, now?

Mill. Ah! don't be impertinent—my dear liberty, shall I leave thee? my faithful solitude, my darling contemplation, must I bid you, then, adieu? aye, adieu—my morning thoughts, agreeable wakings, indolent slumbers, ye douceurs, ye sommeils du matin, adieu—I can't do it; 'tis more than impossible—positively, Mirabell, I'll lie a-bed in a morning, as long as I please.

Mira. Then I'll get up in a morning as early as I please.

Mill. Ah! idle creature, get up when you will—and, d'ye hear, I won't be called names, after I am married; positively, I won't be called names.

Mira. Names!

Mill. Aye, as wife, spouse, my dear, joy, jewel, love, sweetheart, and the rest of that nauseous cant, in which men and their wives are so fulsomely familiar—I shall never bear that—good Mirabell, don't let us be familiar or fond, nor kiss before folks, like my lady Fadler and sir Francis: nor go in public, together, the first Sunday, in a new chariot, to provoke eyes and whispers; and then never be seen there together again; as if ~~we~~ were proud of one another the first week, and ashamed of one another ever after. Let us never visit together, nor go to a play together, but let us be very strange and well-bred: let us be as strange as if we had been married a great while; and as well-bred, as if we were not married at all.

Mira. Have you any more conditions to offer? hitherto, your demands are very reasonable.

Mill. Trifles—as liberty to pay and receive visits to and from whom I please; to write and receive letters, without interrogatories or wry faces on your part; to wear what I please; and choose conversation with regard only to my own taste; to have no obligation upon me to converse with wits, that I don't like, because they are your acquaintance; or to be intimate with fools, because they may be your relations: come to dinner, when I please; dine in my dressing-room, when I'm out of humour, without giving a reason: to have my closet inviolate; to be sole empress of my tea-table, which you must never presume to approach without first asking leave: and, lastly, wherever I am, you shall always knock at the door, before you come in. These articles subscribed, if I continue to endure you a little longer, I may, by degrees, dwindle into a wife.

Mira. Your bill of fare is something advanced in this latter account. Well, have I liberty to offer conditions—that when you are dwindled into a wife, I may not be beyond measure enlarged into a husband?

Mill. You have free leave; propose your utmost; speak, and spare not.

Mira. I thank you. Imprimis, then, I covenant, that your acquaintance be general; that you admit no sworn confidante, or intimate of your own sex: no she friend to screen her affairs under your countenance, and tempt you to make trial of a mutual secrecy: no decoy-duck to wheedle you a fop-scrambling to the play in a mask—then bring you home in a pretended fright, when you think you shall be found out—and rail at me for missing the play, and disappointing the frolic, which you had to pick me up, and prove my constancy.

Mill. Detestable imprimis! I go to the play in a mask!

Mira. Item, I article, that you continue to like your own face, as long as I shall: and, while it passes current with me, that you endeavour not to new-coin it. To which end, together with all vizards for the day, I prohibit all masks for the night made of oiled-skins, and I know not what. In short, I forbid all commerce with the gentlewoman in What-d'ye-call-it court. Item, I shut my doors against all procuresses with baskets, and pennyworths of muslin, china, fans, &c.—Item, when you shall be breeding—

Mill. Ah! name it not!

Mira. I denounce against all strait-lacing, squeezing for a shape, till you mould my boy's head like a sugar-loaf! and, instead of a man-child, make me father to a crooked-billet. Lastly, to the dominion of the tea-table I submit—But with proviso, that you exceed not in your province, but restrain yourself to native and simple tea-table drinks—as tea, chocolate, and coffee. As likewise to genuine and authorised tea-table talk—such as mending of fashions, spoiling reputations, railing at absent friends, and so forth—But that, on no account, you encroach upon the men's prerogative, and presume to drink healths, or toast fellows; for prevention of which, I banish all foreign forces, all auxiliaries to the tea-table—as orange-brandy, all anniseed, cinnamon, citron, and Barbadoes-waters, together with ratafia, and the most noble spirit of Clary—But for cowslip-wine, poppy-water, and all dormitives, those I allow.—These provisos admitted, in other things I may prove a tractable and complying husband.

Mill. O horrid provisos! filthy strong waters! I toast fellows! odious men! I hate your odious provisos.

Mira. Then we're agreed. Shall I kiss your hand upon the contract? And here comes one to be a witness to the sealing of the deed.

Enter MRS FAINALL.

Mill. Fainall, what shall I do? Shall I have him? I think I must have him.

Mrs Fain. Ay, ay, take him, take him! what should you do?

Mill. Well, then—I'll take my death, I'm in a horrid fright.—Fainall, I shall never say it—well—I think—I'll endure you.

Mrs Fain. Fy, fy! have him, have him, and tell him so in plain terms; for I am sure you have a mind to him.

Mill. Are you? I think I have—and the horrid man looks as if he thought so, too. Well, you ridiculous thing you, I'll have you—I won't be kissed, nor I won't be thanked—Here, kiss my hand though—so hold your tongue now; don't say a word.

Mrs Fain. Mirabell, there's a necessity for your obedience; you have neither time to talk, nor stay. My mother is coming; and, in my conscience, if she should see you, would fall into fits; and, may be, not recover time enough to return to sir Rowland, who, as Foible tells me, is in a fair way to succeed. Therefore, spare your ecstasies for another occasion, and slip down the back-stairs, where Foible waits to consult you.

Mill. Ay, go, go! In the mean time, I'll suppose you have said something to please me.

Mira. I am all obedience. [Exit MIRA.]

Mrs Fain. Yonder's sir Wilfull drunk; and so noisy, that my mother has been forced to leave sir Rowland to appease him; but he answers her only with singing and drinking—What they may have done by this time I know not; but Petulant and he were upon quarrelling as I came by.

Mill. Well; if Mirabell should not make a good husband; I am a lost thing; for I find I love him violently.

Mrs Fain. So it seems; for you mind not what is said to you.—If you doubt him, you had better take up with sir Wilfull.

Mill. How can you name that superannuated lubber? foh!

Enter WITWOULD from drinking.

Mrs Fain. So! is the fray made up, that you have left them?

Wit. Left them? I could stay no longer—I have laughed like ten christenings—I am tipsy with laughing—If I had staid any longer I should have burst—I must have been let out, and pierced in the sides like an unsized camlet—Yes, yes, the fray is composed; my lady came in like a noli prosequi, and stopt the proceedings.

Mill. What was the dispute?

Wit. That's the jest; there was no dispute. They could neither of them speak for rage; and so fell a sputtering at one another, like two roasting apples.

Enter PETULANT drunk.

Now, Petulant? all's over, all's well? gad, my head begins to whim it about—why dost thou not speak? thou art both as drunk and as mute as a fish.

Pet. Look you, Mrs Millamant—if you can love me, dear nymph—say it—and that's the conclusion—pass on, or pass off—that's all.

Wit. Thou hast uttered volumes, folios, in less than decimo sexto, my dear Lacedemonian. Sirrah, Petulant, thou art an epitomizer of words!

Pet. Witwould—You are an annihilator of sense!

Wit. Thou art a retailer of phrases; and dost deal in remnants of remnants, like a maker of pincushions!—Thou art, in truth, (metaphorically speaking) a speaker of short-hand!

Pet. Thou art (without a figure) just one-half of an ass, and Baldwin, yonder, thy half-brother, is the rest!—a gemini of asses split would make just four of you!

Wit. Thou dost bite, my dear mustard-seed! Kiss me for that.

Pet. Stand off! I'll kiss no more males. I have kissed your twin yonder in a humour of reconciliation, till he [Hiccup.] rises upon my stomach like a raddish.

Mill. Eh! filthy creature—what was the quarrel?

Pet. There was no quarrel—there might have been a quarrel.

Wit. If there had been words enow between them to have expressed provocation, they had gone together, by the ears, like a pair of castanets.

Pet. You were the quarrel.

Mill. Me!

Pet. If I have the humour to quarrel, I can make less matters conclude premises—if you are not handsome, what then, if I have a humour to prove it?—If I shall have my reward, say so; if not, fight for your face the next time yourself—I'll go sleep.

Wit. Do, wrap thyself up like a woodlouse, and dream revenge—and, hear me, if thou canst learn to write by to-morrow morning, pen me a challenge; I'll carry it for thee!

Pet. Carry your mistress's monkey a spider! go flea dogs, and read romances!—I'll go to bed.
[Exit PETULANT.]

Mrs Fain. He's horridly drunk—how came you all in this pickle?

Wit. A plot, a plot, to get rid of the knight!—Your husband's advice; but he sneaked off.

Enter SIR WILFULL drunk, and LADY WISHFORT.

Lady Wish. Out upon't, out upon't! at years of discretion, and comport yourself at this rattlepole rate!

Sir Wil. No offence, aunt.

Lady Wish. Offence! as I'm a person, I'm ashamed of you—fogh! how you stink of wine! d'ye think my niece will ever endure such a borachio? You're an absolute borachio.

Sir Wil. Borachio!

Lady Wish. At a time when you should commence an amour, and put your best foot foremost—

Sir Wil. Sheart, an you grudge me your liquor, make a hill—give me more drink, and take my purse.

Sings. Prithee fill me the glass—

Till it laugh in my face,

With ale that is potent and mellow;

He that whines for a lass

Is an ignorant ass,

For a bumper has not its fellow.

But if you would have me marry my cousin, say the word, and I'll do it—Wilfull will do it, that's the word—Wilfull will do it, that's my crest—my motto I have forgot.

Lady Wish. My nephew's a little overtaken, cousin—but 'tis with drinking, your health—On my word, you are obliged to him—

Sir Wil. In vino veritas, aunt: if I drunk your health to day, cousin—I am a borachio. But if you have a mind to be married, say the word, and send for the piper; Wilfull will do it. If not, dust it away, and let's have t'other round—Tony, ods-heart, where's Tony?—Tony's an honest fellow; but he spits after a bumper, and that's a fault.

Sings. We'll drink, and we'll never ha' done, boys
Put the glass, then, around with the sun, boys.

*Let Apollo's example invite us ;
For he is drunk every night,
And that makes him so bright,
That he's able next morning to light us.*

The sun's a good pimple, an honest soaker, he has a cellar at your antipodes. If I travel, aunt, I touch at your antipodes—your antipodes are a good rascally sort of topsy-turvy fellows—if I had a bumper, I'd stand upon my head and drink a health to them—A match or no match, cousin with the hard name?—aunt, Wilfull will do it.

Mill. Your pardon, madam, I can stay no longer—Sir Wilfull grows very powerful. Egh! how he smells! I shall be overcome, if I stay. Come, cousin.

[Exeunt MILLAMANT and MRS FAINALL.]

Lady Wish. Smells! he would poison a tallow-chandler and his family. Beastly creature, I know not what to do with him.—Travel quoth a! ay, travel, travel; get thee gone, get thee gone, get thee but far enough, to the Saracens, or the Tartars, or the Turks—for thou art not fit to live in a Christian commonwealth, thou beastly pagan!

Sir Wil. Turks! no; no Turks, aunt; your Turks are infidels, and believe not in the grape. Your Mahometan, your Musselman, is a dry stickard—No offence, aunt. My map says that your Turk is not so honest a man as your Christian—I cannot find by the map, that your Mufti is orthodox—whereby it is a plain case, that orthodox is a hard word, aunt, and [Hiccup.] Greek for charet.

Sings. *To drink is a Christian diversion,
Unknown to the Turk or the Persian :
Let Mahometan fools
Live by heathenish rules,
And be damned over tea-cups and coffee ;
But let British lads sing,
Crown a health to the king,
And a fig for your sultan and sopher.*

Enter FOIBLE, and whispers LADY WISHFORT.

Eh, Tony!

Lady Wish. Sir Rowland impatient! good lack, what shall I do with this beastly tumbril?—go lie down and sleep, you sot—or, as I'm a person, I'll have you bastinadoed with broomsticks. Call up the wenches with broomsticks.

Sir Wil. Ahey! wenches? where are the wenches?

Lady Wish. Dear cousin Witwould, get him away, and you will bind me to you inviolably. I have an affair of moment, that invades me with some precipitation—you will oblige me to all futurity.

Wit. Come, knight—plague on him, I don't know what to say to him—will you go to a cock-match?

VOL. II.

Sir Wil. With a wench, Tony? let me bite your cheek for that.

Wit. Horrible! he has a breath like a bag-pipe—Ay, ay, come, will you march, my Salopian?

Sir Wil. Lead on, little Tony—I'll follow thee, my Anthony, my Tanthony; sirrah, thou shalt be my Tantony, and I'll be thy pig.

—And a fig for your sultan and sopher.

[Exeunt SIR WILFULL, MR WITWOULD, and FOIBLE.]

Lady Wish. This will never do. It will never make a match—At least, before he has been abroad.

Enter WAITWELL, disguised, as for SIR ROWLAND.

Dear sir Rowland, I am confounded with confusion at the retrospection of my own rudeness.—I have more pardons to ask than the pope distributes in the year of jubilee. But, I hope, where there is likely to be so near an alliance—we may unbend the severity of decorum—and dispense with a little ceremony.

Wait. My impatience, madam, is the effect of my transport; and, till I have the possession of your adorable person, I am tantalized on the rack, and do but hang, madam, on the tenter of expectation.

Lady Wish. You have excess of gallantry, sir Rowland; and press things to a conclusion with a most prevailing vehemence—But a day or two for decency of marriage.

Wait. For decency of funeral, madam. The delay will break my heart—or, if that should fail, I shall be poisoned. My nephew will get an inkling of my designs, and poison me—and I would willingly starve him before I die—I would gladly go out of the world with that satisfaction. That would be some comfort to me, if I could but live so long as to be revenged on that unnatural viper.

Lady Wish. Is he so unnatural, say you? truly, I would contribute much, both to the saving of your life, and the accomplishment of your revenge.—Not that I respect myself; though he has been a perfidious wretch to me.

Wait. Perfidious to you!

Lady Wish. O, sir Rowland, the hours, that he has died away at my feet; the tears, that he has shed; the oaths, that he has sworn; the palpitations, that he has felt; the trances and tremblings, the ardours and the ecstasies, the kneelings and the risings, the heart-heavings and the hand-grippings, the pangs and the pathetic regards of his protesting eyes! O, no memory can register.

Wait. What, my rival! is the rebel my rival? a'dies.

Lady Wish. No, don't kill him at once, sir Rowland; starve him gradually, inch by inch.

Wait. I'll do it. In three weeks he shall be barefoot; in a month out at knees with begging an alms—he shall starve upward and upward, till he has nothing living but his head, and then go out in a stink, like a candle's end upon a save-all.

Lady Wish. Well, sir Rowland, you have the way—You are no novice in the labyrinth of love—You have the clue—But, as I am a person, sir Rowland, you must not attribute my yielding to any sinister appetite, or indigestion of widowhood: nor impute my complacency to any lethargy of continence—I hope you do not think me prone to any iteration of nuptials—

Wait. Far be it from me—

Lady Wish. If you do, I protest I must recede—or think that I have made a prostitution of decorums; but, in the vehemence of compassion, and to save the life of a person of so much importance—

Wait. I esteem it so—

Lady Wish. Or else you wrong my condescension—

Wait. I do not, I do not—

Lady Wish. Indeed, you do.

Wait. I do not, fair shrine of virtue.

Lady Wish. If you think the least scruple of carnality was an ingredient—

Wait. Dear madam, no. You are all camphire and frankincense; all chastity and odour.

Lady Wish. Or that—

Enter FOIBLE.

Foi. Madam, the dancers are ready, and there's one with a letter, who must deliver it into your own hands.

Lady Wish. Sir Rowland, will you give me leave? think favourably, judge candidly, and conclude you have found a person, who would suffer racks in honour's cause, dear sir Rowland, and will wait on you incessantly.

[Exit LADY WISHPORT.]

Wait. Fy, fy!—What a slavery have I undergone! Spouse, hast thou any cordial? I want spirits.

Foi. What a washy rogue art thou, to pant thus for a quarter of an hour's lying and swearing to a fine lady!

Wait. O, she is the antidote to desire. Spouse, thou wilt fare the worse for it. By this hand, I'd rather be a chairman in the dog-days—than act sir Rowland till this time to-morrow.

Enter LADY WISHPORT with a letter.

Lady Wish. Call in the dancers;—Sir Rowland, we'll sit, if you please, and see the entertainment. [Dance.] Now, with your permission, sir Rowland, I will peruse my letter—I would open it in your presence, because I would not make you uneasy. If it should make you uneasy I would burn it—speak, if it does—but you may see, the superscription is like a woman's hand,

Foi. By heaven! Mrs Marwood's. I know it. My heart akes—get it from her— [To him.]

Wait. A woman's hand! No, madam, that's no woman's hand, I see that already. That's somebody, whose throat must be cut.

Lady Wish. Nay, sir Rowland, since you give me a proof of your passion by your jealousy, I promise you I'll make a return, by a frank communication—You shall see it—we'll open it together—look you here.—Reads.—'Madam, though unknown to you,' (Look you there, 'tis from nobody, that I know) 'I have that honour for your character, that I think myself obliged to let you know you are abused. He, who pretends to be sir Rowland, is a cheat and a rascal—' O heaven's! what's this?

Foi. Unfortunate, all's ruined!

Wait. How, how! let me see, let me see;— [Reading.—'A rascal, and disguised, and suborned for that imposture,'—O villainy! O villainy!—'By the contrivance of—

Lady Wish. I shall faint, I shall die, ho!

Foi. Say, 'tis your nephew's hand.—Quickly, his plot, swear it, swear it.—

Wait. Here's a villain, madam! don't you perceive it, don't you see it?

Lady Wish. Too well, too well; I have seen too much.

Wait. I told you at first I knew the hand: a woman's hand! The rascal writes a sort of a large hand: your Roman hand—I saw there was a throat to be cut presently. If he were my son, as he is my nephew, I'd pistol him—

Foi. O, treachery! But are you sure, sir Rowland, it is his writing?

Wait. Sure! Am I here? Do I live? Do I love this pearl of India? I have twenty letters in my pocket from him, in the same character.

Lady Wish. How!

Foi. O, what luck it is, sir Rowland, that you were present at this juncture! this was the business that brought Mr Mirabell disguised to madam Millamant this afternoon. I thought something was contriving, when he stole by me, and would have hid his face.

Lady Wish. How, how!—I heard the villain was in the house, indeed; and, now, I remember, my niece went away abruptly, when sir Willfull was to have made his addresses.

Foi. Then, then, madam, Mr Mirabell waited for her in her chamber! but, I would not tell your ladyship, to discompose you, when you were to receive sir Rowland.

Wait. Enough, his date is short.

Foi. No, good sir Rowland, don't incur the law.

Wait. Law! I care not for law. I can but die; and, 'tis in a good cause—My lady shall be satisfied of my truth and innocence, though it cost me my life.

Lady Wish. No, dear sir Rowland, don't fight; if you should be killed, I must never shew my face: Or hanged!—O, consider my reputation, sir Rowland!—No, you shan't fight—I'll go in and examine my niece; I'll make her confess. I conjure you, sir Rowland, by all your love, not to fight.

Wait. I am charmed, madam; I obey. But some proof you must let me give you. I'll go for a black box, which contains the writings of my whole estate, and deliver that into your hands.

Lady Wish. Ay, dear sir Rowland, that will be some comfort; bring the black box.

Wait. And, may I presume to bring a contract to be signed this night? May I hope so far?

Lady Wish. Bring what you will; but come alive, pray, come alive. O, this is a happy discovery!

Wait. Dead or alive, I'll come—and, married we will be, in spite of treachery. Come, my buxom widow:

Ere long, you shall substantial proof receive,
That I'm an arrant knight——

Foi. Or arrant knave.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Continues.

LADY WISFORT and FOIBLE.

Lady Wish. Out of my house, out of my house, thou viper, thou serpent, that I have fostered! thou bosom traitress, that I raised from nothing! Begone, begone, begone! go, go!—That I took from washing of old gauze, and weaving of dead hair, with a bleak blue nose, over a chaffing-dish of starved embers, and dining behind a traverse-rag, in a shop no bigger than a birdcage,—go, go! starve again, do, do.

Foi. Dear madam, I'll beg pardon on my knees.

Lady Wish. Away! out, out! go, set up for yourself again—do, drive a trade, do, with your three-pennyworth of small ware, flaunting upon a pack-thread, under a brandy-seller's bulk, or against a dead wall by a ballad-monger. Go, hang out an old frisoner-gorget, with a yard of yellow Colberteen, again; do; an old gnawed mask, two rows of pins, and a child's fiddle; a glass necklace, with the beads broken, and a quilted night-cap with one ear. Go, go, drive a trade. These were your commodities, you treacherous trull! this was the merchandise you dealt in, when I took you into my house, placed you next myself, and made you governante of my whole family. You have forgot this, have you, now you have feathered your nest?

Foi. No, no, dear madam! Do but hear me; have but a moment's patience—I'll confess all. Mr Mirabell seduced me; I am not the first, that he has wheedled with his dissembling tongue; your ladyship's own wisdom has been deluded by him; then, how should I, a poor ignorant, defend myself? O, madam! if you knew but what he promised me; and how he assured me your ladyship should come to no damage—Or else the wealth of the Indies should not have bribed me to conspire against so good, so sweet, so kind a lady as you have been to me.

Lady Wish. No damage! What! to betray me, and marry me to a cast serving-man! to make me a receptacle, an hospital for a decayed pimp! No damage! O thou frontless impudence, more than a big-bellied actress!

Foi. Pray, do but hear me, madam; he could not marry your ladyship, madam—No, indeed, his marriage was to have been void in law; for, he was married to me first, to secure your ladyship. Yes, indeed; I inquired of the law in that case, before I would meddle or make.

Lady Wish. What, then, I have been your property, have I? I have been convenient to you, it seems—while you were catering for Mirabell, I have been broker for you! What, have you made a passive bawd of me?—This exceeds all precedent; I am brought to fine uses, to become a hotcher of second-hand marriages between Abigail and Andrews! I'll couple you. Yes, I'll baste you together, you and your Philander. I'll Duke's-Place you, as I'm a person. Your turtle is in custody already: you shall coo in the same cage, if there be a constable or warrant in the parish.

[Exit.]

Foi. O that ever I was born! O that I was ever married!—a bride! ay, I shall be a Bridewell bride, oh!

Enter MRS FAINALL.

Mrs Fain. Poor Foible, what's the matter?

Foi. O madam, my lady's gone for a constable! I shall be had to a justice, and put to Bridewell to beat hemp; poor Waitwell's gone to prison already.

Mrs Fain. Have a good heart, Foible; Mirabell's gone to give security for him. This is all Marwood's and my husband's doing.

Foi. Yes, yes, I know it, madam; she was in my lady's closet, and overheard all that you said to me before dinner. She sent the letter to my lady; and that missing effect, Mr Fainall laid this plot to arrest Waitwell, when he pretended to go for the papers; and, in the mean time, Mrs Marwood declared all to my lady.

Mrs Fain. Was there no mention made of me in the letter?—My mother does not suspect my being in the confederacy? I fancy Marwood has not told her, though she has told my husband.

Foi. Yes, madam; but my lady did not see that part: we stilled the letter before she read so far. Has that mischievous devil told Mr Fainall of your ladyship then?

Mrs Fain. Ay, all's out; my affair with Mirabell, every thing discovered. This is the last day of our living together, that's my comfort.

Foi. Indeed, madam! and so 'tis a comfort, if you knew all—he has been even with your ladyship; which I could have told you long enough since; but I love to keep peace and quietness by my good will: I had rather bring friends together, than set them at distance. But Mrs Marwood and he are nearer related than ever their parents thought for.

Mrs Fain. Say'st thou so, Foible? Canst thou prove this?

Foi. I can take my oath of it, madam; so can Mrs Mincing. We have had many a fair word from madam Marwood, to conceal something, that passed in our chamber one evening, when we were at Hyde Park;—and we were thought to have gone a walking: but we went up unawares,—though we were sworn to secrecy, too; madam Marwood took a book, and swore us upon it: but it was but a book of poems.—So long as it was not a bible-oath, we may break it with a safe conscience.

Mrs Fain. This discovery is the most opportune thing I could wish—Now, Mincing!

Enter MINCING.

Min. My lady would speak with Mrs Foible. mem. Mr Mirabell is with her; he has set your spouse at liberty, Mrs Foible, and would have you hide yourself in my lady's closet, till my old lady's anger is abated. O, my old lady is in a perilous passion, at something Mr Fainall has said; he swears, and my old lady cries. There's a fearful hurricane, I vow. He says, mem, how that he'll have my lady's fortune made over to him, or he'll be divorced.

Mrs Fain. Does your lady or Mirabell know that!

Min. Yes, mem, they have sent me to see if Sir Wilfull be sober, and to bring him to them. My lady is resolved to have him, I think, rather than lose such a vast sum as six thousand pounds. O, come Mrs Foible; I hear my old lady.

Mrs Fain. Foible, you must tell Mincing, that she must prepare to vouch when I call her.

Foi. Yes, yes, madam.

Min. O, yes, mem, I'll vouch any thing for your ladyship's service, be what it will.

[Ereunt FOIBLE and MINCING.]

Enter LADY WISHFORT and MRS MARWOOD.

Lady Wish. O my dear friend, how can I enumerate the benefits that I have received from your goodness! To you, I owe the timely discovery of the false vows of Mirabell; to you, I owe the detection of the impostor sir Rowland; and now, you are become an intercessor with my son-in-law, to save the honour of my house, and compound for the frailties of my daughter. Well, friend, you are enough to reconcile me to the bad world, or else I would retire to deserts and solitudes, and feed harmless sheep by groves and purling streams. Dear Marwood, let us leave the world, and retire by ourselves, and be shepherdesses.

Mrs Mar. Let us first dispatch the affair in hand, madam. We shall have leisure to think of retirement afterwards. Here is one who is concerned in the treaty.

Lady Wish. O daughter, daughter! is it possible thou shouldst be my child, bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, and, as I may say, another me, and yet transgress the minute particle of severe virtue? Is it possible you should lean aside to iniquity, who have been cast in the direct mould of virtue?

Mrs Fain. I don't understand your ladyship.

Lady Wish. Not understand! why, have you not been naught? have you not been sophisticated? Not understand! here I am ruined to compound for your caprices, and your cuckoldoms. I must part with my plate and my jewels, and ruin my niece, and all little enough—

Mrs Fain. I am wronged and abused, and so are you. 'Tis a false accusation, as false as hell! as false as your friend there, ay, or your friend's friend, my false husband!

Mrs Mar. My friend! Mrs Fainall? your husband my friend! what do you mean?

Mrs Fain. I know what I mean, madam, and so do you: and so shall all the world at a time convenient.

Mrs Mar. I am sorry to see you so passionate, madam. More temper would look more like innocence. But I have done. I am sorry my zeal to serve your ladyship and family should admit of misconstruction, or make me liable to affronts. You will pardon me, madam, if I meddle no more with an affair, in which I am not personally concerned.

Lady Wish. O dear friend, I am so ashamed that you should meet with such returns!—you ought to ask pardon on your knees, ungrateful creature! she deserves more from you, than all your life can accomplish—O don't leave me destitute in this perplexity!—no, stick to me, my good genius!

Mrs Fain. I tell you, madam, you're abused—Stick to you? ay, like a leech, to suck your best blood—she'll drop off, when she's full. Madam, you shan't pawn a bodkin, nor part with a brass counter, in composition for me. I defy them all. Let them prove their aspersions: I know my own innocence, and dare stand a trial.

[Erit.]

Lady Wish. Why, if she should be innocent, if she should be wronged after all, ha! I don't know what to think—and, I promise you, her education has been very unexceptionable—I may say it: for I chiefly made it my own care to initiate her very infancy in the rudiments of virtue, and to impress upon her tender years a young odium and aversion to the very sight of men—ay, friend, she would ha' shrieked, if she had but seen a man, till she was in her teens. As I'm a person, 'tis true—She was never suffered to play with a male child, though but in coats; nay, her very babies were of the feminine gender—O, she never looked a man in the face, but her own father, or the chaplain, and him we made a shift to put upon her for a woman, by the help of his long garments and his sleek face, till she was going in her fifteen. O dear friend, I can't believe it. No, no; as she says, let him prove it, let him prove it.

Mrs Mar. Prove it, madam? what, and have your name prostituted in a public court; yours and your daughter's reputation worried at the bar by a pack of bawling lawyers! to be ushered in with an O-yes of scandal; and have your case opened by an old fumbling lecher in a coif like a man-midwife, to bring your daughter's infamy to light; to be a theme for legal punsters, and quibblers by the statute; and become a jest, against a rule of court, where there is no precedent for a jest in any record, not even in Domesday-book; to discompose the gravity of the bench, and provoke naughty interrogatories in more naughty law Latin; while the good judge, tickled with the proceeding, simpers under a grey beard, and fidgets off and on his cushion, as if he had swallowed cantharides, or sat upon cow-itch!

Lady Wish. O, 'tis very hard!

Mrs Mar. And then to have my young revelers of the Temple take notes, like 'prentices at a conventicle; and after talk it over again in commons, or before drawers in an eating-house!

Lady Wish. Worse and worse.

Mrs Mar. Nay, this is nothing; if it would end here, 'twere well. But it must, after this, be consigned by the short-hand writers to the public press; and from thence be transferred to the hands, nay, into the throats and lungs of hawkers, with voices more licentious than the loud flounder-man's; and this you must hear till you are stunned; nay, you must hear nothing else for some days.

Lady Wish. O, 'tis insupportable! No, no, dear friend, make it up, make it up; ay, ay, I'll compound. I'll give up all, myself and my all, my niece and her all—any thing, every thing for composition.

Mrs Mar. Nay, madam, I advise nothing; I only lay before you, as a friend; the inconveniences which, perhaps, you have overseen. Here comes Mr Fainall; if he will be satisfied to huddle up all in silence, I shall be glad. You must think I would rather congratulate than condole with you.

Enter FAINALL.

Lady Wish. Ay, ay, I do not doubt it, dear Marwood: no, no, I do not doubt it.

Fain. Well, madam, I have suffered myself to be overcome by the importunity of this lady, your friend; and am content you shall enjoy your own proper estate during life; on condition you oblige yourself never to marry, under such penalty as I think convenient.

Lady Wish. Never to marry!

Fain. No more sir Rowlands—the next imposture may not be so timely detected.

Mrs Mar. That condition, I dare answer, my lady will consent to, without difficulty; she has already but too much experienced the perfidiousness of men. Besides, madam, when we retire to our pastoral solitude, we shall bid adieu to all other thoughts.

Lady Wish. Ay, that's true.

Fain. Next, my wife shall settle on me the remainder of her fortune, not made over already; and, for her maintenance, depend entirely on my discretion.

Lady Wish. This is most inhumanly savage; exceeding the barbarity of a Muscovite husband.

Fain. I learned it from his Czarish majesty's retinue, in a winter evening's conference over brandy and pepper, amongst other secrets of matrimony and policy, as they are at present practised in the northern hemisphere. But this must be agreed unto, and that positively. Lastly, I will be endowed, in right of my wife, with that six thousand pounds, which is the moiety of Mrs Millamant's fortune in your possession; and which she has forfeited (as will appear by the last-will and testament of your deceased husband, sir Jonathan Wishfort), by her disobedience in contracting herself against your consent or knowledge, and by refusing the offered match with Sir Wilfull Witwoud, which you, like a careful aunt, had provided for her.

Lady Wish. My nephew was non compos; and could not make his addresses.

Fain. I come to make demands—I'll hear no objections.

Lady Wish. You will grant me time to consider?

Fain. Yes, while the instrument is drawing, to which you must set your hand till more sufficient deeds can be perfected, which I will take care shall be done with all possible speed. In the mean while, I will go for the said instrument, and till my return, you may balance this matter in your own discretion. [Exit.]

Lady Wish. This insolence is beyond all precedent, all parallel; must I be subject to this merciless villain?

Mrs Mar. 'Tis severe, indeed, madam, that you should smart for your daughter's failings.

Lady Wish. 'Twas against my consent, that she married this barbarian; but she would have him, though her year was not out—ah! her first husband, my son Languish, would not have carried it thus. Well, that was my choice, this is hers; she is matched now, with a witness—I shall be mad, dear friend; is there no comfort for me? Must I live to be confiscated at this rebel-rate? Here come two more of my Egyptian plagues, too.

Enter MILLAMANT and SIR WILFULL.

Sir Wil. Aunt, your servant.

Lady Wish. Out, caterpillar! call not me aunt; I know thee not.

Sir Wil. I confess I have been a little in disguise, as they say—'Sheart! and I'm sorry for't. What would you have? I hope I committed no offence, aunt—and, if I did, I am willing to make satisfaction; and what can a man say fairer? If I have broke any thing, I'll pay for't, an' it cost a pound. And so let that content for what's past, and make no more words. For what's to come, to pleasure you, I'm willing to marry my cousin. So, pray, let's all be friends; she and I are agreed upon the matter before a witness.

Lady Wish. How's this, dear niece? have I any comfort? can this be true?

Mill. I am content to be a sacrifice to your repose, madam; and, to convince you that I had no hand in the plot, as you were misinformed, I have laid my commands on Mirabell to come in person, and be a witness, that I give my hand to this flower of knighthood; and, for the contract that passed between Mirabell and me, I have obliged him to make a resignation of it in your ladyship's presence;—he is without, and waits your leave for admittance.

Lady Wish. Well, I'll swear I am something revived at this testimony of your obedience; but I cannot admit that traitor—I fear I cannot fortify myself to support his appearance. He is as terrible to me as a Gorgon; if I see him, I fear I shall turn to stone, and petrify incessantly.

Mill. If you disoblige him, he may resent your refusal, and insist upon the contract still. Then 'tis the last time he will be offensive to you.

Lady Wish. Are you sure it will be the last time? if I were sure of that—shall I never see him again?

Mill. Sir Wilfull, you and he are to travel together, are you not?

Sir Wil. 'Sheart, the gentleman's a civil gentleman; aunt, let him come in; why, we are sworn brothers, and fellow-travellers. We are to be Pylades and Orestes, he and I—he is to be my interpreter in foreign parts. He has been over-seas once already; and, with proviso that I marry my cousin, will cross them once again, only to bear me company. 'Sheart, I'll call him in—an' I set on't once, he shall come in; and see who'll hinder him. [Goes to the door, and hems.

Mrs Mar. This is precious fooling, if it would pass; but I'll know the bottom of it.

Lady Wish. Oh, dear Marwood, you are not going.

Mrs Mar. Not far, madam; I'll return immediately.

[Exit MRS MARWOOD.

Enter MIRABELL.

Sir Wil. Look up, man, I'll stand by you; 'sbud, an' she do frown—she can't kill you; besides—harkee, she dare not frown desperately, because her face is none of her own; 'sheart, an' she should, her forehead would wrinkle like the coat of a cream-cheese; but mum for that, fellow-traveller.

Mira. If a deep sense of the many injuries I have offered to so good a lady, with a sincere remorse, and a hearty contrition, can but obtain the least glance of compassion, I am too happy. Ah, madam! there was a time—but let it be forgotten—I confess I have deservedly forfeited the high place, I once held, of sighing at your feet; nay, kill me not, by turning from me in disdain—I come not to plead for favour; nay, not for pardon; I am a suppliant only for pity—I am going where I never shall behold you more.

Sir Wil. How, fellow-traveller! you shall go by yourself, then.

Mira. Let me be pitied first: and afterwards forgotten—I ask no more.

Sir Wil. By'r lady, a very reasonable request, and will cost you nothing, aunt. Come, come, forgive and forget, aunt; why, you must, an' you are a Christian.

Mira. Consider, madam, in reality, you could not receive much prejudice; it was an innocent device; though, I confess, it had a face of guiltiness—it was at most an artifice, which love contrived—and errors, which love produces, have ever been accounted venial. At least think it is punishment enough, that I have lost what, in my heart, I hold most dear; that to your cruel indignation I have offered up this beauty, and with her my peace and quiet; nay, all my hopes of future comfort.

Sir Wil. An' he does not move me, would I may never be o' the quorum! An' it were not as good a deed as to drink, to give her to him again, I would I might never take shipping!—Aunt, if you don't forgive quickly, I shall melt, I can tell you that. My contract went no farther than a little mouth-glue, and that's hardly dry; one doleful sigh more from my fellow-traveller, and 'tis dissolved.

Lady Wish. Well, nephew, upon your account—ah! he has a false, insinuating tongue. Well, sir, I will stifle my just resentment, at my nephew's request—I will endeavour what I can to forget—but, on proviso, that you resign the contract with my niece immediately.

Mira. It is in writing, and with papers of concern; but I have sent my servant for it, and will deliver it to you, with all acknowledgments for your transcendent goodness.

Lady Wish. Oh, he has witchcraft in his eyes and tongue! when I did not see him, I could have bribed a villain to his assassination; but his appearance rakes the embers which have so long lain smothered in my breast.

[Aside.

Enter FAINALL and MRS MARWOOD.

Fain. Your debate of deliberation, madam, is expired. Here is the instrument; are you prepared to sign?

Lady Wish. If I were prepared, I am not empowered. My niece exerts a lawful claim, having matched herself, by my direction, to sir Wilfull.

Fain. That sham is too gross to pass on me—though 'tis imposed on you, madam.

Mill. Sir, I have given my consent.

Mira. And, sir, I have resigned my pretensions.

Sir Wil. And, sir, I assert my right; and will maintain it, in defiance of you, sir, and of your instrument. 'Sheart, an' you talk of an instrument, sir, I have an old fox by my thigh, shall hack your instrument of ram vellum to shreds, sir. It shall not be sufficient for a mittimus, or a tailor's measure; therefore, withdraw your instrument, or by'r lady, I shall draw mine.

Lady Wish. Hold, nephew, hold!

Mill. Good sir Wilfull, respite your valour.

Fain. Indeed? Are you provided of your guard, with your single beef-eater there? But I am prepared for you; and insist upon my first proposal. You shall submit your own estate to my management, and absolutely make over my wife's to my sole use, as pursuant to the purport and tenor of this other covenant. I suppose, madam, your consent is not requisite in this case; nor, Mr Mirabell, your resignation; nor, sir Wilfull, your right—you may draw your fox, if you please, sir, and make a bear-garden flourish somewhere else; for, here, it will not avail. This, my lady Wishfort, must be subscribed, or your darling daughter's turned adrift, like a leaky hulk, to sink or swim, as she and the current of this town can agree.

Lady Wish. Is there no means, no remedy, to stop my ruin? Ungrateful wretch! dost thou not owe thy being, thy subsistence, to my daughter's fortune?

Fain. I'll answer you, when I have the rest of it in my possession.

Mira. But that you would not accept of a remedy from my hands—I own I have not deserved you should owe any obligation to me; or else, perhaps, I could advise—

Lady Wish. O what! what! to save me and my child from ruin, from want, I'll forgive all that's past; nay, I'll consent to any thing to come, to be delivered from this tyranny.

Mira. Ay, madam; but that is too late; my reward is intercepted. You have disposed of her, who only could have made me a compensation for all my services: but be it as it may, I am resolved I'll serve you; you shall not be wronged in this savage manner.

Lady Wish. How! dear Mr Mirabell, can you be so generous at last! but it is not possible. Harkee, I'll break my nephew's match; you shall have my niece yet, and all her fortune, if you can but save me from this imminent danger.

Mira. Will you? I take you at your word. I ask no more. I must have leave for two criminals to appear.

Lady Wish. Aye, aye; any body, any body.

Mira. Foible is one, and a penitent.

Enter Mrs FAINALL, FOIBLE, and MINCING.

Mrs Mar. O, my shame! [MIRABELL and LADY WISHFORT go to Mrs FAINALL and FOIBLE.] these corrupt things are brought hither to expose me.

[To FAINALL.

Fain. If it must all come out, why let them know it; 'tis but the Way of the World. That shall not urge me to relinquish or abate one tittle of my terms; no, I will insist the more.

Foi. Yes, indeed, madam; I'll take my bible-oath of it.

Min. And so will I, mem.

Lady Wish. O Marwood, Marwood, art thou false! My friend deceive me! Hast thou been a wicked accomplice with that profligate man?

Mrs Mar. Have you so much ingratitude and injustice, to give credit, against your friend, to the aspersions of two such mercenary trulls?

Min. Mercenary, mem! I scorn your words. 'Tis true, we found you and Mr Fainall in the blue garret; by the same token, you swore us to secrecy upon Messalina's poems. Mercenary! No, if we would have been mercenary, we should have held our tongues; you would have bribed us sufficiently.

Fain. Go, you are an insignificant thing.—Well, what are you the better for this? Is this Mr Mirabell's expedient? I'll be put off no longer—You, thing, that was a wife, shall smart for this. I will not leave thee wherewithal to hide thy shame: Your person shall be naked as your reputation.

Mrs Fain. I despise you, and defy your malice—You have aspersed me wrongfully—I have proved your falsehood—Go, you and your treacherous—I will not name it, but starve together—Perish!

Fain. Not while you are worth a groat, indeed, my dear—madam, I'll be fooled no longer.

Lady Wish. Ah, Mr Mirabell, this is small comfort, the detection of this affair.

Mira. O, in good time—Your leave for the other offender and penitent to appear, madam.

Enter WAITWELL, with a box of writings.

Lady Wish. O sir Rowland—Well, rascal?

Wait. What your ladyship pleases—I have brought the black box at last, madam.

Mira. Give it me. Madam, you remember your promise.

Lady Wish. Aye, dear sir.

Mira. Where are the gentlemen?

Wait. At hand, sir, rubbing their eyes—just risen from sleep.

Fain. 'Sdeath! what's this to me? I'll not wait your private concerns.

Enter PETULANT and WITWOULD.

Pet. How now? what is the matter? whose hand's out?

Wit. Heyday! what, are you all together, like players at the end of the last act?

Mira. You may remember, gentlemen, I once requested your hands as witnesses to a certain parchment.

Wit. Aye I do, my hand I remember—Petulant set his mark.

Mira. You wrong him; his name is fairly written, as shall appear. You do not remember, gentlemen, any thing of what that parchment contained?—

[Undoing the box.

Wit. No.

Pet. Not I. I writ, I read nothing.

Mira. Very well, now you shall know—madam, your promise.

Lady Wish. Aye, aye, sir, upon my honour.

Mira. Mr Fainall, it is now time that you should know, that your lady, while she was at her own disposal, and before you had, by your insinuations, wheedled her out of a pretended settlement of the greatest part of her fortune—

Fain. Sir! pretended!

Mira. Yes, sir, I say, that this lady while a widow, having, it seems, received some cautions respecting your inconstancy and tyranny of temper, which, from her own partial opinion and fondness of you, she could never have suspected——She did, I say, by the wholesome advice of friends, and of sages learned in the laws of this land, deliver this same, as her act and deed, to me, in trust, and to the uses within mentioned. You may read if you please [Holding the parchment]; though, perhaps, what is written on the back may serve your occasions.

Fain. Very likely, sir. What's here? Damnation!

[Reads.] 'A deed of conveyance of the whole estate real of Arabella Languish, widow, in trust, to Edward Mirabell.'

Confusion!

Mir. Even so, sir; 'tis The Way of the World, sir; of the widows of the world. I suppose this deed may bear an elder date than what you have obtained from your lady.

Fain. Perfidious fiend! then thus I'll be revenged——

[Offers to run at Mrs FAINALL.

Sir Wil. Hold, sir! now you may make your Bear-garden flourish somewhere else, sir.

Fain. Mirabell, you shall hear of this, sir; be sure you shall—Let me pass, oaf. [Erit.

Mrs Fain. Madam, you seem to stifle your resentment; you had better give it vent.

Mrs Mar. Yes, it shall have vent—and to your confusion, or I'll perish in the attempt.

[Erit.

Lady Wish. O daughter, daughter! 'tis plain thou hast inherited thy mother's prudence.

Mrs Fain. Thank Mr Mirabell, a cautious friend, to whose advice all is owing.

Lady Wish. Well, Mr Mirabell, you have kept your promise; and I must perform mine. First, I pardon, for your sake, sir Rowland there and Foible. The next thing is to break the matter to my nephew—and how to do that——

Mira. For that, madam, give yourself no trouble—let me have your consent—Sir Wilfull is my friend; he has had compassion upon lovers, and generously engaged a volunteer in this action, for our service; and now designs to prosecute his travels.

Sir Wil. 'Sheart, aunt, I have no mind to marry. My cousin's a fine lady, and the gentleman loves her, and she loves him, and they deserve one another; my resolution is to see foreign parts—I have set on it—and when I'm set on't, I must do it. And if these two gentlemen would travel, too, I think they may be spared.

Pet. For my part, I say little—I think things are best; off or on.

Wait. Egad, I understand nothing of the matter—I'm in a maze yet, like a dog in a dancing-school.

Lady Wish. Well, sir, take her, and with her all the joy I can give you.

Mill. Why does the man not take me? Would you have me give myself to you over again?

Mira. Aye, and over and over again! [Kisses her hand.] I would have you as often as possibly I can. Well, Heaven grant I love you not too well; that's all my fear.

Sir Wil. 'Sheart, you'll have time enough to toy after you're married; or, if you will toy now, let us have a dance in the mean time; that we, who are not lovers, may have some other employment, besides looking on.

Mira. With all my heart, dear sir Wilfull.—What shall we do for music?

Foi. O, sir, some that were provided for sir Rowland's entertainment are yet within call.

[A dance.

Lady Wish. As I am a person, I can hold out no longer: I have wasted my spirits so to day already, that I am ready to sink under the fatigue: and I cannot but have some fears upon me yet, that my son Fainall will pursue some desperate course.

Mira. Madam, disquiet not yourself on that account; to my knowledge his circumstances are such, he must of force comply. For my part, I will contribute all that in me lies to a re-union: in the mean time, madam, [To Mrs Fainall.] let me, before these witnesses, restore to you this deed of trust; it may be a means, well managed, to make you live easily together.

From hence, let those be warned, who mean to wed,

Lest mutual falsehood stain the bridal-bed:

For each deceiver to his cost may find,

That marriage frauds too oft are paid in kind.

[Exeunt omnes.]

ACT I.

SCENE I.

VALENTINE in his chamber reading; JEREMY waiting.—Several books upon the table.

Val. JEREMY!

Jer. Sir.

Val. Here, take away; I'll walk a turn, and digest what I have read.

Jer. You'll grow devilish fat upon this paper diet!

[Aside, and taking away the books.]

Val. And d'ye hear? go you to breakfast—
There's a page doubled down in Epictetus, that is a feast for an emperor.

Jer. Was Epictetus a real cook, or did he only write receipts?

Val. Read, read, sirrah, and refine your appetite; learn to live upon instruction; feast your mind, and mortify your flesh. Read, and take your nourishment in at your eyes; shut up your mouth, and chew the cud of understanding. So Epictetus advises.

Jer. O lord! I have heard much of him, when I waited upon a gentleman at Cambridge. Pray, what was that Epictetus?

Val. A very rich man—not worth a groat!

Jer. Humph! and so he has made a very fine feast, where there is nothing to be eaten!

Val. Yes.

Jer. Sir, you're a gentleman, and probably understand this fine feeding; but, if you please, I had rather be at board-wages. Does your Epictetus, or your Seneca here, or any of these poor rich rogues, teach you how to pay your debts without money? Will they shut up the mouths of your creditors? Will Plato be bail for you? or Diogenes, because he understands confinement, and lived in a tub, go to prison for you? 'Slife, sir, what do you mean, to mew yourself up here with three or four musty books, in commendation of starving and poverty?

Val. Why, sirrah, I have no money, you know it; and therefore resolve to rail at all that have: and in that I but follow the examples of the wisest and wittiest men in all ages—these poets and philosophers, whom you naturally hate, for just such another reason; because they abound in sense, and you are a fool.

Jer. Ay, sir, I am a fool, I know it; and yet, Heaven help me! I'm poor enough to be a wit. But I was always a fool, when I told you what your expences would bring you to; your coaches and your liveries; your treats and your balls; your being in love with a lady that did not care a farthing for you in your prosperity; and keeping company with wits, that cared for nothing but your prosperity, and now, when you are poor, hate you as much as they do one another.

Val. Well! and now I am poor, I have an opportunity to be revenged on them all; I'll pursue Angelica with more love than ever, and appear more notoriously her admirer in this restraint, than when I openly rivalled the rich fops, that made court to her. So shall my poverty be a mortification to her pride, and perhaps make her compassionate the love, which has principally reduced me to this lowness of fortune. And for the wits, I'm sure I am in a condition to be even with them.

Jer. Nay, your condition is pretty even with theirs, that's the truth on't.

Val. I'll take some of their trade out of their hands.

Jer. Now, Heaven of mercy continue the tax upon paper!—You don't mean to write?

Val. Yes, I do; I'll write a play.

Jer. Hem!—Sir, if you please to give me a small certificate of three lines—only to certify those whom it may concern, that the bearer hereof, Jeremy Fetch by name, has, for the space of seven years, truly and faithfully served Valentine Legend, esquire; and that he is not now turned away for any misdemeanour; but does voluntarily dismiss his master from any future authority over him—

Val. No, sirrah; you shall live with me still.

Jer. Sir, it's impossible—I may die with you, starve with you, or be damned with your works: but to live, even three days, the life of a play, I no more expect it, than to be canonized for a muse after my decease.

Val. You are witty, you rogue, I shall want your help—I'll have you learn to make couplets, to tag the end of acts. D'ye hear? get the maids to crambo in an evening, and learn the knack of rhyming; you may arrive at the height of a song sent by an unknown hand, or a chocolate-house lampoon.

Jer. But, sir, is this the way to recover your father's favour? Why, sir Sampson will be irreconcilable. If your younger brother should come from sea, he'd never look upon you again. You're undone, sir; you're ruined; you won't have a friend left in the world, if you turn poet. Ah, pox confound that Will's coffee-house! it has ruined more young men than the Royal Oak lottery! Nothing thrives that belongs to it. The man of the house would have been an alderman by this time, with half the trade, if he had set up in the city. For my part, I never sit at the door, that I don't get double the stomach that I do at a horse-race. The air upon Banstead Downs is nothing to it for a whetter; yet I never see it, but the spirit of famine appears to me—sometimes like a decayed porter, worn out with pimping, and carrying billet-doux and songs; not like other porters for hire, but for the jest's sake. Now, like a thin chairman, melted down to half his proportion, with carrying a poet upon tick, to visit some great fortune; and his fare to be paid him, like the wages of sin, either at the day of marriage, or the day of death.

Enter SCANDAL.

Scand. What! Jeremy holding forth?

Val. The rogue has (with all the wit he could muster up) been declaiming against wit.

Scand. Ay? Why, then, I'm afraid Jeremy has wit: for wherever it is, it's always contriving its own ruin.

Jer. Why, so I have been telling my master, sir. Mr Scandal, for Heaven's sake, sir, try if you can dissuade him from turning poet.

Scand. Poet! He shall turn soldier first, and rather depend upon the outside of his head, than the lining! Why, what the devil! has not your poverty made you enemies enough? must you needs shew your wit to get more?

Jer. Ay, more indeed: for who cares for any body that has more wit than himself?

Scand. Jeremy speaks like an oracle. Don't you see how worthless great men and dull rich rogues avoid a witty man of small fortune? Why, he looks like a writ of inquiry into their titles and estates; and seems commissioned by Heaven to seize the better half.

Val. Therefore, I would rail in my writings, and be revenged.

Scand. Rail! at whom? the whole world? Impotent and vain! Who would die a martyr to sense, in a country where the religion is folly? You may stand at bay for a while; but, when the full cry is against you, you shan't have fair play for your life. If you can't be fairly run down by the hounds, you will be treacherously shot by the huntsmen. No; turn pimp, flatterer, quack, lawyer; any thing but poet. A modern poet is worse, more servile, timorous, and fawning, than any I have named: without you could retrieve the ancient honours of the name, recal the stage of Athens, and be allowed the force of open honest satire.

Val. You are as inveterate against our poets, as if your character had been lately exposed upon the stage. Nay, I am not violently bent upon the trade.—[One knocks.] Jeremy, see who's there. [JEREMY goes to the door.]—But tell me what you would have me do?—What do the world say of me, and my forced confinement?

Scand. The world behaves itself, as it uses to do on such occasions. Some pity you, and condemn your father: others excuse him, and blame you. Only the ladies are merciful, and wish you well: since love and pleasurable expence have been your greatest faults.

JEREMY returns.

Val. How now?

Jer. Nothing new, sir. I have dispatched some half a dozen duns with as much dexterity as an hungry judge does causes at dinner time.

Val. What answer have you given them?

Scand. Patience, I suppose—the old receipt!

Jer. No, faith, sir: I have put them off so long with patience and forbearance, and other fair words, that I was forced to tell them in plain downright English—

Val. What?

Jer. That they should be paid.

Val. When?

Jer. To-morrow.

Val. And how the devil do you mean to keep your word?

Jer. Keep it? Not at all: it has been so very much stretched, that I reckon it will break of course by to-morrow, and nobody be surprised at the matter!—[knocking.]—Again! Sir, if you don't like my negotiation, will you be pleased to answer these yourself?

Val. See who they are. [Exit JEREMY.] By this, Scandal, you may see what it is to be great. Secretaries of state, presidents of the council, and generals of an army, lead just such a life as I do; have just such crowds of visitants in a morning, all soliciting of past promises; which are but a civiler sort of duns, that lay claim to voluntary debts.

Scand. And you, like a truly great man, having engaged their attendance, and promised more than ever you intended to perform, are more perplexed to find evasions, than you would be to invent the honest means of keeping your word, and gratifying your creditors.

Val. Scandal, learn to spare your friends, and do not provoke your enemies. This liberty of your tongue will one day bring confinement on your body, my friend.

Enter JEREMY.

Jer. O, sir, there's Trapland the scrivener, with two suspicious fellows, like lawful pads, that would knock a man down with pocket tipstaves!—And there's your father's steward; and the nurse, with one of your children, from Twittenham.

Val. Pox on her! could she find no other time to fling my sins in my face? Here! give her this, [gives money.] and bid her trouble me no more.

Scand. What, is it bouncing Margery, with my godson?

Jer. Yes, sir.

Scand. My blessing to the boy, with this token [gives money.] of my love.

Val. Bid Trapland come in. If I can give that Cerberus a sop, I shall be at rest for one day.

[JEREMY goes out, and brings in TRAPLAND.]

O Mr Trapland! my old friend! welcome. Jeremy, a chair, quickly: a bottle of sack, and a toast—fly—a chair first.

Trap. A good morning to you, Mr Valentine; and to you, Mr Scandal.

Scand. The morning's a very good morning, if you don't spoil it.

Val. Come, sit you down; you know his way.

Trap. [sits.] There is a debt, Mr Valentine, of fifteen hundred pounds, of pretty long standing—

Val. I cannot talk about business with a thirsty palate. Sirrah! the sack!

Trap. And I desire to know what course you have taken for the payment.

Val. Faith, and troth, I am heartily glad to see you—my service to you! fill, fill, to honest Mr Trapland—fuller.

Trap. Hold! sweetheart—this is not to our business. My service to you, Mr Scandal!—[drinks.]—I have forborn as long—

Val. T'other glass, and then we'll talk—Fill, Jeremy.

Trap. No more, in truth—I have forborn, I say—

Val. Sirrah! fill! when I bid you. And how does your handsome daughter?—Come, a good husband to her. [drinks.]

Trap. Thank you—I have been out of this money—

Val. Drink first. Scandal, why do you not drink? [They drink.]

Trap. And, in short, I can be put off no longer.

Val. I was much obliged to you for your supply: it did me signal service in my necessity. But you delight in doing good. Scandal, drink to me, my friend Trapland's health. An honest man lives not, nor one more ready to serve his friend in distress, though I say it to his face. Come, fill each man his glass.

Scand. What? I know Trapland has been a whoremaster, and loves a wench still. You never knew a whoremaster, that was not an honest fellow.

Trap. Fie, Mr Scandal, you never knew!—

Scand. What don't I know?—I know the buxom black widow in the Poultry—Eight hundred pounds a-year jointure, and twenty thousand pounds in money. Ahah! old Trap.

Val. Say you so, i'faith? Come, we'll remember the widow: I know whereabouts you are; come, to the widow.

Trap. No more, indeed.

Val. What! the widow's health? Give it him—off with it. [They drink.]—A lovely girl, i' faith! black sparkling eyes, soft pouting ruby lips! Better sealing there, than a bond for a million, ha!

Trap. No, no, there's no such thing; we'd better mind our business—You're a wag!

Val. No, faith, we'll mind the widow's business: fill again. Pretty round heaving breasts, a Barbary shape, would stir an anchorite; and the prettiest foot! Oh, if a man could but fasten his eyes to her feet, as they steal in and out, and play at bo-peep under her petticoats—ha! Mr Trapland!

Trap. Verily, give me a glass—you're a wag—and here's to the widow. [Drinks.]

Scand. He begins to chuckle—ply him close, or he'll relapse into a dun.

Enter Officer.

Off. By your leave, gentlemen.—Mr Trapland, if we must do our office, tell us.—We have half a dozen gentlemen to arrest in Pall-mall and Covent-garden; and if we don't make haste, the chairmen will be abroad, and block up the chocolate-houses; and then our labour's lost.

Trap. Odo, that's true. Mr Valentine, I love mirth; but business must be done; are you ready to—

Jer. Sir, your father's steward says, he comes to make proposals concerning your debts.

Val. Bid him come in: Mr. Trapland, send away your officer; you shall have an answer presently.

Trap. Mr Snap, stay within call. [Exit Officer.]

Enter Steward, who whispers VALENTINE,

Scand. Here's a dog now, a traitor in his wine! Sirrah, refund the sack: Jeremy, fetch him some warm water, or I'll rip up his stomach, and go the shortest way to his conscience.

Trap. Mr Scandal, you are uncivil. I did not value your sack; but you cannot expect it again, when I have drunk it.

Scand. And how do you expect to have your money again, when a gentleman has spent it?

Val. You need say no more. I understand the conditions; they are very hard, but my necessity is very pressing: I agree to them. Take Mr Trapland with you, and let him draw the writing.—Mr Trapland, you know this man; he shall satisfy you.

Trap. Sincerely, I am loth to be thus pressing; but my necessity—

Val. No apology, good Mr Scrivener; you shall be paid.

Trap. I hope you forgive me; my business requires—

[Exit TRAPLAND, Steward and JEREMY.]

Scand. He begs pardon like a hangman at an execution.

Val. But I have got a reprieve.

Scand. I am surprised; what, does your father relent?

Val. No; he has sent me the hardest conditions in the world. You have heard of a booby brother of mine, that was sent to sea three years ago? This brother, my father hears, is landed; whereupon he very affectionately sends me word, 'If I will make a deed of conveyance of my right to his estate after his death to my younger brother, he will immediately furnish me with four thousand pounds to pay my debts, and make my fortune.' This was once proposed before, and I refused it; but the present impatience of my creditors for their money, and my own impatience of confinement, and absence from Angelica, force me to consent.

Scand. A very desperate demonstration of your love to Angelica! and I think she has never given you any assurance of hers.

Val. You know her temper; she never gave me any great reason either for hope or despair.

Scand. Women of her airy temper, as they seldom think before they act, so they rarely give us any light to guess at what they mean: but you have little reason to believe that a woman of this age, who has had an indifference for you in your prosperity, will fall in love with your ill fortune. Besides, Angelica has a great fortune of her own; and great fortunes either expect another great fortune, or a fool.

Enter JEREMY.

Jer. More misfortunes, sir.

Val. What, another dun?

Jer. No, sir; but Mr Tattle is come to wait upon you.

Val. Well, I cannot help it—you must bring him up; he knows I don't go abroad.

[Exit JEREMY.]

Scand. Pox on him! I'll be gone.

Val. No, prithee stay: Tattle and you should never be asunder; you are light and shadow, and shew one another. He is perfectly thy reverse, both in humour and understanding; and, as you set up for defamation, he is a mender of reputations.

Scand. A mender of reputations! ay, just as he is a keeper of secrets, another virtue that he sets up for in the same manner. For the rogue will speak aloud in the posture of a whisper; and deny a woman's name, while he gives you the marks of her person. He will forswear receiving a letter from her, and at the same time shew you her hand in the superscription: and yet, perhaps, he has counterfeited her hand too, and sworn to a truth; but he hopes not to be believed; and refuses the reputation of a lady's favour, as a doctor says no to a bishoprick, only that it may be granted him.—In short, he is a public professor of secrecy, and makes proclamation that he holds private intelligence.—He is here.

Enter TATTLE.

Tatt. Valentine, good morrow: Scandal, I am yours—that is, when you speak well of me.

Scand. That is, when I am yours? for while I am my own, or any body's else, that will never happen.

Tatt. How inhuman!

Val. Why, Tattle, you need not be much concerned at any thing, that he says: for to converse with Scandal, is to play at losing loadum; you must lose a good name to him, before you can win it for yourself.

Tatt. But how barbarous that is, and how unfortunate for him, that the world shall think the better of any person for his calumination!—I thank Heaven, it has always been a part of my character to handle the reputations of others very tenderly indeed.

Scand. Ay, such rotten reputations as you have to deal with are to be handled tenderly indeed.

Tatt. Nay, why rotten? why should you say rotten, when you know not the persons of whom you speak? How cruel that is!

Scand. Not know them? Why, thou never hadst to do with any one, that did not stink to all the town.

Tatt. Ha, ha, ha! nay, now you make a jest of it, indeed. For there is nothing more known, than that nobody knows any thing of that nature of me. As I hope to be saved, Valentine, I never exposed a woman, since I knew what woman was.

Val. And yet you have conversed with several?

Tatt. To be free with you, I have—I don't care if I own that—nay, more (I'm going to say a bold word now), I never could meddle with a woman, that had to do with any body else.

Scand. How!

Val. Nay, faith, I'm apt to believe him—except her husband, Tattle.

Tatt. Oh that—

Scand. What think you of that noble commo-ner, Mrs Drab?

Tatt. Pooh, I know madam Drab has made her brags in three or four places, that I said this and that, and writ to her, and did I know not what—but, upon my reputation, she did me wrong—well, well, that was malice—but I know the bottom of it. She was bribed to that by one we all know—a man, too—only to bring me into disgrace with a certain woman of quality—

Scand. Whom we all know.

Tatt. No matter for that—Yes, yes, every body knows—no doubt on't, every body knows my secrets! But I soon satisfied the lady of my innocence; for I told her—Madam, says I, there are some persons who make it their business to tell stories, and say this and that of one and the other, and every thing in the world; and, says I, if your grace—

Scand. Grace!

Tatt. O lord, what have I said? My unlucky tongue!

Val. Ha, ha, ha!

Scand. Why, Tattle, thou hast more impudence than one can in reason expect: I shall have an esteem for thee—well, and ha, ha, ha! well go on, and what did you say to her grace?

Val. I confess this is something extraordinary.

Tatt. Not a word, as I hope to be saved; an arrant lapsus lingue! Come, let us talk of something else.

Val. Well, but how did you acquit yourself?

Tatt. Pooh, pooh, nothing at all; I only rallied with you. A woman of ordinary rank was a little jealous of me, and I told her something or other—faith, I know not what; come, let's talk of something else. [Hums a song.]

Scand. Hang him, let him alone; he has a mind we should inquire.

Tatt. Valentine, I supped last night with your mistress, and her uncle old Foresight: I think your father lies at Foresight's.

Val. Yes.

Tatt. Upon my soul, Angelica's a fine woman. And so is Mrs Foresight, and her sister Mrs Frail.

Scand. Yes, Mrs Frail is a very fine woman; we all know her.

Tatt. Oh, that is not fair.

Scand. What?

Tatt. To tell.

Scand. To tell what? Why, what do you know of Mrs Frail?

Tatt. Who, I? Upon my honour, I don't know whether she be a man or woman; but by the smoothness of her chin, and roundness of her lips.

Scand. No!

Tatt. No.

Scand. She says otherwise.

Tatt. Impossible!

Scand. Yes, faith. Ask Valentine else.

Tatt. Why, then, as I hope to be saved, I believe a woman only obliges a man to secrecy, that she may have the pleasure of telling herself.

Scand. No doubt of it. Well, but has she done you wrong, or no? You have had her? ha!

Tatt. Though I have more honour than to tell first, I have more manners than to contradict what a lady has declared.

Scand. Well, you own it?

Tatt. I am strangely surprised! Yes, yes, I cannot deny it, if she taxes me with it.

Scand. She'll be here by and by; she sees Valentine every morning.

Tatt. How!

Val. She does me the favour—I mean, of a visit sometimes. I did not think she had granted more to any body.

Scand. Nor I, faith. But Tattle does not use to belie a lady; it is contrary to his character.—How one may be deceived in a woman, Valentine!

Tatt. Nay, what do you mean, gentlemen?

Scand. I'm resolved I'll ask her.

Tatt. O barbarous! Why, did you not tell me?

Scand. No, you told us.

Tatt. And bid me ask Valentine?

Val. What did I say? I hope you won't bring me to confess an answer, when you never asked me the question?

Tatt. But, gentlemen, this is the most inhuman proceeding.—

Val. Nay, if you have known Scandal thus long, and cannot avoid such a palpable decoy as this was, the ladies have a fine time, whose reputations are in your keeping.

Enter JEREMY.

Jer. Sir, Mrs Frail has sent to know, if you are stirring.

Val. Shew her up when she comes.

[Exit JEREMY.

Tatt. I'll be gone.

Val. You'll meet her.

Tatt. Is there not a back way?

Val. If there were, you have more discretion than to give Scandal such an advantage; why, your running away will prove all that he can tell her.

Tatt. Scandal, you will not be so ungenerous? O, I shall lose my reputation of secrecy for ever. I shall never be received but upon public days; and my visits will never be admitted beyond a drawing-room: I shall never see a bed-chamber again; never be locked in a closet, nor run behind a screen, or under a table; never be distinguished among the waiting women by the name of trusty Mr Tattle, more. You will not be so cruel?

Val. Scandal, have pity on him; he'll yield to any conditions.

Tatt. Any, any terms.

Scand. Come, then, sacrifice half a dozen women of good reputation to me presently. Come, where are you familiar?—And see that they are women of quality, too, the first quality.

Tatt. 'Tis very hard. Won't a baronet's lady pass?

Scand. No, nothing under a right honourable.

Tatt. O inhuman! You don't expect their names?

Scand. No, their titles shall serve.

Tatt. Alas! that is the same thing. Pray, spare me their titles; I'll describe their persons.

Scand. Well, begin, then. But take notice, if you are so ill a painter, that I cannot know the person by your picture of her, you must be condemned, like other bad painters, to write the name at the bottom.

Tatt. Well, first, then—

Enter Mrs FRAIL.

O unfortunate! she's come already. Will you have patience till another time? I'll double the number.

Scand. Well, on that condition—take heed you don't fail me.

Mrs Frail. I shall get a fine reputation, by coming to see fellows in a morning! Scandal, you devil, are you here, too? Oh, Mr Tattle, every thing is safe with you, we know.

Scand. Tattle!

Tatt. Mum—O madam, you do me too much honour.

Val. Well, lady Galloper, how does Angelica?

Mrs Frail. Angelica? Manners!

Val. What, you will allow an absent lover—

Mrs Frail. No, I'll allow a lover present with his mistress to be particular—but otherwise, I think his passion ought to give place to his manners.

Val. But what if he has more passion than manners?

Mrs Frail. Then let him marry, and reform.

Val. Marriage, indeed, may qualify the fury of his passion; but it very rarely mends a man's manners.

Mrs Frail. You are the most mistaken in the world; there is no creature perfectly civil, but a husband: for in a little time he grows only rude to his wife; and that is the highest good-breeding, for it begets his civility to other people.—Well, I'll tell you news; but, I suppose, you heard your brother Benjamin is landed. And my brother Foresight's daughter is come out of the country—I assure you, there's a match talked of by the old people. Well, if he be but as great a sea-beast, as she is a land-monster, we shall have a most amphibious breed—the progeny will be all otters: he has been bred at sea, and she has never been out of the country.

Val. Pox take them! their conjunction bodes me no good, I'm sure.

Mrs Frail. Now you talk of conjunction, my brother Foresight has cast both their nativities, and prognosticates an admiral and an eminent justice of the peace to be the issue-male of their two bodies. 'Tis the most superstitious old fool! He would have persuaded me, that this was an unlucky day, and would not let me come abroad: but I invented a dream, and sent him to Artemidorus for interpretation, and so stole out to see you. Well, and what will you give me now? Come, I must have something.

Val. Step into the next room, and I'll give you something.

Scand. Aye, we'll all give you something.

Mrs Frail. Well, what will you give me?

Val. Mine's a secret.

Mrs Frail. I thought you would give me something that would be a trouble to you to keep.

Val. And Scandal shall give you a good name.

Mrs Frail. That's more than he has for himself. And what will you give me, Mr Tattle?

Tatt. I? my soul, madam.

Mrs Frail. Pooh! no, I thank you, I have enough to do to take care of my own. Well; but I'll come and see you one of these mornings: I hear you have a great many pictures.

Tatt. I have a pretty good collection, at your service; some originals.

Scand. Hang him, he has nothing but the Seasons and the Twelve Cæsars, paltry copies; and the Five Senses, as ill represented as they are in himself: and he himself is the only original you will see there.

Mrs Frail. Ay, but I hear he has a closet of beauties.

Scand. Yes, all that have done him favours, if you will believe him.

Mrs Frail. Ay, let me see those, Mr Tattle.

Tatt. Oh, madam, those are sacred to love and contemplation. No man but the painter and myself was ever blest with the sight.

Mrs Frail. Well, but a woman—

Tatt. Nor woman, till she consented to have her picture there, too—for then she is obliged to keep the secret.

Scand. No, no! come to me, if you'd see pictures.

Mrs Frail. You?

Scand. Yes, faith, I can shew you your own picture, and most of your acquaintance, to the life, and as like as Kneller's.

Mrs Frail. O lying creature!—Valentine, does not he lie?—I can't believe a word he says.

Val. No, indeed, he speaks truth now: for, as Tattle has pictures of all that have granted him favours, he has the pictures of all that have refused him—if satires, descriptions, characters, and lampoons, are pictures.

Scand. Yes, mine are most in black and white—and yet there are some set out in their true colours, both men and women. I can shew you pride, folly, affectation, wantonness, inconstancy, covetousness, dissimulation, malice, and ignorance, all in one piece. Then I can shew you lying, foppery, vanity, cowardice, bragging, and ugliness, in another piece: and yet one of these is a celebrated beauty, and t'other a professed beau. I have paintings too, some pleasant enough.

Mrs Frail. Come, let's hear them.

Scand. Why, I have a beau in bagnio, cupping for a complexion, and sweating for a shape.

Mrs Frail. So!

Scand. Then I have a lady burning brandy, in a cellar, with a hackney coachman.

Mrs Frail. O devil! Well, but that story is not true.

Scand. I have some hieroglyphics, too. I have a lawyer, with a hundred hands, two heads, and but one face; a divine, with two faces, and one head. And I have a soldier, with his brains in his belly, and his heart where his head should be.

Mrs Frail. And no head?

Scand. No head.

Mrs Frail. Pooh, this is all invention. Have you never a poet?

Scand. Yes, I have a poet, weighing words, and selling praise for praise: and a critic picking his pocket. I have another large piece, too, representing a school; where there are huge-proportioned critics, with long wigs, laced coats, Steinkirk-cravats, and terrible faces; with catcalls in their hands, and horn-books about their necks. I have many more of this kind, very well painted, as you shall see.

Mrs Frail. Well, I'll come, if it be but to disprove you.

Enter JEREMY.

Jer. Sir, here's the steward again from your father.

Val. I'll come to him. Will you give me leave? I'll wait on you again presently.

Mrs Frail. No, I'll be gone. Come, who squires me to the Exchange? I must call on my sister Foresight there.

Scand. I will: I have a mind to your sister.

Mrs Frail. Civil!

Tatt. I will; because I have a tender for your ladyship.

Mrs Frail. That's somewhat the better reason, to my opinion.

Scand. Well, if Tattle entertains you, I have the better opportunity to engage your sister.

Val. Tell Angelica, I am about making hard conditions, to come abroad, and be at liberty to see her.

Scand. I'll give an account of you and your proceedings. If indiscretion be a sign of love, you are the most a lover of any body that I know. You fancy that parting with your estate will help you to your mistress—In my mind, he is a thoughtless adventurer—

Who hopes to purchase wealth by selling land, Or win a mistress with a losing hand.

[Ereunt.]

A C T II.

SCENE I.—A room in FORESIGHT'S house.

Enter FORESIGHT and Servant.

Fore. HEY-DAY ! What ! are all the women of my family abroad ? Is not my wife come home ? nor my sister ? nor my daughter ?

Ser. No, sir.

Fore. Mercy on us ! what can be the meaning of it ? Sure the moon is in all her fortitudes ! Is my niece Angelica at home ?

Ser. Yes, sir.

Fore. I believe you lie, sir.

Ser. Sir ?

Fore. I say, you lie, sir. It is impossible that any thing should be as I would have it ; for I was born, sir, when the crab was ascending ; and all my affairs go backward.

Ser. I can't tell, indeed, sir.

Fore. No, I know you can't, sir. But I can tell, and foretell, sir.

Enter NURSE.

Nurse, where's your young mistress ?

Nurse. Wee'st heart ! I know not ; they're none of them come home yet. Poor child, I warrant she's fond of seeing the town !—Marry, pray Heaven they have given her any dinner ! Good lack-a-day, ha, ha, ha ! O strange ! I'll vow and swear now, ha, ha, ha ! marry, and did you ever see the like ?

Fore. Why, how now, what's the matter ?

Nurse. Pray Heaven send your worship good luck ! marry, and amen, with all my heart ! for you have put on one stocking with the wrong side outward.

Fore. Ha, how ? Faith and troth, I'm glad of it ; and so I have ; that may be good luck in troth ; in troth it may, very good luck : nay, I have had some omens. I got out of bed backwards, too, this morning, without premeditation ; pretty good that, too. But then, I stumbled coming down stairs, and met a weasel ; bad omens those ! Some bad, some good : our lives are chequered ; mirth and sorrow, want and plenty, night and day, make up our time. But, in troth, I am pleased at my stocking—very well pleased at my stocking—Oh, here's my niece !—Sirrah, go, tell sir Sampson Legend I'll wait on him, if he's at leisure.—'Tis now three o'clock ; a very good hour for business : Mercury governs this hour.

[Exit Servant.]Enter ANGELICA.

Ang. Is it not a good hour for pleasure, too, uncle ? Pray, lend me your coach ; mine's out of order.

Fore. What ! would you be gadding, too ? Sure all females are mad to-day ! It is of evil portent, and bodes mischief to the master of a family. I remember an old prophecy, written by Messahalah the Arabian, and thus translated by a reverend Buckinghamshire bard :

' When housewives all the house forsake,
' And leave good-men to brew and bake ;
' Withouten guile, then be it said,
' That house doth stand upon its head ;
' And when the head is set in ground,
' No mar'l, if it be fruitful found.'

Fruitful ! the head fruitful ! that bodes horns ; the fruit of the head is horns. Dear niece, stay at home—for, by the head of the house, is meant the husband ; the prophecy needs no explanation.

Ang. Well, but I can neither make you a cuckold, uncle, by going abroad ; nor secure you from being one, by staying at home.

Fore. Yes, yes ; while there's one woman left, the prophecy is not in full force.

Ang. But my inclinations are in force. I have a mind to go abroad : and, if you won't lend me your coach, I'll take a hackney, or a chair, and leave you to erect a scheme, and find who's in conjunction with your wife. Why don't you keep her at home, if you're jealous of her, when she's abroad ? You know my aunt is a little retrograde (as you call it) in her nature. Uncle, I'm afraid you are not lord of the ascendant ! ha, ha, ha !

Fore. Well, jill-flirt, you are very pert—and always ridiculing that celestial science.

Ang. Nay, uncle, don't be angry.—If you are, I'll reap up all your false prophecies, ridiculous dreams, and idle divinations. I'll swear, you are a nuisance to the neighbourhood.—What a bustle did you keep against the last invisible eclipse, laying in provision, as it were for a siege ! What a world of fire and candle, matches and tinder-boxes, did you purchase ! One would have thought we were ever after to live under ground ; or at least make a voyage to Greenland, to inhabit there all the dark season.

Fore. Why, you malapert slut !

Ang. Will you lend me your coach ? or I'll go on.—Nay, I'll declare how you prophesied popery was coming, only because the butler had mislaid some of the apostle spoons, and thought they were lost. Away went religion and spoon-meat together !—Indeed, uncle, I'll indite you for a wizard.

Fore. How, hussy ! was there ever such a provoking minx ?

Nurse. O merciful father, how she talks !

Ang. Yes, I can make oath of your unlawful midnight practices ; you, and the old nurse there.

Nurse. Marry, Heaven defend !—I at midnight practices !—O Lord, what's here to do ?—I in unlawful doings with my master's worship !—Why, did you ever hear the like now ?—Sir, did ever I do any thing of your midnight concerns—but warm your bed, and tuck you up, and set the candle and your tobacco-box, and now and then rub the soles of your feet?—O Lord, I!—

Ang. Yes, I saw you together, through the keyhole of the closet, one night, like Saul and the witch of Endor, turning the sieve and sheers, and pricking your thumbs, to write poor innocent servants' names in blood, about a little nutmeg-grater, which she had forgot in the caudle-cup.—Nay, I know something worse, if I would speak of it!

Fore. I defy you, hussy; but I'll remember this. I'll be revenged on you, cockatrice; I'll hamper you—You have your fortune in your own hands—but I'll find a way to make your lover, your prodigal spendthrift gallant, Valentine, pay for all, I will.

Ang. Will you? I care not; but all shall out then.

Fore. I will have patience, since it is the will of the stars I should be thus tormented—this is the effect of the malicious conjunctions and oppositions in the third house of my nativity; there the curse of kindred was foretold.—But I will have my doors locked up—I'll punish you; not a man shall enter my house.

Ang. Do, uncle, lock them up quickly, before my aunt comes home—you'll have a letter for alimony to-morrow morning!—But let me be gone first; and then let no mankind come near the house: but converse with spirits and the celestial signs, the bull, and the ram, and the goat. Bless me, there are a great many horned beasts among the twelve signs, uncle! But cuckolds go to Heaven!

Fore. But there's but one virgin among the twelve signs, spit-fire!—but one virgin!

Ang. Nor there had not been that one, if she had had to do with any thing but astrologers, uncle! That makes my aunt go abroad.

Fore. How! how! is that the reason? Come, you know something; tell me, and I'll forgive you; do, good niece.—Come, you shall have my coach and horses—faith and troth, you shall.—Does my wife complain! Come, I know women tell one another.—She is young and sanguine, has a wanton hazel eye, and was born under Gemini, which may incline her to society; she has a mole upon her lip, with a moist palm.

Ang. Ha, ha, ha!

Fore. Do you laugh?—Well, gentlewoman, I'll—But come, be a good girl, don't perplex your poor uncle! Tell me—won't you speak? Odd, I'll—

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir Sampson is coming down, to wait upon you, sir. [Exit Servant.]

Ang. Good by'e, uncle. Call me a chair. I'll find out my aunt, and tell her she must not come home. [Exit ANGELICA.]

Fore. I am so perplexed and vexed, I am not fit to receive him; I shall scarce recover myself before the hour be past. Go, nurse; tell sir Sampson, I'm ready to wait on him.

Nurse. Yes, sir.

[Exit NURSE.]

Fore. Well—why, if I was born to be a cuckold, there's no more to be said!—He is here already.

Enter SIR SAMPSON LEGEND with a paper.

Sir Sam. Nor no more to be done, old boy; that is plain—here it is, I have it in my hand, old Ptolemy; I'll make the ungracious prodigal know who begat him; I will, old Nostrodamus. What! I warrant, my son thought nothing belonged to a father, but forgiveness and affection; no authority, no correction, no arbitrary power—nothing to be done, but for him to offend, and me to pardon! I warrant you, if he danced till doomsday, he thought I was to pay the piper. Well, but here it is under black and white, signatum, sigillatum, and deliberatum—that, as soon as my son Benjamin is arrived, he is to make over to him his right of inheritance. Where's my daughter that is to be—ha! old Merlin? Body of me, I'm so glad I'm revenged on this undutiful rogue!

Fore. Odso, let me see; let me see the paper. Ay, faith and troth, here it is, if it will but hold—I wish things were done, and the conveyance made. When was this signed? what hour? Odso, you should have consulted me for the time. Well, but we'll make haste.

Sir Sam. Haste! ay, ay, haste enough; my son Ben will be in town to-night—I have ordered my lawyer to draw up writings of settlement and jointure—all shall be done to-night. No matter for the time; prithee, brother Foresight, leave superstition. Pox o' the time; there's no time but the time present; there's no more to be said of what's past; and all that is to come will happen. If the sun shine by day, and the stars by night—why, we shall know one another's faces without the help of a candle; and that's all the stars are good for.

Fore. How, how, sir Sampson? that all! Give me leave to contradict you, and tell you, you are ignorant.

Sir Sam. I tell you, I am wise: and sapiens dominabitur astris; there's Latin for you to prove it, and an argument to confound your ephemeris. Ignorant!—I tell you, I have travelled, old Fercu; and know the globe. I have seen the antipodes, where the sun rises at mid-night, and sets at noon-day.

Fore. But I tell you, I have travelled, and travelled in the celestial spheres; know the signs and the planets, and their houses; can judge of motions direct and retrograde, of sextiles, quadrates, trines and oppositions, fiery trigons, and aquatical trigons; know whether life shall be long or short, happy or unhappy; whether diseases are curable or incurable; if journeys shall be prosperous, undertakings successful, or goods stolen recovered : I know—

Sir Sam. I know the length of the emperor of China's foot ; have kissed the Great Mogul's slipper ; and rid a hunting upon an elephant with the cham of Tartary. Body o' me, I have made a cuckold of a king ; and the present majesty of Bantam is the issue of these loins.

Fore. I know when travellers lie or speak truth, when they don't know it themselves.

Sir Sam. I have known an astrologer made a cuckold in the twinkling of a star ; and seen a conjuror, that could not keep the devil out of his wife's circle.

Fore. What, does he twit me with my wife, too ? I must be better informed of this. [Aside.] Do you mean my wife, sir Sampson ? Though you made a cuckold of the king of Bantam, yet, by the body of the sun—

Sir Sam. By the horns of the moon, you would say, brother Capricorn.

Fore. Capricorn in your teeth, thou modern Mandeville ! Ferdinand Mendez Pinto was but a type of thee, thou liar of the first magnitude ! Take back your paper of inheritance ; send your son to sea again. I'll wed my daughter to an Egyptian mummy, ere she shall incorporate with a contemner of sciences, and a defamer of virtue.

Sir Sam. Body o' me, I have gone too far—I must not provoke honest Albumazar.—An Egyptian mummy is an illustrious creature, my trusty hieroglyphic ; and may have significations of futurity about him. Odsbud, I would my son were an Egyptian mummy for thy sake. What, thou art not angry for a jest, my good Italy ?—I reverence the sun, moon, and stars, with all my heart. What ! I'll make thee a present of a mummy. Now, I think on't, body o' me, I have a shoulder of an Egyptian king, that I purloined from one of the pyramids, powdered with hieroglyphics ; thou shalt have it brought home to thy house, and make an entertainment for all the Philomaths, and students in physic and astrology, in and about London.

Fore. But what do you know of my wife, sir Sampson ?

Sir Sam. Thy wife is a constellation of virtues ; she is the moon, and thou art the man in the moon ; nay, she is more illustrious than the moon ; for she has her chastity, without her incontinency : 'sbud, I was but in jest.

Enter JEREMY.

Sir Sam. How now ? who sent for you, ha ? what would you have ?

Fore. Nay, if you were but in jest !—Who's that fellow ? I don't like his physiognomy.

Sir Sam. [To JEREMY.] My son, sir ? what son, sir ? my son Benjamin, ha !

Jer. No, sir ; Mr Valentine, my master ;—it is the first time he has been abroad, since his confinement, and he comes to pay his duty to you.

Sir Sam. Well, sir.

Enter VALENTINE.

Jer. He is here, sir.

Val. Your blessing, sir !

Sir Sam. You've had it already, sir ; I think I sent it you to-day in a bill of four thousand pounds. A great deal of money, brother Foresight !

Fore. Ay, indeed, sir Sampson, a great deal of money for a young man ; I wonder what he can do with it !

Sir Sam. Body o' me, so do I. Hark ye, Valentine, if there be too much, refund the superfluity ; dost hear, boy ?

Val. Superfluity, sir ! it will scarce pay my debts. I hope you will have more indulgence, than to oblige me to those hard conditions, which my necessity signed to.

Sir Sam. Sir ! how ! I beseech you, what were you pleased to intimate, concerning indulgence ?

Val. Why, sir, that you would not go to the extremity of the conditions, but release me at least from some part.

Sir Sam. O, sir, I understand you—that's all, ha ?

Val. Yes, sir, all that I presume to ask—But what you, out of fatherly fondness, will be pleased to add, will be doubly welcome.

Sir Sam. No doubt of it, sweet sir ; but your filial piety and my fatherly fondness would fit like two tallies—Here's a rogue, brother Foresight, makes a bargain under hand and seal in the morning, and would be released from it in the afternoon : here's a rogue, dog ; here's conscience and honesty ! This is your wit now, this is the morality of your wit ! You are a wit, and have been a beau, and may be a—Why, sirrah, is it not here under hand and seal ?—Can you deny it ?

Val. Sir, I don't deny it.

Sir Sam. Sirrah, you'll be hanged ; I shall live to see you go up Holborn-hill—Has he not a rogue's face ?—Speak, brother ; you understand physiognomy ; a hanging look to me—of all my boys the most unlike me. He has a damned Tyburn face, without the benefit of the clergy.

Fore. Hum !—truly, I don't care to discourage a young man—he has a violent death in his face ; but I hope no danger of hanging.

Val. Sir, is this usage for your son ?—For that old weather-headed fool, I know how to laugh at him ; but you, sir—

Sir Sam. You, sir ! and you, sir !—Why, who are you, sir ?

Val. Your son, sir.

Sir Sam. That's more than I know, sir : and I believe not.

Val. Faith, I hope not.

Sir Sam. What ! would you have your mother a whore ? Did you ever hear the like ? did you ever hear the like ? body o' me—

Val. I would have an excuse for your barbarity and unnatural usage.

Sir Sam. Excuse?—Impudence! Why, sirrah, mayn't I do what I please? are not you my slave? did not I beget you? and might not I have chosen whether I would have begot you or no? Oons, who are you? whence came you? what brought you into the world? how came you here, sir? here, to stand here, upon those two legs, and look erect with that audacious face, hah? Answer me that. Did you come a volunteer into the world? or did I, with the lawful authority of a parent, press you to the service?

Val. I know no more why I came, than you do why you called me. But here I am; and if you don't mean to provide for me, I desire you would leave me as you found me.

Sir Sam. With all my heart. Come, uncase, strip, and go naked out of the world as you came into it.

Val. My clothes are soon put off—but you must also divest me of my reason, thought, passions, inclinations, affections, appetites, senses, and the huge train of attendants, that you begot along with me.

Sir Sam. Body o'me, what a many-headed monster have I propagated!

Val. I am, of myself, a plain, easy, simple creature, and to be kept at small expence: but the retinue, that you gave me, are craving and invincible; they are so many devils, that you have raised, and will have employment.

Sir Sam. Oons! what had I to do to get children?—can't a private man be born without all these followers?—Why, nothing under an emperor should be born with appetites—why, at this rate, a fellow, that has but a groat in his pocket, may have a stomach capable of a ten shilling ordinary.

Jer. Nay, that's as clear as the sun; I'll make oath of it before any justice in Middlesex.

Sir Sam. Here's a cormorant, too!—'Sheart, this fellow was not born with you?—I did not beget him, did I?

Jer. By the provision that's made for me, you might have begot me, too.—Nay, and to tell your worship another truth, I believe you did; for I find I was born with those same whoreson appetites, too, that my master speaks of.

Sir Sam. Why, look you there now!—I'll maintain it, that by the rule of right reason, this fellow ought to have been born without a palate.—'Sheart, what should he do with a distinguishing taste?—I warrant now, he'd rather eat a pheasant, than a piece of poor John—and smell, now; why I warrant he can smell, and loves perfumes above a stink—why there's it; and music—don't you love music, scoundrel?

Jer. Yes, I have a reasonable good ear, sir, as to jiggs, and country dances, and the like; I don't much matter your solos or sonatas; they give me the spleen.

Sir Sam. The spleen? ha, ha, ha! a pox confound you!—Solos or sonatas? Oons, whose son are you? how were you engendered, muckworm?

Jer. I am, by my father, the son of a chairman; my mother sold oysters in winter, and cucumbers in summer: and I came up stairs into the world; for I was born in a cellar.

Fore. By your looks you shall go up stairs out of the world too, friend.

Sir Sam. And if this rogue were anatomized now, and dissected, he has his vessels of digestion and concoction, and so forth, large enough for the inside of a cardinal; this son of a cucumber!—These things are unaccountable and unreasonable.—Body o'me, why was I not a bear, that my cubs might have lived upon sucking their paws? Nature has been provident only to bears and spiders: the one has its nutriment in its own hands; and the other spins its habitation out of its own entrails.

Val. Fortune was provident enough to supply all the necessities of my nature, if I had my right inheritance.

Sir Sam. Again! Oons, han't you four thousand pounds?—If I had it again I would not give thee a groat.—What, wouldst thou have me turn pelican, and feed thee out of my own vitals—Odsheart, live by your wits—you were always fond of the wits.—Now let's see if you have wit enough to keep yourself.—Your brother will be in town to-night, or to-morrow morning; then look you perform covenants, and so your friend and servant.—Come, brother Foresight.

[Exeunt SIR SAMPSON and FORESIGHT.]

Jer. I told you what your visit would come to.

Val. 'Tis as much as I expected—I did not come to see him: I came to see Angelica; but since she was gone abroad, it was easily turned another way, and at least looked well on my side. What's here? Mrs Foresight and Mrs Frail! They are earnest—I'll avoid them.—Come this way, and go and inquire when Angelica will return.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MRS FORESIGHT and MRS FRAIL.

Mrs Frail. What have you to do to watch me? 'Slife, I'll do what I please.

Mrs Fore. You will?

Mrs Frail. Yes, marry, will I. A great piece of business to go to Covent-garden, to take a turn in a hackney-coach with one's friend!

Mrs Fore. Nay, two or three turns, I'll take my oath.

Mrs Frail. Well, what if I took twenty! I warrant, if you had been there, it had only been innocent recreation! Lord, where's the comfort of this life, if we can't have the happiness of conversing where we like?

Mrs Fore. But can't you converse at home? I own it, I think there's no happiness like conversing with an agreeable man; I don't quarrel at that, nor I don't think but your conversation was very innocent. But the place is public; and to be seen with a man in a hackney-coach, is scandalous. What if any body else should have seen you alight, as I did? How can any body be happy, while they are in perpetual fear of being seen and censured? Besides, it would not only reflect upon you, sister, but on me.

Mrs Frail. Pooh, here's a clutter! Why should it reflect upon you? I don't doubt but you have thought yourself happy in a hackney-coach before now! If I had gone to Knightsbridge, or to Chelsea, or to Spring-garden, or to Barn-elms, with a man alone—something might have been said.

Mrs Fore. Why, was I ever in any of those places? What do you mean, sister?

Mrs Frail. Was I? What do you mean?

Mrs Fore. You have been at a worse place.

Mrs Frail. I at a worse place, and with a man?

Mrs Fore. I suppose you would not go alone to the World's-end.

Mrs Frail. The World's-end! What, do you mean to banter me?

Mrs Fore. Poor innocent! you don't know that there is a place called the World's-end? I'll swear, you can keep your countenance purely; you'd make an admirable player!

Mrs Frail. I'll swear you have a great deal of confidence, and, in my mind, too much for the stage.

Mrs Fore. Very well, that will appear who has most. You never were at the World's-end?

Mrs Frail. No.

Mrs Fore. You deny it positively to my face?

Mrs Frail. Your face! what's your face?

Mrs Fore. No matter for that; it's as good a face as yours.

Mrs Frail. Not by a dozen years wearing. But I do deny it positively to your face, then.

Mrs Fore. I'll allow you now to find fault with my face; for I'll swear your impudence has put me out of countenance. But look you here now, —where did you lose this gold bodkin? Oh, sister, sister!

Mrs Frail. My bodkin!

Mrs Fore. Nay, 'tis yours; look at it.

Mrs Frail. Well, if you go that, where did you find this bodkin?—Oh, sister, sister! sister every way!

Mrs Fore. O, devil on't! that I could not discover, without betraying myself! [Aside.]

Mrs Frail. I have heard gentlemen say, sister, that one should take great care, when one makes a thrust in fencing, not to lay open one's self.

Mrs Fore. It is very true, sister. Well, since all's out, and, as you say, since we are both wounded, let us do, what is often done in duels, take care of one another, and grow better friends than before.

Mrs Frail. With all my heart. Well, give me your hand, in token of sisterly secrecy and affection.

Mrs Fore. Here it is, with all my heart.

Mrs Frail. Well, as an earnest of friendship and confidence, I'll acquaint you with a design that I have. I'm afraid the world have observed us more than we have observed one another. You have a rich husband, and are provided for: I am at a loss, and have no great stock either of fortune or reputation, and therefore must look sharply about me. Sir Sampson has a son, that is expected to-night; and, by the account I have heard of his education, can be no conjurer. The estate, you know, is to be made over to him. Now, if I could wheedle him, sister, ha? you understand me?

Mrs Fore. I do; and will help you, to the utmost of my power. And I can tell you one thing that falls out luckily enough; my awkward daughter-in-law, who, you know, is designed to be his wife, is grown fond of Mr Tattle; now, if we can improve that, and make her have an aversion for the booby, it may go a great way towards his liking you. Here they come together; and let us contrive some way or other to leave them together.

Enter TATTLE and MISS PRUE.

Miss Prue. Mother, mother, mother! look you here?

Mrs Fore. Fie, fie, miss, how you bawl! Besides, I have told you, you must not call me mother.

Miss Prue. What must I call you, then? are you not my father's wife?

Mrs Fore. Madam; you must say madam. By my soul, I shall fancy myself old indeed, to have this great girl call me mother. Well, but, miss, what are you so overjoyed at?

Miss Prue. Look you here, madam, then, what Mr Tattle has given me. Look you here, cousin; here's a snuff-box; nay, there's snuff in't—here, will you have any? Oh good! how sweet it is! Mr Tattle is all over sweet; his peruke is sweet, and his gloves are sweet, and his handkerchief is sweet, pure sweet, sweeter than roses—smell him, mother—madam, I mean. He gave me this ring, for a kiss.

Tatt. O fie, miss! you must not kiss, and tell.

Miss Prue. Yes; I may tell my mother—and he says he'll give me something to make me smell so. Oh, pray, lend me your handkerchief. Smell, cousin; he says, he'll give me something, that will make my smocks smell this way. Is not it pure? It's better than lavender, mum. I'm resolved I won't let nurse put any more lavender among my smocks—ha, cousin?

Mrs Frail. Fie, miss ! amongst your linen you must say ; you must never say smock.

Miss Prue. Why, it is not bawdy, is it, cousin ?

Tatt. Oh, madam ! you are too severe upon miss : you must not find fault with her pretty simplicity ; it becomes her strangely. Pretty miss, don't let them persuade you out of your innocence !

Mrs Fore. Oh, demn you, toad ! I wish you don't persuade her out of her innocence !

Tatt. Who I, madam ? O Lord, how can your ladyship have such a thought ? sure you don't know me !

Mrs Frail. Ah, devil, sly devil ! He's as close, sister, as a confessor. He thinks we don't observe him.

Mrs Fore. A cunning cur ! how soon he could find out a fresh harmless creature—and left us, sister, presently.

Tatt. Upon reputation——

Mrs Frail. They're all so, sister, these men ; they are as fond of it, as of being first in the fashion, or of seeing a new play the first day. I warrant it would break Mr Tattle's heart, to think that any body else should be before-hand with him !

Tatt. Oh, Lord ! I swear I would not for the world——

Mrs Frail. O, hang you ; who'll believe you ? You'll be hanged before you'd confess—we know you—she's very pretty ! Lord, what pure red and white ! she looks so wholesome ; ne'er stir, I don't know, but I fancy if I were a man——

Miss Prue. How you love to jeer one, cousin.

Mrs Fore. Hark'ee, sister—by my soul, the girl is spoiled already—d'ye think she'll ever endure a great lubberly tarpawlin ? Gad, I warrant you she won't let him come near her, after Mr Tattle.

Mrs Frail. On my soul, I'm afraid not—eh ! filthy creature, that smells all of pitch and tar ! Devil take you, you confounded toad—why did you see her before she was married ?

Mrs Fore. Nay, why did we let him ? My husband will hang us ; he'll think we brought them acquainted.

Mrs Frail. Come, faith, let us be gone ; if my brother Foresight should find us with them, he'd think so, sure enough.

Mrs Fore. So he would ; but then the leaving them together is as bad ; and he's such a sly devil, he'll never miss an opportunity.

Mrs Frail. I don't care ; I won't be seen in it.

Mrs Fore. Well, if you should, Mr Tattle, you'll have a world to answer for : remember, I wash my hands of it ; I'm thoroughly innocent.

[Exeunt MRS FRAIL and MRS FORESIGHT.]

Miss Prue. What makes them go away, Mr Tattle ?—What do they mean, do you know ?

Tatt. Yes, my dear—I think I can guess—but hang me if I know the reason of it.

Miss Prue. Come, must not we go, too ?

Tatt. No, no ; they don't mean that.

Miss Prue. No ! what then ? What shall you and I do together ?

Tatt. I must make love to you, pretty miss ; will you let me make love to you ?

Miss Prue. Yes, if you please.

Tatt. Frank, egad, at least. What a pox does Mrs Foresight mean by this civility ? Is it to make a fool of me ? or does she leave us together out of good-morality, and do as she would be done by ? Egad, I'll understand it so. [Aside.]

Miss Prue. Well, and how will you make love to me ?—Come, I long to have you begin. Must I make love, too ? You must tell me how.

Tatt. You must let me speak, miss ; you must not speak first. I must ask you questions, and you must answer.

Miss Prue. What, is it like the catechism ?—Come, then, ask me.

Tatt. D'ye think you can love me ?

Miss Prue. Yes.

Tatt. Pooh, pox, you must not say yes already. I shan't care a farthing for you, then, in a twinkling.

Miss Prue. What must I say then ?

Tatt. Why, you must say, no ; or, believe not ; or, you can't tell.

Miss Prue. Why, must I tell a lie, then ?

Tatt. Yes, if you'd be well-bred. All well-bred persons lie—Besides, you are a woman ;—you must never speak what you think : your words must contradict your thoughts ; but your actions may contradict your words. So, when I ask you, if you can love me, you must say, no ; but you must love me, too. If I tell you you are handsome, you must deny it, and say, I flatter you. But you must think yourself more charming than I speak you—and like me for the beauty which I say you have, as much as if I had it myself. If I ask you to kiss me, you must be angry ; but you must not refuse me. If I ask you for more, you must be more angry, but more complying ; and as soon as ever I make you say, you'll cry out, you must be sure to hold your tongue.

Miss Prue. O Lord, I swear this is pure !—I like it better than our old-fashioned country way of speaking one's mind. And must not you lie, too ?

Tatt. Hum !—Yes ; but you must believe I speak truth.

Miss Prue. O Gemini ! Well, I always had a great mind to tell lies—but they frightened me, and said it was a sin.

Tatt. Well, my pretty creature, will you make me happy by giving me a kiss ?

Miss Prue. No, indeed ; I'm angry at you !

[Runs and kisses him.]

Tatt. Hold, hold, that's pretty well—but you should not have given me, but have suffered me to have taken it.

Miss Prue. Well, we'll do't again.

Tatt. With all my heart—Now, then, my little angel !

[Kisses her.]

Miss Prue. Pish!

Tatt. That's right. Again, my charmer!

[Kisses again.]

Miss Prue. O fie! nay, now I can't abide you.

Tatt. Admirable! That was as well as if you had been born and bred in Covent-garden—And won't you shew me, pretty miss, where your bed-chamber is?

Miss Prue. No, indeed won't I; but I'll run there, and hide myself from you behind the curtains.

Tatt. I'll follow you.

Miss Prue. Ah, but I will hold the door with both hands, and be angry; and you shall push me down before you come in.

Tatt. No, I'll come in first, and push you down afterwards.

Miss Prue. Will you? then I'll be more angry, and more complying.

Tatt. Then I'll make you cry out.

Miss Prue. O but you shan't, for I'll hold my tongue.

Tatt. Oh, my dear apt scholar!

Miss Prue. Well, now I'll run, and make more haste than you.

Tatt. You shall not fly so fast as I'll pursue.

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter Nurse.

Miss, miss, miss Prue!—Mercy on me, marry, and amen!—Why, what's become of the child?—Why, miss, miss Foresight!—Sure she has locked herself up in her chamber, and gone to sleep, or to prayers!—Miss, miss!—I hear her. Come to your father, child. Open the door—Open the door, miss. I hear you cry husht—O Lord, who's there? [Peeps.]—What's here to do?—O the Father! a man with her!—Why, miss, I say; God's my life! here's fine doings towards!—O Lord, we're all undone!—O you young harlotry!—[Knocks.]—Ods my life, won't you open the door? I'll come in the back way.

[Exit.]

Enter TATTLE and MISS PRUE.

Miss Prue. O Lord, she's coming—and she'll tell my father. What shall I do now?

Tatt. Pox take her! if she had staid two minutes longer, I should have wished for her coming.

Miss Prue. O dear, what shall I say? tell me, Mr Tattle, tell me a lie.

Tatt. There's no occasion for a lie: I could never tell a lie to no purpose—But, since we have done nothing, we must say nothing, I think. I hear her—I'll leave you together, and come off as you can.

[Thrusts her in, and shuts the door.]

Enter VALENTINE, SCANDAL, and ANGELICA.

Ang. You can't accuse me of inconstancy; I never told you that I loved you.

Val. But I can accuse you of uncertainty, for not telling me whether you did or not.

Ang. You mistake indifference for uncertainty; I never had concern enough to ask myself the question.

Scand. Nor good-nature enough to answer him that did ask you: I'll say that for you, madam.

Ang. What, are you setting up for good nature?

Scand. Only for the affectation of it, as the women do for ill-nature.

Ang. Persuade your friend that it is all affectation.

Scand. I shall receive no benefit from the opinion: for I know no effectual difference between continued affectation and reality.

Enter SIR SAMPSON, MRS FRAIL, MISS PRUE, and Servant.

Sir Sam. Is Ben come? Odso, my son Ben come? Odd, I'm glad on't. Where is he? I long to see him. Now, Mrs Frail, you shall see my son Ben. Body o'me, he's the hopes of my family—I ha'nt seen him these three years—I warrant he's grown!—Call him in; bid him make haste—[Exit Servant.]—I'm ready to cry for joy.

Mrs Frail. Now, miss, you shall see your husband.

Miss Prue. Pish, he shall be none of my husband.

[Aside to FRAIL.]

Mrs Frail. Hush! Well, he shant! leave that to me—I'll beckon Mr Tattle to us.

Ang. Won't you stay and see your brother?

Val. We are the twin stars, and cannot shine in one sphere; when he rises, I must set. Besides, if I should stay, I don't know but my father, in good-nature, may press me to the immediate signing the deed of conveyance of my estate; and I'll defer it as long as I can. Well, you'll come to a resolution?

Ang. I cannot. Resolution must come to me, or I shall never have one.

Scand. Come, Valentine, I'll go with you; I have something in my head to communicate to you.

[Exeunt SCANDAL and VALENTINE.]

Sir Samp. What! is my son Valentine gone? What! is he sneaked off, and would not see his brother? There's an unnatural whelp! there's an ill-natured dog! What! were you here, too, madam, and could not keep him? could neither love, nor duty, nor natural affection, oblige him? Odsbud, madam, have no more to say to him; he is not worth your consideration. The rogue has not a drachm of generous love about him—all interest, all interest! He's an undone scoundrel, and courts your estate. Body o'me, he does not care a doit for your person.

Ang. I am pretty even with him, sir Sampson; for, if ever I could have liked any thing in him, it should have been his estate, too. But, since that's gone, the bait's off, and the naked hook appears.

Sir Sam. Odsbud, well spoken; and you are a wiser woman than I thought you were: for most young women now-a-days are to be tempted with a naked hook.

Ang. If I marry, sir Sampson, I am for a good estate with any man, and for any man with a good estate: therefore, if I were obliged to make a choice, I declare I'd rather have you than your son.

Sir Sam. Faith and troth, you are a wise woman; and I'm glad to hear you say so. I was afraid you were in love with a reprobate. Odd, I was sorry for you with all my heart. Hang him, mongrel! cast him off. You shall see the rogue shew himself, and make love to some desponding Cadua of fourscore for sustenance.—Odd, I love to see a young spendthrift forced to cling to an old woman for support, like ivy round a dead oak—faith, I do. I love to see them hug and cotton together, like down upon a thistle.

Enter BEN and Servant.

Ben. Where's father?

Ser. There, sir; his back's toward you. [Exit.]

Sir Sam. My son Ben! Bless thee, dear boy! Body o' me, thou art heartily welcome.

Ben. Thank you, father; and I'm glad to see you.

Sir Sam. Odsbud, and I'm glad to see thee.—Kiss me, boy; kiss me again and again, dear Ben. [Kisses him.]

Ben. So, so, enough, father. Mess, I'd rather kiss these gentlewomen.

Sir Sam. And so thou shalt. Mrs Angelica, my son Ben.

Ben. Forsooth, if you please! [Salutes her.] Nay, mistress, I'm not for dropping anchor here; about ship, i' faith. [Kisses FRAIL.] Nay, and you, too, my little cock-boat! so. [Kisses Miss.]

Tatt. Sir, you're welcome ashore.

Ben. Thank you, thank you, friend.

Sir Sam. Thou hast been many a weary league, Ben, since I saw thee.

Ben. Ey, ey, heen? been far enough, and that be all. Well, father, and how do all at home? how does brother Dick, and brother Val?

Sir Sam. Dick! body o'me, Dick has been dead these two years. I writ you word, when you were at Leghorn.

Ben. Mass, that's true: marry, I had forgot. Dick is dead, as you say. Well, and how—I have a many questions to ask you; well, you ben't married again, father, be you?

Sir Sam. No, I intend you shall marry, Ben; I would not marry, for thy sake.

Ben. Nay, what does that signify? An you marry again—why, then, I'll go to sea again; so there's one for t'other, and that be all. Pray, don't let me be your hindrance; e'en marry, a God's name, and the wind sit that way. As for my part, mayhap I have no mind to marry.

Mrs Frail. That would be pity, such a handsome young gentleman!

Ben. Handsome! he, he, he! Nay, forsooth, an you be for joking, I'll joke with you; for I love my jest, an the ship were sinking, as we said at sea. But I'll tell you why I don't much stand towards matrimony. I love to roam from port to port, and from land to land: I could never abide to be port-bound, as we call it. Now a man that is married has, as it were, d'ye see, his feet in the bilboes, and mayhap may'nt get them out again when he would.

Sir Sam. Ben is a wag!

Ben. A man that is married, d'ye see, is no more like another man, than a galley-slave is like one of us free sailors: he is chained to an oar all his life; and mayhap forced to tug a leaky vessel into the bargain.

Sir Sam. A very wag! Ben is a very wag! only a little rough; he wants a little polishing.

Mrs Frail. Not at all; I like his humour mightily: it is plain and honest; I should like such a humour in a husband extremely.

Ben. Say'n you so, forsooth? Marry, and I should like such a handsome gentlewoman for a bed-fellow hugely. How say you, mistress?—would you like a going to sea? Mess, you're a a tight vessel, and well-rigged, an you were but as well manned.

Mrs Frail. I should not doubt that, if you were master of me.

Ben. But I'll tell you one thing, an you come to sea in a high wind, or that lady—you may'nt carry so much sail o'your head—Top and top gallant, by the mess!

Mrs Frail. No? why so?

Ben. Why, an you do, you may run the risk to be overset: and then you'll carry your keels above water—he, he, he!

Ang. I swear, Mr Benjamin is the veriest wag in nature; an absolute sea wit.

Sir Sam. Nay, Ben has parts; but, as I told you before, they want a little polishing. You must not take any thing ill, madam.

Ben. No, I hope the gentlewoman is not angry; I mean all in good part: for, if I give a jest, I'll take a jest; and so, forsooth, you may be as free with me.

Ang. I thank you, sir; I am not at all offended. But, methinks, sir Sampson, you should leave him alone with his mistress. Mr Tattle, we must not hinder lovers.

Tatt. Well, miss, I have your promise.

[Aside to Miss.

Sir Sam. Body o'me, madam, you say true.—Look you, Ben, this is your mistress. Come, miss, you must not be shame-faced; we'll leave you together.

Miss Prue. I can't abide to be left alone.—Mayn't my cousin stay with me?

Sir Sam. No, no. Come, let's away.

Ben. Look you, father, mayhap the young woman mayn't take a liking to me.

Sir Sam. I warrant thee, boy. Come, come, we'll be gone. I'll venture that.

[Enter SIR SAMPSON, TATTLE, and Mrs FRAIL.

Ben. Come, mistress, will you please to sit down? For, an you stand astern a that'n, we shall never grapple together. Come, I'll hawl a chair; there, an you please to sit, I'll sit by you.

Miss Prue. You need not sit so near one; if you have any thing to say, I can hear you farther off; I an't deaf.

Ben. Why that's true, as you say, nor I an't dumb; I can be heard as far as another. I'll heave off, to please you. [Sits farther off.]—An we were a league asunder, I'd undertake to hold discourse with you, an 'twere not a main high wind, indeed, and full in my teeth. Look you, forsooth; I am, as it were, bound for the land of matrimony: 'tis a voyage, d'ye see, that was none of my seeking; I was commanded by father, and if you like it, mayhap I may steer in-to your harbour. How say you, mistress? The short of the thing is, that if you like me, and I like you, we may chance to swing in a hammock together.

Miss Prue. I don't know what to say to you, nor I don't care to speak with you at all.

Ben. No! I am sorry for that. But, pray, why are you so scornful?

Miss Prue. As long as one must not speak one's mind, one had better not speak at all, I think; and truly I won't tell a lie for the matter.

Ben. Nay, you say true in that; it's but a folly to lie: for to speak one thing, and to think just the contrary way, is, as it were, to look one way, and to row another. Now, for my part, d'ye see, I'm for carrying things above board;—I'm not for keeping any thing under hatches—so that, if you ben't as willing as I, say so, a God's name; there's no harm done. Mayhap, you may be shame-faced; some maidens, though they love a man well enough, yet they don't care to tell'n so to's face. If that's the case, why silence gives consent.

Miss Prue. But I'm sure it is not so, for I'll speak sooner than you should believe that; and I'll speak truth, though one should always tell a lie to a man; and I don't care, let my father do what he will, I'm too big to be whipt; so I'll tell you plainly, I don't like you, nor love you at all; nor never will, that's more. So, there's your answer for you; and don't trouble me no more, you ugly thing.

Ben. Look you, young woman, you may learn to give good words, however. I spoke you fair, d'ye see, and civil. As for your love, or your liking, I don't value it of a rope's end—and mayhap I like you as little as you do me. What I said was in obedience to father. Gad, I fear a whipping no more than you do. But I tell you one thing—if you should give such language at sea, you'd have a cat o' nine tails laid across your shoulders. Flesh! who are you? You heard the other handsome young woman speak civilly to me, of her own accord. Whatever you think of yourself, Gad, I don't think you are any more to compare to her, than a can of small-beer to a bowl of punch.

Miss Prue. Well, and there's a handsome gentleman, and a fine gentleman, and a sweet gentleman, that was here, that loves me, and I love him; and, if he sees you speak to me any more, he'll thrash your jacket for you; he will, you great sea-calf.

Ben. What! do you mean that fair-weather spark that was here just now? Will he thrash my jacket? Let'n—let'n. But an' he comes near me, mayhap I may giv'n a salt eel for's supper, for all that. What does father mean, to leave me alone, as soon as I come home, with such a dirty dowdy? Sea calf! I an't calf enough to lick your chalked face, you cheese-curd, you. Marry thee! 'Oons, I'll marry a Lapland witch as soon, and live upon selling contrary winds, and wrecked vessels.

Miss Prue. I won't be called names, nor I won't be abused thus, so I won't. If I were a man—[Cries.]—you durst not talk at this rate—no, you durst not, you stinking tar-barrel.

[Enter MRS FORESIGHT and MRS FRAIL.

Mrs Fore. They have quarrelled, just as we could wish.

Ben. Tar-barrel! Let your sweetheart there, call me so, if he'll take your part, your Tom Essence, and I'll say something to him—Gad, I'll lace his musk-doublet for him. I'll make him stink; he shall smell more like a weasel than a civet cat, afore I ha' done with 'en.

Mrs Fore. Bless me! what's the matter, miss? What, does she cry? Mr Benjamin, what have you done to her?

Ben. Let her cry: the more she cries, the less she'll—she has been gathering foul weather in her mouth, and now it rains out at her eyes.

Mrs Fore. Come, miss, come along with me; and tell me, poor child.

Mrs Frail. Lord, what shall we do? There's my brother Foresight and sir Sampson coming. Sister, do you take miss down into the parlour, and I'll carry Mr Benjamin into my chamber; for they must not know that they are fallen out. Come, sir, will you venture yourself with me?

[Looking kindly on him.]

Ben. Venture? Mess, and that I will, though it were to sea in a storm.

[Exeunt.]

Enter SIR SAMPSON and FORESIGHT.

Sir Sam. I left them together here. What, are they gone? Ben is a brisk boy: he has got her into a corner—father's own son, faith! he'll touzle her, and mouzle her. The rogue's sharp set coming from sea. If he should not stay for saying grace, old Foresight, but fall to without the help of a parson, ha? Odd, if he should, I could not be angry with him; 'twould be but like me, a chip of the old block. Ha! thou art melancholic, old prognostication; as melancholic as if thou hadst spilt the salt, or paired thy nails on a Sunday. Come, cheer up, look about thee: look up, old star-gazer. Now is he poring upon the ground for a crooked pin, or an old horse-nail, with the head towards him.

Fore. Sir Sampson, we'll have the wedding to-morrow morning.

Sir Sam. With all my heart.

Fore. At ten o'clock; punctually at ten.

Sir Sam. To a minute, to a second; thou shalt set thy watch, and the bridegroom shall observe its motions; they shall be married to a minute, go to bed to a minute; and, when the alarm strikes, they shall keep time like the figures of St Dunstan's clock, and consummatum est shall ring all over the parish!

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, Mr Scandal desires to speak with you upon earnest business.

Fore. I go to him; sir Sampson, your servant.

[Exit FORESIGHT.]

Sir Sam. What's the matter, friend?

Ser. Sir, 'tis about your son Valentine; something has appeared to him in a dream, that makes him prophecy.

Enter SCANDAL.

Scand. Sir Sampson, sad news.

Fore. Bless us!

Sir Sam. Why, what's the matter?

Scand. Can't you guess at what ought to afflict you and him, and all of us, more than any thing else?

Sir Sam. Body o' me! I don't know any universal grievance, but a new tax, or the loss of the Canary fleet—unless popery should be landed in the west, or the French fleet were at anchor at Blackwall.

Scand. No! undoubtedly, Mr Foresight knew all this, and might have prevented it.

Fore. 'Tis no earthquake?

Scand. No, not yet; no whirlwind. But we don't know what it may come to—but it has had a consequence already, that touches us all.

Sir Sam. Why, body o' me, out with it.

Scand. Something has appeared to your son Valentine—he's gone to bed upon't, and very ill. He speaks little, yet he says he has a world to say. Asks for his father and the wise Foresight; talks of Raymond Lully, and the ghost of Lilly. He has secrets to impart, I suppose, to you, too. I can get nothing out of him but sighs. He desires he may see you in the morning; but would not be disturbed to-night, because he has some business to do in a dream.

Sir Sam. Hoity toity! what have I to do with his dreams or his divination? body o' me, this is a trick, to defer signing the conveyance. I warrant the devil will tell him in a dream, that he must not part with his estate. But I'll bring him a parson to tell him that the devil's a liar—or, if that won't do, I'll bring a lawyer, that shall out-lie the devil; and so I'll try whether my black-guard, or his, shall get the better of the day.

[Exit SIR SAMPSON.]

Scand. Alas! Mr Foresight, I am afraid all is not right. You are a wise man, and a conscientious man; a searcher into obscurity and futurity; and, if you commit an error, it is with a great deal of consideration, and discretion, and caution.

Fore. Ah, good Mr Scandal!

Scand. Nay, nay, 'tis manifest; I do not flatter you. But sir Sampson is hasty, very hasty—I'm afraid he is not scrupulous enough, Mr Foresight. He has been wicked; and Heaven grant he may mean well in this affair with you! but my mind gives me, these things cannot be wholly insignificant. You are wise, and should not be over-reached: methinks you should not.

Fore. Alas, Mr Scandal—Humanum est errare!

Scand. You say true, man will err; mere man will err: but you are something more. There have been wise men; but they were such as you—men who consulted the stars, and were observers of omens. Solomon was wise; but how? by his judgment in astrology. So says Pineda, in his third book, and eighth chapter.

Fore. You are learned, Mr Scandal.

Scand. A trifle—but a lover of art. And the wise men of the east owed their instructions to a star; which is rightly observed by Gregory the Great, in favour of astrology. And Albertus Magnus makes it the most valuable science—because, says he, it teaches us to consider the causation of causes, in the causes of things.

Fore. I protest, I honour you, Mr Scandal. I did not think you had been read in these matters. Few young men are inclined—

Scand. I thank my stars that have inclined me. But I fear this marriage, and making over the estate, this transferring of a rightful inheritance, will bring judgments upon us. I prophecy it; and I would not have the fate of Cassandra, not to be believed. Valentine is disturbed; what can be the cause of that? and air Sampson is hurried on by an unusual violence—I fear he does not act wholly from himself; and, methinks, he does not look as he used to do.

Fore. He was always of an impetuous nature. But, as to this marriage, I have consulted the stars; and all appearances are prosperous.

Scand. Come, come, Mr Foresight; let not the prospect of worldly lucre carry you beyond your judgment, nor against your conscience. You are not satisfied that you act justly.

Fore. How!

Scand. You are not satisfied, I say. I am loth to discourage you—but it is palpable that you are not satisfied.

Fore. How does it appear, Mr Scandal? I think I am very well satisfied.

Scand. Either you suffer yourself to deceive yourself, or you do not know yourself.

Fore. Pray explain yourself.

Scand. Do you sleep well o' nights?

Fore. Very well.

Scand. Are you certain? you do not look so.

Fore. I am in health, I think.

Scand. So was Valentine this morning; and looked just so.

Fore. How! Am I altered any way? I don't perceive it.

Scand. That may be; but your beard is longer than it was two hours ago.

Fore. Indeed? bless me!

Enter MRS FORESIGHT.

Mrs Fore. Husband, will you go to bed? it's tea o'clock. Mr Scandal, your servant.

Scand. Pox on her, she has interrupted my design—but I must work her into the project. You keep early hours, madam.

Mrs Fore. Mr Foresight is punctual; we sit up after him.

Fore. My dear, pray lend me your glass, your little looking-glass.

Scand. Pray lend it him, madam—I'll tell you the reason—[She gives him the glass: SCANDAL and she whisper—my passion for you is grown so violent, that I am no longer master of myself; I was interrupted in the morning, when you had charity enough to give me your attention; and I had hopes of finding another opportunity of explaining myself to you—but was disappointed all this day; and the uneasiness that has attended me ever since, brings me now hither at this unseasonable hour.

Mrs Fore. Was there ever such impudence, to make love to me before my husband's face? I'll swear I'll tell him.

Scand. Do. I'll die a martyr rather than disclaim my passion. But come a little farther this way; and I'll tell you what project I had to get him out of the way, that I might have an opportunity of waiting upon you.

[Whisper. FORESIGHT looking in the glass.

Fore. I do not see any revolution here. Methinks I look with a serene and benign aspect—pale, a little pale—but the roses of these cheeks have been gathered many years—ha! I do not like that sudden flushing—gone already! hem, hem, hem! faintish. My heart is pretty good; yet it beats: and my pulses, ha! I have none—mercy on me!—hum!—Yes, here they are.—Gallop, gallop, gallop, gallop, gallop, gallop! hey, whither will they hurry me? now they're gone again—and now I'm faint again; and pale again, and, hem! and my, hem!—breath, and, hem!—grows short; hem! he, he, hem!

Scand. It takes! pursue it, in the name of love and pleasure.

Mrs Fore. How do you do, Mr Foresight?

Fore. Hum, not so well as I thought I was. Lend me your hand.

Scand. Look you there, now. Your lady says your sleep has been unquiet of late.

Fore. Very likely!

Mrs Fore. O, mighty restless! but I was afraid to tell him so. He has been subject to talking and starting.

Scand. And did not use to be so?

Mrs Fore. Never, never; till within these three nights, I cannot say that he has once broken my rest since we have been married.

Fore. I will go to bed.

Scand. Do so, Mr Foresight, and say your prayers—He looks better than he did.

Mrs Fore. Nurse, nurse!

Fore. Do you think so, Scandal?

Scand. Yes, yes; I hope this will be gone by morning: take it in time.

Fore. I hope so.

Enter NURSE.

Mrs Fore. Nurse, your master is not well; put him to bed.

Scand. I hope you will be able to see Valentine in the morning. You had best take a little diacodium and cowslip water, and lie upon your back; may be you may dream.

Fore. I thank you, Mr Scandal; I will. Nurse, let me have a watch-light, and lay the Crumbs of Comfort by me.

Nurse. Yes, sir.

[Erit.

Fore. And—hem, hem! I am very faint.

Scand. No, no, you look much better.

Fore. Do I? And I hope, neither the lord of my ascendant, nor the moon, will be combust; and then, I may do well.

Scand. I hope so—Leave that to me; I will erect a scheme; and, I hope I shall find both Sol and Venus in the sixth house.

Fore. I thank you, Mr Scandal; indeed, that would be a great comfort to me. Hem, Hem !

good night. [Exit FORE.]

Scand. Good night, good Mr Foresight. And I hope Mars and Venus will be in conjunction—while your wife and I are together.

Mrs Fore. Well ; and what use do you hope to make of this project ? You don't think that you are ever like to succeed in your design upon me ?

Scand. Yes, faith, I do ; I have a better opinion both of you and myself, than to despair.

Mrs Fore. Did you ever hear such a toad ?—Hark'ye, devil : do you think any woman honest ?

Scand. Yes, several, very honest—they'll cheat a little at cards, sometimes ; but that's nothing.

Mrs Fore. Pshaw ! but virtuous, I mean ?

Scand. Yes, faith, I believe some women are virtuous, too ; but 'tis, as I believe some men are valiant, through fear—For why should a man court danger, or a woman shun pleasure ?

Mrs Fore. I'll swear you're impudent.

Scand. I'll swear you're handsome.

Mrs Fore. Pish, you'd tell me so, though you did not think so.

Scand. And you'd think so, though I did not tell you so : and now I think we know one another pretty well.

Mrs Fore. O Lord ! who's here ?

Enter Mrs FRAIL and BEN.

Ben. Mess, I love to speak my mind—Father has nothing to do with ine. Nay, I can't say that neither ; he has something to do with me ; but what does that signify ? If so be, that I ben't minded to be steered by him, 'tis as thof he should strive against wind and tide.

Mrs Frail. Ay, but, my dear, we must keep it secret, till the estate be settled ; for, you know, marrying without an estate is like sailing in a ship without ballast.

Ben. He, he, he ! why that's true ; just so for all the world, it is as like as two cable ropes.

Mrs Frail. And though I have a good portion, you know one would not venture all in one bottom.

Ben. Why, that's true ag'in ; for, mayhap, one bottom may spring a leak. You have hit it, indeed ; mess, you've nicked the channel.

Mrs Frail. Well, but if you should forsake me after all, you'd break my heart.

Ben. Break your heart ? I'd rather the Mary-gold should break her cable in a storm, as well as I love her. Flesh, you don't think I'm false-hearted, like a landman ? A sailor would be honest, thof, mayhap, he has never a penny of money in his pocket. Mayhap, I may not have so fair a face as a citizen or courtier ; but, for all that, I've as good blood in my veins, and a heart as sound as a biscuit.

Mrs Frail. And will you love me always ?

Ben. Nay, an I love once, I'll stick like pitch ; I'll tell you that. Come, I'll sing you a song of a sailor.

Mrs Frail. Hold, there's my sister ; I'll call her to hear it. If it won't interrupt you, Mr Ben will entertain you with a song.

Ben. The song was made upon one of our ship's-crew's wife ; our boatswain made the song ; mayhap you know her, sir. Before she married, she was called Buxom Joan of Deptford.

Scand. I have heard of her. [BEN sings.]

BALLAD.

*A soldier and a sailor,
A tinker and a tailor,
Had once a doubtful strife, sir,
To make a maid a wife, sir,
Whose name was Buxom Joan.
For now the time was ended,
When she no more intended
To lick her lips at men, sir,
And gnaw the sheets in vain, sir,
And lie o' nights alone.*

*The soldier swore like thunder,
He loved her more than plunder ;
And shewed her many a scar, sir,
That he had brought from far, sir,
With fighting for her sake.
The tailor thought to please her,
With offering her his measure.
The tinker, too, with mettle,
Said he could mend her kettle,
And stop up every leak.*

*But while these three were prating,
The sailor stily waiting,
Thought if it came about, sir,
That they should all fall out, sir,
He then might play his part :
And just even as he meant, sir,
To loggerheads they went, sir,
And then he let fly at her,
A shot 'twixt wind and water,
That won the fair maid's heart.*

Ben. Thus we live at sea ; eat biscuit, and drink flip ; put on a clean shirt once a quarter—come home, and lie with our landladies once a year ; get rid of a little money, and then put off with the next fair wind. How d'ye like us ?

Mrs Frail. Oh, you are the happiest, merriest men alive !

Mrs Fore. We're beholden to Mr Benjamin for this entertainment. I believe it is late.

Ben. Why, forsooth, an you think so, you had best go to bed. For my part, I mean to toss a can, and remember my sweetheart, before I turn in ; mayhap I may dream of her !

Mrs Fore. Mr Scandal, you had best go to bed, and dream, too.

Scand. Why, faith, I have a good lively imagination ; and can dream as much to the purpose as another, if I set about it. But dreaming is the poor retreat of a lazy, hopeless, and imperfect lover. [Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—VALENTINE'S Lodgings.

Enter SCANDAL and JEREMY.

Scand. WELL, is your master ready! does he look madly, and talk madly?

Jer. Yes, sir; you need make no great doubt of that: he, that was so near turning poet yesterday morning, can't be much to seek in playing the madman to day.

Scand. Would he have Angelica acquainted with the design?

Jer. No, sir, not yet. He has a mind to try whether his playing the madman won't make her play the fool, and fall in love with him; or at least own that she has loved him all this while, and concealed it.

Scand. I saw her take her coach just now with her maid; and think I heard her bid the coachman drive hither.

Jer. Like enough, sir: for I told her maid this morning, my master was run stark mad, only for love of her mistress. I hear a coach stop: if it should be she, sir, I believe he would not see her, till he hears how she takes it.

Scand. Well, I'll try her—'tis she; here she comes.

Enter ANGELICA.

Ang. Mr Scandal, I suppose you don't think it a novelty, to see a woman visit a man at his own lodgings in a morning?

Scand. Not upon a kind occasion, madam. But, when a lady comes, tyrannically, to insult a ruined lover, and make manifest the cruel triumphs of her beauty, the barbarity of it something surprises me.

Ang. I don't like raillery from a serious face. Pray, tell me what is the matter?

Jer. No strange matter, madam; my master's mad, that's all. I suppose your ladyship has thought him so a great while.

Ang. How d'ye mean! mad?

Jer. Why, faith, madam, he's mad for want of his wits, just as he was poor for want of money. His head is e'en as light as his pockets; and any body, that has a mind to a bad bargain, can't do better than to beg him for his estate.

Ang. If you speak truth, your endeavouring at wit is very unseasonable.

Scand. She's concerned, and loves him!

[Aside.]

Ang. Mr Scandal, you can't think me guilty of so much inhumanity, as not to be concerned for a man I must own myself obliged to. Pray, tell me the truth.

Scand. Faith, madam, I wish telling a lie would mend the matter. But this is no new effect of an unsuccessful passion.

Ang. [Aside.] I know not what to think! Yet

I should be vext to have a trick put upon me!—May I not see him?

Scand. I'm afraid the physician is not willing you should see him yet. Jeremy go in and inquire. [Exit JEREMY.]

Ang. Ha! I saw him wink and smile! I fancy a trick. I'll try. [Aside.] I would disguise to all the world, sir, a failing which I must own to you—I fear my happiness depends upon the recovery of Valentine. Therefore, I conjure you, as you are his friend, and as you have compassion on one fearful of affliction, to tell me what I am to hope for—I cannot speak—But you may tell me, for you know what I would ask.

Scand. So, this is pretty plain!—Be not too much concerned, madam; I hope his condition is not desperate. An acknowledgment of love from you, perhaps, may work a cure, as the fear of your aversion occasioned his distemper.

Ang. Say you so? nay, then I'm convinced: and if I don't play trick for trick, may I never taste the pleasure of revenge! [Aside.]—Acknowledgement of love! I find you have mistaken my compassion, and think me guilty of a weakness I am a stranger to. But I have too much sincerity to deceive you, and too much charity to suffer him to be deluded with vain hopes. Good nature and humanity oblige me to be concerned for him: but to love, is neither in my power nor inclination.

Scand. Hey, brave woman, i'faith!—Won't you see him then, if he desires it?

Ang. What signifies a madman's desires? besides, 'twould make me uneasy—If I don't see him, perhaps my concern for him may lessen—If I forget him, 'tis no more than he has done by himself; and now the surprise is over, methinks I'm not half so sorry as I was.

Scand. So, faith, good-nature works apace; you were confessing just now an obligation to his love.

Ang. But I have considered that passions are unreasonable and involuntary. If he loves, he can't help it; and if I don't love, I cannot help it: no more than he can help his being a man, or my being a woman; or no more than I can, help my want of inclination to stay longer here.

[Exit.]

Scand. Humph!—An admirable composition, faith, this same womankind!

Enter JEREMY.

Jer. What, is she gone, sir?

Scand. Gone? why she was never here, nor any where else; nor I don't know her, if I see her, nor you neither.

Jer. Good lack! what's the matter now? are any more of us to be mad? Why, sir, my master longs to see her; and is almost mad in good earnest with the joyful news of her being here.

Scand. We are all under a mistake. Ask no questions, for I can't resolve you; but I'll inform your master. In the mean time, if our project succeed no better with his father than it does with his mistress, he may descend from his exaltation of madness into the road of common sense, and be content only to be made a fool with other reasonable people. I hear sir Sampson. You know your cue? I'll to your master. [Erit.]

Enter SIR SAMPSON and BUCKRAM.

Sir Sam. D'ye see, Mr Buckram, here's the paper signed with his own hand.

Buck. Good, sir. And the conveyance is ready drawn in this box, if he be ready to sign and seal.

Sir Sam. Ready! body o'me, he must be ready: his sham sickness sha'n't excuse him—O, here's his scoundrel. Sirrah, where's your master?

Jer. Ah, sir, he's quite gone!

Sir Sam. Gone! what, he's not dead?

Jer. No, sir, not dead.

Sir Sam. What, is he gone out of town? run away? ha! has he tricked me? Speak, varlet.

Jer. No, no, sir, he's safe enough, sir, an he were but as sound, poor gentleman! He is indeed here, sir, and not here, sir.

Sir Sam. Hey-day, rascal, do you banter me? sirrah, d'ye banter me?—Speak, sirrah; where is he? for I will find him.

Jer. Would you could, sir; for he has lost himself. Indeed, sir, I have almost broke my heart about him—I can't refrain tears when I think on him, sir: I'm as melancholy for him as a passing-bell, sir; or a horse in a pond.

Sir Sam. A pox confound your similitudes, sir:—Speak to be understood: and tell me in plain terms what is the matter with him, or I'll crack your fool's skull.

Jer. Ah, you've hit it, sir; that's the matter with him, sir; his skull's cracked, poor gentleman! he's stark mad, sir.

Sir Sam. Mad!

Buck. What, is he non compos?

Jer. Quite non compos, sir.

Buck. Why, then, all's obliterated, sir Sampson. If he be non compos mentis, his act and deed will be of no effect; it is not good in law.

Sir Sam. Oons, I won't believe it; let me see him, sir. Mad! I'll make him find his senses.

Jer. Mr Scandal is with him, sir; I'll knock at the door.

[Goes to the scene, which opens and discovers VALENTINE and SCANDAL. VALENTINE upon a couch, disorderly dressed.]

Sir Sam. How now? what's here to do?

Val. Ha! who's that? [Starting.]

Scand. For Heaven's sake, softly, sir, and gently: don't provoke him.

Val. Answer me, who's that? and that?

Sir Sam. Gads bobs, does he not know? Is he mischievous? I'll speak gently. Val, Val, dost thou not know me, boy? not know thy own father, Val? I am thy own father; and this, honest Brief Buckram, the lawyer.

Val. It may be so—I did not know you—the world is full. There are people that we do know, and people that we do not know, and yet the sun shines upon all alike. There are fathers that have many children; and there are children that have many fathers—'tis strange! But I am Honesty, and come to give the world the lie.

Sir Sam. Body o'me, I know not what to say to him!

Val. Why does that lawyer wear black?—does he carry his conscience without-side? Lawyer, what art thou? dost thou know me?

Buck. O Lord! what must I say?—Yes, sir.

Val. Thou liest; for I am Honesty. 'Tis hard I cannot get a livelihood amongst you. I have been sworn out of Westminster-Hall the first day of every term—Let me see—no matter how long—But I'll tell you one thing; it is a question that would puzzle an arithmetician, if I should ask him, whether the bible saves more souls in Westminster-Abbey, or damns more in Westminster-Hall?—For my part, I am Honesty, and can't tell; I have very few acquaintance.

Sir Sam. Body o'me, he talks sensibly in his madness—Has he no intervals?

Jer. Very short, sir.

Buck. Sir, I can do you no service while he's in this condition. Here's your paper, sir—He may do me a mischief if I stay—The conveyance is ready, sir, if he recover his senses. [Erit.]

Sir Sam. Hold, hold; don't you go yet.

Scand. You'd better let him go, sir; and send for him if there be occasion: for I fancy his presence provokes him more.

Val. Is the lawyer gone? 'Tis well; then we may drink about, without going together by the ears. Heigh ho! what o'clock is it? My father here! your blessing, sir.

Sir Sam. He recovers!—Bless thee, Val!—How dost thou do, boy?

Val. Thank you, sir, pretty well. I have been a little out of order. Won't you please to sit, sir?

Sir Sam. Ay, boy. Come, thou shalt sit down by me.

Val. Sir, 'tis my duty to wait.

Sir Sam. No, no: come, come, sit thee down, honest Val. How dost thou do? let me feel thy pulse—Oh, pretty well now, Val. Body o'me, I was sorry to see thee indisposed: but I am glad thou art better, honest Val.

Val. I thank you, sir.

Scand. Miracle! The monster grows loving.

[Aside.]

Sir Sam. Let me feel thy hand again, Val. It does not shake—I believe thou canst write, Val? Ha, boy? thou canst write thy name, Val?—

Jeremy, step and overtake Mr Bockram; bid him make haste back with the conveyance—quick!

[Exit JEREMY.]

Scand. That ever I should suspect such a heathen of any remorse!

[Aside.]

Sir Sam. Dost thou know this paper, Val? I know thou'rt honest, and wilt perform articles.

[Shows him the paper, but holds it out of his reach.]

Val. Pray let me see it, sir; you hold it so far off, that I can't tell whether I know it or no.

Sir Sam. See it, boy? Ay, ay, why thou dost see it—'tis thy own hand, Vally. Why, let me see, I can read it as plain as can be: look you here—[Reads.] 'The condition of this obligation'—Look you, as plain as can be, so it begins—And then at the bottom—'As witness my hand, VALENTINE LEGEND,' in great letters—Why, 'tis as plain as the nose on one's face. What, are my eyes better than thine? I believe I can read it farther off yet—let me see—

[Stretches his arm as far as he can.]

Val. Will you please to let me hold it, sir?

Sir Sam. Let thee hold it, say'st thou?—Ay, with all my heart—What matter is it who holds it? What need any body hold it?—I'll put it in my pocket, Val, and then nobody need hold it—[Puts the paper in his pocket.] There, Val: its safe enough, boy. But thou shalt have it as soon as thou hast set thy hand to another paper, little Val.

Enter JEREMY and BUCKRAM.

Val. What, is my bad genius here again? Oh no, 'tis the lawyer, with an itching palm; and he's come to be scratched. My nails are not long enough. Let me have a pair of red hot tongs quickly, quickly; and you shall see me act St Dunstan, and lead the devil by the nose.

Buck. O Lord, let me be gone! I'll not venture myself with a madman.

[Runs out.]

Val. Ha, ha, ha! you need not run so fast. Honesty will not overtake you. Ha, ha, ha! the rogue found me out to be in forma pauperis presently.

Sir Sam. Oons! what a vexation is here! I know not what to do or say, or which way to go.

Val. Who's that, that's out of his way? I am Honesty, and can set him right. Hark'ee, friend, the strait road is the worst way you can go. He that follows his nose always, will very often be led into a stink. Probatum est. But what are you for? religion or politics? There's a couple of topics for you, no more like one another than oil and vinegar; and yet these two, beaten together by a state cook, make sauce for the whole nation.

Sir Sam. What the devil had I to do, ever to beget sons? why did I ever marry?

Val. Because thou wert a monster, old boy. The two greatest monsters in the world, are a man and a woman. What's thy opinion?

Sir Sam. Why, my opinion is, that these two monsters, joined together, make yet a greater; that's a man and his wife.

Val. Aha, old Truepenny! sayest thou so? Thou hast micked it. But it is wonderful strange, Jeremy.

Jer. What is it, sir?

Val. That grey hairs should cover a green head—and I make a fool of my father. What's here? Erra Pater, or a bearded sibyl? If prophecy comes, Honesty must give place.

[Exit VALENTINE and JEREMY.]

Enter FORESIGHT, MRS FORESIGHT, and MRS FRAIL.

Fore. What says he? What did he prophesy? Ha, Sir Sampson! Bless us! how are we?

Sir Sam. Are we? A pox on your prognostications! Why, we are fools as we used to be. Oons, that you could not foresee that the moon would predominate, and my son be mad! Where's your oppositions, your trines, and your quadrates? Ah! pox on't, that I, who know the world, and men and manners, who don't believe a syllable in the sky and stars, and sun and almanacks, and trash, should be directed by a dreamer, an omen-hunter, and defer business in expectation of a lucky hour! when, body o'me! there never was a lucky hour after the first opportunity.

[Exit.]

Fore. Ah, sir Sampson, Heaven help your head! This is none of your lucky hours—Nemo omnibus horis sapit!—What, is he gone, and in contempt of science? Ill stars, and unconvertible ignorance attend him!

Scand. You must excuse his passion, Mr Foresight; for he has been heartily vexed. His son is non compos mentis, and thereby incapable of making any conveyance in law; so that all his measures are disappointed.

Fore. Ha! say you so?

Mrs Frail. What, has my sea-lover lost his anchor of hope, then?

[Aside to MRS FORESIGHT.]

Mrs Fore. O sister, what will you do with him?

Mrs Frail. Do with him? Send him to sea again in the next foul weather. He's used to an inconstant element, and won't be surprised to see the tide turned.

Fore. Wherein was I mistaken, not to foresee this?

[Considers.]

Scand. Madam, you and I can tell him something else, that he did not foresee, and more particularly relating to his own fortune. [Aside to MRS FORESIGHT.] You look pretty well, Mr Foresight. How did you rest last night?

Fore. Truly, Mr Scandal, I was so taken up with broken dreams, and distracted visions, that I remember little.

Scand. But would you not talk with Valentine? Perhaps you may understand him; I am apt to believe, there is something mysterious in his discourse, and sometimes rather think him inspired than mad.

Fore. You speak with singular good judgment, Mr Scandal, truly. I am inclining to your Turkish opinion in this matter, and do reverence a man, whom the vulgar think mad. Let us go to him.

Mrs Frail. Sister, do you go with them; I'll find out my lover, and give him his discharge, and come to you. [Exeunt SCANDAL, MR and MRS FORESIGHT.] On my conscience, here he comes!

Enter BEN.

Ben. All mad, I think. Flesh, I believe all the calentures of the sea are come ashore, for my part.

Mrs Frail. Mr Benjamin in choler!

Ben. No, I'm pleased well enough, now I have found you. Mess, I have had such a hurricane on your account yonder!

Mrs Frail. My account? Pray, what's the matter?

Ben. Why, father came, and found me squabbling with yon chitty-faced thing, as he would have me marry—so he asked, what was the matter. He asked in a surly sort of a way. It seems brother Val is gone mad, and so that put'n into a passion; but what did I know that? what's that to me? So he asked in a surly sort of manner—and, Gad, I answered 'en as surlily. What, thof he be my father, I an't bound prentice to 'en: so, faith, I told'n, in plain terms, if I were minded to marry, I'd marry to please myself, not him; and, for the young woman that he provided for me, I thought it more fitting for her to learn her sampler, and make dirt-pies, than to look after a husband; for my part, I was none of her man—I had another voyage to make, let him take it as he will.

Mrs Frail. So, then, you intend to go to sea again?

Ben. Nay, nay, my mind ran upon you—but I would not tell him so much. So he said, he'd make my heart ache; and if so be, that he could get a woman to his mind, he'd marry himself. Gad, says I, an you play the fool, and marry at these years, there's more danger of your head's aching than my heart! He was woundy angry, when I giv'n that wipe—he hadn't a word to say; and so I left'n, and the green girl together; mayhap the bee may bite, and he'll marry her himself—with all my heart!

Mrs Frail. And were you this undutiful and graceless wretch to your father?

Ben. Then, why was he graceless first? If I am undutiful and graceless, why did he beget me so? I did not beget myself.

Mrs Frail. O impiety! how have I been mistaken! What an inhuman merciless creature have I set my heart upon! O, I am happy to have discovered the shelves and quicksands, that lurk beneath that smiling faithless face?

Ben. Hey-toss! what's the matter now? why, you be'nt angry, be you?

Mrs Frail. O see me no more—for thou wert born among rocks, suckled by whales, cradled in a tempest, and whistled to by winds; and thou art come forth with fins and scales, and three rows of teeth, a most outrageous fish of prey.

Ben. O Lord! O Lord! she's mad, poor young woman! Love has turned her senses; her brain is quite overset. Well-a-day! how shall I do to set her to rights?

Mrs Frail. No, no, I am not mad, monster! I am wise enough to find you out. Hadst thou the impudence to aspire at being a husband, with that stubborn and disobedient temper? You, that know not how to submit to a father, presume to have a sufficient stock of duty to undergo a wife? I should have been finely fobbed, indeed! very finely fobbed!

Ben. Harkee, forsooth; if so be, that you are in your right senses, d'ye see, for aught as I perceive, I'm like to be finely fobbed—if I have got anger here upon your account, and you are tacked about already! What d'ye mean, after all your fair speeches, and stroking my cheeks, and kissing and hugging, what, would you sheer off so? would you, and leave me aground?

Mrs Frail. No, I'll leave you adrift, and go which way you will.

Ben. What, are you false-hearted, then?

Mrs Frail. Only the wind's changed.

Ben. More shame for you!—The wind's changed? It is an ill wind blows nobody good. Mayhap I have a good riddance on you, if these be your tricks. What, did you mean all this while to make a fool of me?

Mrs Frail. Any fool, but a husband.

Ben. Husband! Gad, I would not be your husband, if you would have me, now I know your mind; thof you had your weight in gold and jewels, and thof I loved you never so well.

Mrs Frail. Why, canst thou love, porpus?

Ben. No matter what I can do; don't call names. I don't love you so well as to bear that, whatever I did. I'm glad you shew yourself, mistress: let them marry you as don't know you. Gad, I know you too well, by sad experience; I believe he that marries you will go to sea in a hen-pecked frigate. I believe that, young woman! and mayhap may come to an anchor at Cuckold's Point; so there's a dash for you, take it as you will; mayhap you may hollow after me, when I won't come to. [Exit.]

Mrs Frail. Ha, ha, ha! no doubt on't. [Sings.] 'My true love is gone to sea!' [Enter MRS FORESIGHT.] O sister, had you come a minute sooner, you would have seen the resolution of a lover. Honest Tar and I are parted, and with the same indifference that we met.

Mrs Fore. What, then, he bore it most heroically?

Mrs Frail. Most tyrannically. But I'll tell you a hint that he has given me. Sir Sampson is enraged, and talks desperately of committing matrimony himself. If he has a mind to throw himself away, he can't do it more effectually than upon me, if we could bring it about.

Mrs Fore. O hang him, old fox! he's too cunning; besides, he hates both you and me. But I have a project in my head for you, and I have gone a good way towards it. I have almost made a bargain with Jeremy, Valentine's man, to sell his master to us.

Mrs Frail. Sell him? how?

Mrs Fore. Valentine raves upon Angelica, and took me for her, and Jeremy says, will take any body for her that he imposes on him. Now, I have promised him mountains, if, in one of his mad fits, he will bring you to him in her stead, and get you married together, and put to bed together—and after consummation, girl, there's no revoking. And if he should recover his senses, he'll be glad at least to make you a good settlement. Here they come; stand aside a little, and tell me how you like the design.

Enter VALENTINE, SCANDAL, FORESIGHT, and JEREMY.

Scand. And have you given your master a hint of their plot upon him? [To JEREMY.

Jer. Yes, sir; he says he'll favour it, and mistake her for Angelica.

Scand. It may make us sport.

Fore. Mercy on us!

Val. Hush!—interrupt me not—I'll whisper prediction to thee, and thou shalt prophesy. I am Honesty, and can teach thy tongue a new trick. I have told thee what's past—Now, I'll tell what's to come! Dost thou know what will happen to-morrow? Answer me not; for I will tell thee. To-morrow, knaves will thrive through craft, and fools through fortune; and Honesty will go, as it did, frost-nipt in a summer-suit. Ask me questions concerning to-morrow.

Scand. Ask him, Mr Foresight.

Fore. Pray, what will be done at court?

Val. Scandal will tell you—I am Honesty; I never come there.

Fore. In the city?

Val. Oh, prayers will be said in empty churches, at the usual hours. Yet you will see such zealous faces behind counters, as if religion were to be sold in every shop. Oh! things will go methodically in the city. The clocks will strike twelve at noon, and the horned herd buz in the Exchange at two. Husbands' and wives will drive distinct trades; and care and pleasure separately occupy the family. Coffee-houses will be full of smoke and stratagem. And the cropt 'prentice that sweeps his master's shop in the morning, may, ten to one, dirty his sheets before night. But there are two things that you will see very strange; which are, wanton wives with their legs at liberty, and tame cuckolds with chains about their necks. But hold, I must examine you before I go further; you look suspiciously. Are you a husband?

Fore. I am married.

Val. Poor creature! Is your wife of Covent-garden parish?

Fore. No: St Martin in the Fields.

Val. Alas, poor man! his eyes are sunk, and his hands shrivelled; his legs dwindled, and his back bowed. Pray, pray for a metamorphosis—Change thy shape, and shake off age; get thee Medea's kettle, and be boiled anew; come forth, with labouring, callous hands, a chine of steel, and Atlas' shoulders. Let Taliacotius trim the calves of twenty chairmen, and make thee pedestals to stand erect upon; and look matrimony in the face. Ha, ha, ha! that a man should have a stomach to a wedding supper, when the pigeons ought rather to be laid to his feet! ha, ha, ha!

Fore. His frenzy is very high, now, Mr Scandal.

Scand. I believe it is a spring tide.

Fore. Very likely truly; you understand these matters. Mr Scandal, I shall be very glad to confer with you, about these things, which he has uttered. His sayings are very mysterious and hieroglyphical.

Val. Oh, why would Angelica be absent from my eyes so long?

Jer. She's here, sir.

Mrs Fore. Now, sister.

Mrs Frail. O Lord, what must I say?

Scand. Humour him, madam, by all means.

Val. Where is she? Oh, I see her! She comes like riches, health, and liberty, at once, to a despairing, starving, and abandoned wretch. O welcome, welcome!

Mrs Frail. How d'ye, sir? can I serve you?

Val. Harkee—I have a secret to tell you—Endymion and the moon shall meet us upon Mount Patmos, and we'll be married in the dead of night. But say not a word. Hymen shall put his torch into a dark lantern, that it may be secret; and Juno shall give her peacock poppy water, that he may fold his ogling tail, and Argus's hundred eyes be shut, ha? Nobody shall know but Jeremy.

Mrs Frail. No, no, we'll keep it secret; it shall be done presently.

Val. The sooner the better—Jeremy, come hither—closer—that none may overhear us.—Jeremy, I can tell you news. Angelica is turned nun, and I am turned friar: and yet we'll marry one another in spite of the pope. Get me a cowl and beads, that I may play my part—for she'll meet me two hours hence in black and white, and a long veil to cover the project; and we won't see one another's faces, till we have done something to be ashamed of—and then we'll blush once for all.

Enter TATTLE and ANGELICA.

Jer. I'll take care, and——

Val. Whisper.

Ang. Nay, Mr Tattle, if you make love to me, you spoil my design; for I intend to make you my confident.

Scand. How's this! Tattle making love to Angelica!

Tatt. But, madam, to throw away your person—such a person! and such a fortune, on a madman!

Ang. I never loved him till he was mad; but, don't tell any body so.

Tatt. Tell, madam? alas, you don't know me. I have much ado to tell your ladyship how long I have been in love with you—but, encouraged by the impossibility of Valentine's making any more addresses to you, I have ventured to declare the very inmost passion of my heart. Oh, madam, look upon us both. There, you see the ruins of a poor decayed creature! Here, a complete lively figure, with youth and health, and all his five senses in perfection, madam; and to all this, the most passionate lover——

Ang. O, fie for shame! hold your tongue. A passionate lover, and five senses in perfection! When you are as mad as Valentine, I'll believe you love me; and the maddest shall take me.

Val. It is enough. Ha! who's there;

Mrs Frail. O Lord, her coming will spoil all.
[To JEREMY.]

Jer. No, no, madam; he won't know her; if he should, I can persuade him.

Val. Scandal, who are these? Foreigners? If they are, I'll tell you what I think. Get away all the company but Angelica, that I may discover my design to her.
[Whispers.]

Scand. I will. I have discovered something of Tattle, that is of a piece with Mrs Frail. He courts Angelica; if we could contrive to couple them together——Harkee——
[Whispers.]

Mrs Fore. He won't know you, cousin; he knows nobody.

Fore. But he knows more than any body.—Oh, niece, he knows things past, and things to come, and all the profound secrets of time.

Tatt. Look you, Mr Foresight; it is not my way to make many words of matters, and so I shan't say much. But, in short, d'ye see, I will hold you a hundred pounds now, that I know more secrets than he.

Fore. How? I cannot read that knowledge in your face, Mr Tattle. Pray, what do you know?

Tatt. Why, d'ye think I'll tell you, sir? Read it in my face! No, sir, it is written in my heart; and safer there, sir, than letters written in juice of lemon, for no fire can fetch it out. I am no blab, sir.

Val. Acquaint Jeremy with it; he may easily bring it about. They are welcome, and I'll tell them so myself. [To SCANDAL.] What, do you look strange upon me! Then I must be plain.—[Coming up to them.] I am Honesty, and hate an old acquaintance with a new face.

[SCANDAL goes aside with JEREMY.]

Tatt. Do you know me, Valentine?

Val. You! who are you? I hope not.

Tatt. I am Jack Tattle, your friend.

Val. My friend! What to do? I'm no married man, and thou canst not lie with my wife. I am very poor, and thou canst not borrow money of me. Then what employment have I for a friend?

Tatt. Ha! a good open speaker, and not to be trusted with a secret.

Ang. Do you know me, Valentine?

Val. Oh, very well.

Ang. Who am I?

Val. You're a woman—one, to whom Heaven gave beauty, when it grafted roses on a briar.—You are the reflection of heaven in a pond; and he, that leaps at you, is sunk. You are all white, a sheet of lovely spotless paper, when you were first born; but you are to be scrawled and blotted by every goose's quill. I know you; for I loved a woman, and loved her so long, that I found out a strange thing; I found out what a woman was good for.

Tatt. Ay, prithee, what's that?

Val. Why, to keep a secret.

Tatt. O Lord!

Val. O, exceeding good to keep a secret; for, though she should tell, yet she is not believed.

Tatt. Ha! good again, faith.

Jer. [JEREMY and SCANDAL whisper.] I'll do it, sir.

Scand. Mr Foresight, we had best leave him. He may grow outrageous, and do mischief.

Fore. I will be directed by you.

Jer. [To Mrs FRAIL.] You'll meet, madam.—I'll take care every thing shall be ready.

Mrs Frail. Thou shalt do what thou wilt; in short, I will deny thee nothing.

Tatt. Madam, shall I wait upon you?

[To ANGELICA.]

Ang. No, I'll stay with him. Mr Scandal will protect me. Aunt, Mr Tattle desires you would give him leave to wait upon you.

Tatt. Pox on't, there's no coming off, now she has said that—Madam, will you do me the honour?

Mrs Fore. Mr Tattle might have used less ceremony.

[Exit Mrs FRAIL, Mr and Mrs FORESIGHT and TATTLE.]

Scand. Jeremy, follow Tattle. [Exit JEREMY.]

Ang. Mr Scandal, I only stay till my maid comes, and because I have a mind to be rid of Mr Tattle.

Scand. Madam, I am very glad that I overheard a better reason which you gave to Mr Tattle; for his impertinence forced you to acknowledge a kindness for Valentine, which you denied to all his sufferings and my solicitations. So I'll leave him to make use of the discovery, and your ladyship to the free confession of your inclinations.

Ang. Oh Heavens! you won't leave me alone with a madman?

Scand. No, madam; I only leave a madman to his remedy. [Exit.]

Val. Madam, you need not be very much afraid, for I fancy I begin to come to myself.

Ang. Ay, but if I don't fit you, I'll be hanged. [Aside.]

Val. You see what disguises love makes us put on. Gods have been in counterfeited shapes for the same reason; and the divine part of me, my mind, has worn this masque of madness, and this motly livery, only as the slave of love, and menial creature of your beauty.

Ang. Mercy on me, how he talks!—Poor Valentine!

Val. Nay, faith, now let us understand one another, hypocrisy apart. The comedy draws towards an end; and let us think of leaving acting, and be ourselves; and, since you have loved me, you must own, I have at length deserved you should confess it.

Ang. [Sighs.] I would I had loved you!—for, Heaven knows, I pity you; and, could I have foreseen the bad effects, I would have striven; but that's too late!

Val. What bad effects? what's too late? My seeming madness has deceived my father, and procured me time to think of means to reconcile me to him, and preserve the right of my inheritance to his estate; which otherwise, by articles, I must this morning have resigned. And this I had informed you of to-day, but you were gone before I knew you had been here.

Ang. How! I thought your love of me had caused this transport in your soul, which, it seems, you only counterfeited for mercenary ends and sordid interest.

Val. Nay, now you do me wrong; for, if any interest was considered, it was yours; since I thought I wanted more than love to make me worthy of you.

Ang. Then you thought me mercenary—But how am I deluded, by this interval of sense, to reason with a madman?

Val. Oh, 'tis barbarous to misunderstand me longer.

Enter JEREMY.

Ang. Oh, here's a reasonable creature!—sure he will not have the impudence to persevere!—Come, Jeremy, acknowledge your trick, and confess your master's madness counterfeit.

Jer. Counterfeit, madam! I'll maintain him to be as absolutely and substantially mad, as any freeholder in Bedlam. Nay, he's as mad as any projector, fanatic, chemist, lover, or poet, in Europe.

Val. Sirrah, you lie; I'm not mad.

Ang. Ha, ha, ha! you see he denies it.

Jer. O Lord, madam! did you ever know any madman mad enough to own it?

Val. Sot, can't you apprehend?

Ang. Why, he talked very sensibly just now.

Jer. Yes, madam; he has intervals: but you see he begins to look wild again now.

Val. Why, you thick-skulled rascal, I tell you the farce is done, and I'll be mad no longer.

[Beats him.]

Ang. Ha, ha, ha! is he mad or no, Jeremy?

Jer. Partly, I think—for he does not know his own mind two hours. I'm sure I left him just now in the humour to be mad: and I think I have not found him very quiet at the present. [One knocks.] Who's there?

Val. Go see, you sot. I'm very glad that I can move your mirth, though not your compassion.

Ang. I did not think you had apprehension enough to be exceptions: but madmen shew themselves most by over-pretending to a sound understanding, as drunken men do by over-acting sobriety. I was half inclining to believe you, till I accidentally touched upon your tender part. But now you have restored me to my former opinion and compassion.

Jer. Sir, your father has sent to know if you are any better yet.—Will you please to be mad, sir, or how?

Val. Stupidity! you know the penalty of all I'm worth must pay for the confession of my senses.—I'm mad, and will be mad, to every body but this lady.

Jer. So;—just the very back-side of truth. But lying is a figure in speech, that interlards the greatest part of my conversation.—Madam, your ladyship's woman.

Enter JENNY.

Ang. Well, have you been there?—Come hither.

Jenny. Yes, madam! sir Sampson will wait upon you presently. [Aside to ANGELICA.]

Val. You are not leaving me in this uncertainty?

Ang. Would any thing but a madman complain of uncertainty? Uncertainty and expectation are the joys of life. Security is an insipid thing; and the overtaking and possessing of a wish discovers the folly of the chase. Never let us know one another better; for the pleasure of a masquerade is done, when we come to shew our faces. But I'll tell you two things before I leave you; I am not the fool you take me for; and you are mad, and don't know it.

[Exit ANGELICA and JENNY.]

Val. From a riddle you can expect nothing but a riddle. There's my instruction, and the moral of my lesson.

Jer. What, is the lady gone again, sir? I hope you understood one another before she went?

Val. Understood! she is harder to be understood than a piece of Egyptian antiquity, or an Irish manuscript; you may pore till you spoil your eyes, and not improve your knowledge.

Jer. I have heard them say, sir, they read hard

Hebrew books backwards. May be you begin to read at the wrong end.

Val. They say so of a witch's prayer; and dreams and Dutch almanacks are to be understood by contraries. Yet, while she does not seem to hate me, I will pursue her, and know her, if it be possible, in spite of the opinion of my satirical friend, who says—

That women are like tricks by slight of hand;
Which, to admire, we should not understand.

[Exeunt.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.—A room in FORESIGHT'S house.

Enter ANGELICA and JENNY.

Ang. WHERE is sir Sampson? did you not tell me he would be here before me?

Jenny. He's at the great glass in the dining-room, madam, setting his cravat and wig.

Ang. How! I'm glad on't. If he has a mind I should like him, it's a sign he likes me; and that's more than half my design.

Jenny. I hear him, madam.

Ang. Leave me; and, d'ye hear, if Valentine should come, or send, I'm not to be spoken with.

[Exit JENNY.]

Enter SIR SAMPSON.

Sir Sam. I have not been honoured with the commands of a fair lady a great while. Odd, madam, you have revived me—not since I was five and thirty.

Ang. Why, you have no great reason to complain, sir Sampson; that's not long ago.

Sir Sam. Zooks, but it is, madam, a very great while; to a man that admires a fine woman as much as I do.

Ang. You're an absolute courtier, sir Sampson.

Sir Sam. Not at all, madam. Od's-bud, you wrong me: I am not so old, neither, to be a bare courtier, only a man of words. Odd, I have warm blood about me yet, and can serve a lady any way. Come, come, let me tell you, you women think a man old too soon; faith and troth you do. Come, don't despise fifty; Odd, fifty, in a hale constitution, is no such contemptible age!

Ang. Fifty a contemptible age! not at all: a very fashionable age, I think—I assure you, I know very considerable beaux, that set a good face upon fifty. Fifty! I have seen fifty in a side-box, by candle-light, out-blossom five-and-twenty.

Sir Sam. Outsides, outsides! a pize take them, mere outsides. Hang your side-box beaux; no, I'm none of those, none of your forced trees, that pretend to blossom in the fall, and bud when they should bring forth fruit. I am of a long-lived race, and inherit vigour. None of my ancestors married till fifty; yet they begot sons and daughters till fourscore. I am of your patriarchs, I, a branch of one of your antediluvian families, fellows that the flood could not wash away. Well, madam, what are your commands? Has any young rogue affronted you, and shall I cut his throat? or—

Ang. No, sir Sampson, I have no quarrel upon my hands—I have more occasion for your conduct, than your courage, at this time. To tell you the truth, I'm weary of living single, and want a husband.

Sir Sam. Od's-bud, and it is pity you should! Odd, would she would like me! then I should hamper my young rogues: odd, would she would! faith and troth, she's devilish handsome! —[Aside.—]Madam, you deserve a good husband; and 'twere pity you should be thrown away upon any of these young idle rogues about the town. Odd, there's ne'er a young fellow worth hanging—that is, a very young fellow—Pize on them, they never think beforehand of any thing—and if they commit matrimony, 'tis as they commit murder; out of a frolic; and are ready to hang themselves, or to be hanged by the law, the next morning. Odso, have a care, madam.

Ang. Therefore, I ask your advice, sir Sampson. I have fortune enough to make any man easy that I can like; if there were such a thing as a young agreeable man, with a reasonable stock of good-nature and sense—for I would neither have an absolute wit, nor a fool.

Sir Sam. Odd, you are hard to please, madam: to find a young fellow that is neither a wit in his own eye, nor a fool in the eye of the world, is a very hard task. But, faith and troth, you speak very discreetly. I hate a wit; I had a son that was spoilt among them; a good, hopeful lad, till he learnt to be a wit—and might have risen in the state. But, a pox on't, his wit ran him out of his money, and now his poverty has run him out of his wits.

Ang. Sir Sampson, as your friend, I must tell you, you are very much abused in that matter—he's no more mad than you are.

Sir Sam. How, madam! would I could prove it!

Ang. I can tell you how that may be done—but it is a thing that would make me appear to be too much concerned in your affairs.

Sir Sam. Odsbud, I believe she likes me—
[Aside.]—Ah, madam, all my affairs are scarce worthy to be laid at your feet; and I wish, madam, they were in a better posture, that I might make a more becoming offer to a lady of your incomparable beauty and merit. If I had Peru in one hand, and Mexico in t'other, and the eastern empire under my feet, it would make me only a more glorious victim, to be offered at the shrine of your beauty.

Ang. Bless me, sir Sampson, what's the matter?

Sir Sam. Odd, madam, I love you—and if you would take my advice in a husband—

Ang. Hold, hold, sir Sampson! I asked your advice for a husband, and you are giving me your consent. I was, indeed, thinking to propose something like it in jest, to satisfy you about Valentine: for if a match were seemingly carried on between you and me, it would oblige him to throw off his disguise of madness, in apprehension of losing me; for, you know, he has long pretended a passion for me.

Sir Sam. Gadzooks, a most ingenious contrivance—if we were to go through with it! but why must the match only be seemingly carried on? Odd, let it be a real contract.

Ang. O fie, sir Sampson, what would the world say?

Sir Sam. Say? They would say you were a wise woman, and I a happy man. Odd, madam, I'll love you as long as I live; and leave you a good jointure when I die.

Ang. Aye, but that is not in your power, sir Sampson; for when Valentine confesses himself in his senses, he must make over his inheritance to his younger brother.

Sir Sam. Odd, you're cunning, a wary baggage! Faith and troth, I like you the better. But, I warrant you, I have a proviso in the obligation in favour of myself. Body o' me, I have a trick to turn the settlement upon the issue-male of our two bodies begotten. Odsbud, let us find children, and I'll find an estate!

Ang. Will you? well, do you find the estate, and leave the other to me.

Sir Sam. O rogue! but I'll trust you. And will you consent? Is it a match, then?

Ang. Let me consult my lawyer concerning this obligation; and, if I find what you propose practicable, I'll give you my answer.

Sir Sam. With all my heart. Come in with me, and I'll lend you the bond. You shall consult your lawyer, and I'll consult a parson. Odzooks, I'm a young man; Odzooks, I'm a young man, and I'll make it appear—Odd, you're devilish handsome. Faith and troth, you're very handsome; and I'm very young, and very lusty. Odsbud, hussy, you know how to choose! and so do I. Odd, I think we are very well met. Give me your hand; odd, let me kiss it; 'tis as warm and as soft—as what?—odd, as t'other hand!—give me t'other hand; and I'll mumble them, and kiss them, till they melt in my mouth.

Ang. Hold, sir Sampson—you're profuse of your vigour before your time. You'll spend your estate before you come to it.

Sir Sam. No, no; only give you a rent-roll of my possessions—ah, baggage! I warrant you for a little Sampson. Odd, Sampson is a very good name for an able fellow. Your Sampsons were strong dogs from the beginning.

Ang. Have a care, and don't overact your part. If you remember, Sampson, the strongest of the name, pulled an old house over his head at last.

Sir Sam. Say you so, hussy? Come, let's go, then; odd, I long to be pulling, too. Come away.—Odso, here's somebody coming.

[Exeunt.]

Enter TATTLE and JEREMY.

Tatt. Is not that she, gone out just now?

Jer. Aye, sir, she's just going to the place of appointment. Ah, sir, if you are not very faithful and close in this business, you'll certainly be the death of a person, that has a most extraordinary passion for your honour's service.

Tatt. Aye, who's that?

Jer. Even my unworthy self, sir. Sir, I have had an appetite to be fed with your commands a great while—and now, sir, my former master having much troubled the fountain of his understanding, it is a very plausible occasion for me to quench my thirst at the spring of your bounty. I thought I could not recommend myself better to you, sir, than by the delivery of a great beauty and fortune into your arms, whom I have heard you sigh for.

Tatt. I'll make thy fortune; say no more.—Thou art a pretty fellow, and canst carry a message to a lady, in a pretty soft kind of phrase, and with a good persuading accent.

Jer. Sir, I have the seeds of rhetoric and oratory in my head—I have been at Cambridge.

Tatt. Aye; 'tis well enough for a servant to be bred at an university; but the education is a little too pedantic for a gentleman. I hope you are secret in your nature, private, close, ha?

Jer. O sir, for that, sir, 'tis my chief talent; I'm as secret as the head of Nilus.

Tatt. Aye? who's he, though? a privy counsellor?

Jer. O ignorance!—[Aside.]—A cunning Egyptian, sir, that with his arms could over-run the country, yet nobody could ever find out his head-quarters.

Tatt. Close dog! a good whoremaster, I warrant him! The time draws nigh, Jeremy. Angelica will be veiled like a nun; and I must be hooded like a friar; ha, Jeremy?

Jer. Aye, sir, hooded like a hawk, to seize at first sight upon the quarry. It is the whim of my master's madness to be so dressed; and she is so in love with him, she'll comply with any thing to please him. Poor lady! I'm sure she'll have reason to pray for me, when she finds what a happy change she has made, between a madman and so accomplished a gentleman.

Tatt. Aye, faith, so she will, Jeremy: you're a good friend to her, poor creature! I swear I do it hardly so much in consideration of myself, as compassion to her.

Jer. 'Tis an act of charity, sir, to save a fine woman with thirty thousand pounds from throwing herself away.

Tatt. So 'tis, faith! I might have saved several others in my time; but, egad, I could never find in my heart to marry any body before.

Jer. Well, sir, I'll go and tell her my master's coming; and meet you in half a quarter of an hour, with your disguise, at your own lodgings. You must talk a little madly;—she won't distinguish the tone of your voice.

Tatt. No, no, let me alone for a counterfeit. I'll be ready for you. [Exit JEREMY.]

Enter Miss PRUE.

Miss Prue. O, Mr Tattle, are you here? I'm glad I have found you. I have been looking up and down for you like any thing, till I'm as tired as any thing in the world.

Tatt. O pox! how shall I get rid of this foolish girl? [Aside.]

Miss Prue. O, I have pure news, I can tell you; pure news!—I must not marry the seaman now—My father says so. Why, won't you be my husband? You say you love me! and you won't be my husband. And I know you may be my husband now, if you please.

Tatt. O fie, miss! who told you so, child?

Miss Prue. Why, my father—I told him that you loved me.

Tatt. O fie, miss! why did you do so! and who told you so, child?

Miss Prue. Who? Why, you did; did not you?

Tatt. O pox! that was yesterday, miss; that was a great while ago, child. I have been asleep since; slept a whole night, and did not so much as dream of the matter.

Miss Prue. Pshaw! O, but I dreamt that it was so though.

Tatt. Ay, but your father will tell you that dreams come by contraries, child. O fie! what, we must not love one another now. Pshaw, that would be a foolish thing, indeed! Fie, fie! you're a woman now, and must think of a new man every morning, and forget him every night. No, no; to marry is to be a child again, and play with the same rattle always: O fie, marrying is a paw thing!

Miss Prue. Well, but don't you love me as well as you did last night, then?

Tatt. No, no, child; you would not have me?

Miss Prue. No? Yes, but I would though.

Tatt. Pshaw, but I tell you, you would not. You forget you are a woman, and don't know your own mind.

Miss Prue. But here's my father, and he knows my mind.

Enter FORESIGHT.

Fore. O, Mr Tattle, your servant; you are a close man; but, methinks, your love to my daughter was a secret I might have been trusted with!—or had you a mind to try if I could discover it by my art?—Hum, ha! I think there is something in your physiognomy, that has a resemblance of her; and the girl is like me.

Tatt. And so you would infer, that you and I are alike?—What does the old prig mean? I'll banter him, and laugh at him, and leave him. [Aside.] I fancy you have a wrong notion of faces.

Fore. How? what? a wrong notion! how so?

Tatt. In the way of art, I have some taking features, not obvious to vulgar eyes, that are indication of a sudden turn of good fortune, in the lottery of wives; and promise a great beauty and great fortune reserved alone for me, by a private intrigue of destiny, kept secret from the piercing eye of perspicuity, from all astrologers, and the stars themselves.

Fore. How? I will make it appear, that what you say is impossible.

Tatt. Sir, I beg your pardon, I am in haste—

Fore. For what?

Tatt. To be married, sir—married.

Fore. Ay, but pray, take me along with you, sir.

Tatt. No, sir; it is to be done privately—I never make confidants.

Fore. Well; but my consent, I mean—You won't marry my daughter without my consent?

Tatt. Who, I, sir? I am an absolute stranger to you and your daughter, sir.

Fore. Hey-day! What time of the moon is this?

Tatt. Very true, sir; and desire to continue so. I have no more love for your daughter, than I have likeness of you: and I have a secret in my heart, which you would be glad to know, and shan't know: and yet you shall know it too, and be sorry for it afterwards. I'd have you know, sir, that I am as knowing as the stars, and as secret as the night. And I'm going to be married just now, yet, did not know of it half an hour ago; and the lady stays for me, and does not know of it yet. There's a mystery for you! I know you love to untie difficulties. Or, if you can't solve this; stay here a quarter of an hour, and I'll come and explain it to you. [Exit.]

Miss Prue. O, father! why will you let him go? Won't you make him to be my husband?

Fore. Mercy on us! what do these lunacies portend? Alas! he's mad, child, stark wild.

Miss Prue. What, and must not I have e'er a husband, then? What, must I go to bed to nurse again, and be a child as long as she's an old woman? Indeed, but I won't. For, now my mind is set upon a man, I will have a man some way or other.

Fore. O fearful! I think the girl's influenced, too. Hussy, you shall have a rod.

Miss Prue. A fiddle of a rod! I'll have a husband; and, if you won't get me one, I'll get one for myself. I'll marry our Robin the butler; he says he loves me: and he's a handsome man, and shall be my husband: I warrant he'll be my husband, and thank me, too; for he told me so.

Enter SCANDAL, MRS FORESIGHT, and NURSE.

Fore. Did he so? I'll dispatch him for it presently. Rogue! Oh, nurse, come hither.

Nurse. What is your worship's pleasure?

Fore. Here, take your young mistress, and lock her up presently, till farther orders from me. Not a word, hussy—Do what I bid you. No reply: away. And bid Robin make ready to give an account of his plate and linen, dy'e hear? Begone, when I bid you.

[Exit NURSE and MISS PRUE.]

Mrs Fore. What's the matter, husband?

Fore. 'Tis not convenient to tell you now—Mr Scandal, Heaven keep us all in our senses! I fear there is a contagious frenzy abroad. How does Valentine?

Scand. O, I hope he will do well again. I have a message from him to your niece Angelica.

Fore. I think she has not returned since she went abroad with sir Sampson. Nurse, why are you not gone?

Enter BEN.

Here's Mr Benjamin; he can tell us if his father be come home.

Ben. Who? Father? Ay, he's come home with a vengeance.

Mrs Fore. Why, what's the matter?

Ben. Matter! Why, he's mad.

Fore. Mercy on us! I was afraid of this.

Ben. And there's a handsome young woman; she, as they say, brother Val went mad for, she's mad, too, I think.

Fore. O, my poor niece! my poor niece! is she gone, too? Well, I shall run mad next.

Mrs Fore. Well, but how mad? how d'ye mean?

Ben. Nay, I'll give you leave to guess—I'll undertake to make a voyage to Antigua—No, I mayn't say so, neither—but I'll sail as far as Leghorn, and back again, before you shall guess at the matter, and do nothing else. Mess, you may take in all the points of the compass, and not hit the right.

Mrs Fore. Your experiment will take up a little too much time.

Ben. Why, then, I'll tell you: there's a new wedding upon the stocks, and they two are going to be married to rights.

Scand. Who?

Ben. Why, father, and—the young woman. I can't hit her name.

Scand. Angelica?

Ben. Ay, the same.

Mrs Fore. Sir Sampson and Angelica? Impossible!

Ben. That may be—but I'm sure it is as I tell you.

Scand. 'Sdeath, it is a jest. I can't believe it.

Ben. Look you, friend; it is nothing to me, whether you believe it or no. What I say is true, d'ye see; they are married, or just going to be married, I know not which.

Fore. Well, but they are not mad, that is, not lunatic?

Ben. I don't know what you may call madness—but she's mad for a husband, and he's horn-mad, I think, or they'd never make a match together. Here they come.

Enter SIR SAMPSON, ANGELICA, and BUCKRAM.

Sir Sam. Where is this old soothsayer? this uncle of mine elect?—Aha! old Foresight! uncle Foresight! wish me joy, uncle Foresight, double joy, both as uncle and astrologer: here's a conjunction that was not foretold in all your Ephemeris! The brightest star in the blue firmament—is shot from above, in a jelly of love, and so forth; and I'm lord of the ascendant. Odd, you're an old fellow, Foresight—uncle, I mean; a very old fellow, uncle Foresight, and yet you shall live to dance at my wedding; faith and troth you shall. Odd, we'll have the music of the spheres for thee, old Lilly, that we will; and thou shalt lead up a dance in via lactea.

Fore. I'm thunder-struck! You are not married to my niece?

Sir Sam. Not absolutely married, uncle; but very near it; within a kiss of the matter, as you see. [Kisses ANGELICA.]

Ang. 'Tis very true, indeed, uncle; I hope you'll be my father, and give me.

Sir Sam. That he shall, or I'll burn his globes. Body o'me, he shall be thy father: I'll make him thy father, and thou shalt make me a father, and I'll make thee a mother; and we'll beget sons and daughters enough to put the weekly bills out of countenance.

Scand. Death and hell! Where's Valentine?

[Exit.]

Mrs Fore. This is so surprising—

Sir Sam. How! What does my aunt say? surprising, aunt? not at all, for a young couple to make a match in winter! Not at all—It's a plot to undermine cold weather, and destroy that usurper of a bed called a warming-pan.

Mrs Fore. I'm glad to hear you have so much fire in you, sir Sampson.

Ben. Mess, I fear his fire's little better than tinder; mayhap it will only serve to light a match for somebody else. The young woman's a handsome young woman, I can't deny it: but, father, if I might be your pilot in this case, you should not marry her. It is just the same thing as if so you should sail as far as the Streights without provision.

Sir Sam. Who gave you authority to speak, sirrah? To your element, fish; be mute, fish, and to sea. Rule your helm, sirrah; don't direct me.

Ben. Well, well, take you care of your own helm; or you mayn't keep your new vessel steady.

Sir Sam. Why, you impudent tarpawlin! sirrah, do you bring your fore-castle jests upon your father? But I shall be even with you; I won't give you a groat. Mr Buckram, is the conveyance so worded, that nothing can possibly descend to this scoundrel? I would not so much as have him have the prospect of an estate, though there were no way to come to it, but by the north-east passage.

Buck. Sir, it is drawn according to your directions; there is not the least cranny of the law unstopt.

Ben. Lawyer, I believe there's many a cranny and leak unstopt in your conscience! If so be that one had a pump to your bosom, I believe we should discover a foul hold. They say, a witch will sail in a sieve—but, I believe the devil would not venture aboard your conscience. And that's for you.

Sir Sam. Hold your tongue, sirrah. How now? who's here?

Enter TATTLE, and MRS FRAIL.

Mrs Frail. O, sister, the most unlucky accident!

Mrs Fore. What's the matter?

Tatt. O, the two most unfortunate poor creatures in the world we are!

Fore. Bless us! how so?

Mrs Frail. Ah! Mr Tattle and I, poor Mr Tattle and I are—I can't speak it out.

Tatt. Nor I—but poor Mrs Frail and I are—

Mrs Frail. Married.

Fore. Married! How?

Tatt. Suddenly—before we knew where we were—that villain Jeremy, by the help of disguises, tricked us into one another.

Fore. Why, you told me just now, you went hence in haste to be married!

Ang. But I believe Mr Tattle meant the favour to me; I thank him.

Tatt. I did, as I hope to be saved, madam; my intentions were good. But this is the most cruel thing, to marry, one does not know how, nor why, nor wherefore. The devil take me, if ever I was so much concerned at any thing in my life!

Ang. 'Tis very unhappy, if you don't care for one another.

Tatt. The least in the world—that is, for my part, I speak for myself. Gad, I never had the least thought of serious kindness—I never liked any body less in my life. Poor woman! Gad, I'm sorry for her, too; for I have no reason to hate her neither; but, I believe I shall lead her a damned sort of a life.

Mrs Fore. He's better than no husband at all—though he's a coxcomb. [To FRAIL.

Mrs Frail. [To her.] Ay, ay, it's well it's no worse. Nay, for my part, I always despised Mr Tattle of all things; nothing but his being my husband could have made me like him less.

Tatt. Look you there, I thought as much! Pox on't, I wish we could keep it secret! why, I don't believe any of this company would speak of it.

Ben. If you suspect me, friend, I'll go out of the room.

Mrs Frail. But, my dear, that's impossible; the parson and that rogue Jeremy will publish it.

Tatt. Ay, my dear, so they will, as you say.

Ang. O, you'll agree very well in a little time; custom will make it easy for you.

Tatt. Easy! Pox on't, I don't believe I shall sleep to-night.

Sir Sam. Sleep, quotha! No; why, you would not sleep on your wedding-night? I'm an older fellow than you, and don't mean to sleep.

Ben. Why, there's another match, now, as thof a couple of privateers were looking for a prize, and should fall foul of one another. I'm sorry for the young man with all my heart. Look you, friend, if I may advise you, when she's going—for that you must expect, I have experience of her—when she's going, let her go. For no matrimony is tough enough to hold her; and if she can't drag her anchor along with her, she'll break her cable, I can tell you that. Who's here? the madman?

Enter VALENTINE, SCANDAL, and JEREMY.

Val. No; here's the fool; and, if occasion be, I'll give it under my hand.

Sir Sam. How now?

Val. Sir, I'm come to acknowledge my errors, and ask your pardon.

Sir Sam. What! have you found your senses at last, then? In good time, sir.

Val. You were abused, sir; I never was distracted.

Fore. How? not mad! Mr Scandal?

Scand. No, really, sir; I'm his witness, it was all counterfeit.

Val. I thought I had reasons—but it was a poor contrivance: the effect has shewn it such.

Sir Sam. Contrivance! what, to cheat me? to cheat your father! Sirrah, could you hope to prosper?

Val. Indeed, I thought, sir, when the father endeavoured to undo the son, it was a reasonable return of nature.

Sir Sam. Very good, sir. Mr Buckram, are you ready? Come, sir, will you sign and seal?

Val. If you please, sir; but, first, I would ask this lady one question.

Sir Sam. Sir, you must ask me leave first—That lady! No, sir; you shall ask that lady no questions, till you have asked her blessing, sir; that lady is to be my wife.

Val. I have heard as much, sir; but I would have it from her own mouth.

Sir Sam. That's as much as to say I lie, sir, and you don't believe what I say?

Val. Pardon me, sir. But I reflect that I very lately counterfeited madness: I don't know but the frolic may go round.

Sir Sam. Come, chuck, satisfy him, answer him.—Come, Mr Buckram, the pen and ink.

Buck. Here it is, sir, with the deed; all is ready. [VAL. goes to ANG.

Ang. 'Tis true, you have a great while pretended love to me; nay, what if you were sincere? Still you must pardon me, if I think my own inclinations have a better right to dispose of my person, than yours.

Sir Sam. Are you answered now, sir?

Val. Yes, sir.

Sir Sam. Where's your plot, sir? and your contrivance now, sir? Will you sign, sir? Come, will you sign and seal?

Val. With all my heart, sir.

Scand. 'Sdeath, you are not mad, indeed? to ruin yourself?

Val. I have been disappointed of my only hope; and he that loses hope may part with any thing. I never valued fortune, but as it was subservient to my pleasure; and my only pleasure was to please this lady: I have made many vain attempts; and find, at last, that nothing but my ruin can effect it; which, for that reason, I will sign to. Give me the paper.

Ang. Generous Valentine! [Aside.

Buck. Here is the deed, sir.

Val. But where is the bond, by which I am obliged to sign this?

Buck. Sir Sampson, you have it.

Ang. No, I have it; and I'll use it, as I would every thing that is an enemy to Valentine. [Tears the paper.

Sir Sam. How now?

Val. Ha!

Ang. Had I the world to give you, it could not make me worthy of so generous and faithful a passion. Here's my hand; my heart was always yours, and struggled very hard to make this utmost trial of your virtue. [To VALENTINE.

VOL. II.

Val. Between pleasure and amazement, I am lost—but, on my knees, I take the blessing.

Sir Sam. Oons, what is the meaning of this?

Ben. Mass, here's the wind changed again—Father, you and I may make a voyage together, now!

Ang. Well, sir Sampson, since I have played you a trick, I'll advise you how you may avoid such another. Learn to be a good father, or you'll never get a second wife. I always loved your son, and hated your unforgiving nature. I was resolved to try him to the utmost; I have tried you, too, and know you both. You have not more faults than he has virtues; and it is hardly more pleasure to me, that I can make him and myself happy, than that I can punish you.

Sir Sam. Oons, you are a crocodile.

Fore. Really, sir Sampson, this is a sudden eclipse.

Sir Sam. You're an illiterate old fool; and I'm another.

Tatt. If the gentleman is in disorder for want of a wife, I can spare him mine. Oh, are you there, sir? I am indebted to you for my happiness. [To JEREMY.

Jer. Sir, I ask you ten thousand pardons: it was an arrant mistake. You see, sir, my master was never mad, nor any thing like it. Then, how can it be otherwise?

Val. Tattle, I thank you; you would have interposed between me and Heaven; but Providence laid purgatory in your way. You have but justice.

Scand. I hear the fiddles that sir Sampson provided for his own wedding; methinks it is pity they should not be employed when the match is so much mended. Valentine, though it be morning, we may have a dance.

Val. Any thing, my friend; every thing that looks like joy and transport.

Scand. Call them, Jeremy.

Ang. I have done dissembling now, Valentine; and if that coldness, which I have always worn before you, should turn to an extreme fondness, you must not suspect it.

Val. I'll prevent that suspicion—for I intend to doat to that immoderate degree, that your fondness shall never distinguish itself enough to be taken notice of. If ever you seem to love too much, it must be only when I cannot love enough.

Ang. Have a care of promises: you know you are apt to run more in debt than you are able to pay.

Val. Therefore, I yield my body as your prisoner, and make your best on't.

Scand. [To ANGELICA.] Well, madam, you have done exemplary justice, in punishing an inhuman father, and rewarding a faithful lover:—but there is a third good work, which I, in particular, must thank you for: I was an infidel to your sex, and you have converted me—for now I am convinced, that all women are not, like fortune, blind in bestowing favours, either on those who do not merit, or who do not want them.

2 R

Ang. It is an unreasonable accusation, that you lay upon our sex. You tax us with injustice, only to cover your own want of merit. You would all have the reward of love; but few have the constancy to stay till it becomes your due.—Men are generally hypocrites and infidels; they pretend to worship, but have neither zeal nor faith. How few, like Valentine, would persevere even to martyrdom, and sacrifice their interest to their inconstancy! In admiring me, you misplace the novelty.

The miracle to-day is, that we find
A lover true; not that a woman's kind.

ACT. I.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter VIZARD with a letter, his servant following.

Viz. ANGELICA send it back unopened! say you?

Ser. As you see, sir.

Viz. The pride of these virtuous women is more insufferable than the immodesty of prostitutes—After all my encouragement, to slight me thus!

Ser. She said, sir, that imagining your morals sincere, she gave you access to her conversation; but that your late behaviour in her company has convinced her that your love and your religion are both hypocrisy, and that she believes your letter, like yourself, fair on the outside, and foul within; so sent it back unopened.

Viz. May obstinacy guard her beauty till wrinkles bury it! then, may desire prevail to make her curse that untimely pride her disappointed age repents! I'll be revenged the very first opportunity—Saw you the old lady Darling, her mother?

Ser. Yes, sir, and she was pleased to say much in your commendation.

Viz. That's my cue—An esteem grafted in old age is hardly rooted out; years stiffen their opinions with their bodies, and old zeal is only to be cozened by young hypocrisy. [Aside.] Run to the lady Lurewell's, and know of her maid whether her ladyship will be at home this evening. Her beauty is sufficient cure for Angelica's scorn.

[Exit servant. VIZARD pulls out a book, reads, and walks about.]

Enter SMUGGLER.

Smug. Ay, there's a pattern for the young men o' the times! at his meditation so early! some book of pious ejaculations, I'm sure.

Viz. This Hobbes is an excellent fellow!—[Aside.] Oh, uncle Smuggler! To find you at this end o' the town is a miracle.

Smug. I have seen a miracle this morning, indeed, cousin Vizard.

Viz. What is it, pray, sir?

Smug. A man at his devotion so near the court—I'm very glad, boy, that you keep your sanctity untainted in this infectious place; the very air of this park is heathenish, and every man's breath I meet scents of atheism.

Viz. Surely, sir, some great concern must bring you to this unsanctified end of the town.

Smug. A very unsanctified concern truly, cousin.

Viz. What is it?

Smug. A law-suit, boy—Shall I tell you?—My ship, the Swan, is newly arrived from St Sebastian, laden with Portugal wines: now, the impudent rogue of a tide-waiter has the face to affirm it is French wines in Spanish casks, and has indicted me upon the statute—Oh, conscience! conscience! these tide-waiters and surveyors plague us more with their French wines, than the war did with French privateers—Ay, there's another plague of the nation—

Enter COLONEL STANDARD.

A red coat and feather.

Viz. Colonel Standard, I'm your humble servant.

Stand. May be not, sir.

Viz. Why so?

Stand. Because—I'm disbanded.

Viz. How! Broke?

Stand. This very morning, in Hyde-Park, my brave regiment, a thousand men, that looked like lions yesterday, were scattered, and looked as poor and simple as the herd of deer that grazed beside them.

Smug. Tal, al, deral. [Singing.] I'll have a bonfire this night as high as the monument.

Stand. A bonfire! Thou dry, withered, ill-nature! had not those brave fellows' swords defended you, your house had been a bonfire ere this about your ears.—Did we not venture our lives, sir?

Smug. And did we not pay for your lives, sir? Venture your lives! I'm sure we ventured our money, and that's life and soul to me.—Sir, we'll maintain you no longer.

Stand. Then your wives shall, old Actæon.

There are five and thirty strapping officers gone this morning to live upon free quarters in the city.

Smug. Oh, lord! Oh, lord! I shall have a son within these nine months born with a leading staff in his hand.—Sir, you are——

Stand. What, sir?

Smug. Sir, I say that you are——

Stand. What, sir?

Smug. Disbanded, sir, that's all—I see the lawyer yonder. [Exit.]

Viz. Sir, I'm very sorry for your misfortune.

Stand. Why so? I don't come to borrow money of you. If you're my friend, meet me this evening at the Rummer; I'll pay my foy, dring a health to my king, prosperity to my country, and away for Hungary to-morrow morning.

Viz. What! you won't leave us?

Stand. What! a soldier stay here, to look like an old pair of colours in Westminster Hall, ragged and rusty! No, no—I met yesterday a broken lieutenant; he was ashamed to own that he wanted a dinner, but begged eighteen-pence of me to buy a new scabbard for his sword.

Viz. Oh, but you have good friends, colonel!

Stand. Oh, very good friends! My father's a lord, and my elder brother a beau; mighty good friends, indeed!

Viz. But your country may perhaps want your sword again.

Stand. Nay, for that matter, let but a single drum beat up for volunteers between Ludgate and Charing-Cross, and I shall undoubtedly hear it at the walls of Buda.

Viz. Come, come, colonel, there are ways of making your fortune at home—Make your addresses to the fair; you're a man of honour and courage.

Stand. Ay, my courage is like to do me wondrous service with the fair. This pretty cross cut over my eye will attract a duchess—I warrant 'twill be a mighty grace to my ogling—Had I used the stratagem of a certain brother colonel of mine, I might succeed.

Viz. What was it, pray?

Stand. Why, to save his pretty face for the women, he always turned his back upon the enemy.—He was a man of honour for the ladies.

Viz. Come, come, the loves of Mars and Venus will never fail; you must get a mistress.

Stand. Prithee, no more on't—You have awakened a thought, from which, and the kingdom, I would have stolen away at once.—To be plain, I have a mistress.

Viz. And she's cruel?

Stand. No.

Viz. Her parents prevent your happiness?

Stand. Not that.

Viz. Then she has no fortune?

Stand. A large one. Beauty to tempt all mankind, and virtue to beat off their assaults. Oh, Vizard! such a creature!

Enter SIR HARRY WILDAIR, crosses the stage singing, with Footmen after him.

Hey-day! Who the devil have we here?

Viz. The joy of the play-house, and life of the park; Sir Harry Wildair, newly come from Paris.

Stand. Sir Harry Wildair! Did not he make a campaign in Flanders some three or four years ago?

Viz. The same.

Stand. Why, he behaved himself very bravely.

Viz. Why not? Dost think bravery and gaiety are inconsistent? He's a gentleman of most happy circumstances, born to a plentiful estate; has had a genteel and easy education, free from the rigidity of teachers, and pedantry of schools. His florid constitution, being never ruffled by misfortune, nor stinted in its pleasures, has rendered him entertaining to others, and easy to himself: turning all passion into gaiety of humour, by which he chooses rather to rejoice with his friends, than be hated by any, as you shall see.

Re-enter WILDAIR.

Wild. Ha, Vizard!

Viz. Sir Harry!

Wild. Who thought to find you out of the Rubric so long; I thought thy hypocrisy had been wedded to a pulpit-cushion long ago.—Sir, if I mistake not your face, your name is Standard?

Stand. Sir Harry, I'm your humble servant.

Wild. Come, gentlemen, the news, the news o' the town, for I'm just arrived.

Viz. Why, in the city-end o' the town, we're playing the knave, to get estates.

Stand. And in the court-end playing the fool, in spending them.

Wild. Just so in Paris. I'm glad we're grown so modish.

Viz. And hypocrisy for religion.

Wild. A-la-mode de Paris again.

Viz. Not one whore between Ludgate and Aldgate.

Stand. But ten times more cuckolds than ever.

Viz. Nothing like an oath in the city.

Stand. That's a mistake; for my major swore a hundred and fifty last night to a merchant's wife in her bed-chamber,

Wild. Pshaw! this is trifling; tell me news, gentlemen. What lord has lately broke his fortune at the Groom-Porter's? or his heart at Newmarket, for the loss of a race? What wife has been lately suing in Doctor's-Commons for alimony; or what daughter run away with her father's valet? What beau gave the noblest ball at the Bath, or had the finest coach in the ring? I want news, gentlemen.

Stand. Faith, sir, these are no news at all.

Viz. But pray, sir Harry, tell us some news of your travels.

Wild. With all my heart.—You must know, then, I went over to Amsterdam in a Dutch ship: I there had a Dutch whore for five stivers. I went from thence to Landen, where I was heartily drubbed in the battle with the butt-end of a Swiss musket. I thence went to Paris, where I had half a dozen intrigues, bought half a dozen new suits, fought a couple of duels, and here I am again in statu quo.

Viz. But we heard that you designed to make the tour of Italy; what brought you back so soon?

Wild. That which brought you into the world, and may perhaps carry you out of it; a woman.

Stand. What! quit the pleasures of travel for a woman?

Wild. Ay, colonel, for such a woman! I had rather see her ruelle than the palace of Lewis le Grand. There's more glory in her smile, than in the Jubilee at Rome; and I would rather kiss her hand, than the Pope's toe.

Viz. You, colonel, have been very lavish in the beauty and virtue of your mistress; and sir Harry, here, has been no less eloquent in the praise of his. Now, will I lay you both ten guineas a piece, that neither of them is so pretty, so witty, or so virtuous, as mine.

Stand. 'Tis done.

Wild. I'll double the stakes—But, gentlemen, now I think on it, how shall we be resolved?—For I know not where my mistress may be found; she left Paris about a month before me, and I had an account——

Stand. How, sir! left Paris about a month before you?

Wild. Yes, sir, and I had an account that she lodged somewhere in St James's.

Viz. How! somewhere in St James, say you?

Wild. Aye, sir, but I know not where, and perhaps mayn't find her this fortnight.

Stand. Her name, pray, sir Harry.

Viz. Aye, aye, her name; perhaps, we know her.

Wild. Her name! Ay; she has the softest, whitest hand that e'er was made of flesh and blood; her lips so balmy sweet——

Stand. But her name, sir.

Wild. Then her neck and breast; her breasts do so heave, so heave. [Singing.]

Viz. But her name, sir; her quality.

Wild. Then her shape, colonel!

Stand. But her name I want, sir.

Wild. Then her eyes, Vizard!

Viz. Pshaw, sir Harry, her name, or nothing.

Wild. Then if you must have it, she's called the lady——But then her foot, gentlemen; she dances to a miracle. Vizard, you have certainly lost your wager.

Viz. Why, you have certainly lost your senses; we shall never discover the picture, unless you subscribe the name.

Wild. Then, her name is Lurewell.

Stand. S'death my mistress! [Aside.

Viz. My mistress, by Jupiter! [Aside.

Wild. Do you know her, gentlemen?

Stand. I have seen her, sir.

Wild. Can'st tell where she lodges? Tell me, dear colonel.

Stand. Your humble servant, sir. [Erit.

Wild. Nay, hold, colonel; I'll follow you, and will know. [Runs out.

Viz. The lady Lurewell his mistress! he loves her: but she loves me. But he's a baronet, and I plain Vizard; he has a coach and six, and I walk on foot; I was bred in London, and he in Paris. That very circumstance has murdered me——Then, some stratagem must be laid to divert his pretensions.

Re-enter WILDAIR.

Wild. Prithee, Dick, what makes the colonel so out of humour?

Viz. Because he's out of pay, I suppose.

Wild. 'Slife, that's true; I was beginning to mistrust some rivalry in the case.

Viz. And suppose there were; you know the colonel can fight, sir Harry.

Wild. Fight! Pshaw—but he cannot dance, ha! We contend for a woman, Vizard. 'Slife, man, if ladies were to be gained by sword and pistol only, what the devil should all we beaux do?

Viz. I'll try him farther. [Aside.] But would not you, sir Harry, fight for this woman you so much admire?

Wild. Fight! Let me consider. I love her—that's true; but, then, I love honest sir Harry Wildair better. The lady Lurewell is divinely charming—right—but, then, a thrust i' the guts, or a Middlesex jury, is as ugly as the devil.

Viz. Aye, sir Harry, 'twere a dangerous cast for a beau-baronet to be tried by a parcel of greasy, grumbling, bartering boobies, who would hang you, purely because you're a gentleman.

Wild. Aye, but, on t'other hand, I have money enough to bribe the rogues with: so, upon mature deliberation, I would fight for her. But no more of her. Prithee, Vizard, cannot you recommend a friend to a pretty mistress by the bye, till I can find my own? You have store, I am sure; you cunning poaching dogs make surer game, than we that hunt open and fair. Prithee now, good Vizard.

Viz. Let me consider a little. Now, love and revenge inspire my politics. [Aside.

[Pauses, whilst SIR HARRY walks singing.

Wild. Pshaw! thou'rt as long studying for a new mistress, as a drawer is piercing a new pipe.

Viz. I design a new pipe for you, and wholesome wine; you'll therefore bear a little expectation.

Wild. Ha! sayst thou, dear Vizard?

Viz. A girl of sixteen, sir Harry.

Wild. Now sixteen thousand blessings rest on thee!

Viz. Pretty and witty.

Wild. Aye, aye, but her name, Vizard.

Viz. Her name! yes——she has the softest, whitest hand, that e'er was made of flesh and blood; her lips so balmy sweet—

Wild. Well, well, but where shall I find her, man?

Viz. Find her! but then her foot, sir Harry; she dances to a miracle.

Wild. Prithee, don't distract me.

Viz. Well, then, you must know, that this lady is the greatest beauty in town; her name's Angelica: she that passes for her mother is a private bawd, and called the lady Darling; she goes for a baronet's lady, (no disparagement to your honour, sir Harry) I assure you.

Wild. Pshaw, hang my honour; but what street, what house?

Viz. Not so fast, sir Harry; you must have my passport for your admittance, and you'll find my recommendation in a line or two will procure you very civil entertainment; I suppose twenty or thirty pieces, handsomely placed, will gain the point: I'll ensure her sound.

Wild. Thou dearest friend to a man in necessity! Here, sirrah, order my coach about to St James's; I'll walk across the park.

[To his servant.

Enter CLINCHER, senior.

Clin. Here, sirrah, order my coach about to St James's; I'll walk across the Park, too—Mr Vizard, your most devoted—Sir, [To WILDAIR.]—I admire the mode of your shoulder-knot; methinks it hangs very emphatically, and carries an air of travel in it; your sword-knot, too, is most ornamentally modish, and bears a foreign mien. Gentlemen, my brother is just arrived in town; so that, being upon the wing to kiss his hands, I hope you will pardon this abrupt departure of, gentlemen, your most devoted, and most faithful humble servant. [Erit CLINCHER.

Wild. Prithee, dost know him?

Viz. Know him! why, it is Clincher, who was apprentice to my uncle Smuggler, the merchant in the city.

Wild. What makes him so gay?

Viz. Why, he's in mourning.

Wild. In mourning?

Viz. Yes, for his father. The kind old man in Hertfordshire t'other day broke his neck a fox-hunting; the son upon the news has broke his indentures; whipped from behind the corner into the side-box, forswears merchandise, where he must live by cheating, and usurps gentility, where he may die by raking. He keeps his coach and liveries, brace of geldings, leash of mistresses, talks of nothing but wines, intrigues, plays, fashions, and going to the jubilee.

Wild. Ha, ha, ha! how many pounds of pulvil must the fellow use in sweetening himself from the smell of hops and tobacco? Faugh—In my conscience, methought, like Olivia's lover, he stunk of Thames-street. But now for Angelica, that's her name: we'll to the prince's chocolate-house, where you shall write my passport. Allons! [Exit.

SCENE II.—LADY LUREWELL's lodgings.

Enter LUREWELL, and her maid PARLY.

Lure. Parly, my pocket-book—let me see—Madrid, Paris, Venice, London! Aye, London! They may talk what they will of the hot countries, but I find love most fruitful under this climate—In a month's space have I gained—let me see—imprimis, colonel Standard.

Par. And how will your ladyship manage him?

Lure. As all soldiers should be managed; he shall serve me till I gain my ends; then I'll disband him.

Par. But he loves you, madam.

Lure. Therefore, I scorn him; I hate all that don't love me, and slight all that do; would his whole deluding sex admired me! Thus would I slight them all. My virgin and unwary innocence was wronged by faithless man; but now, glance eyes, plot brain, dissemble face, lie tongue, and be a second Eve to tempt, seduce, and plague the treacherous kind! Let me survey my captives: The colonel leads the van; next Mr Vizard; he courts me out of the practice of piety, therefore is a hypocrite; then Clincher; he adores me with orangerie, and is consequently a fool; then my old merchant, Alderman Smuggler; he's a compound of both; out of which medley of lovers, if I don't make good diversion—What dy'e think, Parly?

Par. I think, madam, I'm like to be very virtuous in your service, if you teach me all those tricks that you use to your lovers.

Lure. You're a fool, child; observe this, that though a woman swear, forswear, lie, dissemble, back-bite, be proud, vain, malicious, any thing, if she secures the main chance, she's still virtuous; that's a maxim.

Par. I cannot be persuaded though, madam, but that you really loved sir Harry Wildair in Paris.

Lure. Of all the lovers I ever had, he was my greatest plague, for I could never make him uneasy: I left him involved in a duel upon my account: I long to know whether the fop be killed or not.

Enter STANDARD.

Oh lord! no sooner talk of killing, but the soldier is conjured up. You're upon hard duty, colonel, to serve your king, your country, and a mistress, too.

Stand. The latter, I must confess, is the hardest; for, in war, madam, we can be relieved in our duty; but, in love, he who would take our post, is our enemy; emulation in glory is transporting, but rivals here intolerable.

Lure. Those, that bear away the prize in the field, should boast the same success in the bed-chamber; and, I think, considering the weakness of our sex, we should make those our companions who can be our champions.

Stand. I once, madam, hoped the honour of defending you from all injuries, through a title to your lovely person; but now my love must attend my fortune. My commission, madam, was my passport to the fair; adding a nobleness to my passion, it stamp'd a value on my love: 'twas once the life of honour, but now its winding-sheet, and with it must my love be buried.

Par. What! disbanded, colonel?

Stand. Yes, Mrs Parly.

Par. Faugh, the nauseous fellow! he smells of poverty already. [Aside.

Lure. His misfortune troubles me, because it may prevent my designs. [Aside.

Stand. I'll choose, madam, rather to destroy my passion by absence abroad, than have it starved at home.

Lure. I'm sorry, sir, you have so mean an opinion of my affection, as to imagine it founded upon your fortune. And, to convince you of your mistake, here I vow, by all that's sacred, I own the same affection now as before. Let it suffice; my fortune is considerable.

Stand. No, madam, no; I'll never be a charge to her I love! The man, that sells himself for gold, is the worst of prostitutes!

Lure. Now, were he any other creature but a man, I could love him. [Aside.

Stand. This only last request I make, that no title recommend a fool, no office introduce a knave, nor coat a coward, to my place in your affections; so, farewell my country, and adieu my love! [Exit.

Lure. Now the devil take thee for being so honourable! here, Parly, call him back; I shall lose half my diversion else. Now for a trial of skill!

Re-enter STANDARD.

Sir, I hope you'll pardon my curiosity. When do you take your journey?

Stand. To-morrow morning, early, madam.

Lure. So suddenly! which way are you designed to travel?

Stand. That I can't yet resolve on.

Lure. Pray, sir, tell me; pray, sir, I entreat you; why are you so obstinate?

Stand. Why are you so curious, madam?

Lure. Because——

Stand. What?

Lure. Because I, I——

Stand. Because! What, madam?—Pray tell me.

Lure. Because I design to follow you. [Crying.

Stand. Follow me! By all that's great, I ne'er was proud before. But such love, from such a creature, might swell the vanity of the proudest prince. Follow me! By Heavens thou shalt not! What! expose thee to the hazards of a camp—Rather I'll stay, and here bear the contempt of fools, and worst of fortune.

Lure. You need not, shall not; my estate for both is sufficient.

Stand. Thy estate! No, I'll turn a knave, and purchase one myself; I'll cringe to the proud man I undermine, and fawn on him that I would bite to death; I'll tip my tongue with flattery, and smooth my face with smiles; I'll turn pimp, informer, office-broker, nay, coward, to be great; and sacrifice it all to thee, my generous fair!

Lure. And I'll dissemble, lie, swear, jilt, any thing, but I'll reward thy love, and recompense thy noble passion.

Stand. Sir Harry, ha, ha, ha! poor sir Harry, ha, ha, ha! Rather kiss her hand, than the Pope's toe, ha, ha, ha!

Lure. What sir Harry, colonel? What sir Harry?

Stand. Sir Harry Wildair, madam.

Lure. What! is he come over?

Stand. Ay, and he told me—but I don't believe a syllable on't.

Lure. What did he tell you?

Stand. Only called you his mistress, and, pretending to be extravagant in your commendation, would vainly insinuate the praise of his own judgment and good fortune in a choice.

Lure. How easily is the vanity of fops tickled by our sex!

Stand. Why, your sex is the vanity of fops.

Lure. On my conscience, I believe so. This gentleman, because he danced well, I pitched on for a partner at a ball in Paris, and, ever since, he has so persecuted me with letters, songs, dances, serenading, flattery, foppery, and noise, that I was forced to fly the kingdom——And I warrant you he made you jealous.

Stand. Faith, madam, I was a little uneasy.

Lure. You shall have a plentiful revenge. I'll send him back all his foolish letters, songs, and verses, and you yourself shall carry them: 'twill afford you opportunity of triumphing, and free me from his further impertinence; for, of all men, he's my aversion. I'll run and fetch them instantly. [Erit.

Stand. Dear madam, a rare project! Now shall I bait him, like Actæon, with his own dogs——Well, Mrs Parly, it is ordered, by act of parliament, that you receive no more pieces, Mrs Parly.

Par. 'Tis provided by the same act, that you send no more messages by me, good colonel; you must not presume to send any more letters, unless you can pay the postage.

Stand. Come, come, don't be mercenary; take example by your lady; be honourable.

Par. A-lack-a-day, sir, it shews as ridiculous and haughty for us to imitate our betters in their honour, as in their finery; leave honour to nobility, that can support it: we poor folks, colonel, have no pretence to't; and truly, I think, sir, that your honour should be cashiered with your leading-staff.

Stand. 'Tis one of the greatest curses of poverty, to be the jest of chambermaids.

Enter LUREWELL.

Lure. Here's the packet, colonel; the whole magazine of love's artillery.

[Giving him the packet.

Stand. Which, since I have gained, I will turn upon the enemy. Madam, I'll bring you the news of my victory this evening. Poor sir Harry! ha, ha, ha! [Erit.

Lure. To the right about as you were; march, colonel. Ha, ha, ha!

Vain man, who boasts of studied parts and wiles!
Nature in us your deepest art beguiles,
Stamping deep cunning in our frowns and smiles.

You toil for art, your intellects you trace;
Woman, without a thought, bears policy in her face. [Ereunt.

ACT II.

SCENE I.—CLINCHER junior's lodgings.

Enter CLINCHER, opening a letter ; servant following.

Clin. [Reads.] 'DEAR brother, I will see you presently: I have sent this lad to wait on you; he can instruct you in the fashions of the town. I am your affectionate brother, CLINCHER.' Very well; and what's your name, sir?

Dick. My name is Dicky, sir.

Clin. Dicky!

Dick. Ay, Dicky, sir.

Clin. Very well; a pretty name! And what can you do, Mr Dicky?

Dick. Why, sir, I can powder a wig, and pick up a whore.

Clin. Oh, lord! Oh, lord! a whore! Why, are there many whores in this town?

Dick. Ha, ha, ha! many whores! there's a question, indeed! Why, sir, there are above five hundred surgeons in town—Hark'e, sir: do you see that woman there, in the velvet scarf, and red knots?

Clin. Ay, sir; what then?

Dick. Why, she shall be at your service in three minutes, as I'm a pimp.

Clin. Oh, Jupiter Ammon! Why, she's a gentlewoman.

Dick. A gentlewoman! Why, so are all the whores in town, sir.

Enter CLINCHER senior.

Clin. sen. Brother, you're welcome to London.

Clin. jun. I thought, brother, you owed so much to the memory of my father, as to wear mourning for his death.

Clin. sen. Why, so I do, fool; I wear this, because I have the estate, and you wear that, because you have not the estate. You have cause to mourn indeed, brother. Well, brother, I'm glad to see you; fare you well. [Going.]

Clin. jun. Stay, stay, brother—Where are you going?

Clin. sen. How natural 'tis for a country booby to ask impertinent questions!—Hark'e, sir; is not my father dead?

Clin. jun. Ay, ay, to my sorrow.

Clin. sen. No matter for that, he's dead; and am not I a young, powdered, extravagant English heir?

Clin. jun. Very right, sir.

Clin. sen. Why, then, sir, you may be sure that I am going to the Jubilee, sir.

Clin. jun. Jubilee! What's that?

Clin. sen. Jubilee! Why, the Jubilee is—Faith, I don't know what it is.

Dick. Why, the Jubilee is the same thing as our lord Mayor's day in the city; there will be pageants, and squibs, and raree-shows, and all that, sir.

Clin. jun. And must you go so soon, brother?

Clin. sen. Yes, sir, for I must stay a month at Amsterdam, to study poetry.

Clin. jun. Then I suppose, brother, you travel through Muscovy, to learn fashions; don't you, brother?

Clin. sen. Brother! Prithee, Robin, don't call me brother; sir will do every jot as well.

Clin. jun. Oh, Jupiter Ammon! why so?

Clin. sen. Because people will imagine you have a spite at me—But have you seen your cousin Angelica yet, and her mother, the lady Darling?

Clin. jun. No; my dancing-master has not been with me yet. How shall I salute them, brother?

Clin. sen. Pshaw! that's easy; 'tis only two scrapes, a kiss, and your humble servant. I'll tell you more when I come from the Jubilee. Come along. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—LADY DARLING's house.

Enter WILDAIR with a letter.

Wild. Like light and heat, incorporate we lay; We blessed the night, and cursed the coming day.

Well, if this paper-kite flies sure, I'm secure of my game—Humph!—the prettiest bourdel I have seen; a very stately genteel one—

Footmen cross the stage.

Hey-day! equipage, too! Now for a bawd by the curtesy, and a whore with a coat of arms—
'Sdeath, I'm afraid I've mistaken the house!

Enter LADY DARLING.

No, this must be the bawd, by her bulk.

Lady Dar. Your business, pray, sir?

Wild. Pleasure, madam.

Lady Dar. Then, sir, you have no business here.

Wild. This letter, madam, will inform you farther. Mr Vizard sent it, with his humble service to your ladyship.

Lady Dar. How does my cousin, sir?

Wild. Aye, her cousin, too! that's right procuress again.

[Aside.]

Lady Dar. [Reads.]—'Madam—earnest inclination to serve—sir Harry—madam—court my cousin—gentleman—fortune—'

'Your ladyship's most humble servant, VIZARD.' Sir, your fortune and quality are sufficient to recommend you any where; but what goes farther with me, is the recommendation of so sober and pious a young gentleman as my cousin Vizard, Wild. A right sanctified bawd, o' my word!

[Aside.

Lady Dar. Sir Harry, your conversation with Mr Vizard argues you a gentleman, free from the loose and vicious carriage of the town. I shall, therefore, call my daughter.

[Erit LADY DARLING.

Wild. Now, go thy way, for an illustrious bawd of Babylon—she dresses up a sin so religiously, that the devil would hardly know it of his making.

Re-enter LADY DARLING with ANGELICA.

Lady Dar. Pray, daughter, use him civilly; such matches don't offer every day.

[Erit LADY DARLING.

Wild. Oh, all ye powers of love! an angel! 'Sdeath, what money have I got in my pocket? I cannot offer her less than twenty guineas—and, by Jupiter, she's worth a hundred.

Ang. 'Tis he! the very same! and his person as agreeable as his character of good humour—Pray Heaven his silence proceed from respect!

Wild. How innocent she looks! How would that modesty adorn virtue, when it makes even vice look so charming! by Heaven, there's such a commanding innocence in her looks, that I dare not ask the question!

Ang. Now, all the charms of real love, and feigned indifference, assist me to engage his heart; for mine is lost already!

Wild. Madam—I, I—Zoons, I cannot speak to her! but she's a whore, and I will—madam, in short, I, I—oh, hypocrisy, hypocrisy, what a charming sin art thou!

Ang. He is caught; now to secure my conquest—I thought, sir, you had business to communicate.

Wild. Business to communicate! how nicely she words it! Yes, madam, I have a little business to communicate. Don't you love singing-birds, madam?

Ang. That's an odd question for a lover—yes, sir.

Wild. Why, then, madam, here is a nest of the prettiest goldfinches that ever chirped in a cage; twenty young ones, I assure you, madam.

Ang. Twenty young ones! what then, sir?

Wild. Why, then, madam, there are—twenty young ones—'Slife, I think twenty is pretty fair.

Ang. He's mad, sure! sir Harry, when you have learned more wit and manners, you shall be welcome here again.

[Erit ANGELICA.

Wild. Wit and manners! 'Egad, now, I conceive there is a great deal of wit and manners in twenty guineas—I'm sure 'tis all the wit and manners I have about me at present. What shall I do?

Enter CLINCHER Jun. and DICKY.

What the devil's here? another cousin, I warrant ye! Harkee, sir, can you lend me ten or a dozen guineas instantly? I'll pay you fifteen for them in three hours, upon my honour.

Clin. jun. These London sparks are plaguy impudent! This fellow, by his wig and assurance, can be no less than a courtier.

Dick. He's rather a courtier by his borrowing.

Clin. jun. Faith, sir, I han't above five guineas about me.

Wild. What business have you here, then, sir? For, to my knowledge, twenty won't be sufficient.

Clin. jun. Sufficient! for what, sir?

Wild. What, sir! why, for that, sir; what the devil should it be, sir? I know your business, notwithstanding all your gravity, sir.

Clin. jun. My business! why, my cousin lives here.

Wild. I know your cousin does live here, and Vizard's cousin, and every body's cousin—harkee, sir, I shall return immediately; and if you offer to touch her, till I come back, I shall cut your throat, rascal.

[Erit WILDAIR.

Clin. jun. Why, the man's mad, sure!

Dick. Mad, sir! aye—why, he's a beau.

Clin. jun. A beau! what's that? are all mad-men beaux?

Dick. No, sir; but most beaux are madmen, But now for your cousin. Remember, your three scrapes, a kiss, and your humble servant.

[Exeunt, as into the house.

Enter WILDAIR, STANDARD following.

Stand. Sir Harry, sir Harry!

Wild. I am in haste, colonel; besides, if you're in no better humour than when I parted with you in the park this morning, your company won't be very agreeable.

Stand. You're a happy man, sir Harry, who are never out of humour. Can nothing move your gall, sir Harry?

Wild. Nothing but impossibilities, which are the same as nothing.

Stand. What impossibilities?

Wild. The resurrection of my father to disinherit me, or an act of parliament against wenching. A man of eight thousand pounds per annum to be vexed! No, no; anger and spleen are companions for younger brothers.

Stand. Suppose one called you a son of a whore behind your back.

Wild. Why, then would I call him rascal behind his back; so we're even.

Stand. But suppose you had lost a mistress.

Wild. Why, then I would get another.

Stand. But suppose you were discarded by the woman you love? that would surely trouble you.

Wild. You're mistaken, colonel; my love is neither romantically honourable, nor meanly mercenary; 'tis only a pitch of gratitude; while she loves me, I love her; when she desists, the obligation's void.

Stand. But to be mistaken in your opinion, sir; if the lady Lurewell (only suppose it) had discarded you—I say, only suppose it—and had sent your discharge by me.

Wild. Pshaw! that's another impossibility.

Stand. Are you sure of that?

Wild. Why, 'twere a solecism in nature. Why she's a rib of me, sir. She dances with me, sings with me, plays with me, swears with me, lies with me.

Stand. How, sir?

Wild. I mean in an honourable way; that is, she lies for me. In short, we are as like one another as a couple of guineas.

Stand. Now that I have raised you to the highest pinnacle of vanity, will I give you so mortifying a fall, as shall dash your hopes to pieces. I pray your honour to peruse these papers.

[Gives him the packet.]

Wild. What is't, the muster-roll of your regiment, colonel?

Stand. No, no; 'tis a list of your forces in your last love campaign; and, for your comfort, all disbanded.

Wild. Prithee, good metaphorical colonel, what d'ye mean?

Stand. Read, sir, read; these are the Sibyl's leaves that will unfold your destiny.

Wild. So it be not a false deed to cheat me of my estate, what care I—[Opening the packet.]—Humph! my hand! To the lady Lurewell—To the lady Lurewell—To the lady Lurewell—what the devil hast thou been tampering with, to conjure up these spirits?

Stand. A certain familiar of your acquaintance, sir. Read, read.

Wild. [Reading.]—'Madam, my passion—so 'natural—your beauty contending—force of 'charms—mankind—eternal admirer, Wildair.'—I ne'er was ashamed of my name before.

Stand. What, sir Harry Wildair out of humour! ha, ha, ha! poor sir Harry! more glory in her smile, than in the jubilee at Rome; ha, ha, ha! but then her foot, sir Harry; she dances to a miracle! ha, ha, ha! fie, sir Harry, a man of your parts write letters not worth keeping! what say'st thou, my dear knight-errant? ha, ha, ha! you may seek adventures now, indeed.

Wild. [Sings.]—No, no, let her wander, &c.

Stand. You are jilted to some tune, sir; blown up with false music, that's all.

Wild. Now, why should I be angry that a woman is a woman? Since inconstancy and falsehood are grounded in their natures, how can they help it?

Stand. Then they must be grounded in your nature: for she's a rib of you, sir Harry.

Wild. Here's a copy of verses, too: I must turn poet, in the devil's name—stay—'sdeath, what's here? This is her hand—oh, the charming characters!—[Reading.]—'My dear Wildair,'—that's I, 'egad!—'this huff-bluff colonel'—that's he—'is the rarest fool in nature,'—the devil he is!—'and as such have I used him.'—With all my heart, faith—'I had no better way of letting you know, that I lodge in St James's, near the Holy Lamb. Lurewell.'—Colonel, I am your most humble servant.

Stand. Hold, sir, you sha'nt go yet; I ha'nt delivered half my message.

Wild. Upon my faith but you have, colonel.

Stand. Well, well, own your spleen; out with it; I know you're like to burst.

Wild. I am so, 'egad; ha, ha, ha!

[Laugh and point at one another.]

Stand. Aye, with all my heart, ha, ha, ha! well, well, that's forced, sir Harry.

Wild. I was never better pleased in all my life, by Jupiter!

Stand. Well, sir Harry, 'tis prudence to hide your concern, when there's no help for it. But, to be serious, now; the lady has sent you back all your papers there—I was so just as not to look upon them.

Wild. I'm glad on't, sir; for there were some things that I would not have you see.

Stand. All this she has done for my sake, and I desire you would decline any further pretensions for your own sake. So, honest, good-natured sir Harry, I'm your humble servant.

[Exit STANDARD.]

Wild. Ha, ha, ha! poor colonel! oh, the delight of an ingenious mistress! what a life and briskness it adds to an amour, like the loves of mighty Jove, still suing in different shapes. A legerdmain mistress, who, presto! pass! and she's vanished; then hey! in an instant in your arms again!

[Going.]

Enter VIZARD.

Viz. Well met, sir Harry—what news from the island of love?

Wild. Faith, we made but a broken voyage by your chart; but now I'm bound for another port: I told you the colonel was my rival.

Viz. The colonel—cursed misfortune! another. [Aside.]

Wild. But the civilest in the world; he brought me word where my mistress lodges. The story's too long to tell you now, for I must fly.

Viz. What, have you given over all thoughts of Angelica?

Wild. No, no; I'll think of her some other time. But now for the lady Lurewell. Wit and beauty call.

That mistress ne'er can pall her lover's joys,
Whose wit can whet, whene'er her beauty cloy.

Her little am'rous frauds all truths excel,
And make us happy, being deceived so well.

[Erit.

Viz. The colonel my rival, too!—How shall I manage? There is but one way——him and the knight will I set a tilting, where one cuts t'other's throat, and the survivor's hanged: so there will be two rivals pretty decently disposed of. Since honour may oblige them to play the fool, why should not necessity engage me to play the knave?
[Erit.

SCENE III.—LADY LUREWELL'S Lodgings.

Enter LUREWELL and PARLY.

Lure. Has my servant brought me the money from my merchant?

Par. No, madam: he met alderman Smuggler at Charing-Cross, who has promised to wait on you himself immediately.

Lure. 'Tis odd that this old rogue should pretend to love me, and at the same time cheat me of my money.

Par. 'Tis well, madam, if he don't cheat you of your estate; for you say the writings are in his hands.

Lure. But what satisfaction can I get of him?
—Oh, here he comes!

Enter SMUGGLER.

Mr Alderman, your servant; have you brought me any money, sir?

Smug. Faith, madam, trading is very dead; what with paying the taxes, raising the customs, losses at sea abroad, and maintaining our wives at home, the bank is reduced very low.

Lure. Come, come, sir, these evasions won't serve your turn; I must have money, sir—I hope you don't design to cheat me?

Smug. Cheat you, madam!—have a care what you say: I'm an alderman, madam—Cheat you, madam! I have been an honest citizen these five-and-thirty years.

Lure. An honest citizen! Bear witness, Parly—I shall trap him in more lies presently. Come, sir, though I am a woman, I can take a course.

Smug. What course, madam? You'll go to law, will ye? I can maintain a suit of law, be it right or wrong, these forty years, I am sure of that, thanks to the honest practice of the courts.

Lure. Sir, I'll blast your reputation, and so ruin your credit.

Smug. Blast my reputation! he, he, he! Why, I'm a religious man, madam; I have been very instrumental in the reformation of manners. Ruin my credit! Ah, poor woman! There is but one way, madam—you have a sweet leering eye.

Lure. You instrumental in the reformation! How?

Smug. I whipped all the whores, cut and long-tail, out of the parish—Ah, that leering eye!—Then, I voted for pulling down the playhouse—

Ah, that ogle, that ogle!—Then, my own pious example—Ah, that lip, that lip!

Lure. Here's a religious rogue for you, now!—As I hope to be saved, I have a good mind to beat the old monster.

Smug. Madam, I have brought you about a hundred and fifty guineas (a great deal of money, as times go) and——

Lure. Come, give them me.

Smug. Ah, that hand, that hand! that pretty, soft, white—I have brought it, you see; but the condition of the obligation is such, that whereas that leering eye, that pouting lip, that pretty soft hand, that—you understand me; you understand; I'm sure you do, you little rogue——

Lure. Here's a villain, now, so covetous, that he won't wench upon his own cost, but would bribe me with my own money. I'll be revenged.
[Aside.] Upon my word, Mr Alderman, you make me blush,—what d'ye mean, pray?

Smug. See here, madam. [Puts a piece of money in his mouth.] Buss and guinea, buss and guinea, buss and guinea.

Lure. Well, Mr Alderman, you have such pretty winning ways, that I will, ha, ha, ha!

Smug. Will you, indeed, he, he, he! my little cocket? And when, and where, and how?

Lure. 'Twill be a difficult point, sir, to secure both our honours; you must therefore be disguised, Mr Alderman.

Smug. Pshaw! no matter; I am an old fornicator; I'm not half so religious as I seem to be. You little rogue, why, I'm disguised as I am; our sanctity is all outside, all hypocrisy.

Lure. No man is seen to come into this house after night-fall; you must therefore sneak in, when 'tis dark, in woman's clothes.

Smug. With all my heart—I have a suit on purpose, my little cocket; I love to be disguised; 'ecod, I make a very handsome woman; 'ecod, I do.

Enter Servant, who whispers LUREWELL.

Lure. Oh, Mr Alderman, shall I beg you to walk into the next room? Here are some strangers coming up.

Smug. Buss and guinea first—Ah, my little cocket!
[Erit SMUGGLER.

Enter WILDAIR.

Wild. My life, my soul, my all that Heaven can give!

Lure. Death's life with thee, without thee, death to live.

Welcome, my dear sir Harry—I see you got my directions.

Wild. Directions! in the most charming manner, thou dear Machiavel of intrigue.

Lure. Still brisk and airy, I find, sir Harry.

Wild. The sight of you, madam, exalts my air, and makes joy lighten in my face.

Lure. I have a thousand questions to ask you, sir Harry. How d'ye like France?

Wild. Ah! c'est le plus beau país du monde.

Lure. Then, what made you leave it so soon?

Wild. Madam, vous voyez que je vous suive par-tout.

Lure. Oh, monsieur, je vous suis fort obligée. But, where's the court now?

Wild. At Marli, madam.

Lure. And where my count La Valier?

Wild. His body's in the church of Nôtre Dame; I don't know where his soul is.

Lure. What disease did he die of?

Wild. A duel, madam; I was his doctor.

Lure. How d'ye mean?

Wild. As most doctors do; I killed him.

Lure. En cavalier, my dear knight-errant—Well, and how, and how: what intrigues, what gallantries are carrying on in the beau monde?

Wild. I should ask you that question, madam, since your ladyship makes the beau-monde wherever you come.

Lure. Ah, sir Harry, I've been almost ruined, pestered to death here, by the incessant attacks of a mighty colonel; he has besieged me as close as our army did Namur.

Wild. I hope your ladyship did not surrender, though.

Lure. No, no; but was forced to capitulate. But since you are come to raise the siege, we'll dance, and sing, and laugh—

Wild. And love, and kiss——Montrez moi votre chambre?

Lure. Attendez, attendez, un peu—I remember, sir Harry, you promised me, in Paris, never to ask that impertinent question again.

Wild. Pshaw, madam! that was above two months ago: besides, madam, treaties made in France are never kept.

Lure. Would you marry me, sir Harry?

Wild. Oh! la marriage est un grand mal—But I will marry you.

Lure. Your word, sir, is not to be relied on: if a gentleman will forfeit his honour in dealings of business, we may reasonably suspect his fidelity in an amour.

Wild. My honour in dealings of business! Why, madam, I never had any business in all my life.

Lure. Yes, sir Harry, I have heard a very odd story, and am sorry that a gentleman of your figure should undergo the scandal.

Wild. Out with it, madam.

Lure. Why, the merchant, sir, that transmitted your bills of exchange to you in France, complains of some indirect and dishonourable dealings.

Wild. Who, old Smuggler?

Lure. Ay, ay, you know him, I find.

Wild. I have some reason, I think; why, the rogue has cheated me of above five hundred pounds within these three years.

Lure. 'Tis your business, then, to acquit yourself publicly; for he spreads the scandal everywhere.

Wild. Acquit myself publicly!—Here, sirrah, my coach; I'll drive instantly into the city, and cane the old villain round the Royal Exchange; he shall run the gauntlet through a thousand brushed beavers, and formal cravats, Lure. Why, he's in the house now, sir.

Wild. What, in this house?

Lure. Ay, in the next room.

Wild. Then, sirrah, lend me your cudgel.

Lure. Sir Harry, you won't raise a disturbance in my house?

Wild. Disturbance, madam! no, no, I'll beat him with the temper of a philosopher. Here, Mrs Parly, shew me the gentleman.

[Erit with PARLY.

Lure. Now shall I get the old monster well beaten, and sir Harry pestered next term with bloodsheds, batteries, costs and damages, solicitors and attornies; and if they don't tease him out of his good humour, I'll never plot again.

[Erit.

SCENE IV.—Changes to another room in the same house.

Enter SMUGGLER.

Smug. Oh, this damned tide-waiter! A ship and cargo worth five thousand pounds! Why, 'tis richly worth five hundred perjuries.

Enter WILDAIR.

Wild. Dear Mr Alderman, I'm your most devoted and humble servant.

Smug. My best friend, sir Harry, you're welcome to England.

Wild. I'll assure you, sir, there's not a man in the king's dominions I am gladder to meet, dear, dear Mr Alderman! [Bowing very low.

Smug. Oh, lord, sir, you travellers have the most obliging ways with you!

Wild. There is a business, Mr Alderman, fallen out, which you may oblige me infinitely by—I am very sorry that I am forced to be troublesome; but necessity, Mr Alderman—

Smug. Ay, sir, as you say, necessity—But, upon my word, sir, I am very short of money at present; but—

Wild. That's not the matter, sir; I'm above an obligation that way: but the business is, I'm reduced to an indispensable necessity of being obliged to you for a beating—Here, take this cudgel.

Smug. A beating, sir Harry! ha, ha, ha! I beat a knight-baronet! an alderman turn cudgel-player!—Ha, ha, ha!

Wild. Upon my word, sir, you must beat me, or I cudgel you; take your choice.

Smug. Pshaw, pshaw! you jest.

Wild. Nay, 'tis sure as fate—So, alderman, I hope you'll pardon my curiosity. [Strikes him.]

Smug. Curiosity! Deuce take your curiosity, sir!—What d'ye mean?

Wild. Nothing at all; I'm but in jest, sir.

Smug. Oh, I can take any thing in jest! but a man might imagine, by the smartness of the stroke, that you were in downright earnest.

Wild. Not in the least, sir; [Strikes him.] not in the least, indeed, sir.

Smug. Pray, good sir, no more of our jests; for they are the bluntest jests that ever I knew.

Wild. [Strikes.] I heartily beg your pardon with all my heart, sir.

Smug. Pardon, sir! Well, sir, that is satisfaction enough from a gentleman. But, seriously now, if you pass any more of your jests upon me I shall grow angry.

Wild. I humbly beg your permission to break one or two more. [Strikes him.]

Smug. Oh, lord, sir, you'll break my bones! Are you mad, sir? murder, felony, manslaughter!

[WILDAIR knocks him down.]

Wild. Sir, I beg you ten thousand pardons; but I am absolutely compelled to it, upon my honour, sir: nothing can be more averse to my inclinations, than to jest with my honest, dear, loving, obliging friend, the Alderman.

[Striking him all this while: SMUGGLER tumbles over and over, and shakes out his pocket-book on the floor; LUREWELL enters, and takes it up.]

Lure. The old rogue's pocket-book: this may be of use. [Aside.] Oh, lord, Sir Harry's murdering the poor old man.

Smug. Oh, dear madam, I was beaten in jest, till I am murdered in good earnest.

Lure. Well, well, I'll bring you off, Senior—Frappez, frappez!

Smug. Oh, for charity's sake, madam, rescue a poor citizen!

Lure. Oh, you barbarous man!—Hold, hold! Frappez, plus rudement! Frappez—I wonder you are not ashamed. [Holding WILD.] A poor, reverend, honest elder—[Helps SMUG. up.] It makes me weep to see him in this condition, poor man!—Now, the devil take you, sir Harry—For not beating him harder—Well, my dear, you shall come at night, and I'll make you amends. [Here SIR HARRY takes snuff.]

Smug. Madam, I will have amends before I leave the place—Sir, how durst you use me thus?

Wild. Sir?

Smug. Sir, I say that I will have satisfaction.

Wild. With all my heart.

[Throws snuff into his eyes.]

Smug. Oh, murder, blindness, fire! Oh, madam, madam, get me some water. Water, fire, fire, water! [Exit with LUREWELL.]

Wild. How pleasant is resenting an injury without passion! 'Tis the beauty of revenge.

Let statesmen plot, and under business groan,
And, settling public quiet, lose their own;
Let soldiers drudge and fight for pay or fame,
For when they're shot, I think 'tis much the same;

Let scholars vex their brains with mood and tense,
And, mad with strength of reason, fools commence,

Losing their wits in searching after sense;
Their summum bonum they must toil to gain,
And, seeking pleasure, spend their life in pain.
I make the most of life, no hour mispend;
Pleasure's the mean, and pleasure is my end.
No spleen, no trouble shall my time destroy;
Life's but a span; I'll ev'ry inch enjoy. [Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter STANDARD and VIZARD.

Stand. I BRING him word where she lodged; I the civilest rival in the world? 'Tis impossible.

Viz. I shall urge it no farther, sir. I only thought, sir, that my character in the world might add authority to my words, without so many repetitions.

Stand. Pardon me, dear Vizard. Our belief struggles hard, before it can be brought to yield to the disadvantage of what we love; 'tis so great an abuse to our judgment, that it makes the faults of our choice our own failing. But what said sir Harry?

Viz. He pitied the poor credulous colonel, laughed heartily, flew away with all the raptures of a bride-groom, repeating these lines:

A mistress ne'er can pall her lover's joys,
Whose wit can whet, whene'er her beauty cloy.

Stand. A mistress ne'er can pall! By all my wrongs he whores her, and I am made their property!—Vengeance—Vizard, you must carry a note for me to Sir Harry.

Viz. What, a challenge? I hope you don't design to fight.

Stand. What, wear the livery of my king, and pocket an affront? 'Twere an abuse to his sacred Majesty: a soldier's sword, Vizard, should start of itself to redress its master's wrong.

Viz. However, sir, I think it not proper for me to carry any such message between friends.

Stand. I have ne'er a servant here; what shall I do?

Viz. There's Tom Errand, the porter, that plies at the Blue Posts, one who knows Sir Harry and his haunts very well; you may send a note by him.

Stand. Here, you, friend! [Calling.]

Viz. I have now some business, and must take my leave; I would advise you, nevertheless, against this affair.

Stand. No whispering now, nor telling of friends, to prevent us. He that disappoints a man of an honourable revenge, may love him foolishly like a wife, but never value him as a friend.

Viz. Nay, the devil take him that parts you, say I. [Exit.]

Enter Porter, running.

Err. Did your honour call porter?

Stand. Is your name Tom Errand?

Err. People call me so, an't like your worship.

Stand. D'ye know sir Harry Wildair?

Err. Ay, very well, sir; he's one of my best masters; many a round half-crown have I had of his worship; he's newly come home from France, sir.

Stand. Go to the next coffee-house, and wait for me.—Oh, woman, woman, how blessed is man when favoured by your smiles, and how accursed when all those smiles are found but wanton baits to sooth us to destruction!

Thus, our chief joys with base allays are cursed, And our best things, when once corrupted, worst.

[Exeunt.]

Enter WILDAIR, and CLINCHER senior following.

Clin. sen. Sir, sir, sir! having some business of importance to communicate to you, I would beg your attention to a trifling affair that I would impart to your understanding.

Wild. What is your trifling business of importance, pray, sweet sir?

Clin. sen. Pray, sir, are the roads deep between this and Paris?

Wild. Why that question, sir?

Clin. sen. Because I design to go to the Jubilee, sir; I understand that you are a traveller, sir; there is an air of travel in the tie of your cravat, sir; there is indeed, sir—I suppose, sir, you bought this lace in Flanders?

Wild. No, sir, this lace was made in Norway.

Clin. sen. Norway, sir?

Wild. Yes, sir, of the shavings of deal-boards.

Clin. sen. That's very strange now, faith—Lace made of the shavings of deal boards! 'Egad, sir, you travellers see very strange things abroad, very incredible things abroad, indeed. Well, I'll have a cravat of the very same lace before I come home.

Wild. But, sir, what preparations have you made for your journey?

Clin. sen. A case of pocket-pistols for the braves, and a swimming-girdle.

Wild. Why these, sir?

Clin. sen. Oh, lord, sir, I'll tell you—Suppose us in Rome, now; away goes I to some ball—for I'll be a mighty beau. Then, as I said, I go to some ball, or some bear-baiting—'tis all one, you know—then, comes a fine Italian bona roba, and plucks me by the sleeve: Signior Angle, Signior Angle—She's a very fine lady, observe that—Signior Angle, says she—Signora, says I, and trips after her to the corner of a street, suppose it Russel-street, here, or any other street; then, you know, I must invite her to the tavern; I can do no less—There up comes her bravo; the Italian grows saucy, and I give him an English dowse o' the face: I can box, sir, box tightly; I was a 'prentice, sir—But, then, sir, he whips out his stiletto, and I whips out my bull-dog—slaps him through, trips down stairs, turns the corner of Russel-street again, and whips me into the ambassador's train, and there I'm safe as a beau behind the scenes.

Wild. Is your pistol charged, sir?

Clin. sen. Only a brace of bullets, that's all, sir.

Wild. 'Tis a very fine pistol, truly; pray, let me see it.

Clin. sen. With all my heart, sir.

Wild. Hark'e, Mr Jubilee, can you digest a brace of bullets?

Clin. sen. Oh, by no means in the world, sir.

Wild. I'll try the strength of your stomach, however. Sir, you're a dead man.

[Presenting the pistol to his breast.]

Clin. sen. Consider, dear sir, I am going to the Jubilee: when I come home again, I am a dead man at your service.

Wild. Oh, very well, sir; but take heed you are not choleric for the future.

Clin. sen. Choleric, sir! Oons, I design to shoot seven Italians in a week, sir.

Wild. Sir, you won't have provocation.

Clin. sen. Provocation, sir? Zauns, sir, I'll kill any man for treading upon my corns; and there will be a devilish throng of people there; they say that all the princes of Italy will be there.

Wild. And all the fops and fiddlers in Europe—But the use of your swimming-girdle, pray, sir?

Clin. sen. Oh, lord, sir, that's easy. Suppose the ship's cast away; now, whilst other foolish people are busy at their prayers, I whip on my swimming-girdle, clap a month's provision in my pocket, and sails me away, like an egg in a duck's belly—And barkee, sir, I have a new project in my head: where d'ye think my swimming-girdle shall carry me upon this occasion? 'Tis a new project.

Wild. Where, sir?

Clin. sen. To Civita Vecchia, faith and troth, and so save the charges of my passage. Well, sir, you must pardon me now; I'm going to see my mistress. [Exit.]

Wild. This fellow's an accomplished ass before he goes abroad. Well, this Angelica has got into my heart, and I can't get her out of my head.—I must pay her t'other visit. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—LADY DARLING'S house.

Enter ANGELICA.

Ang. Unhappy state of woman! whose chief virtue is but ceremony, and our much boasted modesty but a slavish restraint. The strict confinement on our words makes our thoughts ramble more; and what preserves our outward fame, destroys our inward quiet. 'Tis hard that love should be denied the privilege of hatred; that scandal and detraction should be so much indulged, yet sacred love and truth debarred our conversation.

Enter DARLING, CLINCHER junior, and DICKY.

Lady Dar. This is my daughter, cousin.

Dick. Now, sir, remember your three scrapes.

Clin. jun. [saluting ANGELICA.] One, two, three, your humble servant. Was not that right, Dicky?

Dick. Aye 'faith, sir; but why don't you speak to her?

Clin. jun. I beg your pardon, Dicky; I know my distance. Would you have me speak to a lady at the first sight?

Dick. Aye, sir, by all means; the first aim is the surest.

Clin. jun. Now, for a good jest, to make her laugh heartily—By Jupiter Ammon, I'll go give her a kiss. [Goes towards her.]

Enter WILDAIR, interposing.

Wild. 'Tis all to no purpose; I told you so before; your pitiful five guineas will never do.—You may go; I'll outbid you.

Clin. jun. What, the devil! the madman's here again.

Lady Dar. Bless me, cousin, what d'ye mean? Affront a gentleman of his quality in my house?

Clin. jun. Quality!—Why, madam, I don't know what you mean by your madmen, and your beaux, and your quality—they're all alike, I believe.

Lady Dar. Pray, sir, walk with me into the next room.

[Exit LADY DARLING, leading CLINCHER.—
DICKY following.]

Ang. Sir, if your conversation be no more agreeable than 'twas the last time, I would advise you to make your visit as short as you can.

Wild. The offences of my last visit, madam, bore their punishment in the commission; and have made me as uneasy till I receive pardon, as your ladyship can be till I sue for it.

Ang. Sir Harry, I did not well understand the offence, and must therefore proportion it to the greatness of your apology; if you would, therefore, have me think it light, take no great pains in an excuse.

Wild. How sweet must the lips be that guard that tongue! Then, madam, no more of past offences; let us prepare for joys to come. Let this seal my pardon; [Kisses her hand.] and this [Again.] initiate me to farther happiness.

Ang. Hold, sir—one question, sir Harry, and pray, answer plainly—D'ye love me?

Wild. Love you! Does fire ascend? Do hypocrites dissemble? Usurers love gold, or great men flattery? Doubt these, then question that I love.

Ang. This shews your gallantry, sir, but not your love.

Wild. View your own charms, madam, then judge my passion; your beauty ravishes my eye, your voice my ear, and your touch has thrilled my melting soul.

Ang. If your words be real, 'tis in your power to raise an equal flame in me.

Wild. Nay, then, I seize—

Ang. Hold, sir! 'tis also possible to make me detest and scorn you worse than the most profligate of your deceiving sex.

Wild. Ha! A very odd turn this! I hope, madam, you only affect anger, because you know your frowns are becoming.

Ang. Sir Harry, you being the best judge of your own designs, can best understand whether my anger should be real or dissembled; think what strict modesty should bear, then judge of my resentment.

Wild. Strict modesty should bear! Why, faith, madam, I believe, the strictest modesty may bear fifty guineas, and I don't believe 'twill bear one farthing more.

Ang. What d'ye mean, sir?

Wild. Nay, madam, what do you mean, if you go to that? I think, now, fifty guineas is a fine offer for your strict modesty, as you call it.

Ang. 'Tis more charitable, sir Harry, to charge the impertinence of a man of your figure on his defect in understanding, than on his want of manners—I am afraid you're mad, sir.

Wild. Why, madam, you're enough to make any man mad. 'Sdeath, are you not a——

Ang. What, sir?

Wild. Why, a lady of—strict modesty, if you will have it so.

Ang. I shall never hereafter trust common report, which represented you, sir, a man of honour, wit, and breeding; for I find you very deficient in them all three. [Exit ANGELICA.]

Wild. Now I find that the strict pretences which the ladies of pleasure make to strict modesty, is the reason why those of quality are ashamed to wear it.

Enter VIZARD.

Viz. Ah, sir Harry! have I caught you?—Well, and what success?

Wild. Success! 'Tis a shame for you young fellows in town here to let the wenches grow so saucy. I offered her fifty guineas, and she was in her airs presently, and flew away in a huff.—I could have had a brace of countesses in Paris for half the money, and je vous remercie into the bargain.

Viz. Gone in her airs, say you ! And did not you follow her ?

Wild. Whither should I follow her ?

Viz. Into her bed-chamber, man ; she went on purpose. You a man of gallantry, and not understand that a lady's best pleased when she puts on her airs, as you call it !

Wild. She talked to me of strict modesty, and stuff.

Viz. Certainly. Most women magnify their modesty, for the same reason that cowards boast their courage—because they have least on't.—Come, come, sir Harry, when you make your next assault, encourage your spirits with brisk Burgundy : if you succeed, 'tis well ; if not, you have a fair excuse for your rudeness. I'll go in, and make your peace for what's past. Oh, I had almost forgot—Colonel Standard wants to speak with you about some business.

Wild. I'll wait upon him presently ; d'ye know where he may be found ?

Viz. In the piazza of Covent-Garden, about an hour hence, I promised to see him ; and there you may meet him—to have your throat cut. [Aside.] I'll go in and intercede for you.

Wild. But no foul play with the lady, Vizard.

Viz. No fair play, I can assure you. [Exit.]

SCENE III.—The Street before LUREWELL'S Lodgings.

CLINCHER senior, and LUREWELL, coquetting in the balcony. Enter STANDARD.

Stand. How weak is reason in disputes of love ! That daring reason, which so oft pretends to question works of high omnipotence, yet poorly truckles to our weakest passions, and yields implicit faith to foolish love, paying blind zeal to faithless women's eyes. I've heard her falsehood with such pressing proofs, that I no longer should distrust it. Yet still my love would baffle demonstration, and make impossibilities seem probable. [Looks up.] Ha ! That fool, too ! What, stoop so low as that animal ?—'Tis true, women once fallen, like cowards in despair, will stick at nothing ; there's no medium in their actions. They must be bright as angels, or black as fiends. But now for my revenge ; I'll kick her cully before her face, call her whore, curse the whole sex, and leave her. [Goes in.]

LUREWELL comes down with CLINCHER senior. The Scene changes to a Dining-Room.

Lure. Oh, lord, sir, it is my husband ! What will become of you ?

Clin. sen. Ah, your husband ! Oh, I shall be murdered ! What shall I do ? Where shall I run ? I'll creep into an oven ; I'll climb up the chimney ; I'll fly ; I'll swim ;—I wish to the Lord I were at the Jubilee now !

Lure. Can't you think of any thing, sir ?

Clin. sen. Think ! not I ; I never could think to any purpose in my life.

Lure. What do you want, sir ?

Enter TOM ERRAND.

Err. Madam, I am looking for sir Harry Wildair ; I saw him come in here this morning ; and did imagine he might be here still, if he is not gone.

Lure. A lucky hit ! Here, friend, change clothes with this gentleman ; quickly, strip.

Clin. sen. Ay, ay, quickly, strip ; I'll give you half a crown to boot. Come here ; so.

[They change clothes.]

Lure. Now, slip you [To CLIN. sen.] down stairs, and wait at the door till my husband be gone ; and get you in there [To the Porter.] till I call you. [Puts ERRAND in the next room.]

Enter STANDARD.

Oh, sir, are you come ? I wonder, sir, how you have the confidence to approach me after so base a trick ?

Stand. Oh, madam, all your artifices won't avail.

Lure. Nay, sir, your artifices won't avail. I thought, sir, that I gave you caution enough against troubling me with sir Harry Wildair's company, when I sent his letters back by you ? yet you, forsooth, must tell him where I lodged, and expose me again to his impertinent courtship !

Stand. I expose you to his courtship !

Lure. I'll lay my life you'll deny it now. Come, come, sir ; a pitiful lie is as scandalous to a red coat, as an oath to a black. Did not sir Harry himself tell me, that he found out, by you, where I lodged ?

Stand. You're all lies ; first, your heart is false ; your eyes are double ; one look belies another ; and then, your tongue does contradict them all—Madam, I see a little devil just now hammering out a lie in your pericranium.

Lure. As I hope for mercy, he's in the right on't. [Aside.] Hold, sir, you have got the playhouse cant upon your tongue, and think, that wit may privilege your railing : but, I must tell you, sir, that what is satire upon the stage, is ill manners here.

Stand. What is feigned upon the stage, is here, in reality, real falsehood. Yes, yes, madam—I exposed you to the courtship of your fool Clincher, too ; I hope your female wiles will impose that upon me—also—

Lure. Clincher ! Nay, now, you're stark mad, I know no such person.

Stand. Oh, woman in perfection ! not know him ? 'Slife, madam, can my eyes, my piercing jealous eyes, be so deluded ? Nay, madam, my nose could not mistake him ; for I smelt the fop by his pulvis from the balcony down to the street.

Lure. The balcony! Ha, ha, ha! the balcony! I'll be hanged but he has mistaken sir Harry Wildair's footman with a new French livery for a beau!

Stand. 'Sdeath, madam, what is there in me that looks like a cully? Did not I see him?

Lure. No, no, you could not see him; you're dreaming, colonel. Will you believe your eyes, now that I have rubbed them open?—Here, you friend.

Enter ERRAND in CLINCHER senior's clothes.

Stand. This is illusion all; my eyes conspire against themselves. 'Tis legerdemain!

Lure. Legerdemain! Is that all your acknowledgment for your rude behaviour?—Oh, what a curse is it to love as I do!—But don't presume too far, sir, on my affection: for such ungenerous usage will soon return my tired heart.—Begone, sir, [To the Porter.] to your impertinent master, and tell him I shall never be at leisure to receive any of his troublesome visits. Send to me to know when I should be at home!—Begone, sir! I am sure he has made me an unfortunate woman. [Weeps.]

Stand. Nay, then, there is no certainty in nature; and truth is only falsehood well disguised.

Lure. Sir, had not I owned my fond, foolish passion, I should not have been subject to such unjust suspicions: but it is an ungrateful return. [Weeping.]

Stand. Now, where are all my firm resolves? I will believe her just. My passion raised my jealousy; then, why may'nt love be as blind in finding faults, as in excusing them?—I hope, madam, you'll pardon me, since jealousy, that magnified my suspicion, is as much the effect of love, as my easiness in being satisfied.

Lure. Easiness in being satisfied! You men have got an insolent way of extorting pardon, by persisting in your faults. No, no, sir; cherish your suspicions, and feed upon your jealousy: 'tis fit meat for your squeamish stomach.

With me all women should this rule pursue:

Who think us false, should never find us true.

[Exit in a rage.]

Enter CLINCHER senior in the porter's clothes.

Clin. sen. Well, intriguing is the prettiest, pleasantest thing for a man of my parts. How shall we laugh at the husband when he is gone?—How sillily he looks! He's in labour of horns already. To make a colonel a cuckold! 'Twill be rare news for the alderman. [Apart.]

Stand. All this sir Harry has occasioned; but he's brave, and will afford me a just revenge. Oh, this is the porter I sent the challenge by—Well, sir, have you found him?

Clin. sen. What the devil does he mean now?

Stand. Have you given sir Harry the note, fellow?

Clin. sen. The note! What note?

Stand. The letter, blockhead, which I sent by you to sir Harry Wildair. Have you seen him?

Clin. sen. Oh, lord, what shall I say now? Seen him? Yes, sir—No, sir. I have, sir—I have not, sir.

Stand. The fellow's mad! Answer me directly, sirrah, or I'll break your head.

Clin. sen. I know sir Harry very well, sir; but, as to the note, sir, I can't remember a word on't: truth is, I have a very bad memory.

Stand. Oh, sir, I'll quicken your memory.

[Strikes him.]

Clin. sen. Zauns, sir, hold!—I did give him the note.

Stand. And what answer?

Clin. sen. I mean, I did not give him the note.

Stand. What, d'ye banter, rascal?

[Strikes him again.]

Clin. sen. Hold, sir, hold! He did send an answer.

Stand. What was't, villain?

Clin. sen. Why, truly, sir, I have forgot it: I told you that I had a very treacherous memory.

Stand. I'll engage you shall remember me this month, rascal. [Beats him off; and exit.]

Enter LUREWELL and PARLY.

Lure. Fort-bon, fort-bon, fort-bon! This is better than I expected; but fortune still helps the industrious.

Enter CLINCHER senior.

Clin. sen. Ah! the devil take all intriguing, say I, and him who first invented canes—That cursed colonel has got such a knack of beating his men, that he has left the mark of a collar of bandiliers about my shoulders.

Lure. Oh, my poor gentleman! and was it beaten?

Clin. sen. Yes, I have been beaten. But where's my clothes? my clothes?

Lure. What, you won't leave me so soon, my dear, will ye?

Clin. sen. Will ye!—If ever I peep into a colonel's tent again, may I be forced to run the gauntlet! But my clothes, madam.

Lure. I sent the porter down stairs with them: did not you meet him?

Clin. sen. Meet him! No; not I.

Par. No!—He went out at the back-door, and is run clear away, I'm afraid.

Clin. sen. Gone, say you, and with my clothes, my fine Jubilee clothes?—Oh, the rogue, the thief!—I'll have him hanged for murder—But how shall I get home in this pickle?

Par. I'm afraid, sir, the colonel will be back presently, for he dines at home.

Clin. sen. Oh, then, I must sneak off.

Was ever such an unfortunate beau,
To have his back well thrashed, and lost his coat also? [Exit CLINCHER sen.]

Lure. Thus, the noble poet spoke truth:
Nothing suits worse with vice than want of sense:
Fools are still wicked at their own expence.

Par. Methinks, madam, the injuries you have suffered by men must be very great, to raise such heavy resentments against the whole sex.

Lure. The greatest injury that woman could sustain: they robbed me of that jewel, which, preserved, exalts our sex almost to angels: but, destroyed, debases us below the worst of brutes, mankind.

Par. But, I think, madam, your anger should be only confined to the author of your wrongs.

Lure. The author! Alas, I know him not, which makes my wrongs the greater.

Par. Not know him? 'Tis odd, madam, that a man should rob you of that same jewel you mentioned, and you not know him.

Lure. Leave trifling: 'tis a subject that always sours my temper: but since, by thy faithful service, I have some reason to confide in your secrecy, hear the strange relation.—Some twelve years ago, I lived at my father's house in Oxfordshire, blest with innocence, the ornamental, but weak guard of blooming beauty: I was then just fifteen, an age fatal to the female sex. Our youth is tempting, our innocence credulous, romances moving, love powerful, and men are—villains. Then it happened, that three young gentlemen from the university, coming into the country, and being benighted, and strangers, called at my father's: he was very glad of their company, and offered them the entertainment of his house.

Par. Which they accepted, no doubt. Oh, these strolling collegians are never abroad, but upon some mischief.

Lure. They had some private frolic or design in their heads, as appeared by their not naming one another, which my father perceiving, out of civility made no inquiry into their affairs; two of them had a heavy, pedantic, university air; a sort of disagreeable scholastic boorishness in their behaviour; but the third——

Par. Ah, the third, madam—the third of all things, they say, is very critical.

Lure. He was—but in short, nature cut him out for my undoing; he seemed to be about eighteen.

Par. A fit match for your fifteen as could be.

Lure. He had a genteel sweetness in his face, a graceful comeliness in his person, and his tongue was fit to sooth soft innocence into ruin. His very looks were witty, and his expressive eyes spoke softer, prettier things, than words could frame.

Par. There will be mischief by and by; I never heard a woman talk so much of eyes, but there were tears presently after.

Lure. His discourse was directed to my father, but his looks to me. After supper, I went to my chamber, and read Cassandra, then went to bed, and dreamed of him all night, rose in the morning, and made verses, so fell desperately in love. My father was so well pleased with their conversation, that he begged their company next day; they consented, and next night, Parly——

Par. Ah! next night, madam——next night (I'm afraid) was a night, indeed.

Lure. He bribed my maid, with his gold, out of her honesty; and me, with his rhetoric, out of my honour—She admitted him into my chamber, and there he vowed, and swore, and wept, and sighed——and conquered. [Weeps.]

Par. A-lack-a-day, poor fifteen! [Weeps.]

Lure. He swore that he would come down from Oxford in a fortnight, and marry me.

Par. The old bait, the old bait—I was cheated just so myself. [Aside.] But had not you the wit to know his name all this while?

Lure. Alas! what wit had innocence like mine? He told me, that he was under an obligation to his companions of concealing himself then, but that he would write to me in two days, and let me know his name and quality. After all the binding oaths of constancy, joining hands, exchanging hearts, I gave him a ring with this motto: Love and honour:—then we parted, and I never saw the dear deceiver more.

Par. No, nor never will, I warrant you.

Lure. I need not tell my griefs, which my father's death made a fair pretence for; he left me sole heiress and executrix to three thousand pounds a-year: at last, my love for this single dissembler turned to a hatred of the whole sex; and, to direct my melancholy, and make my large fortune subservient to my pleasure and revenge, I went to travel, where, in most courts of Europe, I have done some execution. Here I will play my last scene: then retire to my country-house, live solitary, and die a penitent.

Par. But don't you still love this fair dissembler?

Lure. Most certainly. 'Tis love of him that keeps my anger warm, representing the baseness of mankind full in view; and makes my resentments work—We shall have that old impertinent letcher, Smuggler, here to-night; I have a plot to swinge him, and his precise nephew, Vizard.

Par. I think, madam, you manage every body that comes in your way.

Lure. No, Parly; those men, whose pretensions I found just and honourable, I fairly dismissed, by letting them know my firm resolutions never to marry. But those villains that would attempt my honour, I've seldom failed to manage.

Par. What d'ye think of the colonel, madam? I suppose his designs are honourable.

Lure. That man's a riddle; there's something of honour in his temper that pleases; I'm sure he loves me, too, because he's soon jealous, and soon satisfied. But he's a man still. When I once tried his pulse about marriage, his blood ran as low as a coward's. He swore, indeed, that he loved me, but could not marry me, forsooth, because he was engaged elsewhere. So poor a pretence made me disdain his passion, which otherwise might have been uneasy to me.—But hang him, I have teased him enough—Besides, Parly, I begin to be tired of my revenge: but, this buss and guinea I must maul once more. I'll handsel his women's clothes for him. Go, get me pen and ink; I must write to Vizard, too.

Fortune, this once assist me as before:
Two such machines can never work in vain,
As thy propitious wheel, and my projecting brain.
[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Covent Garden.

WILDAIR and STANDARD meeting.

Stand. I THOUGHT, sir Harry, to have met you ere this in a more convenient place; but, since my wrongs were without ceremony, my revenge shall be so, too. Draw, sir.

Wild. Draw, sir! What shall I draw?

Stand. Come, come, sir, I like your facetious humour well enough; it shews courage and unconcern. I know you brave; and therefore use you thus.—Draw your sword.

Wild. Nay, to oblige you, I will draw; but, the devil take me if I fight. Perhaps, colonel, this is the prettiest blade you have seen.

Stand. I doubt not but the arm is good; and, therefore, think both worth my resentment. Come, sir.

Wild. But, prithee, colonel, dost think that I am such a madman, as to send my soul to the devil, and body to the worms——upon every fool's errand? [Aside.]

Stand. I hope you're no coward, sir.

Wild. Coward, sir! I have eight thousand pounds a-year, sir.

Stand. You fought in Flanders, to my knowledge.

Wild. Ay, for the same reason that I wore a red coat; because 'twas fashionable.

Stand. Sir, you fought a French count in Paris.

Wild. True, sir; but there was no danger of lands nor tenements: besides, he was a beau, like myself. Now you're a soldier, colonel, and fighting's your trade; and I think it downright madness to contend with any man in his profession.

Stand. Come, sir, no more dallying; I shall take very unseemly methods, if you don't shew yourself a gentleman.

Wild. A gentleman! Why, there again, now. A gentleman! I tell you once more, colonel, that I am a baronet, and have eight thousand pounds a-year. I can dance, sing, ride, fence, understand the languages——Now, I can't conceive how running you through the body should contribute one jot more to my gentility. But, pray, colonel, I had forgot to ask you, what's the quarrel?

Stand. A woman, sir.

Wild. Then I put up my sword. Take her.

Stand. Sir, my honour's concerned.

Wild. Nay, if your honour be concerned with a woman, get it out of her hands as soon as you can. An honourable lover is the greatest slave in nature: some will say, the greatest fool. Come, come, colonel, that is something about the lady Lurewell, I warrant; I can give you satisfaction in that affair.

Stand. Do so, then, immediately.

Wild. Put up your sword first; you know I dare fight: but I had much rather make you a friend than an enemy. I can assure you, this lady will prove too hard for one of your temper. You have too much honour, too much in conscience, to be a favourite with the ladies.

Stand. I'm assured, sir, she never gave you any encouragement.

Wild. A man can never hear reason with a sword in his hand. Sheath your weapon; and then, if I don't satisfy you, sheath it in my body.

Stand. Give me but demonstration of her granting you any favour, and it is enough.

Wild. Will you take my word?

Stand. Pardon me, sir—I cannot.

Wild. Will you believe your own eyes?

Stand. 'Tis ten to one whether I shall or no; they have deceived me already.

Wild. That's hard—but some means I shall devise for your satisfaction—we must fly this place, else that cluster of mob will overwhelm us.

[Exeunt.]

Enter mob; TOM ERRAND'S wife hurrying in CLINCHER, sen. in ERRAND'S clothes.

Wife. Oh! the villain, the rogue, he has murdered my husband. Ah, my poor Timothy!

[Crying.]

Clin. sen. Dem your Timothy! your husband has murdered me, woman; for he has carried away my fine jubilee clothes.

Wife. Aye, you cut-throat, have you not got his clothes upon your back there? Neighbours, don't you know poor Timothy's coat and apron?

Mob. Aye, aye, it is the same.

1st Mob. What shall we do with him, neighbours?

2d Mob. We'll pull him in pieces.

1st Mob. No, no; then we may be hanged for murder; but we'll drown him.

Clin. sen. Ah, good people, pray don't drown me; for I never learned to swim in all my life. Ah, this plaguy intriguing!

Mob. Away with him! away with him to the Thames!

Clin. sen. Oh! if I had but my swimming girdle now!

Enter Constable.

Con. Hold, neighbours; I command the peace.

Wife. Oh, Mr Constable, here's a rogue that has murdered my husband, and robbed him of his clothes.

Con. Murder and robbery! then he must be a gentleman. Hands off, there; he must not be abused. Give an account of yourself. Are you a gentleman?

Clin. sen. No, sir, I'm a beau.

Con. A beau! Then you have killed nobody, I'm persuaded. How came you by these clothes, sir?

Clin. sen. You must know, sir, that walking along, sir, I don't know how, sir, I cannot tell where, sir, and so the porter and I changed clothes, sir.

Con. Very well. The man speaks reason, and like a gentleman.

Wife. But pray, Mr Constable, ask him how he changed clothes with him?

Con. Silence, woman, and don't disturb the court. Well, sir, how did you change clothes?

Clin. sen. Why, sir, he pulled off my coat, and I drew off his: so I put on his coat, and he put on mine.

Con. Why, neighbour, I don't find that he's guilty: search him; and, if he carries no arms about him, we'll let him go.

[They search his pockets, and pull out his pistols.]

Clin. sen. Oh, gemini! my jubilee pistols!

Con. What, a case of pistols! then the case is plain. Speak, what are you, sir? whence came you, and whither go you?

Clin. sen. Sir, I came from Russel-street, and am going to the jubilee.

Wife. You shall go to the gallows, you rogue.

Con. Away with him! away with him to Newgate, straight!

Clin. sen. I shall go to the jubilee, now, indeed.

[Ereunt.]

Re-enter WILDAIR and STANDARD.

Wild. In short, colonel, 'tis all nonsense: fight for a woman! hard by is the lady's house; if you please we'll wait on her together: you shall draw your sword; I'll draw my snuff-box: you shall produce your wounds received in war; I'll relate mine by Cupid's dart: you shall look big; I'll ogle: you shall swear; I'll sigh: you shall sa, sa, and I'll coupée; and if she flies not to my arms like a hawk to its perch, my dancing-master deserves to be damned.

Stand. With the generality of women, I grant you, these arts may prevail.

Wild. Generality of women! Why, there again, you're out. They're all alike, sir: I never heard of any one that was particular, but one.

Stand. Who was she, pray?

Wild. Penelope, I think she's called, and that's a poetical story, too. When will you find a poet, in our age, make a woman so chaste?

Stand. Well, sir Harry, your facetious humour can disguise falsehood, and make calumny pass for satire; but you have promised me ocular demonstration that she favours you: make that good, and I shall then maintain faith and female to be as inconsistent as truth and falsehood.

Wild. Nay, by what you told me, I am satisfied that she imposes on us all: and Vizard, too, seems what I still suspected him: but his honesty once mistrusted, spoils his knavery. But will you be convinced, if our plot succeeds?

Stand. I rely on your word and honour, sir Harry; which, if I doubted, my distrust would cancel the obligation of their security.

Wild. Then meet me half an hour hence, at the Rummer; you must oblige me by taking a hearty glass with me, toward the fitting me out for a certain project, which this night I undertake.

Stand. I guess, by the preparation, that woman's the design.

Wild. Yes, faith! I am taken dangerous ill with two foolish maladies, modesty and love: the first I'll cure with Burgundy, and my love by a night's lodging with the damsel. A sure remedy. Probatum est.

Stand. I'll certainly meet you, sir.

[Ereunt severally.]

Enter CLINCHER junior and DICKY.

Clin. Ah, Dicky, this London is a sad place, a sad, vicious place: I wish that I were in the country again. And this brother of mine—I'm sorry he's so great a rake: I had rather see him dead, than see him thus.

Dick. Aye, sir, he'll spend his whole estate at this same jubilee. Who d'ye think lives at this same jubilee?

Clin. Who, pray?

Dick. The Pope.

Clin. The devil he does! my brother go to the place where the Pope dwells! he's bewitched, sure!

Enter TOM ERRAND in CLINCHER senior's clothes.

Dick. Indeed, I believe he is, for he's strangely altered.

Clin. Altered! why, he looks like a Jesuit already.

Err. This lace will sell. What a blockhead was the fellow to trust me with his coat! If I can get cross the garden, down to the water-side, I am pretty secure.

[Aside.]

Clin. Brother! Alaw! Oh, gemini! Are you my brother?

Dick. I seize you in the king's name, sir.

Err. Oh, lord! should this prove some parliament man, now!

Clin. Speak, you rogue, what are you?

Err. A poor porter, sir, and going of an errand.

Dick. What errand? speak, you rogue.

Err. A fool's errand, I'm afraid.

Clin. Who sent you?

Err. A beau, sir.

Dick. No, no; the rogue has murdered your brother, and stripped him of his clothes.

Clin. Murdered my brother! Oh, crimini! Oh, my poor jubilee brother! Stay—by Jupiter Ammon, I'm heir, though. Speak, sir, have you killed him? Confess that you have killed him, and I'll give you half a crown.

Err. Who, I, sir? Alack-a-day, sir! I never killed any man but a carrier's horse once.

Clin. Then you shall certainly be hanged; but confess that you killed him, and we'll let you go.

Err. Telling the truth hangs a man, but confessing a lie can do no harm: besides, if the worst come to the worst, I can but deny it again. Well, sir, since I must tell you, I did kill him.

Clin. Here's your money, sir. But are you sure you killed him dead?

Err. Sir, I'll swear it before any judge in England.

Dick. But are you sure that he's dead in law?

Err. Dead in law! I cannot tell whether he be dead in law. But he's as dead as a door-nail; for I gave him seven knocks on the head with a hammer.

Dick. Then you have the estate by statute. Any man that's knocked o' the head is dead in law.

Clin. But are you sure he was compos mentis when he was killed?

Err. I suppose he was, sir; for he told me nothing to the contrary afterwards.

Clin. Hey! Then I go the Jubilee. Strip, sir, strip! By Jupiter Ammon, strip!

Dick. Ah! don't swear, sir.

[Puts on his brother's clothes.]

Clin. Swear, sir! Zoons, ha'n't I got the estate, sir? Come, sir, now I'm in mourning for my brother.

Err. I hope you'll let me go now, sir.

Clin. Yes, yes, sir, but you must do me the favour to swear positively before a magistrate, that you killed him dead, that I may enter upon the estate without any trouble. By Jupiter Ammon! all my religion's gone since I put on these fine clothes—Hey, call me a coach! somebody.

Err. Ay, master, let me go, and I'll call one immediately.

Clin. No, no; Dicky, carry this spark before a justice, and, when he has made oath, you may discharge him. And I'll go see Angelica. [Exeunt DICK and ERRAND.] Now that I'm an elder brother, I'll court, and swear, and rant, and rake, and go to the Jubilee with the best of them.

[Erit.]

SCENE II.—LUREWELL'S house.

Enter LUREWELL and PARLY.

Lure. Are you sure that Vizard had my letter?

Par. Yes, yes, madam; one of your ladyship's footmen gave it to him in the park, and he told the bearer, with all transports of joy, that he would be punctual to a minute.

Lure. Thus, most villains, some time or other, are punctual to their ruin; and hypocrisy, by imposing on the world, at last deceives itself. Are all things prepared for his reception?

Par. Exactly to your ladyship's order: the alderman, too, is just come, dressed and cooked up for iniquity.

Lure. Then he has got woman's clothes on?

Par. Yes, madam, and has passed upon the family for your nurse.

Lure. Convey him into that closet, and put out the candles, and tell him, I'll wait on him presently.

[As PARLY goes to put out the candles, somebody knocks.]

Music plays without.

Lure. This must be sir Harry; tell him I am not to be spoken with.

Par. Sir, my lady is not to be spoken with.

Wild. I must have that from her own mouth, Mrs Parly. Play, gentlemen. [Music plays again.]

Lure. This must be some clown without manners, or a gentleman above ceremony. Who's there?

WILDAIR sings.

*Thus Damon knocked at Celia's door,
He sighed, and wept, and begged, and swore,
The sign was so, [Knocks,
She answered, No. [Knocks thrice,
No, no, no.*

*Again he sighed, again he prayed,
No, Damon, no, I am afraid:
Consider, Damon, I'm a maid.*

Consider,

No,

I am a maid.

No, &c.

*At last his sighs and tears made way,
She rose, and softly turned the key:
Come in, said she, but do not stay.*

I may conclude,

You will be rude,

But if you are, you may. [Exit PARLY.

Enter SIR HARRY.

Lure. 'Tis too early for serenading, sir Harry.

Wild. Wheresoever love is, there music is proper: there's an harmonious consent in their natures, and, when rightly joined, they make up the chorus of earthly happiness.

Lure. But, sir Harry, what tempest drives you here at this hour?

Wild. No tempest, madam, but as fair weather as ever enticed a citizen's wife to cuckold her husband in fresh air. Love, madam.

[WILDAIR taking her by the hand.]

Lure. As pure and white as angels' soft desires.

Wild. Fierce, as when ripe consenting beauty fires. Is't not so?

Lure. Oh, villain! What privilege have men to our destruction, that thus they hunt our ruin? [Aside.] If this be a love-token, [WILDAIR drops a ring, she takes it up.] your mistress's favours hang very loose about you, sir.

Wild. I can't, justly, madam, pay your trouble of taking it up, by any thing but desiring you to wear it.

Lure. You gentlemen have the cunningest ways of playing the fool, and are so industrious in your profuseness. Speak seriously; am I beholden to chance, or design, for this ring?

Wild. To design, upon my honour. And I hope my design will succeed. [Aside.]

Lure. And what shall I give you for such a fine thing?

Wild. You'll give me another; you'll give me another fine thing. [Both sing.]

Lure. Shall I be free with you, sir Harry?

Wild. With all my heart, madam, so I may be free with you.

Lure. Then, plainly, sir, I shall beg the favour to see you some other time: for, at this very minute, I have two lovers in the house.

Wild. Then to be plain, I must be gone this minute, for I must see another mistress within these two hours.

Lure. Frank and free!

Wild. As you with me—Madam, your most humble servant. [Erit.]

Lure. Nothing can disturb his humour. Now for my merchant and Vizard.

[Erit, and takes the candles with her.]

Enter PARLY, leading in SMUGGLER, dressed in women's clothes.

Par. This way, Mr Alderman.

Smug. Well, Mrs Parly—I'm obliged to you for this trouble: here are a couple of shillings for you. Times are hard, very hard indeed!—but next time I'll steal a pair of silk stockings from my wife, and bring them to you—What are you fumbling about my pockets for?

Par. Only setting the plaits of your gown:—here, sir, get into this closet, and my lady will wait on you presently.

[Puts him into the closet, runs out, and returns with VIZARD.]

Viz. Where wouldst thou lead me, my dear suspicious little pilot?

Par. You're almost in port, sir; my lady's in the closet, and will come out to you immediately.

Viz. Let me thank thee as I ought. [Kisses her.]

Par. Pshaw! who has hired me best? a couple of shillings, or a couple of kisses?

Viz. Propitious darkness guides the lover's steps, and night, that shadows outward sense, lights up our inward joy. Night! the great awful ruler of mankind, which, like the Persian monarch, hides its royalty to raise the veneration of the world. Under thy easy reign dissemblers may speak truth: all slavish forms and ceremonies laid aside, and generous villainy may act without constraint.

Smug. [Peeping out of the closet.] Bless me! what voice is this?

Viz. Our hungry appetites, like the wild beasts of prey, now scour about to gorge their craving maws; the pleasure of hypocrisy, like a chained lion, once broke loose, wildly indulges its new freedom, ranging through all unbounded joys.

Smug. My nephew's voice, and certainly possessed with an evil spirit; he talks as profanely as an actor possessed with a poet.

Viz. Ha! I hear a voice. Madam—my life, my happiness! where are you, madam?

Smug. Madam! He takes me for a woman too: I'll try him. Where have you left your sanctity, Mr Vizard?

Viz. Talk no more of that ungrateful subject—I left it where it has only business, with daylight; 'tis needless to wear a mask in the dark.

Smug. Oh, the rogue, the rogue!—The world takes you for a very sober, virtuous gentleman.

Viz. Ay, madam, that adds security to all my pleasure. With me a cully'squire may squander his estate, and ne'er be thought a spendthrift—With me a holy elder may zealously be drunk, and toast his tuneful nose in sack, to make it hold forth clearer—But what is most my praise, the formal rigid she, that rails at vice and men, with me secures her loosest pleasures, and her strictest honour—She who, with scornful mien, and virtuous pride, disdains the name of whore, with me can wanton, and laugh at the deluded world.

Smug. How have I been deceived! Then you are very great among the ladies?

Viz. Yes, madam, they know that, like a mole in the earth, I dig deep, but invisible; not like those fluttering noisy sinners, whose pleasure is the proclamation of their faults; those empty flashes, who no sooner kindle, but they must blaze to alarm the world. But come, madam, you delay our pleasures.

Smug. He surely takes me for the lady Lurewell—she has made him an appointment too—but I'll be revenged of both.

Well, sir, what are those you are so intimate with?

Viz. Come, come, madam, you know very well—those who stand so high, that the vulgar envy even their crimes, whose figure adds privilege to their sin, and makes it pass unquestioned: fair, high, pampered females, whose speaking eyes, and piercing voice, would arm the statue of a stoic, and animate his cold marble with the soul of an epicure; all ravishing, lovely, soft and kind, like you.

Smug. I'm very lovely and soft indeed! You shall find me much harder than you imagine, friend.—Well, sir, but I suppose your dissimulation has some other motive besides pleasure?

Viz. Yes, madam, the honestest motive in the world—interest—You must know, madam, that I have an old uncle, Alderman Smuggler; you have seen him, I suppose?

Smug. Yes, yes, I have some small acquaintance with him.

Viz. 'Tis the most knavish, precise, covetous old rogue, that ever died of the gout.

Smug. Ah, the young son of a whore! Well, sir, and what of him?

Viz. Hell hungers not more for wretched souls, than he for ill-got pelf: and yet (what's wonderful), he that would stick at no profitable villany himself, loves holiness in another. He prays all Sunday for the sins of the week past; he spends all dinner-time in two tedious graces; and what he designs a blessing to the meat, proves a curse to his family; he's the most—

Smug. Well, well, sir, I know him very well.

Viz. Then, madam, he has a swinging estate, which I design to purchase as a saint, and spend like a gentleman. He got it by cheating, and should lose it by deceit. By the pretence of my zeal and sobriety, I'll cozen the old miser, one of these days, out of a settlement and deed of conveyance—

Smug. It shall be a deed to convey you to the gallows, then, ye young dog. [Aside.]

Viz. And no sooner he's dead, but I'll rattle over his grave with a coach and six, to inform his covetous ghost how genteelly I spend his money.

Smug. I'll prevent you, boy; for I'll have my money buried with me. [Aside.]

Viz. Bless me, madam! here's a light coming this way. I must fly immediately.—When shall I see you, madam?

Smug. Sooner than you expect, my dear.

Viz. Pardon me, dear madam, I would not be seen for the world. I would sooner forfeit my life, my pleasure, than my reputation. [Exit.]

Smug. Reputation, reputation! That poor word suffers a great deal—Well, thou art the most accomplished hypocrite that ever made a grave plodding face over a dish of coffee and a pipe of tobacco. He owes me for seven years maintenance, and shall pay me by seven years imprisonment; when I die, I'll leave him the fee-simple of a rope and a shilling—Who are these? I begin to be afraid of some mischief—I wish that I were safe within the city liberties—I'll hide myself.

[Stands close.]

Enter BUTLER, with other Servants and lights.

But. I say there are two spoons wanting, and I'll search the whole house. Two spoons will be no small gap in my quarter's wages.

Serv. When did you miss them, James?

But. Miss them! why, I miss them now—In short, they must be among you; and if you don't return them, I'll go to the cunning man to-morrow morning—My spoons I want, and my spoons I will have.

Serv. Come, come, search about.

[Search, and discover SMUGGLER.]

But. Hark'e, good woman, what makes you hide yourself? What are you ashamed of?

Smug. Ashamed of! Oh, lord, sir, I'm an honest old woman, that never was ashamed of any thing.

But. What, are you a midwife, then? Speak, did not you see a couple of stray spoons in your travels?

Smug. Stray spoons!

But. Ay, ay, stray spoons. In short, you stole them; and I'll shake your old limbs to pieces, if you don't deliver them presently.

Smug. Bless me! a reverend elder of seventy years old accused for petty larceny!—Why, search me, good people, search me; and if you find any spoons about me, you shall burn me for a witch.

But. Ay, we will search you, mistress.

[They search, and pull the spoons out of his pocket.]

Smug. Oh, the devil, the devil!

But. Where, where is he! Lord bless us! she is a witch in good earnest, may be.

Smug. Oh, it was some devil, some Covent-Garden, or St. James's devil, that put them in my pocket.

But. Ay, ay, you shall be hanged for a thief, burned for a witch, and then carted for a bawd. Speak, what are you?

Enter LUREWELL.

Smug. I'm the lady Lurewell's nurse.

Lure. What noise is this?

But. Here is an old succubus, madam, that has stole two silver spoons, and says she is your nurse.

Lure. My nurse! Oh, the impudent old jade! I never saw the withered creature before.

Smug. Then I'm finely caught—Oh, madam, madam, don't you know me? Don't you remember buss and guinea?

Lure. Was ever such impudence! I know thee!—Why, thou'rt as brazen as a bawd in the side-box. Take her before a justice, and then to Newgate; away!

Smug. Oh, consider, madam, that I'm an alderman!

Lure. Consider, sir, that you're a compound of covetousness, hypocrisy, and knavery, and must be punished accordingly. You must be in petticoats, gouty monster! must ye? You must buss and guinea, too? you must tempt a lady's honour, old satyr? Away with him!

[Hurry him off.]

Still may our sex thus frauds of men oppose;
Still may our arts delude these tempting foes.
May honour rule, and never fall betrayed,
But vice be caught in nets for virtue laid.

[Erit.]

A C T V.

SCENE I.—LADY DARLING'S house.

Enter DARLING and ANGELICA.

Dar. DAUGHTER, since you have to deal with a man of so peculiar a temper, you must not think the general arts of love can secure him; you may therefore allow such a courtier some encouragement extraordinary, without reproach to your modesty.

Ang. I am sensible, madam, that a formal nicety makes our modesty sit awkward, and appears rather a chain to enslave, than a bracelet to adorn us; it should shew, when unmolested, easy and innocent as a dove, but strong and vigorous as a falcon, when assauked.

Dar. I'm afraid, daughter, you mistake sir Harry's gaiety for dishonour.

Ang. Though modesty, madam, may wink, it must not sleep, when powerful enemies are abroad. I must confess, that, of all men's, I would not see sir Harry Wildair's faults; nay, I could wrest his most suspicious words a thousand ways, to make them look like honour. But, madam, in spite of love, I must hate him, and curse those practices which taint our nobility, and rob all virtuous women of the bravest men——

Dar. You must certainly be mistaken, Angelica; for I'm satisfied sir Harry's designs are only to court and marry you.

Ang. His pretence, perhaps, was such; but women, now, like enemies, are attacked; whether by treachery, or fairly conquered, the glory of the triumph is the same. Pray, madam, by what means were you made acquainted with his designs?

Dar. Means, child! Why, my cousin Vizard, who, I'm sure, is your sincere friend, sent him. He brought me this letter from my cousin.

[Gives her the letter, which she opens.]

Ang. Ha, Vizard!—then I'm abused in earnest—Would sir Harry, by his instigation, fix a base affront upon me? No, I cannot suspect him of so ungentle a crime—This letter shall trace the truth. [Aside.]—My suspicions, madam, are much cleared; and I hope to satisfy your ladyship in my management, when I next see sir Harry.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Madam, here's a gentleman below, calls himself Wildair.

VOL. II.

Dar. Conduct him up. [Erit Servant.]
Daughter, I won't doubt your discretion.

[Erit LADY DARLING.]

Enter WILDAIR.

Wild. Oh, the delights of love and Burgundy!—Madam, I have toasted your ladyship fifteen bumpers successively, and swallowed cupids like loches to every glass.

Ang. And what then, sir?

Wild. Why, then, madam, the wine has got into my head, and the cupids into my heart; and unless, by quenching quick my flame, you kindly ease the smart, I am a lost man, madam.

Ang. Drunkenness, sir Harry, is the worst pretence a gentleman can make for rudeness;—for the excuse is as scandalous as the fault.—Therefore, pray consider who you are so free with, sir; a woman of condition, that can call half a dozen footmen upon occasion.

Wild. Nay, madam, if you have a mind to toss me in a blanket, half a dozen chambermaids would do better service. Come, come, madam; though the wine makes me lisp, yet it has taught me to speak plainer. By all the dust of my ancient progenitors, I must this night rest in your arms!

Ang. Nay, then—who waits there?

Enter Footmen.

Take hold of that madman, and bind him.

Wild. Nay, then, Burgundy's the word;—slaughter will ensue. Hold—Do you know, scoundrels, that I have been drinking victorious Burgundy?

[Draws.]

Servants. We know you're drunk, sir.

Wild. Then, how have you the impudence, rascals, to assault a gentleman with a couple of flasks of courage in his head?

Servants. We must do as our young mistress commands us.

Wild. Nay, then, have among ye, dogs!

[Throws money among them; they scramble and take it up: he, pelting them out, shuts the door, and returns.]

Rascals, poltroons! I have charmed the dragon, and now the fruit's my own.

Ang. Oh, the mercenary wretches! This was a plot to betray me.

Wild. I have put the whole army to flight;—and now I'll take the general prisoner.

[Laying hold on her.]

2 U

Ang. I conjure you, sir, by the sacred name of honour, by your dead father's name, and the fair reputation of your mother's chastity, that you offer not the least offence. Already you have wronged me past redress.

Wild. Thou art the most unaccountable creature——

Ang. What madness, sir Harry, what wild dream of loose desire, could prompt you to attempt this baseness? View me well—the brightness of my mind, methinks, should lighten outwards, and let you see your mistake in my behaviour. I think it shines with so much innocence in my face, that it should dazzle all your vicious thoughts. Think not I am defenceless, because alone. Your very self is guard against yourself; I'm sure there's something generous in your soul: my words shall search it out, and eyes shall fire it for my own defence.

Wild. [Mimicking.] Tal tidum, tidum, tal ti didi didum. A million to one, now, but this girl is just come flush from reading the Rival Queens!—'Egad, I'll at her in her own cant—Oh, my Statira! Oh! my angry dear, turn thy eyes on me—behold thy beau in buskins.

Ang. Behold me, sir; view me with a sober thought, free from those fumes of wine that throw a mist before your sight, and you shall find that every glance from my reproaching eyes is armed with sharp resentment, and with a virtuous pride that looks dishonour dead.

Wild. This is the first whore in heroics that I have met with. [Aside.] Look ye, madam, as to that slender particular of your virtue, we sha'n't quarrel about it; you may be as virtuous as any woman in England, if you please; you may say your prayers all the time. But, pray, madam, be pleased to consider, what is this same virtue that you make such a mighty noise about—Can your virtue bespeak you a front row in the boxes? No! for the players cannot live upon virtue. Can your virtue keep a coach and six. No, no; your virtuous women walk on foot.—Can your virtue hire you a pew in the church? Why, the very sexton will tell you, No. Can your virtue stake for you at picquet? No. Then, what business has a woman with virtue? Come, come, madam, I offered you fifty guineas;—there's a hundred—The devil!—virtuous still!—Why, it is a hundred, five score, a hundred guineas!

Ang. Oh, indignation! Were I a man, you durst not use me thus. But the mean, poor abuse you throw on me, reflects upon yourself: our sex still strikes an awe upon the brave, and only cowards dare affront a woman.

Wild. Affront! 'Sdeath, madam, a hundred guineas will set you up a bank at basset; a hundred guineas will furnish out your lodging with china; a hundred guineas will give you an air of quality; a hundred guineas will buy you a rich es-critoire for your billet-doux, or a fine common-prayer-book for your virtue; a hundred guineas will buy a hundred fine things, and fine things are for fine ladies, and fine ladies are for fine gentlemen, and fine gentlemen are——'Egad, this Burgundy makes a man speak like an angel! Come, come, madam, take it, and put it to what use you please.

Ang. I'll use it as I would the base unworthy giver, thus——

[Throws down the purse, and stamps upon it.]

Wild. I have no mind to meddle in state affairs; but these women will make me a parliament-man in spite of my teeth, on purpose to bring in a bill against their extortion. She tramples under foot that deity which all the world adores—Oh, the blooming pride of beautiful eighteen!—Pshaw! I'll talk to her no longer; I'll make my market with the old gentlewoman; she knows business better—[Goes to the door.] Here, you, friend: pray, desire the old lady to walk in—Hark'e, 'egad, madam, I'll tell your mother.

Enter LADY DARLING.

Lady Dar. Well, sir Harry, and how d'ye like my daughter, pray?

Wild. Like her, madam!—Hark'e, will you take it?—Why, faith, madam—Take the money, I say, or, egad, all's out.

Ang. All shall out—Sir, you're a scandal to the name of gentleman.

Wild. With all my heart, madam—In short, madam, your daughter has used me somewhat too familiarly, though I have treated her like a woman of quality.

Lady Dar. How, sir?

Wild. Why, madam, I have offered her a hundred guineas.

Lady Dar. A hundred guineas! Upon what score?

Wild. Upon what score! Lord, lord, how these old women love to hear bawdy! Why, 'faith, madam, I have never a double entendre ready at present; but I'll sing you a song.

*Behold the goldfinches, tal al de rall,
And a man of my inches, tal al de rall,
You shall take them, believe me, tal al de rall,
If you will give me your tall al de rall.*

A modish minuet, madam, that's all.

Lady Dar. Sir, I don't understand you.

Wild. Aye, she will have it plain terms—Then, madam, in downright English, I offered your daughter a hundred guineas to——

Ang. Hold, sir! stop your abusive tongue, too loose for modest ears to hear—Madam, I did before suspect that his designs were base; now they're too plain. This knight, this mighty man of wit and humour, is made a tool to a knave—Vizard has sent him on a bully's errand to affront a woman; but I scorn the abuse, and him that offered it.

Lady Dar. How, sir, come to affront us!—D'ye know who we are, sir?

Wild. Know who you are! Why, your daughter there, is Mr Vizard's—cousin, I suppose.—And for you, madam—Now, to call her procuress à-la-mode de France.—[Aside.]—J'estime votre occupation—

Lady Dar. Pray, sir, speak English.

Wild. Then, to define her office à-la-mode de Londres. [Aside.] I suppose your ladyship to be one of those civil, obliging, discreet old gentlewomen, who keep their visiting days for the entertainment of their presenting friends, whom they treat with imperial tea, a private room, and a pack of cards. Now I suppose you do understand me?

Lady Dar. This is beyond sufferance! But say, thou abusive man, what injury have you ever received from me, or mine, thus to engage you in this scandalous aspersion?

Ang. Yes, sir, what cause, what motives could induce you thus to debase yourself below your rank?

Wild. Hey-day! Now, dear Roxana, and you, my fair Statira, be not so very heroic in your style: Vizard's letter may resolve you, and answer all the impertinent questions you have made me.

Lady Dar. & Ang. We appeal to that.

Wild. And I'll stand to it; he read it to me, and the contents were pretty plain, I thought.

Ang. Here, sir, peruse it, and see how much we are injured, and you deceived.

Wild. [Opening the letter.] But, hold, madam, [To DARLING.] before I read I'll make some conditions: Mr Vizard says here, that I won't scruple thirty or forty pieces. Now, madam, if you have clapt in another cypher to the account, and made it three or four hundred, 'egad I'll not stand to it.

Ang. Now, I cannot tell whether disdain or anger be the most just resentment for this injury.

Lady Darl. The letter, sir, shall answer you.

Wild. Well, then—[Reads.]—'Out of my earnest inclination to serve your ladyship, and my cousin Angelica'—Aye, aye, the very words, I can say it by heart—'I have sent sir Harry Wildair to—What the devil's this? Sent sir Harry Wildair to court my cousin'—He read to me quite a different thing—'He's a gentleman of great parts and fortune'—He's a son of a whore and a rascal—'And would make your daughter very happy [Whistles.] in a husband.'—[Looks foolish and hums a song] Oh! poor sir Harry, what have thy angry stars designed!

Ang. Now, sir, I hope you need no instigation to redress our wrongs, since even the injury points the way.

Lady Dar. Think, sir, that our blood for many generations has run in the purest channel of unsullied honour.

Wild. Ay, madam.

[Bows to her.]

Ang. Consider what a tender flower is woman's reputation, which the least air of foul detraction blasts.

Wild. Yes, madam. [Bows to the other.]

Lady Dar. Call, then, to mind your rude and scandalous behaviour.

Wild. Right, madam. [Bows again.]

Ang. Remember the base price you offered me. [Exit.]

Wild. Very true, madam. Was ever man so catechized?

Lady Dar. Then, think, that Vizard—the villain Vizard—caused all this, yet lives: that's all: farewell.

Wild. Stay, madam, [To DARLING.] one word; is there no other way to redress your wrongs, but by fighting?

Lady Dar. Only one, sir; which, if you can think of, you may do; you know the business I entertained you for.

Wild. I understand you, madam. [Exit DARLING.] Here am I brought to a very pretty dilemma. I must commit murder, or commit matrimony; which is the best now? a licence from Doctors Commons, or a sentence from the Old Bailey?—If I kill my man, the law hangs me; if I marry my woman, I shall hang myself—But, damn it—cowards dare fight:—I'll marry; that's the most daring action of the two—So, my dear cousin Angelica, have at you. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Newgate.

CLINCHER senior, solus.

Clin. sen. How severe and melancholy are Newgate reflections! Last week my father died; yesterday I turned beau; to-day I am laid by the heels; and to-morrow shall be hung by the neck—I was agreeing with a bookseller about printing an account of my journey through France and Italy: but now the history of my travels must be through Holborn to Tyburn—'The last dying speech of beau Clincher, that was going to the Jubilee—Come, a halfpenny a-piece'—A sad sound, a sad sound, faith! 'Tis one way to have a man's death make a great noise in the world.

Enter SMUGGLER and Gaoler.

Smug. Well, friend, I have told you who I am: so, send these letters into Thames Street, as directed: they are to gentlemen that will bail me. [Exit Gaoler.] Eh! this Newgate is a very populous place! here's robbery and repentance in every corner—Well, friend, what are you? a cut-throat or a bum-bailiff!

Clin. sen. What are you, mistress, a bawd or a witch? Hark'e, if you are a witch, d'ye see, I'll give you a hundred pounds to mount me on a broom-staff, and whip me away to the Jubilee.

Smug. The Jubilee! O, you young rake-hell, what brought you here?

Clin. sen. Ah, you old rogue, what brought you here, if you go to that?

Smug. I knew, sir, what your powdering, your prinking, your dancing, and your frisking, would come to.

Clin. sen. And I knew what your cozening, your extortion, and your smuggling would come to.

Smug. Ay, sir, you must break your indentures, and run to the devil in a full-bottom wig, must you?

Clin. sen. Ay, sir, and you must put off your gravity, and run to the devil in petticoats—You design to swing in masquerade, master, d'ye?

Smug. Ay, you must go to the plays, too, sirrah: Lord, lord! what business has a 'prentice at a play-house, unless it be to hear his master made a cuckold, and his mistress a whore? It is ten to one now, but some malicious poet has my character upon the stage within this month: 'tis a hard matter, now, that an honest sober man cannot sin in private for this plaguy stage. I gave an honest gentleman five guineas myself towards writing a book against it; and it has done no good, we see.

Clin. sen. Well, well, master, take courage! Our comfort is, we have lived together, and shall die together; only with this difference, that I have lived like a fool, and shall die like a knave, and you have lived like a knave, and shall die like a fool.

Smug. No, sirrah! I have sent a messenger for my clothes, and shall get out immediately, and shall be upon your jury by and by—Go to prayers, you rogue, to prayers. [Exit.]

Clin. sen. Prayers! it is a hard taking when a man must say grace to the gallows—Ah, this cursed intriguing! Had I swung handsomely in a silken garter now, I had died in my duty; but to hang in hemp, like the vulgar, it is very ungentleel.

Enter TOM ERRAND.

A reprieve! a reprieve! thou dear, dear—damned rogue. Where have you been? Thou art the most welcome—son of a whore—where's my clothes?

Err. Sir, I see where mine are. Come, sir, strip, sir, strip!

Clin. sen. What, sir, will you abuse a gentleman?

Err. A gentleman! Ha, ha, ha!—d'ye know where you are, sir? We're all gentlemen here. I stand up for liberty and property. Newgate's a commonwealth. No courtier has business among us. Come, sir.

Clin. sen. Well, but stay; stay till I send for my own clothes: I shall get out presently.

Err. No, no, sir, I'll ha' you into the dungeon, and uncase you.

Clin. sen. Sir, you cannot master me, for I am twenty thousand strong.

[Exit, struggling.]

SCENE III.—Changes to LADY DARLING'S house.

Enter WILDAIR, with letters; Servants following.

Wild. Here, fly all around, and bear these as directed; you to Westminster, you to St. James's, and you into the city. Tell all my friends, a bridegroom's joy invites their presence. Look all of ye-like bridegrooms also: all appear with hospitable looks, and bear a welcome in your faces. Tell them I am married. If any ask to whom, make no reply; but tell them, that I'm married; that joy shall crown the day, and love the night. Begone, fly!

Enter STANDARD.

A thousand welcomes, friend; my pleasure's now complete, since I can share it with my friend: brisk joy shall bound from me to you: then back again; and, like the sun, grow warmer by reflection.

Stand. You're always pleasant, sir Harry; but this transcends yourself: whence proceeds it?

Wild. Canst thou not guess, my friend? Whence flows all earthly joy? What is the life of man, and soul of pleasure? Woman.—What fires the heart with transport, and the soul with raptures?—Lovely woman.—What is the master-stroke and smile of the creation, but charming, virtuous woman?—When nature, in the general composition, first brought woman forth, like a flushed poet, ravished with his fancy, with ecstasy it blest the fair production!—Methinks, my friend, you relish not my joy. What is the cause?

Stand. Canst thou not guess?—What is the bane of man, and scourge of life, but woman?—What is the heathenish idol man sets up, and is damned for worshipping? Treacherous woman.—What are those, whose eyes, like basilisks, shine beautiful for sure destruction, whose smiles are dangerous as the grin of fiends, but false, deluding woman?—Woman, whose composition inverts humanity; their bodies heavenly, but their souls are clay.

Wild. Come, come, colonel, this is too much: I know your wrongs received from Lurewell may excuse your resentment against her. But it is unpardonable to charge the failings of a single woman upon the whole sex. I have found one, whose virtues—

Stand. So have I, sir Harry; I have found one whose pride's above yielding to a prince. And if lying, dissembling, perjury and falsehood, be no breaches in a woman's honour, she is as innocent as infancy.

Wild. Well, colonel, I find your opinion grows stronger by opposition; I shall now, therefore, wave the argument, and only beg you, for this day, to make a shew of complaisance at least.—

Here comes my charming bride.

Enter LADY DARLING and ANGELICA.

Stand. [Saluting ANGELICA.] I wish you, madam, all the joys of love and fortune.

Enter CLINCHER junior.

Clin. Gentlemen and ladies, I'm just upon the spur, and have only a minute to take my leave.

Wild. Whither are you bound, sir?

Clin. Bound, sir! I am going to the Jubilee, sir.

Lady Dar. Bless me, cousin! how came you by these clothes?

Clin. Clothes! ha, ha, ha! the rarest jest! ha, ha, ha! I shall burst, by Jupiter Ammon, I shall burst.

Lady Dar. What's the matter, cousin?

Clin. The matter! ha, ha, ha! Why an honest porter, ha, ha, ha! has knocked out my brother's brains, ha, ha, ha!

Wild. A very good jest, i'faith, ha, ha, ha!

Clin. Ay, sir, but the jest of all is, he knocked out his brains with a hammer, and so he is as dead as a door-nail, ha, ha, ha!

Lady Dar. And do you laugh, wretch?

Clin. Laugh! ha, ha, ha! let me see e'er a younger brother in England that won't laugh at such a jest.

Ang. You appeared a very sober, pious gentleman some hours ago.

Clin. Pshaw! I was a fool then: but now, madam, I'm a wit; I can rake now. As for your part, madam, you might have had me once; but now, madam, if you should fall to eating chalk, or gnawing the sheets, it is none of my fault. Now, madam—I have got an estate, and I must go to the Jubilee.

Enter CLINCHER senior in a blanket.

Clin. sen. Must you so, rogue, must ye? You will go to the Jubilee, will you?

Clin. jun. A ghost! a ghost! Send for the dean and chapter presently.

Clin. sen. A ghost! No, no, sirrah, I'm an older brother, rogue.

Clin. jun. I don't care a farthing for that; I'm sure you're dead in law.

Clin. sen. Why so, sirrah, why so?

Clin. jun. Because, sir, I can get a fellow to swear he knocked out your brains.

Wild. An odd way of swearing a man out of his life!

Clin. jun. Smell him, gentlemen; he has a deadly scent about him.—

Clin. sen. Truly the apprehensions of death may have made me savour a little. O, lord! the colonel! The apprehension of him may make the savour worse, I'm afraid.

Clin. jun. In short, sir, were you a ghost, or brother, or devil, I will go to the Jubilee, by Jupiter Ammon.

Stand. Go to the jubilee! go to the bear-garden.—The travel of such fools as you doubly injures our country: you expose our native follies, which ridicule us among strangers, and return fraught only with their vices, which you vend here for fashionable gallantry: a travelling fool is as dangerous as a home-bred villain. Get you to your native plough and cart, converse with animals like yourselves, sheep and oxen: men are creatures you don't understand.

Wild. Let them alone, colonel, their folly will be now diverting. Come, gentlemen, we'll dispute this point some other time; I hear some fiddles tuning; let's hear how they can entertain us. [A servant enters, and whispers WILDAIR.]

Wild. Madam, shall I beg you to entertain the company in the next room for a moment?

[To LADY DARLING.]

Lady Dar. With all my heart—Come, gentlemen. [Exeunt all but WILDAIR.]

Wild. A lady to inquire for me! Who can this be?

Enter LUREWELL.

Oh, madam, this favour is beyond my expectation—to come, uninvited, to dance at my wedding.—What d'ye gaze at, madam?

Lure. A monster—If thou'rt married, thou'rt the most perjured wretch that e'er avouched deceit.

Wild. Heyday! Why, madam, I'm sure I never swore to marry you: I made, indeed, a slight promise, upon condition of your granting me a small favour; but you would not consent, you know.

Lure. How he upbraids me with my shame! Can you deny your binding vows, when this appears a witness against your falsehood? [Shows a ring.] Methinks the motto of this sacred pledge should flash confusion in your guilty face—Read, read here, the binding words of Love and Honour!—words not unknown to your perfidious tongue, though utter strangers to your treacherous heart.

Wild. The woman's stark staring mad, that's certain.

Lure. Was it maliciously designed to let me find my misery when past redress; to let me know you, only to know you false? Had not cursed chance shewed me the surprising motto, I had been happy—The first knowledge I had of you was fatal to me, and this second worse.

Wild. What the devil is all this! Madam, I'm not at leisure for raillery at present, I have weighty affairs upon my hands; the business of pleasure, madam: any other time—

[Going.]

Lure. Stay, I conjure you, stay.

Wild. 'Faith, I can't, my bride expects me; but hark'e, when the honey-moon is over, about a month or two hence, I may do you a small favour.

[Erit.

Lure. Grant me some wild expressions, Heavens, or I shall burst! Woman's weakness, man's falsehood, my own shame, and love's disdain, at once swell up my breast—Words, words, or I shall burst!

[Going.

Enter STANDARD.

Stand. Stay, madam, you need not shun my sight; for, if you are perfect woman, you have confidence to outface a crime, and bear the charge of guilt without a blush.

Lure. The charge of guilt! What, making a fool of you? I've done it, and glory in the act: the height of female justice were to make you all hang or drown: dissembling to the prejudice of men is virtue; and every look, or sign, or smile, or tear, that can deceive, is meritorious.

Stand. Very pretty principles, truly! If there be truth in woman, 'tis now in thee. Come, madam, you know that you're discovered, and, being sensible that you cannot escape, you would now turn to bay. That ring, madam, proclaims you guilty.

Lure. O, monster, villain! perfidious villain! Has he told you?

Stand. I'll tell it you, and loudly, too.

Lure. O, name it not!—Yet, speak it out; 'tis so just a punishment for putting faith in man, that I will bear it all; and let credulous maids, that trust their honour to the tongues of men, thus hear the shame proclaimed. Speak now, what his busy scandal, and your improving malice, both dare utter.

Stand. Your falsehood can't be reached by malice nor by satire; your actions are the justest libel on your fame; your words, your looks, your tears, I did believe in spite of common fame. Nay, 'gainst mine own eyes, I still maintained your truth. I imagined Wildair's boasting of your favours to be the pure result of his own vanity: at last he urged your taking presents of him; as a convincing proof of which, you yesterday, from him, received that ring, which ring, that I might be sure he gave it, I lent him for that purpose.

Lure. Ha! you lent it him for that purpose!

Stand. Yes, yes, madam, I lent it him for that purpose—No denying it—I know it well, for I have worn it long, and desire you now, madam, to restore it to the just owner.

Lure. The just owner! Think, sir, think but of what importance 'tis to own it: if you have love and honour in your soul, 'tis then most justly yours; if not, you are a robber, and have stolen it basely.

Stand. Ha!—your words, like meeting flints, have struck a light to shew me something strange—But tell me instantly, is not your real name Manly?

Lure. Answer me first: did not you receive this ring about twelve years ago?

Stand. I did.

Lure. And were not you about that time entertained two nights at the house of sir Oliver Manly, in Oxfordshire?

Stand. I was, I was. [Runs to her, and embraces her.] The blest remembrance fires my soul with transport—I know the rest—you are the charming she, and I the happy man.

Lure. How has blind fortune stumbled on the right! But, where have you wandered since?—'Twas cruel to forsake me.

Stand. The particulars of my fortune are too tedious now: but, to discharge myself from the stain of dishonour, I must tell you, that immediately upon my return to the university, my elder brother and I quarrelled: my father, to prevent farther mischief, posts me away to travel: I wrote to you from London, but fear the letter came not to your hands.

Lure. I never had the least account of you by letter or otherwise.

Stand. Three years I lived abroad, and at my return found you were gone out of the kingdom, though none could tell me whither: missing you thus, I went to Flanders, served my king till the peace commenced; then, fortunately going on board at Amsterdam, one ship transported us both to England. At the first sight I loved, though ignorant of the hidden cause—You may remember, madam, that, talking once of marriage, I told you I was engaged; to your dear self I meant.

Lure. Then, men are still most generous and brave—and, to reward your truth, an estate of three thousand pounds a-year waits your acceptance; and, if I can satisfy you in my past conduct, and the reasons that engaged me to deceive all men, I shall expect the honourable performance of your promise, and that you will stay with me in England.

Stand. Stay! Nor fame nor glory e'er shall part us more. My honour can be nowhere more concerned than here.

Enter WILDAIR, ANGELICA, and both CLINCHERS.

Oh! sir Harry, fortune has acted miracles to-day: the story's strange and tedious, but all amounts to this—that woman's mind is charming as her person, and I am made a convert, too, to beauty.

Wild. I wanted only this to make my pleasure perfect. And now, madam, we may dance and sing, and love and kiss in good earnest.

A dance here. After the dance, enter SMUGGLER.

Smug. So, gentlemen and ladies, I'm glad to find you so merry; is my gracious nephew among ye?

Wild. Sir, he dares not shew his face among such honourable company; for your gracious nephew is—Smug. What, sir? Have a care what you say.

Wild. A villain, sir.

Smug. With all my heart. I'll pardon you the beating me for that very word. And pray, sir Harry, when you see him next, tell him this news from me, that I have disinherited him—that I will leave him as poor as a disbanded quarter-master. And this is the positive and stiff resolution of threescore and ten; an age that sticks as obstinately to its purpose, as to the old fashion of its cloak.

Wild. You see, madam, [To ANGEL.] how industriously fortune has punished his offence to you.

Ang. I can scarcely, sir, reckon it an offence, considering the happy consequence of it.

Smug. Oh, sir Harry, he is as hypocritical—

Larc. As yourself, Mr Alderman. How fares my good old nurse, pray, sir?

Smug. O, madam, I shall be even with you before I part with your writings and money, that I have in my hands.

Stand. A word with you, Mr Alderman; do you know this pocket-book?

Smug. O lord, it contains an account of all my secret practices in trading. [Aside.] How came you by it, sir?

Stand. Sir Harry, here, dusted it out of your pocket at this lady's house yesterday. It contains an account of some secret practices in your merchandising; among the rest, the counterpart of an agreement with a correspondent at Bourdeaux, about transporting French wine in Spanish casks. First, return this lady all her writings; then I shall consider whether I shall lay your proceedings before the parliament or not, whose justice will never suffer your smuggling to go unpunished.

Smug. Oh, my poor ship and cargo!

Clin. sen. Hark'e, master, you had as good come along with me to the Jubilee now.

Ang. Come, Mr Alderman, for once let a woman advise: Would you be thought an honest man, banish covetousness, that worst gout of age: avarice is a poor, pilfering quality of the soul, and will as certainly cheat, as a thief would steal. Would you be thought a reformer of the times, be less severe in your censures, less rigid in your precepts, and more strict in your example.

Wild. Right, madam; virtue flows freer from imitation than compulsion; of which, colonel, your conversion and mine are just examples.

In vain are musty morals taught in schools,
By rigid teachers, and as rigid rules,
Where virtue with a frowning aspect stands,
And frights the pupil from its rough commands:
But woman—

Charming woman can true converts make,
We love the precept for the teacher's sake.
Virtue in them appears so bright, so gay,
We hear with transport, and with pride obey.

[Exeunt omnes.]

THE INCONSTANT:

OR,
THE WAY TO WIN HIM.

BY FARQUHAR.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MEN.

OLD MIRABELL, an aged gentleman, of an odd compound, between the peevishness incident to his years, and his fatherly fondness towards his son.

YOUNG MIRABELL, his son, the Inconstant.

CAPTAIN DURETETE, an honest good-natured fellow, that thinks himself a greater fool than he is.

DUGARD, brother to ORIANA.

PETIT, servant to DUGARD, afterwards to his sister.

WOMEN.

ORIANA, a lady contracted to MIRABELL, who would bring him to reason.

BISARRE, a whimsical lady, friend to ORIANA, admired by DURETETE.

LAMORCE, a woman of contrivance.

Four Bravoes, two Gentlemen, and two Ladies. Soldiers, Servants, and Attendants.

Scene—Paris.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Street.

Enter DUGARD, and his man PETIT, in riding habits.

Dug. SIRRAH, What's a clock?

Pet. Turned of eleven, sir.

Dug. No more! We have rid a swinging pace from Nemours, since two this morning! Petit, run to Rousseau's, and bespeak a dinner at a louis-d'or a-head, to be ready by one.

Pet. How many will there be of you, sir?

Dug. Let me see; Mirabell one, Duretete two, myself, three—

Pet. And I four.

Dug. How now, sir, at your old travelling familiarity! When abroad, you had some freedom for want of better company; but among my friends at Paris, pray remember your distance—Begone, sir! [Erit PETIT.] This fellow's wit was necessary abroad, but he's too cunning for a domestic; I must dispose of him some way else.—Who's here? Old Mirabell, and my sister! my dearest sister!

Enter OLD MIRABELL and ORIANA.

Ori. My brother! Welcome.

Dug. Monsieur Mirabell ! I'm heartily glad to see you.

Old Mir. Honest Mr Dugard ! by the blood of the Mirabells, I'm your most humble servant.

Dug. Why, sir, you've cast your skin, sure ; you're brisk and gay ; lusty health about you ; no sign of age but your silver hairs.

Old Mir. Silver hairs ! Then, they are quick-silver hairs, sir. Whilst I have golden pockets, let my hairs be silver as they will. Adsbud, sir, I can dance, and sing, and drink, and——no, I can't wench. But, Mr Dugard, no news of my son Bob in all your travels ?

Dug. Your son's come home, sir.

Old Mir. Come home ! Bob come home ! By the blood of the Mirabells, Mr Dugard, what say ye ?

Ori. Mr Mirabell returned, sir !

Dug. He's certainly come, and you may see him within this hour or two.

Old Mir. Swear it, Mr Dugard ; presently swear it.

Dug. Sir, he came to town with me this morning ; I left him at the Bagnieurs, being a little disordered after riding, and I shall see him again presently.

Old Mir. What ! And he was ashamed to ask a blessing with his boots on ? A nice dog ! Well, and how fares the young rogue, ha ?

Dug. A fine gentleman, sir. He'll be his own messenger.

Old Mir. A fine gentleman ! But is the rogue like me, still ?

Dug. Why, yes, sir ; he's very like his mother, and as like you as most modern sons are to their fathers.

Old Mir. Why, sir, don't you think that I begat him ?

Dug. Why, yes, sir ; you married his mother, and he inherits your estate. He's very like you, upon my word.

Ori. And pray, brother, what's become of his honest companion, Duretete ?

Dug. Who, the captain ? the very same, he went abroad ; he's the only Frenchman I ever knew, that could not change. Your son, Mr Mirabell, is more obliged to nature for that fellow's composition, than for his own : for he's more happy in Duretete's folly, than his own wit. In short, they are as inseparable as finger and thumb ; but the first instance in the world, I believe, of opposition in friendship.

Old Mir. Very well ; will he be home to dinner, think ye ?

Dug. Sir, he has ordered me to bespeak a dinner for us at Rousseau's, at a Louis-d'or a head.

Old Mir. A Louis-d'or a head ! well said, Bob ; by the blood of the Mirabells, Bob's improved. But, Mr Dugard, was it so civil of Bob to visit Monsieur Rousseau before his own natural father ? Eh ! harkee, Oriana, what think you, now, of a fellow, that can eat and drink ye a whole Louis-d'or at a sitting ? He must be as strong as Hercules, life and spirit in abundance. Before Gad, I don't wonder at these men of quality, that their own wives can't serve them. A Louis-d'or a head ! 'Tis enough to stock the whole nation with bastards, 'tis faith. Mr Dugard, I leave you with your sister. [Exit Old Mir.]

Dug. Well, sister, I need not ask you how you do, your looks resolve me ; fair, tall, well-shaped ; you're almost grown out of my remembrance.

Ori. Why, truly, brother, I look pretty well, thank nature and my toilet ; I have 'scaped the jaundice, green-sickness, and the small-pox ; I eat three meals a day, am very merry, when up, and sleep soundly, when I'm down.

Dug. But, sister, you remember, that upon my going abroad, you would chuse this old gentleman for your guardian ; he's no more related to our family, than Prester John, and I have no reason to think you mistrusted my management of your fortune : therefore, pray be so kind as to tell me, without reservation, the true cause of making such a choice ?

Ori. Look'e, brother, you were going a ramb-ling, and 'twas proper, lest I should go a ramb-ling too, that somebody should take care of me. Old monsieur Mirabell is an honest gentleman, was our father's friend, and has a young lady in his house, whose company I like, and who has chosen him for her guardian, as well as I.

Dug. Who, mademoiselle Bizarre ?

Ori. The same ; we live merrily together, without scandal or reproach ; we make much of the old gentleman between us, and he takes care of us ; we eat what we like ; go to bed, when we please ; rise, when we will ; all the week we dance and sing, and, upon Sundays, go first to church, and then to the play. Now, brother, besides these motives for chusing this gentleman for my guardian, perhaps I had some private reasons.

Dug. Not so private as you imagine, sister ; your love to young Mirabell's no secret, I can assure you, but so public, that all your friends are ashamed on't.

Ori. O' my word, then, my friends are very bashful ; though I'm afraid, sir, that those people are not ashamed enough at their own crimes, who have so many blushes to spare for the faults of their neighbours.

Dug. Aye, but, sister, the people say——

Ori. Pshaw, hang the people ! they'll talk treason, and prophane their Maker ; must we, therefore, infer, that our king is a tyrant, and religion a cheat ? Look'e, brother, their court of enquiry is a tavern, and their informer, claret : they think as they drink, and swallow reputations like loches ; a lady's health goes briskly round with the glass, but her honour is lost in the toast.

Dug. Aye, but, sister, there is still something——

Ori. If there be something, brother, 'tis none of the people's something; marriage is my thing, and I'll stick to't.

Dug. Marriage! Young Mirabell marry! He'll build churches sooner. Take heed, sister, though your honour stood proof to his home-bred assaults: you must keep a stricter guard for the future: he has now got the foreign air, and the Italian softness; his wit's improved by converse; his behaviour finished by observation; and his assurance confirmed by success. Sister, I can assure you, he has made his conquests; and 'tis a plague upon your sex, to be the soonest deceived by those very men, that you know have been false to others.

Ori. Then why will you tell me of his conquests? for, I must confess, there is no title to a woman's favour so engaging as the repute of a handsome dissimulation; there is something of a pride to see a fellow lie at our feet, that has triumphed over so many; and then, I don't know, we fancy he must have something extraordinary about him to please us, and that we have something engaging about us to secure him; so we can't be quiet till we put ourselves upon the lay of being both disappointed.

Dug. But then, sister, he's as fickle—

Ori. For God's sake, brother, tell me no more of his faults; for, if you do, I shall run mad for him: say no more, sir; let me but get him into the bands of matrimony, I'll spoil his wandering, I warrant him; I'll do his business that way, never fear.

Dug. Well, sister, I won't pretend to understand the engagements between you and your lover; I expect, when you have need of my counsel or assistance, you will let me know more of your affairs. Mirabell is a gentleman, and, as far as my honour and interest can reach, you may command me to the furtherance of your happiness: in the mean time, sister, I have a great mind to make you a present of another humble servant; a fellow, that I took up at Lyons, who has served me honestly ever since.

Ori. Then, why will you part with him?

Dug. He has gained so insufferably on my good humour, that he's grown too familiar; but the fellow's cunning, and may be serviceable to you in your affair with Mirabell. Here he comes.

Enter PETIT.

Well, sir, have you been at Rousseau's?

Pet. Yes, sir; and who should I find there, but Mr Mirabell and the captain, hatching as warmly over a tub of ice, as two hen-pheasants over a brood—they would not let me bespeak any thing, for they had dined before I came.

Dug. Come, sir, you shall serve my sister; I shall still continue kind to you; and, if your lady recommends your diligence upon trial, I'll use my interest to advance you; you have sense enough to expect preferment. Here, sirrah, here's ten guineas for thee; get thyself a drugget suit, and a puff wig, and so—I dub thee gentleman-usher. Sister, I must put myself in repair; you may expect me in the evening—wait on your lady home, Petit.

[Erit DUGARD.]

Pet. A chair, a chair, a chair!

Ori. No, no; I'll walk home, 'tis but next door.

[Ereunt.]

SCENE II.—A tavern, discovering young MIRABELL and DURETETE rising from table.

Mir. Welcome to Paris once more, my dear captain; we have eat heartily, drank roundly, paid plentifully, and let it go for once. I liked every thing but our women, they looked so lean and tawdry, poor creatures! 'tis a sure sign the army is not paid. Give me the plump Venetian, brisk and sanguine, that smiles upon me like the glowing sun, and meets my lips like sparkling wine, her person shining as the glass, and spirit like the foaming liquor.

Dur. Ah, Mirabell! Italy I grant you; but for our women here in France, they are such thin brawn-fallen jades, a man may as well make a bed-fellow of a cane chair.

Mir. France! A light unseasoned country, nothing but feathers, foppery, and fashions; we're fine indeed, so are our coach-horses: men say we're courtiers; men abuse us; that we are wise and politic, non credo seigneur: that our women have wit; parrots, mere parrots. Assurance and a good memory sets them up: there's nothing on this side the Alps worth my humble service t'ye—Ha, Poma la Santa! Italy for my money; their customs, gardens, buildings, paintings, music, policies, wine and women! the paradise of the world; not pestered with a parcel of precise, old gouty fellows, that would debar their children every pleasure, that they themselves are past the sense of: commend me to the Italian familiarity: Here, son, there's fifty crowns, go pay your whore her week's allowance.

Dur. Aye, these are your fathers for you, that understand the necessities of young men; not like our musty dads, who, because they cannot fish themselves, would muddy the water, and spoil the sport of them that can. But now you talk of the plump, what d'ye think of a Dutch woman?

Mir. A Dutch woman's too compact; nay, every thing among them is so. A Dutch man is thick; a Dutch woman is squab; a Dutch horse is round; a Dutch dog is short; a Dutch ship is broad-bottomed: and, in short, one would swear the whole product of the country were cast in the same mould with their cheeses.

Dur. Aye, but, Mirabell, you have forgot the English ladies.

Mir. The women of England were excellent, did they not take such insufferable pains to ruin what nature has made so incomparably well; they would be delicate creatures, indeed, could they but thoroughly arrive at the French mien, or entirely let it alone; for they only spoil a very good air of their own, by an awkward imitation of ours; their parliaments, and our tailors, give laws to the three kingdoms. But come, Duretete, let us mind the business in hand; mistresses we must have, and must take up with the manufacture of the place, and, upon a competent diligence, we shall find those in Paris shall match the Italians from top to toe.

Dur. Aye, Mirabell, you will do well enough, but what will become of your friend? you know I am so plaguy bashful, so naturally an ass upon these occasions, that—

Mir. Pshaw! you must be bolder, man: travel three years, and bring home such a baby as bashfulness! a great lusty fellow! and a soldier! fy upon it!

Dur. Look'e, sir, I can visit, and I can ogle a little—as thus, or thus, now. Then, I can kiss abundantly, and make a shift to—but if they chance to give me a forbidding look, as some women, you know, have a devilish cast with their eyes—or if they cry—what d'ye mean? what d'ye take me for? fye, sir, remember who I am, sir—a person of quality to be used at this rate! 'egad, I'm struck as flat as a frying-pan!

Mir. Words o' course! never mind them: turn you about upon your heel with a jantée air; hum out the end of an old song; cut a cross caper, and at her again.

Dur. [Imitates him.] No, hang it, 'twill never do. Oons, what did my father mean by sticking me up in an university? or to think that I should gain any thing by my head in a nation, whose genius lies all in their heels! well, if ever I come to have children of my own, they shall have the education of the country; they shall learn to dance before they can walk, and be taught to sing before they can speak.

Mir. Come, come, throw off that childish humour; put on assurance, there's no avoiding it; stand all hazards, thou'rt a stout lusty fellow, and hast a good estate; look bluff, hector, you have a good side-box face, a pretty impudent face; so, that's pretty well. This fellow went abroad like an ox, and is returned like an ass.

[Aside.]
Dur. Let me see now, how I look.—[Pulls out a pocket-glass, and looks in it.]—A side-box face, say you! 'egad, I don't like it, Mirabell. Fy, sir, don't abuse your friends; I could not wear such a face for the best countess in Christendom.

Mir. Why can't you, blockhead, as well as I?

Dur. Why, thou hast impudence to set a good face upon any thing; I would change half my gold for half thy brass, with all my heart. Who comes here? Odsso, Mirabell, your father!

Enter OLD MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Where's Bob? dear Bob!

Mir. Yoqr blessing, sir.

Old Mir. My blessing! damn ye, ye young rogue! why did ye not come to see your father first, sirrah? my dear boy, I am heartily glad to see thee, my dear child, faith—captain Duretete, by the blood of the Mirabells, I'm your's; well, my lads, ye look bravely, faith. Bob, hast got any money left?

Mir. Not a farthing, sir.

Old Mir. Why, then I won't gi' thee a souse.

Mir. I did but jest, here's ten pistoles.

Old Mir. Why, then here's ten more; I love to be charitable to those, that don't want it: well, and how d'ye like Italy, my boy?

Mir. Oh, the garden of the world, sir; Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and a thousand others—all fine.

Old Mir. Aye, say you so! and, they say, that Chiari is very fine, too.

Dur. Indifferent, sir, very indifferent; a very scurvy air, the most unwholesome to a French constitution in the world.

Mir. Pshaw, nothing on't; these rascally Gazeteers have misinformed you.

Old Mir. Misinformed me! Oons, sir, were not we beaten there?

Mir. Beaten, sir! the French beaten!

Old Mir. Why, how was it, pray, sweet sir?

Mir. Sir, the captain will tell you.

Dur. No, sir, your son will tell you.

Mir. The captain was in the action, sir.

Dur. Your son saw more than I, sir, for he was a looker on.

Old Mir. Confound you both, for a brace of cowards! here are no Germans to over-hear you: why don't ye tell me how it was?

Mir. Why, then, you must know, that we marched up a body of the finest, bravest, well-dressed fellows in the universe; our commanders at the head of us, all lace and feather, like so many beaux at a ball—I don't believe there was a man of them but could dance a charmèr, morbleau.

Old Mir. Dance! very well, pretty fellows, faith!

Mir. We capered up to their very trenches, and there saw peeping over a parcel of scarecrow, olive-coloured gun-powder fellows, as ugly as the devil.

Dur. 'Egad, I shall never forget the looks of them, while I have breath to fetch.

Mir. They were so civil, indeed, as to welcome us with their cannon; but, for the rest, we found them such unmannerly, rude, unsociable dogs, that we grew tired of their company, and so we e'en danced back again.

Old Mir. And did ye all come back?

Mir. No, two or three thousand of us staid behind.

Old Mir. Why, Bob, why?

Mir. Pshaw—because they could not come that night. But come, sir, we were talking of something else; pray, how does your lovely charge, the fair Oriana?

Old Mir. Ripe, sir, just ripe: you'll find it better engaging with her than with the Germans, let me tell you. And what would you say, my young Mars, if I had a Venus for thee, too?—Come, Bob, your apartment is ready, and pray let your friend be my guest, too; you shall command the house between ye, and I'll be as merry as the best of you.

Mir. Bravely said, father!

Let misers bend their age with niggard cares,
And starve themselves to pamper hungry heirs;
Who, living, stint their sons what youth may crave,
And make them revel o'er a father's grave.
The stock on which I grew does still dispense
Its genial sap into the blooming branch;
The fruit, he knows, from his own root is grown,
And, therefore, soothes those passions once his own.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—OLD MIRABELL'S house.

Enter ORIANA and BISARRE.

Bis. AND you love this young rake, d'ye?

Ori. Yes.

Bis. In spite of all his ill usage?

Ori. I can't help it.

Bis. What's the matter with ye?

Ori. Pshaw!

Bis. Um! before that any young, lying, swearing, flattering, rakehell fellow should play such tricks with me, I would wear my teeth to the stumps with lime and chalk. O, the devil take all your Cassandras and Cleopatras for me!—Prithee, mind your airs, modes, and fashions; your stays, gowns, and furbelows. Hark'e, my dear, have you got home your furbelowed smocks yet?

Ori. Prithee, be quiet, Bizarre; you know I can be as mad as you, when this Mirabell is out of my head.

Bis. Pshaw! would he were out, or in, or some way, to make you easy. I warrant, now, you'll play the fool, when he comes, and say you love him; eh!

Ori. Most certainly—I can't dissemble, Bizarre: besides, 'tis past that, we're contracted.

Bis. Contracted! alack-a-day, poor thing!—What, have you changed rings, or broken an old broad-piece between you! Hark'e, child, han't you broke something else between ye?

Ori. No, no, I can assure you.

Bis. Then, what d'ye whine for? Whilst I kept that in my power, I would make a fool of any fellow in France. Well, I must confess, I do love a little coquetting with all my heart! my business should be to break gold with my lover one hour, and crack my promise the next; he should find me one day with a prayer-book in my hand, and with a play-book another. He should have my consent to buy the wedding-ring, and the next moment would I laugh in his face.

Ori. O, my dear! were there no greater tie upon my heart, than there is upon my conscience,

I would soon throw the contract out of doors; but the mischief on't is, I am so fond of being tied, that I am forced to be just, and the strength of my passion keeps down the inclination of my sex. But here's the old gentleman.

Enter OLD MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Where's my wenches? where's my two little girls? Eh? Have a care, look to yourselves; faith, they're a coming, the travellers are a coming. Well, which of you two will be my daughter-in-law, now? Bizarre, Bizarre, what say you, mad-cap? Mirabell is a pure wild fellow.

Bis. I like him the worse.

Old Mir. You lie, hussey, you like him the better, indeed you do: What say you, my t'other little filbert? eh?

Ori. I suppose the gentleman will chuse for himself, sir.

Old Mir. Why, that's discreetly said; and so he shall.

Enter MIRABELL and DURETETE. They salute the ladies.

Hark'e, Bob, you shall marry one of these girls, sirrah.

Mir. Sir, I'll marry them both, if you please.

Bis. [Aside.] He'll find that one may serve his turn.

Old Mir. Both! Why, you young dog, d'ye banter me? Come, sir, take your choice. Duretete, you shall have your choice, too; but Robin shall chuse first. Come, sir, begin.

Mir. Well, I an't the first son, that has made his father's dwelling a bawdy house—let me see.

Old Mir. Well! which d'ye like?

Mir. Both.

Old Mir. But which will you marry?

Mir. Neither.

Old Mir. Neither! Don't make me angry now, Bob; pray don't make me angry. Look'e, sirrah, if I don't dance at your wedding to-morrow, I shall be very glad to cry at your grave.

Mir. That's a bull, father,

Old Mir. A bull! Why, how now, ungrateful sir! did I make thee a man, that thou shouldst make me a beast?

Mir. Your pardon, sir. I only meant your expression.

Old Mir. Hark'e, Bob, learn better manners to your father before strangers; I wont be angry this time. But Oons, if ever you do't again, you rascal—remember what I say.

Mir. Pshaw! what does the old fellow mean by mewing me up here with a couple of green girls? Come, Duretete, will you go?

Ori. I hope, Mr Mirabell, you han't forgot.—

Mir. No, no, madam, I han't forgot, I have brought you a thousand Italian curiosities; I'll assure you, madam, as far as a hundred pistoles would reach, I han't forgot the least circumstance.

Ori. Sir, you misunderstand me.

Mir. Odso, the relics, madam, from Rome. I do remember, now, you made a vow of chastity before my departure; a vow of chastity, or something like it—was it not, madam?

Ori. O, sir, I'm answered at present.

[Exit ORIANA.]

Mir. She was coming full mouth upon me with her contract—Would I might dispatch t'other!

Dur. Mirabell—that lady there, observe her, she's wondrous pretty, faith, and seems to have but few words: I like her mainly; speak to her, man; prithee speak to her.

Mir. Madam, here's a gentleman, who declares—

Dur. Madam, don't believe him, I declare nothing—What the devil do you mean, man?

Mir. He says, madam, that you are as beautiful as an angel.

Dur. He tells a damned lie, madam; I say no such thing: Are you mad, Mirabell? Why, I shall drop down with shame.

Mir. And so, madam, not doubting but your ladyship may like him as well as he does you, I think it proper to leave you together.

[Going, DURETETE holds him.]

Dur. Hold, hold—Why, Mirabell, friend, sure you wont be so barbarous as to leave me alone. Prithee, speak to her for yourself, as it were. Lord, lord, that a Frenchman should want impudence!

Mir. You look mighty demure, madam—She's deaf, captain.

Dur. I had much rather have her dumb.

Mir. The gravity of your air, madam, promises some extraordinary fruits from your study, which moves us with curiosity to inquire the subject of your ladyship's contemplation. Not a word!

Dur. I hope in the lord she's speechless! if she be, she's mine this moment. Mirabell, d'ye think a woman's silence can be natural?

Bis. But the forms, that logicians introduce, and which proceed from simple enumeration, are dubitable, and proceed only upon admittance—

Mir. Hoyty toyty! what a plague have we here? Plato in petticoats.

Dur. Ay, ay, let her go on, man; she talks in my own mother-tongue.

Bis. 'Tis exposed to invalidity from a contradictory instance; looks only upon common operations; and is infinite in its termination.

Mir. Rare pedantry!

Dur. Axioms! Axioms! Self-evident principles.

Bis. Then, the ideas wherewith the mind is pre-occupate—O gentlemen, I hope you'll pardon my cogitation; I was involved in a profound point of philosophy; but I shall discuss it somewhere else, being satisfied that the subject is not agreeable to your sparks, that profess the vanity of the times. [Exit.]

Mir. Go thy way, good wife Bias: do you hear, Duretete? Dost hear this starched piece of austerity?

Dur. She's mine, man; she's mine: My own talent to a T. I'll match her in dialects, faith. I was seven years at the university, man, nursed up with Barbara, Celarunt, Darii, Ferio, Baralipon. Did you ever know, man, that 'twas metaphysics made me an ass? It was, faith. Had she talked a word of singing, dancing, plays, fashions, or the like, I had foundered at the first step; but as she is—Mirabell, wish me joy.

Mir. You don't mean marriage, I hope.

Dur. No, no, I am a man of more honour.

Mir. Bravely resolved, captain. Now, for thy credit, warm me this frozen snow-ball! 'twill be a conquest above the Alps.

Dur. But will you promise to be always near me?

Mir. Upon all occasions, never fear.

Dur. Why, then, you shall see me in two moments make an induction from my love to her hand, from her hand to her mouth, from her mouth to her heart, and so conclude in her bed, categorematic. [Exit.]

Mir. Now the game begins, and my fool is entered. But here comes one to spoil my sport; now shall I be teased to death with this old fashioned contract. I should love her, too, if I might do it my own way; but she'll do nothing without witnesses forsooth. I wonder women can be so immodest.

Enter ORIANA.

Well, madam, why d'ye follow me?

Ori. Well, sir, why do you shun me?

Mir. 'Tis my humour, madam, and I'm naturally swayed by inclination.

Ori. Have you forgot our contract, sir?

Mir. All I remember of that contract is, that it was made some three years ago, and that's enough in conscience to forget the rest on't.

Ori. 'Tis sufficient, sir, to recollect the passing of it; for in that circumstance, I presume, lies the force of the obligation.

Mir. Obligations, madam, that are forced upon the will, are no tie upon the conscience. I was a slave to my passion, when I passed the instrument; but the recovery of my freedom makes the contract void.

Ori. Sir, you can't make that a compulsion, which was your own choice; besides, sir, a subjection to your own desires has not the virtue of a forcible constraint: And you will find, sir, that, to plead your passion for the killing a man, will hardly exempt you from the justice of the punishment.

Mir. And so, madam, you make the sin of murder and the crime of a contract the very same, because hanging and matrimony are so much alike?

Ori. Come, Mr Mirabell, these expressions I expected from the raillery of your humour; but I hope for very different sentiments from your honour and generosity.

Mir. Look'e, madam; as for my generosity, 'tis at your service, with all my heart: I'll keep you a coach and six horses, if you please, only permit me to keep my honour to myself; for I can assure you, madam, that the thing called honour is a circumstance absolutely unnecessary in a natural correspondence between male and female, and he's a mad-man, that lays it out, considering its scarcity, upon any such trivial occasions. There's honour required of us by our friends, and honour due to our enemies, and they return it to us again; but I never heard of a man that left but an inch of his honour in a woman's keeping, that could ever get the least account on't—Consider, madam, you have no such thing among ye, and 'tis a main point of policy to keep no faith with reprobates—thou art a pretty little reprobate, and so get thee about thy business.

Ori. Well, sir, even all this I will allow to the gaiety of your temper; your travels have improved your talent of talking; but they are not of force, I hope, to impair your morals.

Mir. Morals! Why, there 'tis again now—I tell thee, child, there is not the least occasion for morals in any business between you and I—Don't you know, that of all commerce in the world, there is no such cozenage and deceit as in the traffic between man and woman? we study all our lives long how to put tricks upon one another—What is your business, now, from the time you throw away your artificial babies, but how to get natural ones with the most advantage! No fowler lays abroad more nets for his game, nor a hunter for his prey, than you do to catch poor innocent men—Why do you sit three or four hours at your toilet in a morning? only with a villainous design to make some poor fellow a fool before night. What are your languishing looks, your studied air and affectations, but so many baits and devices to delude men out of their dear liberty and freedom? What d'ye sigh for? What d'ye weep for? What d'ye pray for? Why, for a husband: That is, you implore Providence to assist you in the just and pious design of making the wisest of his creatures a fool, and the head of the creation a slave.

Ori. Sir, I am proud of my power, and am resolved to use it.

Mir. Hold, hold, madam, not so fast—As you have variety of vanities to make coxcombs of us; so, we have vows, oaths, and protestations, of all sorts and sizes, to make fools of you. As you are very strange and whimsical creatures, so we are allowed as unaccountable ways of managing you. And this, in short, my dear creature, is our present condition. I have sworn and lied briskly to gain my ends of you: your ladyship has patched and painted violently, to gain your ends of me—But, since we are both disappointed, let us make a drawn battle, and part clear on both sides.

Ori. With all my heart, sir; give me up my contract, and I'll never see your face again.

Mir. Indeed I won't, child.

Ori. What, sir, neither do one nor t'other?

Mir. No, you shall die a maid, unless you please to be otherwise upon my terms.

Ori. What do you intend by this, sir?

Mir. Why, to starve you into compliance—look'e, you shall never marry any man; and you had as good let me do you a kindness as a stranger.

Ori. Sir, you're a——

Mir. What am I, mistress?

Ori. A villain, sir!

Mir. I'm glad on't—I never knew an honest fellow in my life, but was a villain upon these occasions—Hav'n't you drawn yourself into a very pretty dilemma? Ha, ha, ha! the poor lady has made a vow of virginity, when she thought of making a vow for the contrary. Was ever poor woman so cheated into chastity?

Ori. Sir, my fortune is equal to yours, my friends as powerful, and both shall be put to the test, to do me justice.

Mir. What! you'll force me to marry you, will ye?

Ori. Sir, the law shall.

Mir. But the law can't force me to do any thing else, can it?

Ori. Pshaw! I despise thee—monster.

Mir. Kiss and be friends, then—Don't cry, child, and you shall have your sugar-plumb—Come, madam, d'ye think I could be so unreasonable as to make you fast all your life long? No, I did but jest, you shall have your liberty; here, take your contract, and give me mine.

Ori. No, I won't.

Mir. Eh! What, is the girl a fool?

Ori. No, sir, you shall find me cunning enough to do myself justice; and since I must—not depend upon your love, I'll be revenged, and force you to marry me out of spite.

Mir. Then I'll beat thee out of spite; and make a most confounded husband.

Ori. O sir, I shall match ye: A good husband makes a good wife at any time.

Mir. I'll rattle down your china about your ears.

Ori. And I'll rattle about the city to run you in debt for more.

Mir. Your face-mending toilet shall fly out of the window.

Ori. And your face-mending periwig shall fly after it.

Mir. I'll tear the furbelow off your clothes; and when you swoon for vexation, you shan't have a penny to buy a bottle of hartshorn.

Ori. And you, sir, shall have hartshorn in abundance.

Mir. I'll keep as many mistresses as I have coach-horses.

Ori. And I'll keep as many gallants as you have grooms.

Mir. I'll lie with your woman before your face.

Ori. Have a care of your valet behind your back.

Mir. But, sweet madam, there is such a thing as a divorce.

Ori. But, sweet sir, there is such a thing as alimony; so divorce on, and spare not. [Exit.]

Mir. Ay, that separate maintenance is the devil—there's their refuge—o' my conscience, one would take cuckoldom for a meritorious action, because the women are so handsomely rewarded for't! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A large parlour in the same house.

Enter DURETETE and PETIT.

Dur. And she's mighty peevish, you say?

Pet. O sir, she has a tongue as long as my leg, and talks so crabbedly, you would think she always spoke Welsh.

Dur. That's an odd language, methinks, for her philosophy.

Pet. But sometimes she will sit you half a day without speaking a word, and talk oracles all the while, by the wrinkles of her forehead, and the motions of her eye-brows.

Dur. Nay, I shall match her in philosophical ogles, faith; that's my talent: I can talk best, you must know, when I say nothing.

Pet. But d'ye ever laugh, sir?

Dur. Laugh! Wou't she endure laughing?

Pet. Why, she's a eritic, sir; she hates a jest, for fear it should please her; and nothing keeps her in humour but what gives her the spleen—And then for logic, and all that, you know—

Dur. Ay, ay, I'm prepared; I have been practising hard words, and no sense, this hour to entertain her.

Pet. Then place yourself behind this screen, that you may have a view of her behaviour before you begin.

Dur. I long to engage her, lest I should forget my lesson.

Pet. Here she comes, sir; I must fly.

[Exit PETIT, and DURETETE stands peeping behind the curtain.]

Enter BISARRE and Maid.

Bis. [with a book.] Pshaw, hang books! they sour our temper, spoil our eyes, and ruin our complexions. [Throws away the book.]

Dur. Eh! The devil such a word, there is in all Aristotle.

Bis. Come, wench; let's be free, call in the fiddle, there's nobody near us.

Enter Fiddler.

Dur. Would to the Lord there was not!

Bis. Here, friend, a minuet! quicker time; ha! would we had a man or two!

Dur. [Stealing away.] You shall have the devil sooner, my dear dancing philosopher.

Bis. Uds my life!—Here's one.

[Runs to DUR. and hales him back.]

Dur. Is all my learned preparation come to this?

Bis. Come, sir, don't be ashamed, that's my good boy—you're very welcome, we wanted such a one—Come, strike up—I know you dance well, sir, you're finely shaped for't—Come, come, sir; quick, quick, you miss the time else.

Dur. But, madam, I come to talk with you.

Bis. Ay, ay, talk as you dance; talk as you dance; come.

Dur. But we were talking of Dialectics.

Bis. Hang Dialectics—Mind the time—quicker, sirrah, [To the Fiddler.] Come—and how d'ye find yourself now, sir?

Dur. In a fine breathing sweat, doctor.

Bis. All the better, patient, all the better;—Come, sir; sing now, sing, I know you sing well; I see you have a singing face; a heavy, dull, sonata face.

Dur. Who, I sing?

Bis. O you're modest, sir—but come, sit down, closer, closer. Here, a bottle of wine—Come, sir, fa, la, lay; sing, sir.

Dur. But, madam, I came to talk with you.

Bis. O sir, you shall drink first. Come, fill me a bumper—here, sir, bless the king.

Dur. Would I were out of his dominions!—By this light, she'll make me drunk, too.

Bis. O pardon me, sir, you shall do me right; fill it higher.—Now, sir, can you drink a health under your leg?

Dur. Rare philosophy that, faith!

Bis. Come, off with it to the bottom.—Now, how d'ye like me, sir?

Dur. O, mighty well, madam.

Bis. You see how a woman's fancy varies; sometimes splenetic and heavy, then gay and frolicsome.—And how d'ye like the humour?

Dur. Good madam, let me sit down to answer you, for I am heartily tired.

Bis. Fy upon't! a young man, and tired! up, for shame, and walk about, action becomes us—a little faster, sir—What d'ye think now of my lady La Pal, and lady Coquet, the duke's fair daughter? Ha! Are they not brisk lasses? Then, there is black Mrs Bellair, and brown Mrs Bellface.

Dur. They are all strangers to me, madam.

Bis. But let me tell you, sir, that brown is not always despicable—O lard, sir, if young Mrs Bagatell had kept herself single 'till this time o' day, what a beauty there had been! And then, you know, the charming Mrs Monkeylove, the fair gem of St Germain's.

Dur. Upon my soul, I don't.

Bis. And then you must have heard of the English beau, Spleenamore, how unlike a gentleman—

Dur. Hey—not a syllable on't, as I hope to be saved, madam.

Bis. No! Why, then, play me a jig. Come, sir.

Dur. By this light I cannot; faith, madam, I have sprained my leg.

Bis. Then sit you down, sir; and now tell me what's your business with me? What's your errand? Quick, quick, dispatch—Odso, may be you are some gentleman's servant, that has brought me a letter, or a haunch of venison.

Dur. 'Sdeath, madam, do I look like a carrier?

Bis. O, cry you mercy! I saw you just now; I mistook you, upon my word: You are one of the travelling gentlemen—and pray, sir, how do all our impudent friends in Italy?

Dur. Madam, I came to wait on you with a more serious intention than your entertainment has answered.

Bis. Sir, your intention of waiting on me was the greatest affront imaginable, howe'er your expressions may turn it to a compliment: Your visit, sir, was intended as a prologue to a very scurvy play, of which Mr Mirabell and you so handsomely laid the plot.—Marry! No, no, I'm a man of more honour. Where's your honour? Where's your courage now? Ads my life, sir, I have a great mind to kick you.—Go, go to your fellow-rake now; rail at my sex, and get drunk for vexation, and write a lampoon—But I must have you to know, sir, that my reputation is above the scandal of a libel; my virtue is sufficiently approved to those, whose opinion is my interest: And, for the rest, let them talk what they will; for when I please I'll be what I please, in spite of you and all mankind; and so, my dear man of honour, if you be tired, con over this lesson, and sit there till I come to you. [Runs off.]

Dur. Tum ti dum. [Sings] Ha, ha, ha! Ads my life, I have a great mind to kick you!—Oons and confusion! [Starts up] Was ever man so abused?—Ay, Mirabell set me on.

Enter PETIT.

Pet. Well, sir, how d'ye find yourself?

Dur. You son of a nine-ey'd whore, d'ye come to abuse me? I'll kick you with a vengeance, you dog! [PETIT runs off, and DUR. after him.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

Enter OLD and YOUNG MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Bob, come hither, Bob.

Mir. Your pleasure, sir?

Old Mir. Are not you a great rogue, sirrah?

Mir. That's a little out of my comprehension, sir; for I've heard say, that I resemble my father.

Old Mir. Your father is your very humble slave—I tell thee what, child, thou art a very pretty fellow, and I love thee heartily; and a very great villain, and I hate thee mortally.

Mir. Villain, sir! Then, I must be a very impudent one, for I can't recollect any passage of my life, that I'm ashamed of.

Old Mir. Come hither, my dear friend; dost see this picture? [Shews him a little picture.]

Mir. Oriana's! Pshaw!

Old Mir. What, sir, won't you look upon't?—

Bob, dear Bob, prithee come hither now—Dost want any money, child?

Mir. No, sir.

Old Mir. Why, then, here's some for thee; come here, now—How can'st thou be so hard-hearted, an unnatural, unmannerly rascal (don't mistake me, child, I an't angry) as to abuse this tender, lovely, good-natured dear rogue?—Why, she sighs for thee, and cries for thee, pouts for thee, and snubs for thee; the poor little heart of it is like to burst—Come, my dear boy, be good-natured like your own father, be now—and then, see here, read this—the effigies of the lovely Oriana, with ten thousand pound to her portion—ten thousand pound, you dog; ten thousand pound, you rogue; how dare you refuse a lady with ten thousand pound, you impudent rascal?

Mir. Will you hear me speak, sir?

Old Mir. Hear you speak, sir! If you had ten thousand tongues, you could not out-talk ten thousand pound, sir.

Mir. Nay, sir, if you won't hear me, I'll be gone, sir! I'll take post for Italy this moment.

Old Mir. Ah! the fellow knows I won't part with him. Well, sir, what have you to say?

Mir. The universal reception, sir, that marriage has had in the world, is enough to fix it for a public good, and to draw every body into the common cause; but there are some constitutions, like some instruments, so peculiarly singular, that they make tolerable music by themselves, but never do well in a concert.

Old Mir. Why, this is reason, I must confess, but yet it is nonsense, too; for, though you should reason like an angel, if you argue yourself out of a good estate, you talk like a fool.

Mir. But, sir, if you bribe me into bondage with the riches of Cræsus, you leave me but a beggar for want of my liberty.

Old Mir. Was ever such a perverse fool heard? 'Sdeath, sir, why did I give you education? was it to dispute me out of my senses? Of what colour now is the head of this cane? You'll say 'tis white, and ten to one make me believe it, too—I thought that young fellows studied to get money.

Mir. No, sir, I have studied to despise it; my reading was not to make me rich, but happy, sir.

Old Mir. There he has me again, now! But, sir, did not I marry to oblige you?

Mir. To oblige me, sir! in what respect, pray?

Old Mir. Why, to bring you into the world, sir; was not that an obligation?

Mir. And, because I would have it still an obligation, I avoid marriage.

Old Mir. How is that, sir?

Mir. Because I would not curse the hour I was born.

Old Mir. Look'e, friend, you may persuade me out of my designs, but I'll command you out of yours; and though you may convince my reason that you are in the right, yet there is an old attendant of sixty-three, called positiveness, which you, nor all the wits in Italy, shall ever be able to shake: so, sir, you're a wit, and I'm a father; you may talk, but I'll be obeyed.

Mir. This it is to have the son a finer gentleman than the father! they first give us breeding that they don't understand, then they turn us out of doors because we are wiser than themselves. But I'm a little aforehand with the old gentleman. [Aside.] Sir, you have been pleased to settle a thousand pound sterling a-year upon me; in return of which, I have a very great honour for you and your family, and shall take care, that your only, and beloved son, shall do nothing to make him hate his father, or to hang himself. So, dear sir, I'm your very humble servant. [Runs off.]

Old Mir. Here, sirrah, rogue, Bob; villain!

Enter DUGARD.

Dug. Ah, sir, 'tis but what he deserves.

VOL. II.

Old Mir. 'Tis false, sir, he don't deserve it: what have you to say against my boy, sir?

Dug. I shall only repeat your own words.

Old Mir. What have you to do with my words? I have swallowed my words already; I have eaten them up, and how can you come at them, sir?

Dug. Very easily, sir: 'Tis but mentioning your injured ward, and you will throw them up again immediately.

Old Mir. Sir, your sister was a foolish young flirt to trust any such young, deceitful, rake-helly rogue, like him.

Dug. Cry you mercy, old gentleman! I thought we should have the words again.

Old Mir. And what then? 'Tis the way with young fellows to slight old gentlemen's words; you never mind them, when you ought.—I say, that Bob's an honest fellow, and who dares deny it?

Enter BISABRE.

Bis. That dare I, sir:—I say, that your son is a wild, foppish, whimsical, impertinent coxcomb; and, were I abused as this gentleman's sister is, I would make it an Italian quarrel, and poison the whole family.

Dug. Come, sir, 'tis no time for trifling; my sister is abused; you are made sensible of the affront, and your honour is concerned to see her redressed.

Old Mir. Look'e, Mr Dugard, good words go farthest. I will do your sister justice, but it must be after my own rate; nobody must abuse my son but myself. For, although Robin be a sad dog, yet he's nobody's puppy but my own.

Bis. Ay, that's my sweet-natured, kind, old gentleman—[Wheedling him.] We will be good, then, if you'll join with us in the plot.

Old Mir. Ah, you coaxing young baggage, what plot can you have to wheedle a fellow of sixty-three?

Bis. A plot that sixty-three is only good for; to bring other people together, sir; a Spanish plot, less dangerous than that of eighty-eight, and you must act the Spaniard 'cause your son will least suspect you; and, if he should, your authority protects you from a quarrel, to which Oriana is unwilling to expose her brother.

Old Mir. And what part will you act in the business, madam?

Bis. Myself, sir; my friend is grown a perfect changeling: these foolish hearts of ours spoil our heads presently; the fellows no sooner turn knaves, but we turn fools: But I am still myself, and he may expect the most severe usage from me, 'cause I neither love him, nor hate him.

[Exit Bis.]

Old Mir. Well said, Mrs Paradox! but, sir, who must open the matter to him?

Dug. Petit, sir, who is our engineer-general. And here he comes.

2 Y

Enter PETIT.

Pet. O sir, more discoveries; are all friends about us?

Dug. Ay, ay, speak freely.

Pet. You must know, sir—odd's my life, I'm out of breath; you must know, sir—you must know—

Old Mir. What the devil must we know, sir?

Pet. That I have [Pants and blows.] bribed, sir, bribed—your son's secretary of state.

Old Mir. Secretary of state!—who's that, for Heaven's sake?

Pet. His valet-de-chambre, sir. You must know, sir, that the intrigue lay folded up with his master's clothes, and when he went to dust the embroidered suit, the secret flew out of the right pocket of his coat, in a whole swarm of your crambo songs, short-footed odes, and long-legged pindarics.

Old Mir. Impossible!

Pet. Ah, sir, he has loved her all along; there was Oriana in every line—but he hates marriage: Now, sir, this plot will stir up his jealousy, and we shall know, by the strength of that, how to proceed farther.

Come, sir, lets about it with speed,

'Tis expedition gives our king the sway;

For expedition to the French give way;

Swift to attack, or swift—to run away.

[Exeunt.]

Enter MIRABELL and BISARRE, passing carelessly by one another.

Bis. [Aside.] I wonder what she can see in this fellow to like him?

Mir. [Aside.] I wonder what my friend can see in this girl to admire her?

Bis. [Aside.] A wild, foppish, extravagant rake-hell.

Mir. [Aside.] A light, whimsical, impertinent mad-cap.

Bis. Whom do you mean, sir?

Mir. Whom do you mean, madam?

Bis. A fellow, that has nothing left to re-establish him for a human creature, but a prudent resolution to hang himself.

Mir. There is a way, madam, to force me to that resolution.

Bis. I'll do it with all my heart.

Mir. Then, you must marry me.

Bis. Look'e, sir; don't think your ill manners to me shall excuse your ill usage of my friend; nor, by fixing a quarrel here, to divert my zeal for the absent; for, I'm resolved, nay, I come prepared, to make you a panegyric, that shall mortify your pride like any modern dedication.

Mir. And I, madam, like a true modern patron, shall hardly give you thanks for your trouble.

Bis. Come, sir, to let you see what little foundation you have for your dear sufficiency, I'll take you to pieces.

Mir. And what piece will you chuse?

Bis. Your heart, to be sure; because I should get presently rid on't; your courage I would give to a hector, your wit to a lewd play-maker, your honour to an attorney, your body to the physicians, and your soul to its master.

Mir. I had the oddest dream last night of the dutchess of Burgundy; methought the furbelows of her gown were pinned up so high behind, that I could not see her head for her tail.

Bis. The creature don't mind me! do you think, sir, that your humorous impertinence can divert me? No, sir, I'm above any pleasure that you can give, but that of seeing you miserable. And mark me, sir, my friend, my injured friend, shall yet be doubly happy, and you shall be a husband as much as the rites of marriage, and the breach of them, can make you.

[Here MIRABELL pulls out a Virgil, and reads to himself while she speaks.]

Mir. [Reading.] At regina dolos, (quis fallere possit amantem?)

Dissimulare etiam sperasti, perfide tantum [Very true.] Posse nefus.

By your favour, friend Virgil, 'twas but a rascally trick of your hero to forsake poor pug so inhumanly.

Bis. I don't know what to say to him. The devil—what's Virgil to us, sir?

Mir. Very much, madam, the most apropos in the world—for, what should I chop upon, but the very place, where the perjured rogue of a lover and the forsaken lady are battling it tooth and nail? Come, madam, spend your spirits no longer; we'll take an easier method: I'll be Aeneas now, and you shall be Dido, and we'll rail by book. Now for you, madam Dido.

Nec te noster amor, nec te data dextera quondam,

Nec moritura tenet crudeli funere Dido—

Ah, poor Dido!

[Looking at her.]

Bis. Rudeness, affronts, impatience! I could almost start out even to manhood, and want but a weapon as long as his to fight him upon the spot. What shall I say?

Mir. Now she rants.

Qua quibus anteferam? jam jam nec maxima Juno.

Bis. A man! No, the woman's birth was spirited away.

Mir. Right, right, madam; the very words.

Bis. And some pernicious elf left in the cradle with human shape, to palliate growing mischief.

[Both speak together, and raise their voices by degrees.]

Mir. Perfide, sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens

Caucasus, Hyrcanaeque admorunt ubera tigres.

Bis. Go, sir; fly to your midnight revels!

Mir. [Excellent.] I sequare Italiam ventis, pectore regna per undas.

Spero equidem mediis, si quid pia numina possunt. [Together again.]

Bis. Converse with imps of darkness of your make! your nature starts at justice, and shivers at the touch of virtue. Now, the devil take his impudence! he vexes me so, I don't know whether to cry or laugh at him.

Mir. Bravely performed, my dear Libyan! I'll write the tragedy of Dido, and you shall act the part: But you do nothing at all, unless you fret yourself into a fit; for here the poor lady is stifled with vapours, drops into the arms of her maids; and the cruel, barbarous, deceitful wanderer, is, in the very next line, called pious Æneas. There's authority for ye.

Sorry, indeed, Æneas stood

To see her in a pout;

But Jove himself, who ne'er thought good

To stay a second bout,

Commands him off, with all his crew,

And leaves poor Dy, as I leave you.

[Runs off.]

Bis. Go thy ways, for a dear, mad, deceitful, agreeable fellow. O' my conscience, I must excuse Oriana.

That lover soon his angry fair disarms,

Whose slighting pleasures, and whose faults are charms.

[Exit Bis.]

SCENE II.

Enter PETIT, runs about to every door, and knocks.

Pet. Mr Mirabell! Sir, where are you? no where to be found?

Enter MIRABELL.

Mir. What's the matter, Petit?

Pet. Most critically met—Ah, sir, that one, who has followed the game so long, and brought the poor hare just under his paws, should let a mongrel cur chop in, and run away with the puss!

Mir. If your worship can get out of your allegories, be pleased to tell me, in three words, what you mean.

Pet. Plain, plain, sir. Your mistress and mine is going to be married.

Mir. I believe you lie, sir.

Pet. Your humble servant, sir. [Going.]

Mir. Come hither, Petit. Married, say you?

Pet. No, sir, 'tis no matter; I only thought to do you a service, but I shall take care how I confer my favours for the future.

Mir. Sir, I beg ten thousand pardons.

[Bowing low.]

Pet. 'Tis enough, sir—I come to tell you, sir, that Oriana is this moment to be sacrificed; married past redemption.

Mir. I understand her—she'll take a husband out of spite to me; and then, out of love to me, she will make him a cuckold. 'Tis ordinary with women, to marry one person for the sake of another, and to throw themselves into the arms of one they hate, to secure their pleasure with the man they love. But who is the happy man?

Pet. A lord, sir.

Mir. I'm her ladyship's most humble servant; a train and a title, hey! Room for my lady's coach; a front-row in the box for her ladyship; lights, lights for her honour! Now must I be a constant attender at my lord's levee, to work my way to my lady's couchee—a countess, I presume, sir?

Pet. A Spanish count, sir, that Mr Dugard knew abroad, is come to Paris, saw your mistress yesterday, marries her to-day, and whips her into Spain to-morrow.

Mir. Ay, is it so? and must I follow my cuckold over the Pyrenees? Had she married within the precincts of a billet-doux, I would be the man to lead her to church; but, as it happens, I'll forbid the banns. Where is this mighty don?

Pet. Have a care, sir! he's a rough cross-grained piece, and there's no tampering with him; would you apply to Mr Dugard, or the lady herself, something might be done, for it is in despite to you, that the business is carried so hastily. Odso, sir, here he comes! I must be gone.

[Exit PET.]

Enter OLD MIRABELL, dressed in a Spanish habit, leading ORIANA.

Ori. Good, my lord, a nobler choice had better suited your lordship's merit. My person, rank, and circumstance, expose me as the public theme of raillery, and subject me so to injurious usage, my lord, that I can lay no claim to any part of your regard, except your pity.

Old Mir. Breathes he vital air, that dares presume,

With rude behaviour, to profane such excellence? Shew me the man—

And you shall see how my sudden revenge Shall fall upon the head of such presumption.

Is this thing one? [Strutting up to MIRABELL.]

Mir. Sir!

Ori. Good my lord.

Old Mir. If he, or any he!

Ori. Pray, my lord! the gentleman's a stranger.

Old Mir. O, your pardon, sir—but if you had—remember, sir—the lady now is mine, her injuries are mine; therefore, sir, you understand me—Come, madam.

[Leads ORIANA to the door, she goes off; MIRABELL runs to his father, and pulls him by the sleeve.]

Mir. Ecoutez, Monsieur le compte.

Old Mir. Your business, sir?

Mir. Boh!

Old Mir. Boh? What language is that, sir?

Mir. Spanish, my lord.

Old Mir. What d'ye mean?

Mir. This, sir. [Trips up his heels.]

Old Mir. A very concise quarrel, truly!—I'll bully him. Trinidade seigneur, give me fair play.

[Offering to rise.]

Mir. By all means, sir. [Takes away his sword.] Now, seigneur, where's that bombast look, and fustian face, your countship wore just now?

[Strikes him.]

Old Mir. The rogue quarrels well, very well: my own son right! But hold, sirrah, no more jesting; I'm your father, sir, your father!

Mir. My father! Then, by this light, I could find in my heart to pay thee. [Aside.] Is the fellow mad? Why, sure, sir, I han't frightened you out of your senses?

Old Mir. But you have, sir.

Mir. Then I'll beat them into you again.

[Offers to strike him.]

Old Mir. Why, rogue—Bob, dear Bob, don't you know me, child?

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! the fellow's downright distracted: Thou miracle of impudence! would'st thou make me believe, that such a grave gentleman as my father would go a masquerading thus? That a person of threescore and three would run about in a fool's coat, to disgrace himself and family? Why, you impudent villain, do you think I will suffer such an affront to pass upon my honoured father, my worthy father, my dear father? 'Sdeath, sir, mention my father but once again, and I'll send your soul to thy grandfather this minute!

[Offering to stab him.]

Old Mir. Well, well, I am not your father.

Mir. Why, then, sir, you are the saucy, hec-toring Spaniard, and I'll use you accordingly.

Old Mir. The devil take the Spaniards, sir! we have all got nothing but blows, since we began to take their part.

Enter DUGARD, ORIANA, MAID, and PETIT.
DUGARD runs to MIRABELL, the rest to the old gentleman.

Dug. Fy, fy, Mirabell, murder your father!

Mir. My father? what, is the whole family mad? Give me way, sir, I won't be held.

Old Mir. No? nor I neither; let me be gone, pray.

[Offering to go.]

Mir. My father!

Old Mir. Aye, you dog's face! I am your father, for I have bore as much for thee, as your mother ever did.

Mir. O ho! then this was a trick, it seems; a design, a contrivance, a stratagem—Oh! how my bones ache!

Old Mir. Your bones, sirrah, why yours?

Mir. Why, sir, han't I been beating my own flesh and blood all this while? Oh, madam—[To ORIANA.]—I wish your ladyship joy of your new dignity. Here was a contrivance indeed.

Pet. The contrivance was well enough, sir, for they imposed upon us all.

Mir. Well, my dear dulcinea, did your don Quixotte battle for you bravely? My father will answer for the force of my love.

Ori. Pray, sir, don't insult the misfortunes of your own creating.

Dug. My prudence will be counted cowardice, if I stand tamely now.—[Comes up between MIRABELL and his sister.]—Well, sir!

Mir. Well, sir! Do you take me for one of your tenants, sir, that you put on your landlord face at me?

Dug. On what presumption, sir, dare you assume thus?

[Draws.]

Old Mir. What's that to you, sir?

[Draws.]

Pet. Help! help! the lady faints.

[ORIANA falls into her maid's arms.]

Mir. Vapours! vapours! she'll come to herself: if it be an angry fit, a dram of assafoetida—if jealousy, hartshorn in water—if the mother, burnt feathers—if grief, ratifia—if it be strait stays, or corns, there's nothing like a dram of plain brandy.

Ori. Hold off! give me air—O my brother! would you preserve my life, endanger not your own; would you defend my reputation, leave it to itself; 'tis a dear vindication, that's purchased by the sword; for, though our champion proves victorious, yet our honour is wounded.

Old Mir. Aye, and your lover may be wounded, that's another thing. But I think you are pretty brisk again, my child.

Ori. Aye, sir, my indisposition was only a pretence to divert the quarrel; the capricious taste of your sex excuses this artifice in ours.

For often, when our chief perfections fail,
Our chief defects with foolish men prevail.

[Exit ORIANA.]

Pet. Come, Mr Dugard, take courage, there is a way still left to fetch him again.

Old Mir. Sir, I'll have no plot, that has any relation to Spain.

Dug. I scorn all artifice whatsoever; my sword shall do her justice.

Pet. Pretty justice, truly! Suppose you run him through the body, you run her through the heart at the same time.

Old Mir. And me through the head—rot your sword, sir, we'll have plots; come, Petit, let's hear.

Pet. What if she pretended to go into a nunnery, and so bring him about to declare himself?

Dug. That, I must confess, has a face.

Old Mir. A face! a face like an angel, sir.—Ad's my life, sir, 'tis the most beautiful plot in Christendom. We'll about it immediately.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—The Street.

Enter DURETETE and MIRABELL.

Dur. [In a passion.—And though I can't dance, nor sing, nor talk like you, yet I can fight; you know I can, sir.

Mir. I know thou canst, man.

Dur. 'Sdeath, sir, and I will: let me see the proudest man alive make a jest of me!

Mir. But I'll engage to make you amends.

Dur. Danced to death! baited like a bear! ridiculed! threatened to be kicked! confusion! sir, you set me on, and I will have satisfaction; all mankind will point at me.

Mir. [Aside.—I must give this thunderbolt some passage, or 'twill break upon my own head—look'e, Duretete, what do these gentlemen laugh at?

Enter two Gentlemen.

Dur. At me, to be sure—Sir, what made you laugh at me?

1 Gen. You're mistaken, sir; if we were merry, we had a private reason.

2 Gen. Sir, we don't know you.

Dur. Sir, I'll make you know me; mark and observe me, I won't be named; it sha'n't be mentioned, not even whispered, in your prayers at church. 'Sdeath, sir, d'ye smile?

1 Gen. Not I, upon my word.

Dur. Why, then, look grave as an owl in a barn, or a friar with his crown a shaving.

Mir. [Aside to the gentlemen.—Don't be bullied out of your humour, gentlemen; the fellow's mad; laugh at him, and I'll stand by you.

1 Gen. 'Egad, and so we will.

Both. Ha, ha, ha!

Dur. Very pretty.—[Draws.—She threatened to kick me. Aye, then, you dogs, I'll murder ye.

[Fights, and beats them off, MIRABELL runs over to his side.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! bravely done, Duretete! there you had him, noble captain; hey, they run, they run, Victoria, Victoria—Ha, ha, ha!—how happy am I in an excellent friend! tell me of your virtuosos, and men of sense! a parcel of sour-faced, splenetic rogues—a man of my thin constitution should never want a fool in his company: I don't affect your fine things that improve the understanding, but hearty laughing to fatten my carcase: and, in my conscience, a man of sense is as melancholy without a coxcomb, as a lion without a jackall; he hunts for our diversion, starts game for our spleen, and perfectly feeds us with pleasure.

I hate the man who makes acquaintance nice,
And still discreetly plagues me with advice;
Who moves by caution, and mature delays,
And must give reasons for whate'er he says.
The man, indeed, whose converse is so full,
Makes me attentive, but it makes me dull:
Give me the careless rogue, who never thinks,
That plays the fool as freely as he drinks.
Not a buffoon, who is buffoon by trade,
But one that nature, not his wants have made;
Who still is merry, but does ne'er design it;
And still is ridiculed, but ne'er can find it:
Who, when he's most in earnest, is the best;
And his most grave expression is a jest.

[Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Old MIRABELL'S house.

Enter Old MIRABELL and DUGARD.

Dug. THE lady abbess is my relation, and privy to the plot: your son has been there, but had no admittance beyond the privilege of the grate, and there my sister refused to see him. He went off more nettled at his repulse, than I thought his gaiety could admit.

Old Mir. Aye, aye, this nunnery will bring him about, I warrant ye.

Enter DURETETE.

Dur. Here, where are ye all? O! Mr Mirabell, you have done fine things for your posterity—and you, Mr Dugard, may come to answer this—I come to demand my friend at your hands; restore him, sir, or—

[To Old MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Restore him! what, d'ye think I have got him in my trunk, or my pocket!

Dur. Sir, he's mad, and you're the cause on't.

Old Mir. That may be; for I was as mad as he, when I begot him.

Dug. Mad, sir! what d'ye mean?

Dur. What do you mean, sir, by shutting up your sister yonder to talk like a parrot through a cage? Or a decoy-duck, to draw others into the snare? Your son, sir, because she has deserted him, he has forsaken the world; and, in three words, has—

Old Mir. Hanged himself!

Dur. The very same—turned friar.

Old Mir. You lie, sir, 'tis ten times worse.—Bob turned friar! Why should the fellow shave his foolish crown when the same razor may cut his throat?

Dur. If you have any command, or you any interest over him, lose not a minute: He has thrown himself into the next monastery, and has ordered me to pay off his servants, and discharge his equipage.

Old Mir. Let me alone to ferret him out; I'll sacrifice the abbot, if he receives him; I'll try whether the spiritual or the natural father has the most right to the child. But, dear captain, what has he done with his estate?

Dur. Settled it upon the church, sir.

Old Mir. The church! Nay, then the devil won't get him out of their clutches—Ten thousand livres a-year upon the church! 'Tis downright sacrilege—Come, gentlemen, all hands to work; for half that sum, one of these monasteries shall protect you a traitor from the law, a rebellious wife from her husband, and a disobedient son from his own father. [Exit OLD MIRABELL.]

Dug. But will you persuade me, that he is gone to a monastery?

Dur. Is your sister gone to the Filles Repenties? I tell you, sir, she's not fit for the society of repenting maids.

Dug. Why so, sir?

Dur. Because she's neither one nor the other; she's too old to be a maid, and too young to repent. [Exit; DUGARD after him.]

SCENE II.—The inside of a monastery; ORIANA in a nun's habit; BISARRE.

Ori. I hope, Bisarre, there is no harm in jesting with this religious habit.

Bis. To me, the greatest jest in the habit is taking it in earnest: I don't understand this imprisoning people with the keys of Paradise, nor the merit of that virtue, which comes by constraint. Besides, we may own to one another, that we are in the worst company when among ourselves; for our private thoughts run us into those desires, which our pride resists from the attack of the world; and, you may remember, the first woman met the devil when she retired from her man.

Ori. But I'm reconciled, methinks, to the mortification of a nunnery; because I fancy the habit becomes me.

Bis. A well-contrived mortification, truly, that makes a woman look ten times handsomer than she did before! Aye, my dear, were there any religion in becoming dress, our sex's devotion were rightly placed; for our toilets would do the work of the altar; we should all be canonized.

Ori. But don't you think there is a great deal of merit in dedicating a beautiful face and person to the service of religion?

Bis. Not half so much as devoting them to a pretty fellow: If our feminality had no business in this world, why was it sent hither? Let us dedicate our beautiful minds to the service of Heaven; and for our handsome persons, they become a box at the play, as well as a pew in the church.

Ori. But the vicissitudes of fortune, the inconsistency of man, with other disappointments of life, require some place of religion, for a refuge from their persecution.

Bis. Ha, ha, ha! and do you think there is any devotion in a fellow's going to church, when he takes it only for a sanctuary? Don't you know that religion consists in charity with all mankind? and that you should never think of being friends with Heaven, till you have quarrelled with all the world! Come, come, mind your business; Mirabell loves you; 'tis now plain, and hold him to't; give fresh orders that he shan't see you: We get more by hiding our faces sometimes, than by exposing them: a very mask, you see, whets desire; but a pair of keen eyes through an iron grate fire double upon them, with view and disguise. But I must be gone upon my own affairs; I have brought my captain about again.

Ori. But why will you trouble yourself with that coxcomb?

Bis. Because he is a coxcomb: had I not better have a lover like him, that I can make an ass of, than a lover like yours, to make a fool of me? [Knocking below.] A message from Mirabell, I'll lay my life. [She runs to the door.] Come hither, run: thou charming nun, come hither.

Ori. What's the news? [Runs to her.]

Bis. Don't you see who's below?

Ori. I see nobody but a friar.

Bis. Ah! Thou poor blind Cupid! O' my conscience, these hearts of ours spoil our heads instantly! the fellows no sooner turn knaves, than we turn fools. A friar! Don't you see a villainous genteel mein under that cloak of hypocrisy, the loose careless air of a tall rake-helly fellow!

Ori. As I live, Mirabell turned friar! I hope, in Heaven, he's not in earnest.

Bis. In earnest! Ha, ha, ha! are you in earnest? Now's your time; this disguise has he certainly taken for a passport, to get in and try your resolutions; stick to your habit, to be sure; treat him with disdain, rather than anger; for pride becomes us more than passion. Remember what I say, if you would yield to advantage, and hold on the attack; to draw him on, keep him off to be sure.

The cunning gamesters never gain too fast;
But lose at first, to win the more at last.

[Exit.]

Ori. His coming puts me into some ambiguity, I don't know how; I don't fear him, but I mistrust myself; would he were not come! yet I would not have him gone neither—I'm afraid to talk with him, but I love to see him though.

What a strange power has this fantastic fire,
That makes us dread even what we most desire!

Enter MIRABELL in a friar's habit.

Mir. Save you, sister—Your brother, young lady, having a regard for your soul's health, has sent me to prepare you for the sacred habit by confession.

Ori. That's false; the cloven foot already.—
[Aside.] My brother's care I own; and to you, sacred sir, I confess, that the great crying sin which I have long indulged, and now prepare to expiate, was love. My morning thoughts, my evening prayers, my daily musings, nightly cares, was love! my present peace, my future bliss, the joy of earth, and hopes of heaven, I all contemned for love!

Mir. She's downright mad in earnest! death and confusion, I have lost her! [Aside.] You confess your fault, madam, in such moving terms, that I could almost be in love with the sin.

Ori. Take care, sir; crimes, like virtues, are their own rewards; my chief delight became my only grief; he, in whose breast I thought my heart secure, turned robber, and despoiled the treasure that he kept.

Mir. Perhaps, that treasure he esteems so much, that, like the miser, though afraid to use it, he reserves it safe.

Ori. No, holy father: who can be miser in another's wealth, that's prodigal of his own? His heart was open, shared to all he knew; and what, alas, must then become of mine! But the same eyes, that drew his passion in, shall send it out in tears, to which now hear my vow.

Mir. [Discovering himself.] No, my fair angel! but let me repent; here, on my knees, behold the criminal, that vows repentance his. Ha! No concern upon her!

Ori. This turn is odd, and the time has been, that such a sudden change would have surprised me into some confusion.

Mir. Restore that happy time; for I am now returned to myself; for I want but pardon to deserve your favour, and here I'll fix till you relent and give it.

Ori. Grovelling, sordid man! why would you act a thing to make you kneel? monarch in your pleasures to be slave to your faults? Are all the conquests of your wandering sway, your wit, your humour, fortune, all reduced to the base cringing of a bended knee? Servile and poor! Pray Heaven this change be real! [Aside.]

Mir. I come not here to justify my fault but my submission; for though there be a meanness in this humble posture, 'tis nobler still to bend, when justice calls, than to resist conviction.

Ori. No more—thy oft repeated violated words reproach my weak belief; 'tis the severest calumny to hear thee speak; that humble posture, which once could raise, now mortifies my pride. How canst thou hope for pardon from one, that you affront by asking it?

Mir. [Rises.] In my own cause I'll plead no more; but give me leave to intercede for you against the hard injunctions of that habit, which, for my fault, you wear.

Ori. Surprising insolence! My greatest foe pretends to give me counsel; but I am too warm upon so cool a subject. My resolutions, sir, are fixed! but as our hearts were united with the ceremony of our eyes, so, I shall spare some tears to the separation. [Weeps.] That's all;—farewell.

Mir. And must I lose her? No. [Runs and catches her.] Since all my prayers are vain, I'll use the nobler argument of man, and force you to the justice you refuse; you're mine by pre-contract: And where's the vow so sacred to disannul another? I'll urge my love, your oath, and plead my cause 'gainst all monastic shifts upon the earth.

Ori. Unhand me, ravisher! Would you profane these holy walls with violence? Revenge for all my past disgrace now offers; thy life should answer this, would I provoke the law: urge me no farther, but be gone.

Mir. Inexorable woman! let me kneel again. [Kneels.]

Enter OLD MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Where, where's this counterfeit nun?

Ori. Madness! Confusion! I'm ruined!

Mir. What do I hear? [Puts on his hood] What did you say, sir?

Old Mir. I say she's a counterfeit, and you may be another for aught I know, sir; I have lost my child by these tricks, sir.

Mir. What tricks, sir!

Old Mir. By a pretended trick, sir. A contrivance to bring my son to reason, and it has made him stark mad; I have lost him and a thousand pounds a year.

Mir. [Discovering himself.] My dear father, I'm your most humble servant.

Old Mir. My dear boy, [Runs and kisses him.] Welcome ex inferis, my dear boy; 'tis all a trick; she's no more a nun than I am.

Mir. No!

Old Mir. The devil a bit.

Mir. Then, kiss me again, my dear dad, for the most happy news—And now, most venerable holy sister. [Kneels.]

Your mercy and your pardon I implore,

For the offence of asking it before.

Look'e, my dear counterfeiting nun, take my advice, be a nun in good earnest; women make the best nuns always, when they can't do otherwise. Ah, my dear father! there is a merit in your son's behaviour that you little think; the free deportment of such fellows as I, makes more ladies religious than all the pulpits in France.

Ori. O! sir, how unhappily have you destroyed what was so near perfection? He is the counterfeit, that has deceived you.

Old Mir. Ha! Look'e, sir, I recant; she is a nun.

Mir. Sir, your humble servant; then I'm a friar this moment.

Old Mir. Was ever an old fool so bantered by a brace of young ones! hang you both!

you're both counterfeits, and my plot's spoiled, that's all.

Ori. Shame and confusion, love, anger, and disappointment, will work my brain to madness.

[Takes off her habit. Exit.]

Mir. Ay, ay, throw by the rags; they have served a turn for us both, and they shall e'en go off together.

[Exit, throwing away the habit.]

SCENE III.—Changes to OLD MIRABELL'S house.

DURETETE with a letter.

Dur. [Reads] 'My rudeness was only a proof of your humour, which I have found so agreeable, that I own myself penitent, and willing to make any reparation upon your first appearance to

BISARRE.'

Mirabell swears she loves me, and this confirms it; then farewell gallantry, and welcome revenge; 'tis my turn now to be upon the sublime; I'll take her off, I warrant her.

Enter BISARRE.

Well, mistress, do you love me?

Bis. I hope, sir, you will pardon the modesty of—

Dur. Of what? of a dancing devil?—Do you love me, I say?

Bis. Perhaps I—

Dur. What?

Bis. Perhaps I do not.

Dur. Ha! abused again! Death, woman, I'll—

Bis. Hold, hold, sir; I do, I do!

Dur. Confirm it, then, by your obedience; stand there, and ogle me now, as if your heart, blood and soul, were like to fly out at your eyes—First, the direct surprise—[She looks full upon him.] Right; next the deux yeux par oblique. [She gives him the side glance.] Right; now depart, and languish. [She turns from him, and looks over her shoulder.] Very well; now sigh. [She sighs.] Now drop your fan on purpose. [She drops her fan.] Now take it up again: Come now, confess your faults; are not you a proud—say after me.

Bis. Proud.

Dur. Impertinent.

Bis. Impertinent.

Dur. Ridiculous.

Bis. Ridiculous.

Dur. Flirt.

Bis. Puppy.

Dur. Zoons! Woman, don't provoke me! we are alone, and you don't know but the devil may tempt me to do you a mischief; ask my pardon immediately.

Bis. I do, sir, I only mistook the word.

Dur. Cry, then; have you got e'er a handkerchief?

Bis. Yes, sir.

Dur. Cry, then, handsomely; cry like a queen in a tragedy.

[She pretending to cry, bursts out a laughing, and enter two ladies laughing.]

Bis. Ha, ha, ha!

Ladies both. Ha, ha, ha!

Dur. Hell broke loose upon me, and all the furies fluttered about my ears! Betrayed again?

Bis. That you are, upon my word, my dear captain; ha, ha, ha!

Dur. The lord deliver me!

1 Lady. What! Is this the mighty man with the bull-face, that comes to frighten ladies? I long to see him angry; come, begin.

Dur. Ah, madam, I'm the best natured fellow in the world.

2 Lady. A man! We're mistaken; a man has manners; the awkward creature is some tinkcr's trull in a periwig.

Bis. Come, ladies, let's examine him.

[They lay hold on him.]

Dur. Examine! the devil you will!

Bis. I'll lay my life, some great dairy-maid in man's clothes.

Dur. They will do't;—look'e, dear Christian women, pray, hear me!

Bis. Will you ever attempt a lady's honour again?

Dur. If you please to let me get away with my honour, I'll do any thing in the world.

Bis. Will you persuade your friend to marry mine?

Dur. O yes, to be sure.

Bis. And will you do the same by me?

Dur. Burn me if I do, if the coast be clear.

[Runs out.]

Bis. Ha, ha, ha! the visit, ladies, was critical for our diversions; we'll go make an end of our tea.

[Exit.]

Enter MIRABELL and OLD MIRABELL.

Mir. Your patience, sir; I tell you I won't marry; and, though you send all the bishops in France to persuade me, I shall never believe their doctrine against their practice.

Old Mir. But will you disobey your father, sir?

Mir. Would my father have his youthful son lie lazing here, bound to a wife, chained like a monkey, to make sport to a woman, subject to her whims, humours, longings, vapours, and caprices—to have her one day pleased, to-morrow peevish, the next day mad, the fourth rebellious; and nothing but this succession of impertinence for ages together! Be merciful, sir, to your own flesh and blood.

Old Mir. But, sir, did not I bear all this? why should not you?

Mir. Then, you think that marriage, like treason, should attain the whole body? pray, consider, sir, is it reasonable, because you throw yourself down from one story, that I must cast myself headlong from the garret window? You would compel me to that state, which I have heard you curse yourself, when my mother and you have battled it for a whole week together.

Old Mir. Never but once, you rogue, and that was when she longed for six Flanders mares: Ay, sir, then she was breeding of you, which shewed what an expensive dog I should have of you.

Enter PETIT.

Well, Petit, how does she now?

Pet. Mad, sir, con pompos—Ay, Mr Mirabell, you'll believe that I speak truth now, when I confess that I have told you hitherto nothing but lies; our jesting is come to a sad earnest; she's downright distracted.

Enter BISARRE.

Bis. Where is this mighty victor? The great exploit is done; go, triumph in the glory of your conquest, inhuman, barbarous man! O sir, (To the old gentleman.) your wretched ward has found a tender guardian of you! where her young innocence expected protection, here has she found her ruin.

Old Mir. Ay, the fault is mine; for I believe that rogue won't marry, for fear of begetting such another disobedient son as his father did. I have done all I can, madam, and now can do no more than run mad for company. [Cries.]

Enter DUGARD, with his sword drawn.

Dug. Away! Revenge, revenge!

Old Mir. Patience, patience, sir. [OLD MIR. holds him.] Bob, draw. [Aside.]

Dug. Patience! The coward's virtue, and the brave man's failing, when thus provoked—Villain!

Mir. Your sister's frenzy shall excuse your madness; and to shew my concern for what she suffers, I'll bear the villain from her brother—Put up your anger with your sword; I have a heart like your's, that swells at an affront received, but melts at an injury given: and if the lovely Oriana's grief be such a moving scene, 'twill find a part within this breast, perhaps as tender as a brother's.

Dug. To prove that soft compassion for her grief, endeavour to remove it—There, there, behold an object that's infective; I cannot view her, but I am as mad as she: [Enter ORIANA, held by two maids, who put her in a chair.] A sister, that my dying parents left, with their last words and blessing, to my care. Sister, dearest sister!

Old Mir. Ay, poor child, poor child, d'ye know me?

Ori. You! you are Amadis de Gaul, sir—Oh! oh my heart! Were you never in love, fair lady? And do you never dream of flowers and gardens?—I dream of walking fires, and tall, gigantic sights. Take heed, it comes now—What's that? Pray stand away: I have seen that face suer. How light my head is!

Mir. What piercing charms has beauty, evne in madness! these sudden starts of undigested words shoot through my soul, with more persuasive force than all the studied art of laboured eloquence—Come, madam, try to repose a little.

Ori. I cannot; for I must be up to go to church; and I must dress me, put on my new gown, and be so fine, to meet my love. Hey ho!—Will you not tell me where my heart lies buried?

Mir. My very soul is touched—Your hand, my fair!

Ori. How soft and gentle you feel! I'll tell your fortune, friend.

Mir. How she stares upon me!

Ori. You have a flattering face; but 'tis a fine one—I warrant you have five hundred mistresses—Ay, to be sure, a mistress for every guinea in his pocket—Will you pray for me? I shall die to-morrow—And will you ring my passing-bell?

Mir. O woman, woman, of artifice created! whose nature, even distracted, has a cunning: In vain let man his sense, his learning boast, when woman's madness overrules his reason—Do you know me, injured creature?

Ori. No—but you shall be my intimate acquaintance—in the grave. [Weeps.]

Mir. Oh tears, I must believe you! sure there's a kind of sympathy in madness; for even I, obstinate as I am, do feel my soul so tossed with storms of passion, that I could cry for help as well as she— [Wipes his eyes.]

Ori. What, have you lost your lover? No, you mock me; I'll go home and pray.

Mir. Stay, my fair innocence! and hear me own my love so loud, that I may call your senses to their place, restore them to their charming, happy functions, and reinstate myself into your favour.

Bis. Let her alone, sir, 'tis all too late; she trembles; hold her; her fits grow stronger by her talking; don't trouble her; she don't know you, sir.

Old Mir. Not know him! what then? she loves to see him for all that.

Enter DURETETE.

Dur. Where are you all? What the devil! melancholy, and I here! Are ye sad, and such a ridiculous subject, such a very good jest among you as I am?

Mir. Away with this impertinence! this is no place for bagatelle: I have murdered my honour, destroyed a lady, and my desire of reparation is come at length too late: See, there.

Dur. What ails her?

Mir. Alas! she's mad.

Dur. Mad! dost wonder at that? By this light, they're all so; they're cozening mad; they're brawling mad; they're proud mad; I just now came from a whole world of mad women, that had almost—What, is she dead?

Mir. Dead! Heavens forbid!

Dur. Heavens further it! for 'till they be as cold as a key, there's no trusting them; you're never sure that a woman's in earnest, till she is laid in her coffin. Shall I talk to her? Are you mad, mistress?

Bis. What's that to you, sir?

Dur. Oons, madam, are you there? [Runs off.]

Mir. Away, thou wild buffoon! how poor and mean this humour now appears! His follies and my own, I here disclaim; this lady's frenzy has restored my senses; and was she perfect now, as once she was, (before you all I speak it) she should be mine; and, as she is, my tears and prayers shall wed her.

Dug. How happy had this declaration been some hours ago!

Bis. Sir, she beckons to you, and waves us to go off; come, come, let's leave them.

[Ereunt omnes, but MIR. and ORI.]

Ori. Oh, sir!

Mir. Speak, my charming angel! if your dear senses have regained their order; speak, fair, and bless me with the news.

Ori. First, let me bless the cunning of my sex, that happy counterfeited frenzy, that has restored to my poor labouring breast the dearest, best beloved of men.

Mir. Tune, all ye spheres, your instruments of joy, and carry round your spacious orbs, the happy sound of Oriana's health! her soul, whose harmony was next to your's, is now in tune again; the counterfeiting fair has played the fool—

She was so mad to counterfeit for me;

I was so mad to pawn my liberty:

But now we both are well, and both are free. }

Ori. How, sir, free!

Mir. As air, my dear Bedlamite! what, marry a lunatic! Look ye, my dear, you have counterfeited madness so very well this bout, that you'll be apt to play the fool all your life long—Here, gentlemen.

Ori. Monster! you won't disgrace me?

Mir. O' my faith, but I will; here, come in, gentlemen—A miracle! a miracle! the woman's dispossessed; the devil's vanished.

Enter OLD MIRABELL and DUGARD.

Old Mir. Bless us, was she possessed?

Mir. With the worst of demons, sir, a marriage-devil, a horrid devil! Mr Dugard, don't be surprized; I promised my endeavours to cure your sister; no mad doctor in Christendom could have done it more effectually. Take her into your charge; and have a care she don't relapse; if she should, employ me not again, for I am no more infallible than others of the faculty; I do cure sometimes.

Ori. Your remedy, most barbarous man! will prove the greatest poison to my health; for though my former frenzy was but counterfeit, I now shall run into a real madness.

[Exit; OLD MIR. after.]

Dug. This was a turn beyond my knowledge; I'm so confused, I know not how to resent it.

[Exit.]

Mir. What a dangerous precipice have I 'scaped! Was not I just now upon the brink of destruction?

Enter DURETETE.

Oh, my friend, let me run into thy bosom! no lark, escaped from the devouring pounces of a hawk, quakes with more dismal apprehension.

Dur. The matter, man!

Mir. Marriage! hanging! I was just at the gallows-foot, the running noose about my neck, and the cart wheeling from me—Oh—I shan't be myself this month again.

Dur. Did not I tell you so? They are all alike, saints or devils: their counterfeiting can't be reputed a deceit, for 'tis the nature of the sex, not their contrivance.

Mir. Ay, ay; there's no living here with security; this house is so full of stratagem and design; that I must abroad again.

Dur. With all my heart; I'll bear thee company, my lad; I'll meet you at the play; and we'll set out for Italy to-morrow morning.

Mir. A match; I'll go pay my compliment of leave to my father presently.

Dur. I'm afraid he'll stop you.

Mir. What, pretend a command over me, after his settlement of a thousand pounds a-year upon me! No, no, he has passed away his authority with the conveyance; the will of a living father is chiefly obeyed for the sake of the dying one:—

What makes the world attend and crowd the great?

Hopes, interest, and dependence, make their state:

Behold the anti-chamber filled with beaux,
A horse's levee filled with courtly crows.

Though grumbling subjects make the crown their sport,

Hopes of a place will bring the sparks to court.
Dependence even a father's sway secures,
For though the son rebels, the heir is yours.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—The street before the Playhouse.

Enter MIRABELL and DURETETE as coming from the play.

Dur. How d'ye like this play?

Mir. I liked the company; the lady, the rich beauty in the front-box, had my attention: These impudent poets bring the ladies together to support them, and to kill every body else.

*For deaths upon the stage the ladies cry,
But ne'er mind us, that in the audience die:
The poet's hero should not move their pain,
But they should weep for those their eyes have slain.*

Dur. Hoyty, toyty! did Phillis inspire you with all this?

Mir. Ten times more; the playhouse is the element of poetry, because the region of beauty: the ladies, methinks, have a more inspiring triumphant air in the boxes, than any where else; they sit commanding on their thrones with all their subject-slaves about them: Their best clothes, best looks, shining jewels, sparkling eyes, the treasure of the world in a ring. Then there's such a hurry of pleasure to transport us; the bustle, noise, gallantry, equipage, garters, feathers, wigs, bows, smiles, ogles, love, music, and applause: I could wish that my whole life long were the first night of a new play.

Dur. The fellow has quite forgot this journey; have you bespoke post-horses?

Mir. Grant me but three days, dear captain, one to discover the lady, one to unfold myself, and one to make me happy; and then I'm your's to the world's end.

Dur. Hast thou the impudence to promise thyself a lady of her figure and quality in so short a time?

Mir. Yes, sir—I have a confident address, no disagreeable person, and five hundred Louis d'Ors in my pocket.

Dur. Five hundred Louis d'Ors! You a'n't mad?

Mir. I tell you, she's worth five thousand; one of her black brilliant eyes is worth a diamond as big as her head. I compared her necklace with her looks, and the living jewels out-sparkled the dead ones by a million.

Dur. But you have owned to me, that, abating Oriana's pretensions to marriage, you loved her passionately; then, how can you wander at this rate?

Mir. I longed for a partridge t'other day off the king's plate; but d'ye think, because I could not have it, I must eat nothing?

Dur. Prithee, Mirabell, be quiet; you may remember what narrow escapes you have had abroad by following strangers; you forget your leap out of the courtesan's window at Bologna, to save your fine ring there.

Mir. My ring's a trifle; there's nothing we possess comparable to what we desire—he shy of a lady bare-faced in the front-box, with a thousand pounds in jewels about her neck! For shame! no more.

Enter ORIANA, in boy's clothes, with a letter.

Ori. Is your name Mirabell, sir?

Mir. Yes, sir.

Ori. A letter from your uncle in Picardy.

[Gives the letter.]

Mir. [Reads.] 'The bearer is the son of a protestant gentleman, who, flying for his religion, left me the charge of this youth [a pretty boy.]. He's fond of some handsome service, that may afford him opportunity of improvement; your care of him will oblige Yours.' Has't a mind to travel, child?

Ori. 'Tis my desire, sir; I should be pleased to serve a traveller in any capacity.

Mir. A hopeful inclination; you shall along with me into Italy, as my page.

Dur. I don't think it safe; the rogue's [Noise without.] too handsome—The play's done, and some of the ladies come this way.

Enter LAMORCE, with her train borne up by a page.

Mir. Duretete, the very dear, identical she!

Dur. And what then?

Mir. Why, 'tis she.

Dur. And what then, sir?

Mir. Then! Why—Look'e, sirrah, the first piece of service I put upon you, is, to follow that lady's coach, and bring me word where she lives.

[To ORIANA.]

Ori. I don't know the town, sir, and am afraid of losing myself.

Mir. Pshaw!

Lam. Page, what's become of all my people?

Page. I can't tell, madam; I can see no sign of your ladyship's coach.

Lam. That fellow is got into his old pranks, and fallen drunk somewhere; none of the footmen there?

Page. Not one, madam.

Lam. These servants are the plague of our lives; what shall I do?

Mir. By all my hopes, fortune pimps for me; now, Duretete, for a piece of gallantry.

Dur. Why, you won't, sure?

Mir. Won't, brute!—Let not your servants neglect, madam, put your ladyship to any inconvenience, for you can't be disappointed of an equipage, whilst mine waits below; and would you honour the master so far, he would be proud to pay his attendance.

Dur. Ay, to be sure. [Aside.

Lam. Sir, I won't presume to be troublesome, for my habitation is a great way off.

Dur. Very true, madam, and he's a little engaged; besides, madam, a hackney-coach will do as well, madam.

Mir. Rude beast, be quiet! [To DURETETE.] The farther from home, madam, the more occasion you have for a guard—pray, madam—

Lam. Lord, sir—

[He seems to press, she to decline it, in dumb shew.]

Dur. Ah! The devil's in his impudence! now he wheedles, she smiles; he flatters, she simpers; he swears, she believes; he's a rogue, and she's a w— in a moment.

Mir. Without there! my coach; Duretete, wish me joy. [Hands the lady out.]

Dur. Wish you a surgeon! Here, you little Picard, go follow your master, and he'll lead you—

Ori. Whither, sir?

Dur. To the academy, child: 'tis the fashion, with men of quality, to teach their pages their exercises—go.

Ori. Won't you go with him, too, sir; that woman may do him some harm; I don't like her.

Dur. Why, how now, Mr Page, do you start up to give laws of a sudden? do you pretend to rise at court, and disapprove the pleasure of your betters? Look'e, sirrah, if ever you would rise by a great man, be sure to be with him in all his little actions, and, as a step to your advancement, follow your master immediately, and make it your hope that he goes to a bawdy-house.

Ori. Heavens forbid! [Exit.]

Dur. Now would I sooner take a cart in company of the hangman, than a coach with that woman: What a strange antipathy have I taken against these creatures! a woman, to me, is aversion upon aversion; a cheese, a cat, a breast of mutton, the squalling of children, the grinding of knives, and the snuff of a candle, [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A handsome apartment.

Enter MIRABEL and LAMORCE.

Lam. To convince me, sir, that your service was something more than good breeding, please to lay out an hour of your company upon my desire, as you have already upon my necessity.

Mir. Your desire, madam, has only prevented my request: My hours! make them yours, madam; eleven, twelve, one, two, three, and all that belong to those happy minutes.

Lam. But I must trouble you, sir, to dismiss your retinue; because an equipage at my door, at this time of night, will not be consistent with my reputation.

Mir. By all means, madam; all but one little boy—Here, page, order my coach and servants home, and do you stay—'tis a foolish country boy, that knows nothing but innocence.

Lam. Innocence, sir! I should be sorry, if you made any sinister constructions of my freedom.

Mir. O madam, I must not pretend to remark upon any body's freedom, having so entirely forfeited my own.

Lam. Well, sir, 'twere convenient towards our easy correspondence, that we entered into a free confidence of each other, by a mutual declaration of what we are, and what we think of one another. Now, sir, what are you?

Mir. In three words, madam—I am a gentleman; I have five hundred pounds in my pocket, and a clean shirt on.

Lam. And your name is—

Mir. Mustapha. Now, madam, the inventory of your fortunes.

Lam. My name is Lamorce; my birth noble; I was married young, to a proud, rude, sullen, impetuous fellow; the husband spoiled the gentleman; crying ruined my face, till, at last, I took heart, leaped out of a window, got away to my friends, sued my tyrant, and recovered my fortune—I lived, from fifteen to twenty, to please a husband; from twenty to forty, I'm resolved to please myself; and, from thence upwards, I'll humour the world.

Mir. The charming wild notes of a bird broke out of its cage!

Lam. I marked you at the play, and something I saw of a well-furnished, careless, agreeable tour about you. Methought your eyes made their mannerly demands with such an arch-modesty, that I don't know how—but I am eloped. Ha, ha, ha! I'm eloped.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! I rejoice in your good fortune with all my heart.

Lam. O, now I think on't, Mr Mustapha, you have got the finest ring there, I could scarcely believe it right; pray, let me see it.

Mir. Hum! Yes, madam, 'tis, 'tis right—but, but, but, but, it was given me by my mother; an old family ring, madam, an old-fashioned family ring.

Lam. Ay, sir—If you can entertain yourself with a song for a moment, I'll wait on you immediately; come in there. •

Enter Singers.

Call what you please, sir.

Mir. The new song—"Prithee, Phillis."

SONG.

Certainly the stars have been in a strange intriguing humour, when I was born—Ay, this night should I have had a bride in my arms, and that I should like well enough: But what should I have to-morrow night? The same. And what next night? The same. And what next night? The very same: Soup for breakfast, soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for breakfast again—But here's variety.

*I love the fair who freely gives her heart,
That's mine by ties of nature, not of art;
Who boldly owns what'er her thoughts indite,
And is too modest for a hypocrite.*

LAMORCE appears at the door. As he runs towards her, four Bravoes step in before her. He starts back.

She comes, she comes—hum, hum—bitch—murdered, murdered to be sure! The cursed strumpet! To make me send away my servants—Nobody near me! These cut-throats always make sure work. What shall I do? I have but one way. Are these gentlemen your relations, madam?

Lam. Yes, sir:

Mir. Gentlemen, your most humble servant; sir, your most faithful; yours, sir, with all my heart; your most obedient—come, gentlemen, [Salutes all round.] please to sit—no ceremony; next the lady, pray sir.

Lam. Well, sir, and how d'ye like my friends? [They all sit.]

Mir. O, madam, the most finished gentlemen! I was never more happy in good company in my life; I suppose, sir, you have travelled?

1 Bra. Yes, sir.

Mir. Which way, may I presume?

1 Bra. In a western barge, sir.

Mir. Ha, ha, ha! very pretty; facetious pretty gentleman!

Lam. Ha, ha, ha! sir, you have got the prettiest ring upon your finger there—

Mir. Ah! madam, 'tis at your service with all my heart. [Offering the ring.]

Lam. By no means, sir, a family-ring! [Takes it.]

Mir. No matter, madam. Seven hundred pound, by this light. [Aside.]

2 Bra. Pray, sir, what's o'clock?

Mir. Hum! sir, I have left my watch at home.

2 Bra. I thought I saw the string of it just now—

Mir. Ods my life, sir, I beg your pardon, here it is—but it don't go. [Putting it up.]

Lam. O dear sir, an English watch! Tompion's, I presume?

Mir. D'ye like it, madam—no ceremony—'tis at your service with all my heart and soul—Tompion's! Hang ye. [Aside.]

1 Bra. But, sir, above all things, I admire the fashion and make of your sword-hilt.

Mir. I'm mighty glad you like it, sir.

1 Bra. Will you part with it, sir?

Mir. Sir, I won't sell it.

1 Bra. Not sell it, sir?

Mir. No, gentlemen—but I'll bestow it with all my heart. [Offering it.]

1 Bra. O, sir, we shall rob you.

Mir. That you do, I'll be sworn. [Aside.] I have another at home; pray, sir—Gentlemen, you're too modest; have I any thing else that you fancy?—Sir, will you do me a favour? [To the 1st Bravo.] I am extremely in love with that wig which you wear; will you do me the favour to change with me?

1 Bra. Look'e, sir, this is a family wig, and I would not part with it, but if you like it—

Mir. Sir, your most humble servant.

[They change wigs.]

1 Bra. Madam, your most humble slave.

[Goes up foppishly to the lady, salutes her.]

2 Bra. The fellow's very liberal; shall we murder him?

1 Bra. What! Let him escape to hang us all! And I to lose my wig! no, no; I want but a handsome pretence to quarrel with him, for you know we must act like gentlemen. Here, some wine—[Wine here.] Sir, your good health.

[Pulls MIRABELL by the nose.]

Mir. Oh! Sir, your most humble servant; a pleasant frolic enough, to drink a man's health, and pull him by the nose: ha, ha, ha! the pleasantest pretty-humoured gentleman!

Lam. Help the gentleman to a glass.

[MIRABELL drinks.]

1 Bra. How d'ye like the wine, sir?

Mir. Very good o' the kind, sir: But I tell ye what; I find we're all inclined to be frolicsome, and, e'gad, for my own part, I was never more disposed to be merry; let's make a night on't, ha! This wine is pretty, but I have such Burgundy at home! Look'e, gentlemen, let me send for half a dozen flasks of my Burgundy; I defy France to match it; 'twill make us all life, all air; pray, gentlemen.

2 Bra. Eh! Shall we have his Burgundy?

1 Bra. Yes, faith, we'll have all we can; here, call up the gentleman's servant—What think you, Lamorce?

Lam. Yes, yes—your servant is a foolish country boy, sir; he understands nothing but innocence.

Mir. Ay, ay, madam. Here, page!

Enter ORIANA.

take this key, and go to my butler, order him to send half a dozen flasks of the red Burgundy, marked a thousand; and be sure you make haste! I long to entertain my friends here, my very good friends.

Omnes. Ah, dear sir!

1 Bra. Here, child, take a glass of wine—Your master and I have changed wigs, honey, in a frolic. Where had you this pretty boy, honest Mustapha?

Ori. Mustapha!

Mir. Out of Picardy—this is the first errand he has made for me, and if he does it right, I'll encourage him.

Ori. The red Burgundy, sir.

Mir. The red, marked a thousand; and be sure you make haste!

Ori. I shall, sir.

[Exit.]

1 Bra. Sir, you were pleased to like my wig, have you any fancy for my coat?—Look'e, sir, it has served a great many honest gentlemen very faithfully.

Mir. Not so faithfully, for I'm afraid it has got a scurvy trick of leaving all its masters in necessity. The insolence of these dogs is beyond their cruelty.

[Aside.]

Lam. You're melancholy, sir.

Mir. Only concerned, madam, that I should have no servant here but this little boy—he'll make some confounded blunder, I'll lay my life on't; I would not be disappointed of my wine for the universe.

Lam. He'll do well enough, sir; but supper's ready, will you please to eat a bit, sir?

Mir. O, madam, I never had a better stomach in my life.

Lam. Come, then—we have nothing but a plate of soup.

Mir. Ah! The marriage-soup I could dispense with now. [Aside.]

[Exit, handing the lady.]

2 Bra. That wig won't fall to your share.

1 Bra. No, no, we'll settle that after supper; in the mean time, the gentleman shall wear it.

2 Bra. Shall we dispatch him?

3 Bra. To be sure. I think he knows me.

1 Bra. Ay, ay, dead men tell no tales; I wonder at the impudence of the English rogues, that will hazard the meeting a man at the bar, whom they have encountered upon the road! I han't the confidence to look a man in the face, after I have done him an injury; therefore, we'll murder him.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Changes to OLD MIRABELL'S house.

Enter DURETETE.

Dur. My friend has forsaken me, I have abandoned my mistress, my time lies heavy upon my hands, and my money burns in my pocket—But, now I think on't, my myrmidons are upon duty to-night; I'll fairly stroll down to the guard, and nod away the night with my honest lieutenant over a flask of wine, a rake-belly story, and a pipe of tobacco.

Going off, BISSARRE meets him.

Bis. Who comes there? stand!

Dur. Hey day! now she's turned dragoon.

Bis. Look'e, sir, I'm told you intend to travel again. I design to wait on you as far as Italy.

Dur. Then, I'll travel into Wales.

Bis. Wales! what country's that?

Dur. The land of mountains, child, where you're never out of the way, 'cause there's no such thing as a high road.

Bis. Rather always in a high road, 'cause you travel all upon hills; but, be it as it will, I'll jog along with you.

Dur. But we intend to sail to the East Indies.

Bis. East or west, 'tis all one to me; I'm tight and light, and the fitter for sailing.

Dur. But suppose we take through Germany, and drink hard?

Bis. Suppose I take through Germany, and drink harder than you?

Dur. Suppose I go to a bawdy-house?

Bis. Suppose I shew you the way?

Dur. 'Sdeath, woman, will you go to the guard with me, and smoke a pipe?

Bis. Allons donc!

Dur. The devil's in the woman! suppose I hang myself?

Bis. There I'll leave you.

Dur. And a happy riddance; the gallows is welcome.

Bis. Hold, hold, sir.—[Catches him by the arm going.—one word before we part.

Dur. Let me go, madam, or I shall think that you're a man, and perhaps may examine you.

Bis. Stir, if you dare; I have still spirits to attend me; and can raise such a muster of fairies, as shall punish you to death—come, sir, stand there, now, and ogle me:—[He frowns upon her.—Now a languishing sigh!—[He groans.—Now run and take up my fan,—faster.—[He runs and takes it up.—Now play with it handsomely.

Dur. Aye, aye.

[He tears it all in pieces.]

Bis. Hold, hold, dear humourous coxcomb; captain, spare my fan, and I'll—why, you rude, inhuman monster, don't you expect to pay for this?

Dur. Yes, madam, there's twelve-pence; for that is the price on't.

Bis. Sir, it cost a guinea.

Dur. Well, madam, you shall have the sticks again.

[Throws them to her, and exit.]

Bis. Ha, ha, ha! ridiculous below my concern. I must follow him, however, to know if he can give me any news of Oriana.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.—Changes to LAMORCE'S lodgings.

Enter MIRABELL, solus.

Mir. Bloody hell-hounds! I overheard you: was not I two hours ago the happy, gay, rejoicing Mirabell? How did I plume my hopes in a fair-coming prospect of a long scene of years? Life courted me with all the charms of vigour, youth, and fortune; and to be torn away from all my promised joys is more than death; the manner, too—by villains! Oh, my Oriana, this very moment might have blessed me in thy arms, and my poor boy ! The innocent boy ! Confusion ! But hush, they come : I must dissemble still—no news of my wine, gentlemen ?

Enter the four Bravoes.

1 Bra. No, sir, I believe your country-booby has lost himself, and we can wait no longer for't : true, sir, you're a pleasant gentleman, but I suppose you understand our business.

Mir. Sir, I may go near to guess at your employments ; you, sir, are a lawyer, I presume ; you a physician ; you a scrivener ; and you a stock-jobber. All cut-throats, 'egad !

[Aside.

4 Bra. Sir, I am a broken officer ; I was cashiered at the head of the army for a coward : so, I took up the trade of murderer to retrieve the reputation of my courage.

3 Bra. I am a soldier, too, and would serve my king, but I don't like the quarrel ; and I have more honour than to fight in a bad cause.

2 Bra. I was bred a gentleman, and have no estate ; but I must have my whore and my bottle, through the prejudice of education.

1 Bra. I am a ruffian, too ; by the prejudice of education, I was bred a butcher. In short, sir, if your wine had come, we might have trifled a little longer. Come, sir, which sword will you fall by ? mine, sir ?

[Draws.

2 Bra. Or mine ?

[Draws.

3 Bra. Or mine ?

[Draws.

4 Bra. Or mine ?

[Draws.

Mir. I scorn to beg my life ; but to be butchered thus ! O there's the wine ! this moment (knocking) for my life or death.

Enter ORIANA.

Lost ! for ever lost ! where's the wine, child ?

[Faintly.

Ori. Coming up, sir.

[Stamps.

Enter DURETETE with his sword drawn, and six of the grand musqueteers, with their pieces presented ; the ruffians drop their swords.

[ORIANA goes off.

Mir. The wine ! the wine ! the wine ! Youth, pleasure, fortune, days, and years, are now my own again. Ah, my dear friends, did not I tell you this wine would make me merry ? Dear captain, these gentlemen are the best-natured, facetious, witty creatures, that ever you knew.

Enter LAMORCE.

Lam. Is the wine come, sir !

Mir. O yes, madam, the wine is come—see there !—[Pointing to the soldiers.]—Your ladyship has got a very fine ring upon your finger.

Lam. Sir, 'tis at your service.

Mir. O ho ! is it so ? thou dear seven hundred pound, thou'rt welcome home again, with all my heart—Ad's my life, madam, you have got the finest built watch there ? Tompion's, I presume.

Lam. Sir, you may wear it.

Mir. Oh, madam, by no means : 'tis too much—rob you of all !—[Taking it from her.]—Good dear time, thou'rt a precious thing ! I am glad I have retrieved thee :—[Putting it up.]—What, my friends, neglected all this while ! Gentlemen, you'll pardon my complaisance to the lady. How now—is it civil to be so out of humour at my entertainment, and I so pleased with yours ? Captain, you're surprised at all this ! but we're in our frolics, you must know. Some wine here.

Enter servant with wine.

Come, captain, this worthy gentleman's health.

[Tweaks the first bravo by the nose ; he roars. But now, where—where's my dear deliverer, my boy, my charming boy !

1 Bra. I hope some of our crew below-stairs have dispatched him.

Mir. Villain, what say'st thou ? Dispatched ! I'll have ye all tortured, racked, torn to pieces alive, if you have touched my boy. Here, page ! page ! page !

[Runs out.

Dur. Here, gentlemen, be sure you secure those fellows.

1 Bra. Yes, sir, we know you and your guard will be very civil to us.

Dur. Now for you, madam. He, he, he ! I'm so pleased to think that I shall be revenged of one woman before I die—well, Mrs Snap-Dragon, which of these honourable gentlemen is so happy to call you a wife ?

1 Bra. Sir, she should have been mine to-night, 'cause Sampre here had her last night. Sir, she's very true to us all four.

Dug. Take them to justice.

[The guards carry off the Bravoes.

Enter OLD MIRABELL, DUGARD, and BISARRE.

Old Mir. Robin, Robin, where's Bob ? where's my boy ? what, is this the lady ? a pretty whore, faith ! heark'e, child, because my son was so civil as to oblige you with a coach, I'll treat you with a cart ; indeed I will.

Dug. Aye, madam, and you shall have a swinging equipage, three or four thousand footmen at your heels at least.

Dur. No less becomes her quality.

Bis. Faugh ! the monster !

Dur. Monster ! aye, you're all a little monstrous, let me tell you.

Enter MIRABELL.

Old Mir. Ah, my dear Bob, art thou safe, man ?

Mir. No, no, sir, I'm ruined ; the saver of my life is lost.

Old Mir. No, he came and brought us the news.

Mir. But where is he?

Enter ORIANA.

Ha!—[Runs and embraces her.]—My dear preserver! what shall I do to recompense your trust? Father, friends, gentlemen, behold the youth, that has relieved me from the most ignominious death, from the scandalous poniards of these bloody ruffians, where to have fallen would have defamed my memory with vile reproach.—My life, estate, my all, is due to such a favour—command me, child; before you all, before my late so kind indulgent stars, I swear to grant whate'er you ask.

Ori. To the same stars, indulgent now to me, I will appeal as to the justice of my claim; I shall demand but what was mine before—the just performance of your contract to Oriana.

[Discovering herself.]

Om. Oriana!

Ori. In this disguise, I resolved to follow you abroad; counterfeited that letter, that got me into your service; and so, by this strange turn of fate, I became the instrument of your preservation. Few common servants would have had such cunning; my love inspired me with the meaning of your message, because my concern for your safety made me suspect your company.

Dur. Mirabell, you're caught.

Mir. Caught! I scorn the thought of imposition; the tricks and artful cunning of the sex I have despised, and broke through all contrivance. Caught! no, 'tis my voluntary act; this was no human stratagem; but by my providential stars designed to shew the dangers wandering youth incurs by the pursuit of an unlawful love, to plunge me headlong in the snares of vice, and then to free me by the hands of virtue: here, on my knees, I humbly beg my fair preserver's pardon; my thanks are needless, for myself I owe. And now, for ever, do protest me yours.

Old Mir. Tall, all di dall.—[Sings.]—Kiss me, daughter—no, you shall kiss me first—[To LAMORCE]—for you're the cause on't. Well, Bissarre, what say you to the captain?

Bis. I like the beast well enough, but I don't understand his paces so well, as to endanger him in a strange road.

Old Mir. But marriage is so beaten a path, that you can't go wrong.

Bis. Aye, 'tis so beaten, that the way is spoiled.

Dur. There is but one thing should make me thy husband—I could marry thee to-day, for the privilege of beating thee to-morrow.

Old Mir. Come, come, you may agree for all this. Mr Dugard, are not you pleased with this?

Dug. So pleased, that if I thought it might secure your son's affection to my sister, I would double her fortune.

Mir. Fortune! has she not given me mine? my life, estate, my all, and, what is more, her virtuous self? Virtue, in this so advantageous life, has her own sparkling charms, more tempting far than glittering gold or glory. Behold the foil—[Pointing to LAMORCE]—that sets this brightness off!—[To ORIANA.]—Here view the pride—[To ORIANA]—and scandal of the sex.—[To LAMORCE.]—There—[To LAMORCE.]—the false meteor, whose deluding light leads mankind to destruction; here—[To ORIANA]—the bright shining star, that guides to a security of happiness; a garden, and a single she—[To ORIANA]—was our first father's bliss; the tempter—[To LAMORCE.]—and to wander was his curse.

What liberty can be so tempting there?

[To LAMORCE.]

As a soft, virtuous, am'rous bondage here?

[To ORIANA.]

ACT. I.

SCENE I.—An Inn in Madrid.

Enter TRAPPANTI, alone, talking to himself.

INDEED, my friend Trappanti, thou'rt in a very thin condition; thou hast neither master, meat, nor money: not but, couldst thou part with that unappeaseable itch of eating, too, thou hast all the ragged virtues that were requisite to set up an ancient philosopher: contempt and poverty, kicks, thumps, and thinking, thou hast endured with the best of them; but—when fortune turns thee up to hard fasting, that is to say, positively not eating at all, I perceive thou art a downright dunce, with the same stomach, and no more philosophy, than a hound upon horse-flesh—Fasting's the devil!—Let me see—this, I take it, is the most frequented inn about Madrid, and if a keen guest or two should drop in now—Hark!

Host. [Within.] Take care of the gentlemen's horses there; see them well rubbed and littered.

Trap. Just alighted! if they do but stay to eat now! Impudence assist me. Ha! a couple of pretty young sparks, faith!

VOL. II.

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA in men's habits, a Servant with a portmanteau.

Trap. Welcome to Madrid, sir; welcome, sir!

Flo. Sir, your servant!

Ser. Have the horses pleased your honour?

Hyp. Very well indeed, friend. Prithee, set down the portmanteau, and see that the poor creatures want nothing: they have performed well, and deserve our care.

Trap. I'll take care of that, sir. Here, ostler!

[Exeunt TRAP. and Servant.]

Flo. And pray, madam, what do I deserve, that have lost the use of my limbs to keep pace with you? 'Sheart! you whipped and spurred like a fox-hunter: its a sign you had a lover in view: I'm sure my shoulders ache as if I had carried my horse on them.

Hyp. Poor Flora! thou art fatigued indeed! but I shall find a way to thank thee for't.

Flo. Thank me, quotha! Egad, I shan't be able to sit this fortnight. Well, I'm glad our journey's at an end, however; and now, madam, pray, what do you propose will be the end of our journey?

3 A

Hyp. Why, now, I hope the end of my wishes—Don Philip, I need not tell you how far he is in my heart.

Flo. No, your sweet usage of him told me that long enough ago; but now, it seems, you think fit to confess it: and what is it you love him for, pray?

Hyp. His manner of bearing that usage.

Flo. Ah, dear pride! how we love to have it tickled! But he does not bear it, you see, for he's coming post to Madrid to marry another woman; nay, one he never saw.

Hyp. An unknown face cannot have very far engaged him.

Flo. How came he to be engaged to her at all?

Hyp. Why, I engaged him.

Flo. To another!

Hyp. To my whole sex, rather than own I loved him.

Flo. Ah, done like a woman of courage!

Hyp. I could not bear the thought of parting with my power; besides, he took me at such an advantage, and pressed me so home to a surrender, I could have torn him piece-meal.

Flo. Ay, I warrant you, an insolent—agreeable puppy. Well, but to leave impertinence, madam, pray how came you to squabble with him?

Hyp. I'll tell thee, Flora: you know Don Philip wants no charms that can recommend a lover; in birth and quality, I confess him my superior; and it is the thought of that has been a constant thorn upon my wishes. I never saw him in the humblest posture, but still I fancied he secretly presumed his rank and fortune might deserve me. This always stung my pride, and made me overact it: nay, sometimes, when his sufferings have almost drawn tears into my eyes, I have turned the subject with some trivial talk, or hummed a spiteful tune, though I believe his heart was breaking.

Flo. A very tender principle, truly!

Hyp. Well, I don't know, it was in my nature. But to proceed—this, and worse usage, continued a long time; at last, despairing of my heart, he then resolved to do a violence on his own, by consenting to his father's commands of marrying a lady of considerable fortune here in Madrid.—The match is concluded, articles are sealed, and the day is fixed for his journey. Now, the night before he set out, he came to take his leave of me, in hopes, I suppose, I would have staid him. I need not tell you my confusion at the news; and though I could have given my soul to have deferred it, yet, finding him, unless I bade him stay, resolved upon the marriage, I (from the pure spirit of contradiction) swore to myself I would not bid him do it; so called for my veil, and told him I was in haste, begged his pardon, your servant, and so whipped to prayers.

Flo. Well said again! that was a clincher.—Ah, had not you better been at confession?

Hyp. Why, really, I might have saved a long journey by it. To be short, when I came from church, Don Philip had left this letter at home for me, without requiring an answer——Read it——

Flo. [Reads.] 'Your usage has made me justly despair of you, and now, any change must better my condition; at least, it has reduced me to the necessity of trying the last remedy, marriage with another; if it prove ineffectual, I only wish you may, at some hours, remember how little cause I have given you to have made me for ever miserable.'

PHILIP!

Poor gentleman! very hard, by my conscience! Indeed, madam, this was carrying the jest a little too far.

Hyp. Ah, by many a long mile, Flora; but what would you have a woman do, when her hand's in?

Flo. Nay, the truth of it is, we never know the difference between enough and a surfeit; but, love be praised, your proud stomach's come down for it.

Hyp. Indeed, it is not altogether so high as it was. In a word, his last letter set me at my wit's end; and when I came to myself, you may remember you thought me bewitched; for I immediately called for my boots and breeches, a straddle we got, and so rode after him.

Flo. Why, truly, madam, as to your wits, I have not much altered my opinion for them, for I cannot see what you propose by it.

Hyp. My whole design, Flora, lies in this portmanteau, and these breeches.

Flo. A notable design, no doubt! but, pray, let's hear it.

Hyp. Why, I do propose to be twice married between them.

Flo. How! twice?

Hyp. By the help of the portmanteau, I intend to marry myself to Don Philip's new mistress; and then—I'll put off my breeches, and marry him.

Flo. Now, I begin to take ye: but, pray, what's in the portmanteau, and how came you by it?

Hyp. I hired one to steal it from his servant at the last inn we lay at in Toledo. In it are jewels of value, presents to my bride, gold good store, settlements, and credential letters, to certify, that the bearer (which I intend to be myself) is Don Philip, only son and heir of Don Fernando de las Torres, now residing at Seville, whence we came.

Flo. A very smart undertaking, by my troth! And, pray, madam, what part am I to act?

Hyp. My woman still; when I cannot lie for myself, you are to do it for me, in the person of a cousin-german.

Flo. And my name is to be——

Hyp. Don Guzman, Diego, Mendez, or what you please: be your own goodfather.

Flo. 'Egad, I begin to like it mightily! this may prove a very pleasant adventure, if we can but come off without fighting, which, by the way, I don't easily perceive we shall; for, to be sure, Don Philip will make the devil to do with us when he finds himself here before he come hither.

Hyp. Oh, let me alone to give him satisfaction.

Flo. I'm afraid it must be alone, if you do give him satisfaction; for my part, I can push no more than I can swim.

Hyp. But can you bully upon occasion?

Flo. I can scold, when my blood's up.

Hyp. That's the same thing: bullying would be scolding in petticoats.

Flo. Say ye so? Why, then, Don, look to yourself; if I don't give you as good as you bring, I'll be content to wear breeches as long as I live, though I lose the end of my sex by it. Well, madam, now you have opened the plot, pray, when is the play to begin?

Hyp. I hope to have it all over in less than four hours: we'll just refresh ourselves with what the house affords, comb out our wigs, and wait upon my father-in-law——How now! what would this fellow have?——

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Servant, gentlemen; I have taken nice care of your nags; good cattle they are, by my troth! right and sound, I warrant them; they deserve care, and they have had it, and shall have it, if they stay in this house. I always stand by, sir; see them rubbed down with my own eyes——Catch me trusting an ostler—I'll give you leave to fill for me, and drink for me, too.

Flo. I have seen this fellow somewhere.

Trap. Hey-day! what, no cloth laid? was ever such attendance! Hey, house! tapster! landlord! hey! [Knocks.] What was it you bespoke, gentlemen?

Hyp. Really, sir, I ask your pardon; I have almost forgot you.

Trap. Pshaw! dear sir, never talk of it; I live here hard by—I have a lodging——I cannot call it a lodging, neither—that is, I have a——Sometimes I am here, and sometimes I am there; and so, here and there, one makes shift, you know. Hey! will these people never come? [Knocks.]

Hyp. You give a very good account of yourself, sir.

Trap. Oh, nothing at all, sir. Lord, sir—was it fish or flesh, sir?

Flo. Really, sir, we have bespoke nothing yet.

Trap. Nothing! for shame! it's a sign you are young travellers. You don't know this house, sir; why, they'll let you starve if you don't stir and call, and that like thunder, too——Hey!

[Knocks.]

Hyp. Ha! you eat here sometimes, I presume, sir?

Trap. Umph! Aye, sir, that's as it happens—I seldom eat at home, indeed—things are generally, you know, so out of order there, that—Did you hear any fresh news upon the road, sir?

Hyp. Only, sir, that the king of France lost a great horse-match upon the Alps t'other day.

Trap. Ha! a very odd place for a horse-race—but the king of France may do any thing—did you come that way, gentlemen? or—Hey!

[Knocks.]

Enter Host.

Host. Did you call, gentlemen?

Trap. Yes, and bawl, too, sir. Here, the gentlemen are almost famished, and nobody comes near them. What have you in the house, now, that will be ready presently?

Host. You may have what you please, sir.

Hyp. Can you give us a partridge?

Host. Sir, we have no partridges; but we'll get you what you please in a moment. We have a very good neck of mutton, sir; if you please, it shall be clapped down in a moment.

Hyp. Have you no pigeons or chickens?

Host. Truly, sir, we have no fowl in the house at present; if you please, you may have any thing else in a moment.

Hyp. Then, prithee, get us some young rabbits.

Host. Upon my word, sir, rabbits are so scarce, they are not to be had for money.

Flo. Have you any fish?

Host. Fish, sir! I drest yesterday the finest dish that ever came upon a table; I am sorry we have none left, sir; but if you please, you may have any thing else in a moment.

Trap. Pox on thee! hast thou nothing but any thing else in the house?

Host. Very good mutton, sir.

Hyp. Prithee get us a breast, then.

Host. Breast! don't you love the neck, sir?

Hyp. Have ye nothing in the house but the neck?

Host. Really, sir, we don't use to be so unprovided; but at present we have nothing else left.

Trap. Faith, sir, I don't know but a nothing else may be very good meat, when any thing else is not to be had.

Hyp. Then, prithee, friend, let's have thy neck of mutton before that is gone, too.

Trap. Sir, he shall lay it down this minute; I'll see it done, gentlemen; I'll wait upon ye presently; for a minute I must beg your pardon, and leave to lay the cloth myself.

Hyp. By no means, sir.

Trap. No ceremony, dear sir! Indeed I'll do it.

[Exeunt Host and TRAPPANTI.]

Hyp. What can this familiar puppy be?

Flo. With much ado, I have recollected his face. Don't you remember, madam, about two or three years ago, Don Philip had a trusty servant, called Trappanti, that used now and then to slip a note into your hand as you came from church?

Hyp. Is this he, that Philip turned away for saying I was as proud as a beauty, and homely enough to be good humoured?

Flo. The very same I assure ye; only, as you see, starving has altered his air a little.

Hyp. Poor fellow! I am concerned for him. What makes him so far from Seville?

Flo. I am afraid all places are alike to him.

Hyp. I have a great mind to take him into my service; his assurance may be useful, as my case stands.

Flo. You would not tell him who you are?

Hyp. There's no occasion for it—I'll talk with him.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Your dinner's upon the spit, gentlemen, and the cloth is laid in the best room—Are you not for a whet, sir? What wine? what wine? hey!

Flo. We give you trouble, sir.

Trap. Not in the least, sir—Ihey! [Knocks.]

Enter Host.

Host. D'ye call, gentlemen?

Hyp. Ay; what wine have ye?

Host. What sort you please, sir.

Flo. Sir, will you please to name it?

[To TRAP.]

Trap. Nay, pray, sir!

Hyp. No ceremony, dear sir! upon my word you shall.

Trap. Upon my soul you'll make me leave ye, gentlemen.

Hyp. Come, come, no words; prithee, you shall.

Trap. Psha! but why this among friends, now? Here—have ye any right Galicia?

Host. The best in Spain, I warrant it.

Trap. Let's taste it; if it be good, set us out half a dozen bottles for dinner.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Erit Host.]

Flo. Who says this fellow's a starving now? On my conscience, the rogue has more impudence than a lover at midnight.

Hyp. Hang him, 'tis inoffensive; I'll humour him—Pray, sir, (for I find we are like to be better acquainted, therefore, I hope you won't take my question ill)——

Trap. Oh, dear sir!

Hyp. What profession may you be of?

Trap. Profession, sir—I—I—'Ods me? here's wine.

Enter Host.

Come, fill out—hold—let me taste it first—Ye blockhead, would ye have the gentleman drink before he knows whether it be good or not? [Drinks.] Yes, 'twill do—Give me the bottle, I'll fill myself. Now, sir, is not that a glass of right wine?

Hyp. Extremely good, indeed—But, sir, as to my question.

Trap. I'm afraid, sir, that mutton won't be enough for us all.

Hyp. Oh, pray sir, bespeak what you please.

Trap. Sir, your most humble servant—Here, master! prithee, get us a—ha! ay, get us a dozen of poached eggs—a dozen, dy'e hear—just to—pop down a little.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Going.]

Trap. Friend—let there be a little slice of bacon to every one of them.

Hyp. But, sir——

Trap. 'Odso! I had like to have forgot—here a—Sancho, Sancho! Ay, is not your name Sancho?

Host. Diego, sir.

Trap. Oh, ay, Diego; that's true, indeed, Diego. Umph!

Hyp. I must e'en let him alone; there's no putting in a word till his mouth's full.

Trap. Come, here's to thee, Diego—[Drinks and fills again.] That I should forget thy name, though.

Host. No great harm, sir.

Trap. Diego, ha! a very pretty name, faith—I think you are married, are you not, Diego?

Host. Ay, ay, sir.

Trap. Ha! how many children?

Host. Nine girls and a boy, sir.

Trap. Ha! nine girls—Come, here's to thee again, Diego—Nine girls! a stirring woman, I dare say; a good housewife, ha, Diego?

Host. Pretty well, sir.

Trap. Makes all her pickles herself, I warrant ye—Does she do olives well?

Host. Will you be pleased to taste them, sir?

Trap. Taste them! hum! prithee, let's have a plate, Diego.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. And our dinner as soon as you please, sir: when it's ready, call us.

Host. Yes, sir.

[Erit Host.]

Hyp. But, sir, I was asking you of your profession.

Trap. Profession! really, sir, I don't use to profess much: I am a plain-dealing sort of a man: if I say I'll serve a gentleman, he may depend upon me.

Flo. Have you ever served, sir?

Trap. Not these two last campaigns.

Hyp. How so?

Trap. Some words with my superior officer; I was a little too free in speaking my mind to him.

Hyp. Don't you think of serving again, sir?

Trap. If a good post fall in my way.

Hyp. I believe I could help you—Pray, sir, when you served last, did you take pay or wages?

Trap. Pay, sir!—Yes, sir, I was paid, cleared, subsistence and arrears, to a farthing.

Hyp. And your late commander's name was—

Trap. Don Philip de las Torres.

Hyp. Of Seville?

Trap. Of Seville.

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant. You need not be curious, for I am sure you don't know me, though I do you, and your condition, which, I dare promise you, I'll mend upon our better acquaintance: and your first step to deserve it, is to answer me honestly to a few questions. Keep your assurance still; it may do me service; I shall like you better for it. Come, here's to encourage you. [Gives him money.]

Trap. Sir, my humble service to you.

Hyp. Well said.

Flo. Nay, I'll pass my word he sha'n't dwindle into modesty.

Trap. I never heard a gentleman talk better in my life. I have seen such sort of a face before; but where—I don't know, nor I don't care. It's your glass, sir.

Hyp. Grammercy! here, cousin. [Drinks to Flora.] Come now, what made Don Philip turn you out of his service? why did you leave him?

Trap. 'Twas time, I think; his wits had left him—the man was mad.

Hyp. Mad!

Trap. Ay, stark mad—in love.

Hyp. In love! how, pray?

Trap. Very deep—up to the ears—over head—drowned by this time—he would in—I would have had him stopped when he was up to the middle.

Hyp. What was she he was in love with?

Trap. The devil.

Hyp. So, now for a very ugly likeness of my own face. [Aside.] What sort of a devil?

Trap. The damning sort—a woman.

Hyp. Had she no name?

Trap. Her Christian name was Donna Hypolita, but her proper name was Shittlecock.

Flo. How dy'e like that? [Aside to Hyp.]

Hyp. Pretty well. [Aside to Flo.] Was she handsome?

Trap. Umph—so, so.

Flo. How dy'e like that? [To Hyp.]

Hyp. Umph—so, so. [To Flo.] Had she wit?

Trap. Sometimes.

Hyp. Good humour?

Trap. Very seldom.

Hyp. Proud?

Trap. Ever.

Hyp. Was she honest?

Trap. Very proud.

Hyp. What, had she no good qualities?

Trap. Faith, I don't remember them.

Hyp. Ha! dy'e think she loved him?

Trap. If she did, 'twas as the cobbler loved his wife.

Hyp. How's that?

Trap. Why, he beat her thrice a-day, and told his neighbours he loved her ne'er the worse, but he was resolved she should never know it.

Hyp. Did she use him so very ill?

Trap. Like a jade.

Flo. How d'ye do now?

[To Hyp.]

Hyp. I don't know—methinks, I—But sure; what, was she not handsome, say ye?

Trap. A devilish tongue.

Hyp. Was she ugly?

Flo. Ay, say that at your peril. [Aside.]

Hyp. What was she? how did she look?

Trap. Look! why, faith, the woman looked very well when she had a blush in her face.

Hyp. Did she often blush?

Trap. I never saw her.

Hyp. Never saw her! had she no charm? what made him love her?

Trap. Really, I can't tell.

Flo. How d'ye like the picture, madam?

[Aside.]

Hyp. Oh, oh, extremely well! the rogue has put me into a cold sweat. I am as humble as an offending lover.

Enter Host.

Host. Gentlemen, your dinner's upon the table.

[Exit Host.]

Hyp. That's well. Come, sir; at dinner I'll give you farther instructions how you may serve yourself and me.

Trap. Come, sir.

[To Flora.]

Flo. Nay, dear sir! no ceremony.

Trap. Sir, your very humble servant.

[As they are going, Hyp. stops them.]

Hyp. Come back; here's one I don't care should see me.

Trap. Sir, the dinner will be cold.

Hyp. Do you eat it hot, then; we are not hungry.

Trap. Sir, your very humble servant again.

[Exit Trap.]

Flo. You seem concerned; who is it?

Hyp. My brother Octavio, as I live!—Come this way. [They retire.]

Enter OCTAVIO and a Servant.

Oct. Jasper, run immediately to Rosara's woman; tell her I am just come to town; slip that note into her hand, and stay for an answer.

Flo. 'Tis he!

Re-enter Host, conducting DON PHILIP.

Host. Here, sir, please to walk this way.

Flo. And Don Philip, by Jupiter!

D. Phi. When my servant comes, send him to me immediately.

Host. Yes, sir.

Hyp. Nay, then, it is time for us to make ready—Alons! [Exeunt HYP. and FLO.

Oct. Don Philip!

D. Phi. Dear Octavio!

Oct. What lucky point of the compass could blow us to one another so?

D. Phi. Faith a wind very contrary to my inclination; but the worst, I see, blows some good. I am overjoyed to see you. But what makes you so far from the army?

Oct. Who thought to have found you so far from Seville?

D. Phi. What do you do at Madrid?

Oct. Oh, friend, such an unfortunate occasion, and yet such a lucky discovery! such a mixture of joy and torment, no poor dog upon earth was ever plagued with.

D. Phi. Unriddle, pray.

Oct. Don't you remember, about six months ago, I wrote you word of a dear, delicious, sprightly creature, that I had bombarded for a whole summer to no purpose?

D. Phi. I remember.

Oct. That same silly, stubborn, charming angel, now capitulates.

D. Phi. Then she's taken.

Oct. I can't tell that; for, you must know, her perfidious father, contrary to his treaty with me, and her inclination, is going to—

D. Phi. Marry her to another—

Oct. Of a better estate than mine, it seems. She tells me here, he is within a day's march of her; begs me to come upon the spur to her relief; and, if I don't arrive too late, confesses she loves me well enough to open the gates, and let me enter the town before him. There's her express, read it—

HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI appear in the Balcony.

Hyp. Hark! they are talking of a mistress—let us observe.

Flo. Trappanti, there's your old master.

Trap. Ay, I know him again; but I may chance to tell him, he did not know a good servant when he had him.

D. Phi. [Reads.] 'My father has concluded a match for me with one I never saw, and intends, in two days, to perfect it: the gentleman is expected every hour. In the mean time, if you know any friend that has a better title to me, advise him forthwith to put in his claim. I am almost out of my senses, which you will easily believe when I tell you, if such a one should make haste, I sha'n't have time to refuse him any thing.'

Hyp. How is this?

D. Phi. No name?

Oct. She never would trust it in a letter.

Flo. If this should be Don Philip's mistress?

Trap. Sir, you may take my word it is: I know the lady, and what the neighbours say of her.

Hyp. This was a lucky discovery—but hush.

D. Phi. What will you do in this case?

Oct. That I don't yet know: I am half-distracted; I have just sent my servant to tell her I am come to town, and beg an opportunity to speak with her; I long to see her; I warrant the poor fool will be so soft and so humble, now she's in a fright.

D. Phi. What will you purpose at your meeting her?

Oct. I don't know; may be another meeting; at least it will come to a kind look, a kiss, good bye, and a sigh—Ah, if I can but persuade her to run away with me!

D. Phi. Consider—

Oct. Ah, so I do! What pleasure 'twould be, to have her steal out of her bed in a sweet moonshiny night; to hear her come pat, pat, pat, along in her slippers, with nothing but a thin silk night-gown loose about her, and in this tempting dress, to have her jump into my arms, breathless with fear; her panting bosom close to mine; then to stifle her with kisses, and curl myself about her smooth warm limbs, that breathe an healing odour from their pores, enough to make the senses ache, or fancy mad!

D. Phi. Octavio, I envy thee; thou art the happiest man in thy temper—

Oct. And thou art the most altered I ever knew. Pr'ythee, what makes thee so much upon the humdrum? Well, are my sister and you come to a right understanding yet? When do you marry?

Hyp. So, now I shall have my picture by another hand.

D. Phi. My condition, Octavio, is very much like your mistress's; she is going to marry the man she never saw, and I the woman.

Oct. 'Sdeath, you make me tremble! I hope 'tis not my mistress.

D. Phi. Thy mistress! that were an idle fear; Madrid's a wide place—or if it were, (she loving you) my friendship and my honour would oblige me to desist.

Oct. That's generous, indeed! but still you amaze me! Are you quite broke off with my sister? I hope she has given you no reason to forget her.

Hyp. Now, I tremble.

D. Phi. The most severe that ever beauty printed in the heart of man; a coldness unaccountable to sense.

Oct. Psha, dissembled.

Hyp. Ha!

D. Phi. I can't think it; lovers are soon flattered into hope; but she appeared to me indifferent to so nice a point, that she has ruined me without the trouble of resolving it.

Flo. Well, men are fools.

Oct. And by this time she's in fits for your leaving her; 'tis her nature; I know her from her bib and baby: I remember, at five years old, the vixen has fasted three days together, in pure spite to her governess.

Hyp. So!

Oct. Nothing could ever, in appearance, make her pleased or angry; always too proud to be obliged, too high to be affronted, and thought nothing so low as to seem fond of revenge: she had a stomach that could digest every thing but humility.

Hyp. Good lack, Mr Wit!

Oct. Yet, with all this, I have sometimes seen her good-natured, generous, and tender.

Hyp. There the rogue was civil again.

D. Phi. I have thought so, too. [Sighing.]

Hyp. How can he speak of me with so much generosity?

Oct. For all her usage of you, I'll be racked if she did not love you.

D. Phi. I rather think she hated me: however, now 'tis past, and I must endeavour to think no more of her.

Hyp. Now I begin to hate myself.

Oct. Then you are determined to marry this other lady?

D. Phi. That's my business to Madrid.

Trap. Which shall be done to your hand.

D. Phi. Besides, I am now obliged by contract.

Oct. Then, (though she be my sister) may some jealous, old, ill-natured dog, revenge your quarrel to her.

Hyp. Thank you, sir.

D. Phi. Come, forget it.

Hyp. Come, we have seen enough of the enemy's motions, to know 'tis time for us to decamp.

[Exeunt HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.]

Oct. With all my heart; let's go in, and drink your new mistress's health. When do you visit her?

D. Phi. I intended it immediately, but an unlucky accident hindered me: one of my servants fell sick upon the road, so that I am forced to make shift with one, and he is the most negligent, sottish rogue in nature; he has left my portmanteau, where all my writings and letters of concern are, behind him at the last town we lay at, so that I can't properly visit the lady, or her father, till I am able to assure them who I am.

Oct. Why don't you go back yourself to see for them?

D. Phi. I have sent my servant, for I am really tired: I was loath to appear so much concerned for them, lest the rascal should think it worth his while to run away with them.

Enter Servant to OCTAVIO.

Oct. How now?

Ser. Here's an answer, sir. [Gives a letter.]

Oct. [To D. Phi.] My dear friend, I beg a thousand pardons; I must leave you this minute; the kind creature has sent for me. I am a soldier, you know, and orders must be obeyed; when I come off duty I'll immediately wait upon you.

D. Phi. You'll find me here, or hear of me. Adieu. Here, house! [Exit OCTAVIO.]

Enter Host.

Prithee, see if my servant be come yet.

Host. I believe he is, sir; is he not in blue?

D. Phi. Ay, where is the sot?

Host. Just refreshing himself with a glass at the gate.

D. Phi. Pray, tell the gentleman I'd speak with him.—[Exit Host.] In all the necessities of life, there is not a greater plague than servants. Hey, Soto!

Enter Soto, drunk.

Soto. Did you please to—uch!—call, sir?

D. Phi. What's the reason, blockhead, I must always wait upon you thus?

Soto. Sir, I did not know any thing of it. I—I—came as soon as you se—se—se—sent for me.

D. Phi. And why not without sending, sir? Did you think I expected no answer to the business I sent you about?

Soto. Yes, sir—I did think you would be willing—that is—to have an account—so, I staid to take a glass at the door, because I would not be out of the way—huh!

D. Phi. You are drunk, rascal!—Where's the portmanteau?

Soto. Sir, I am here—if you please I'll give you the whole account how the matter is—huh!

D. Phi. My mind misgives me—speak, villain!— [Strikes him.]

Soto. I will, sir, as soon as I can put my words into an intelligible order: I ar'n't running away, sir.

D. Phi. To the point, sirrah.

Soto. Not of your sword, dear sir!

D. Phi. Sirrah, be brief, or I'll murder you: where's the portmanteau?

Soto. Sir, as I hope to breathe, I made all the strictest search in the world, and drank at every house upon the road going and coming, and asked about it; and so, at last, as I was coming within a mile of the town here, I found, then—

D. Phi. What?

Soto. That it must certainly be lost.

D. Phi. Dog! d'ye think this must satisfy me? [Beats him.]

Soto. Lord, sir, you won't hear reason—Are you sure you ha'n't it about you?—If I know any thing of it I wish I may be burnt!

D. Phi. Villain! your life can't make me satisfaction.

Soto. No, sir, that's hard—a man's life can't—for my part—I—I—

D. Phi. Why do I vent my rage against a sot, a clod of earth? I should accuse myself for trusting him.

Soto. Sir—I had rather—bought a portman-teau out of my own pocket, than have had such a life about it.

D. Phi. Be dumb!

Soto. Ahuh! Yea.

D. Phi. If this rascal had stole it, sure he would not have ventured to come back again.—I am confounded! Neither Don Manuel nor his daughter know me, nor any of his family. If I should not visit him till I can receive fresh letters from my father, he'll in the mean time think himself affronted by my neglect.—What shall I do?—Suppose I go and tell him my misfortune, and beg his patience till we can hear again from Seville. I must think. Hey, sot!

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Hold, sir; let me touch up your fore-top a little.

Hyp. So! my gloves,—Well, Trappanti, you know your business, and if I marry the lady, you know my promise, too.

Trap. Sir, I shall remember them both—'Odso! I had like to have forgot—Here, house! a bason and wash-ball—I've a razor about me. Hey!

[Knocks.]

Hyp. What's the matter?

Trap. Sir, you are not shaved.

Hyp. Shaved!

Trap. Ever while you live, sir, go with a smooth chin to your mistress. Hey! [Knocks.]

Hyp. This puppy does so plague me with his impertinence, I shall laugh out and discover myself.

Trap. Why, Diego!

Hyp. Psha! prithee don't stand fooling, we're in haste.

Flo. Ay, ay, shave another time.

Trap. Nay, what you please; sir; your beard is not much, you may wear it to-day.

[Taking her by the chin.]

Flo. Ay, and to-morrow, too: pray, sir, will you see the coach ready, and put in the things.

Trap. Sir, I'll see the coach ready, and put in the things. [Exit TRAP.]

Flo. Come, madam, courage! Now, let's do something for the honour of our sex, give a proof of our parts, and tell mankind we can contrive, fatigue, bustle, and bring about as well as the best of them.

Hyp. Well said, Flora! for the honour of our sex be it, then, and let the grave dons think themselves as wise as they please; but Nature knows there goes more wit to the management of some amours, than the hardest point in politics;

Therefore, to men the affair of state's confined.

Wisely to us the state of love's assigned,

As love's the weightier business of mankind.

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—DON MANUEL'S house.

Enter ROSARA and VILETTA.

Vil. HEAR reason.

Ros. Talk of Octavio, then.

Vil. How do you know but the gentleman your father designs you for, may prove as pretty a fellow as he? If you should happen to like him as well, would not that do your business as well?

Ros. Do you expect Octavio should thank you for this?

Vil. The gentleman is no fool.

Ros. He'll hate any one that is not a friend to his love.

Vil. Hang them, say I: but can't one quench one's thirst without jumping into the river? Is there no difference between cooling and drowning? Octavio's now in a very good post—keep him there—I know the man; he understands the business he is in to a hair; but, faith, you'll spoil him; he's too pretty a fellow, and too poor a one for an husband.

Ros. Poor! he has enough.

Vil. That's the most he has.

Ros. 'Twill do our business.

Vil. But when you have no portion (which I'm afraid you won't have with him) he'll soon have enough of you, and how will your business be done then, pray?

Ros. Psha! you talk like a fool.

Vil. Come, come, if Octavio must be the man, I say let Don Philip be the husband.

Ros. I tell you, fool, I'll have no man but an husband, and no husband but Octavio: when you find I am weary of him, I'll give you leave to talk to me of somebody else.

Vil. In vain, I see—I have done, madam—one must have time to be wise: but, in the mean while, what do you resolve? positively not to marry Don Philip?

Ros. I don't know what I shall do, till I see Octavio. When did he say he would be here?

Vil. Oh! I dare not tell you, madam.

Ros. Why?

Vil. I am bribed to the contrary.

Ros. By whom?

Vil. Octavio; he just now sent me this lovely piece of gold not to tell you what time he would be here.

Ros. Nay, then, Viletta, here are two pieces that are twice as lovely; tell me, when shall I see him?

Vil. Umph! these are lovely pieces, indeed. [Smiling.

Ros. When, Viletta?

Vil. Have you no more of them, madam?

Ros. Psha! there, take purse and all; will that content thee?

Vil. Oh, dear madam! I should be unconscionable to desire more; but, really, I was willing to have them all first. [Curtseying.

Ros. When will he come?

Vil. Why, the poor gentleman has been hankering about the house this quarter of an hour; but, I did not observe, madam, you were willing to see him till you had convinced me by so plain a proof.

Ros. Where's my father?

Vil. Fast asleep in the great chair.

Ros. Fetch him in, then, before he wakes.

Vil. Let him wake, his habit will protect him.

Ros. His habit!

Vil. Ay, madam, he's turned friar to come at you: if your father surprises us, I have a lie ready to back him.—Hist, Octavio! you may enter.

Enter OCTAVIO, in a friar's habit.

Oct. After a thousand frights and fears, do I live to see my dear Rosara once again, and kind?

Ros. What shall we do, Octavio? [Looking kindly on him.

Oct. Kind creature! Do! why, as lovers should do; what nobody can undo; let's run away this minute, tie ourselves in the church-knot, and defy fathers and mothers.

Ros. And fortunes, too?

Oct. Psha! we shall have it one day: they must leave their money behind them.

Ros. Suppose you first try my father's good-nature? You know he once encouraged your addresses.

Oct. First, let's be fast married: perhaps he may be good-natured when he can't help it: if we should try him now, 'twill but set him more upon his guard against us: since we are listed under Love, don't let us serve in a separate garrison. Come, come, stand to your arms, whip a suit of night-clothes into your pocket, and let's march off in a body together.

Ros. Ah! my father!

Oct. Dead!

Vil. To your function.

Enter DON MANUEL.

D. Man. Viletta!

Vil. Sir.

D. Man. Where's my daughter?

Vil. Hist! don't disturb her.

D. Man. Disturb her! Why, what's the matter?

Vil. She's at confession, sir.

D. Man. Confession! I don't like that; a young woman ought to have no sins at all.

Vil. Ah! dear sir, there's no living without them.

D. Man. She's now at years of discretion.

Vil. There's the danger, sir; she's just of the tasting age: one has really no relish of a sin till fifteen.

D. Man. Ah! then, the jades have swinging stomachs. I find her aversion to the marriage I have proposed her has put her upon disobedient thoughts: there can be no confession without guilt.

Vil. Nor no pardon, sir, without confession.

D. Man. Fiddle faddle! I won't have her seem wicked. Hussy, you shall confess for her; I'll have her send her sins by you: you know them, I'm sure; but I'll know what the friar has got out of her—Save you, father!

Oct. Bless you, son!

D. Man. How now! What's become of Father Benedict? Why is not he here?

Vil. Sir, he is not well; and so desired this gentleman, his brother here, to officiate for him.

D. Man. He seems very young for a confessor.

Vil. Ay, sir; he has not been long at it.

Oct. Nor don't desire to be long in it: I wish I understand it well enough to make a fool of my old Don here. [Aside.

D. Man. Well, sir, how do you find the pulse of iniquity beat there? What sort of sin has she most stomach to?

Oct. Why, truly, sir, we have all frailties, and your daughter has had most powerful temptations.

D. Man. Nay, the devil has been very busy with her these two days.

Oct. She has told me a most lamentable story.

D. Man. Ten to one but this lamentable story proves a most damnable lie.

Oct. Indeed, son, I find, by her confession, that you are much to blame for your tyrannical government of her.

D. Man. Hey-day! what, has the jade been inventing sins for me, and confessing them instead of her own? Let me come—she shall be locked up till she repents them, too.

Oct. Son, forbear; this is now a corroboration of your guilt: this is inhuman.

D. Man. Sir, I have done; but pray, if you please, let's come to the point: what are these terrible cruelties that this tender lady accuses me of?

Oct. Nay, sir, mistake her not: she did not, with any malicious design, expose your faults, but as her own depended on them; her frailties were the consequence of your cruelty.

D. Man. Let's have them both, antecedent and consequent.

Oct. Why, she confessed her first maiden innocent affection had long been settled upon a young gentleman, whose love to her you had once encouraged, and after their most solemn vows of mutual faith, you have most barbarously broke in upon her hopes; and, to the utter ruin of her peace, contracted her to a man she never saw.

D. Man. Very good! I see no harm in all this.

Oct. Methinks the welfare of a daughter, sir, might be of weight enough to make you serious.

D. Man. Serious! so I am, sir. What a devil! must I needs be melancholy, because I have got her a good husband?

Oct. Her melancholy may tell you, sir, she can't think him a good one.

D. Man. Sir, I understand thinking better than she, and I'll make her take my word.

Oct. What have you to object against the man she likes?

D. Man. The man I like.

Oct. Suppose the unhappy youth she loves should throw himself distracted at your feet, and try to melt you into pity—

D. Man. Ay! that if he can.

Oct. You would not, sir, refuse to hear him?

D. Man. Sir, I shall not refuse him any thing that I am sure will signify nothing.

Oct. Were you one moment to reflect upon the pangs which separated lovers feel—were Nature dead in you, that thought might wake her.

D. Man. Sir, when I am asked to do a thing I have not a mind to do, my nature sleeps like a top.

Oct. Then I must tell you, sir, this obstinacy obliges me, as a churchman, to put you in mind of your duty, and to let you know, too, you ought to pay more reverence to our order.

D. Man. Sir, I am not afraid of the sin of marrying my daughter to the best advantage; and so, if you please, father, you may walk home again—when any thing lies upon my conscience, I'll send for you.

Oct. Nay, then, 'tis time to claim a lover's right, and to tell you, sir, the man that dares to ask Rosara from me, is a villain.

[Throws off his disguise.

Vil. So! here will be fine work! [Aside.

D. Man. Octavio! the devil!

Oct. You'll find me one, unless you do me speedy justice: since not the bonds of honour, nature, nor submissive reason, can oblige you, I am reduced to take a surer, shorter way, and force you to be just. I leave you, sir, to think on't.

[Walks about angrily.

D. Man. Ah! here's a confessor! ah! that jade of mine!—and that other jade of my jade's!—Here has been rare doings!—Well! it shan't hold long; madam shall be noosed to-morrow morning—Ha! sir's in a great passion here, but it won't do—those long strides, Don, will never bring you the sooner to your mistress.—Rosara! step into that closet, and fetch my spectacles off o' the table there. Tum! tum!

[Sings.

Vil. I don't like the old gentleman's looks.

[Aside.

Ros. This obstinacy of yours, my dear father, you shall find runs in the family.

[Exit ROSARA, and DON MAN. locks her in.

D. Man. Tum! dum! dum! [Sings.

Oct. Sir, I would advise you, as your nearest friend, to defer this marriage for three days.

D. Man. Tum! dum! dum!

Vil. Sir, you have locked my mistress in.

[Pertly.

D. Man. Tum! dum! dum!

Vil. If you please to lend me the key, sir, I'll let her out.

D. Man. Tum! dum! dum!

Oct. You might afford me at least, as I am a gentleman, a civil answer, sir.

D. Man. Why, then, in one word, sir, you shall not marry my daughter; and, as you are a gentleman, I'm sure you won't think it good manners to stay in my house, when I submissively beg of you to walk out.

Oct. You are the father of my mistress, and something, sir, too old to answer, as you ought, this wrong; therefore, I'll look for reparation where I can with honour take it; and since you have obliged me to leave your house, I'll watch it carefully; I'll know who dares enter it. This, sir, be sure of; the man that offers at Rosara's love, shall have one virtue, courage, at least; I'll be his proof of that, and ere he steps before me, force him to deserve her.

[Exit OCT.

D. Man. Ah! poor fellow! he's mad now, and does not know what he would be at.—But, however, 'twill be no harm to provide against him—Who waits there?

Enter a Servant.

Run you for an alguazil, and bid your fellows arm themselves; I expect mischief at my door immediately: if Octavio offers any disturbance, knock him down, and bring him before me. [Exit Scr.

Vil. Hist! don't I hear my mistress's voice?

Ros. [Within.] Viletta!

Vil. Here, here, madam—Bless me! what's this?

[VILETTA listens at the closet door, and ROSARA thrusts a billet to her through the key-hole.]

Ha! a billet—to Octavio—a—hem.

[Puts it into her bosom.

D. Man. How now, hussy? What are you fumbling about that door for?

Vil. Nothing, sir; I was only peeping to see if my mistress had done prayers yet.

D. Man. Oh! she had as good let them alone; for she shall never come out till she has stomach enough to fall to upon the man I have provided for her. But hark you, Mrs Modesty, was it you, pray, that let in that able comforter for my babe of grace there?

Vil. Yes, sir; I let him in. [Pertly.]

D. Man. Did you so? Ha! then, if you please, madam, I'll let you go out—go—go—get a sheet of brown paper, pack up your things, and let me never see that damned ugly face of thine as long as I live.

Vil. Bless me! sir, you are in a strange humour, that you won't know when a servant does as she should do.

D. Man. Thou art strangely impudent.

Vil. Only the farthest from it in the world, sir.

D. Man. Then I am strangely mistaken; didst not thou own just now thou lettest him in?

Vil. Yes—but 'twas in disguise—for I did not design you should see him, because I know you did not care my mistress should see him.

D. Man. Ha!

Vil. And I knew, at the same time, she had a mind to see him.

D. Man. Ha!

Vil. And you know, sir, that the sin of loving him had lain upon her conscience a great while; so I thought it high time she should come to a thorough confession.

D. Man. Ha!

Vil. So upon this, sir, as you see—I—I—I let him in, that's all.

D. Man. Nay, if it be so as thou sayest, he was a proper confessor, indeed.

Vil. Ay, sir, for you know this was not a spiritual father's business.

D. Man. No, no; this matter was utterly carnal.

Vil. Well, sir, and judge you now if my mistress is not beholden to me?

D. Man. Oh! extremely; but you'll go to hell, my dear, for all this—though, perhaps, you'll chuse that place: I think you never much cared for your husband's company; and, if I don't mistake, you sent him to heaven in the old road. Hark! what noise is that? [Noise without.]

Vil. So, Octavio's pushing his fortune—he'll have a wife or a halter, that's positive—I'll go see. [Erit VILETTA.]

Enter a Servant, hastily.

D. Man. How now?

Ser. O, sir, Octavio has set upon a couple of gentlemen just as they were alighting out of a coach at the door; one of them, I believe, is he that is to marry my young mistress; I heard them name her name; I'm afraid there will be mischief, sir: there they are, all at it, helter, skelter!

D. Man. Run into the hall, take down my back, breast, and head-piece; call an officer; raise the neighbours; give me my great gun; I'll shoot him out of the garret-window.

[Erit DON MANUEL.]

Enter HYPOLITA and FLORA, putting up their swords, OCTAVIO in the Alguazil's hands, and TRAPPANTI.

Hyp. Bring him along—This is such an insolence! damn it! at this rate, no gentleman can walk the streets.

Flo. I suppose, sir, your business was more with our pockets than our persons. Are our things safe?

Trap. Ay, sir, I secured them as soon as ever I saw his sword out; I guessed his design, and scoured off with the portmanteau.

Hyp. I'll know now who set you on, sir.

Oct. Prithce, young man, don't be troublesome; but thank the rascal, that knocked me down, for your escape.

Hyp. Sir, I'd have you know, if you had not been knocked down, I should have owed my escape to the same arm you would have owed the reward for your insolence. Pray, sir, what are you? who knows you?

Oct. I'm glad, at least, to find it is not Don Philip that's my rival. [Aside,]

Ser. Sir, my master knows the gentleman very well; he belongs to the army.

Hyp. Then, sir, if you'd have me use you like a gentleman, I desire your meaning of those familiar questions you asked me at the coach-side.

Oct. Faith, young gentleman, I'll be very short: I love the lady you are to marry, and if you don't quit your pretences in two hours, it will entail perpetual danger upon you and your family.

Hyp. Sir, if you please, the danger's equal—for, rot me, if I am not as fond of cutting your throat, as you can be of mine!

Oct. If I were out of these gentlemen's hands, on my word, sir, you should not want an opportunity.

Hyp. O, sir! these gentlemen shall protect neither of us; my friend and I will be your bail from them.

Flo. Ay, sir, we'll bail you; and, if you please sir, bring your friend, I'm his. Damn me! what! d'ye think you have boys to deal with?

Oct. Sir, I ask your pardon, and shall desire to kiss your hands, about an hour hence, at—

[Whispers,]

Flo. Very well, sir, we'll meet you.

Hyp. Release the gentleman.

Ser. Sir, we dare not, without my master's order. Here he is, sir.

Enter DON MANUEL.

D. Man. How now, bully confessor? What! in limbo?

Hyp. Sir, Don Ferdinando de las Torres, whom I am proud to call my father, commanded me to deliver this into the hands of his most dear and worthy friend, Don Manuel Grimaldi, and, at the same time, gave me assurance of a kind reception.

D. Man. Sir, you are thrice welcome; let me embrace ye. I'm overjoyed to see you—Your friend, sir?

Hyp. Don Pedro Velada, my near relation, who has done me the honour of his company from Seville, sir, to assist at the solemnity of his friend's happiness.

D. Man. Sir, you are welcome; I shall be proud to know you.

Flo. You do me honour, sir.

D. Man. I hope you are not hurt, gentlemen.

Hyp. Not at all, sir; thanks to a little skill in the sword.

D. Man. I am glad of it; however, give me leave to interrupt our business for a moment, till I have done you justice on the person that offered you this insolence at my gate.

Hyp. Your pardon, sir; I understand he is a gentleman, and beg you would not let my honour suffer, by receiving a lame reparation from the law.

D. Man. A pretty mettled fellow, faith!—I must not let him fight though. [Aside.] But, sir, you don't know, perhaps, how deeply this man is your enemy.

Hyp. Sir, I know more of his spleen and folly than you imagine, which, if you please to discharge him, I'll acquaint you with.

D. Man. Discharge him! Pray consider, sir—
[They seem to talk.]

Enter VILETTA, and slips a note into OCTAVIO's hand.

Vil. Send your answer to me. [Erit VIL.]

Oct. [Aside.] Now for a beam of hope in a tempest! [Reads.] 'I charge you, don't hazard my ruin and your own, by the madness of a quarrel: the closet window, where I am, is but a step to the ground: be at the back-door of the garden exactly at the close of the evening, where you will certainly find one that may put you in the best way of getting rid of a rival.' Dear, kind creature! Now if my little don's fit of honour does but hold out to hail me, I am the happiest dog in the universe.

D. Man. Well, sir, since I find your honour is dip't so deep in the matter—here—release the gentleman.

Flo. So, sir, you have your freedom; you may depend upon us.

Hyp. You will find us punctual.—Sir, your servant,

Oct. So, now, I have a very handsome occasion to put off the tilt, too. Gentlemen, I ask your pardon; I begin to be a little sensible of the rashness I committed; and, I confess, your manner of treating me has been so very much like men of honour, that I think myself obliged, from the same principle, to assure ye, that, though I love

Rosara equal to my life, yet no consideration shall persuade me to be a rude enemy, even to my rival. I thank you for my freedom, and am your humble servant. [Erit OCT.]

Hyp. Your servant, sir—I think we released my brother very handsomely; but I ha'n't done with him. [Aside to FLORA.]

D. Man. What can this sudden turn of civility mean? I'm afraid 'tis but a cloak to some new roguery he has in his head.

Hyp. I don't know how old it may be, but my servant here has discovered a piece of villainy of his that exceeds any other he can be capable of.

D. Man. Is it possible? Why would you let him go, then?

Hyp. Because I'm sure he can do me no harm, sir.

D. Man. Pray, be plain, sir; what is it?

Hyp. This fellow can inform you—for, to say truth, he's much better at a lie. [Aside.]

D. Man. Come hither, friend; pray, what is this business?

Hyp. Ay, what was that you overheard between Octavio and another gentleman at the inn where we alighted?

Trap. Why, sir, as I was unbuckling my port-manteau in the yard there, I observed Octavio and another spark very familiar with your honour's name; upon which, sir, I pricked up the ears of my curiosity, and took in all their discourse.

D. Man. Pray, who was that other spark, friend?

Trap. A brother rake, sir; a damned sly-looking fellow.

D. Man. So!

Flo. How familiarly the rogue treats his old master! [Aside.]

Hyp. Poor Don Philip! [Aside.]

Trap. Says one of them, says he, No, damn him, the old rogue (meaning you, sir) will never let you have her by fair means; however, says Octavio, I'll try soft words; but, if those won't do, bully him, says t'other.

D. Man. Ah, poor dog! but that would not do neither, sir; he has tried them both to-day to no purpose.

Trap. Say you so, sir! then you'll find what I say is all of a piece. Well, and if neither of these will do, says he, you must e'en tilt the young prig, your rival, (meaning you, then, sir).

[To HYP.]

D. Man. Ha, ha! that, I perceive, my spark did not greatly care for.

Trap. No, sir; that, be found, was catching a Tartar. 'Sbud! my master fought like a lion, sir.

Hyp. Truly, I did not spare him.

Flo. No, faith—after he was knocked down.

[Aside.]

Trap. But now, sir, comes the cream of the roguery.

Hyp. Pray observe, sir.

Trap. Well, says Slylooks, and if all these fail, I have a rare trick in my head, that will certainly defer the marriage for three or four days at least, and, in that time, the devil's in't if you don't find an opportunity to run away with her.

D. Man. Would you so, Mr Dog? but he'll be hanged.

Hyp. O, sir, you'll find we were mighty fortunate in this discovery.

D. Man. Pray, sir, let's hear: what was this trick to be, friend?

Trap. Why, sir, to alarm you, that my master was an impostor, and that Slylooks was the true Don Philip, sent by his father, from Seville, to marry your daughter; upon which (says he) the old put (meaning you again, sir), will be so bamboozled, that—

D. Man. But pray, sir, how did young Mr Coxcomb conclude that the old put was to believe all this? Had they no sham proofs that they proposed to bamboozle me with, as you call it?

Trap. You shall hear, sir; (the plot was pretty well laid, too) I'll pretend, says he, that the rascal, your rival, (meaning you, then, sir), has robbed me of my portmanteau, where I had put all my jewels, money, and letters of recommendation from my father: we are neither of us known in Madrid, says he, so that a little impudence, and a grave face, will certainly set those dogs a snarling, while you run away with the bone. That's all, sir.

D. Man. Impudent rogue!

Hyp. What think ye, sir? Was not this business pretty handsomely laid?

Flo. Faith, it might have wrought a very ridiculous consequence.

D. Man. Why, truly, if we had not been forearmed by this discovery, for aught I know, Mr Dog might have ran away with the bone indeed; but, if you please, sir, since these ingenious gentlemen are so pert upon the matter, we'll e'en let them see, that you and I have wit enough to do our business, and e'en clap up the wedding to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Sir, you are too obliging—but will your daughter, think ye, be prevailed with?

D. Man. Sir, I'll prepare her this minute—it's pity, methinks, we relieved this bully, tho'—

Hyp. Not at all, sir; I don't suppose he can have the impudence to pursue his design; or, if he should, sir—now we know him beforehand.

D. Man. Nay, that's true, as you say—but therefore, methinks, I'd have him come: I love mightily to laugh in my sleeve at an impudent rogue, when I'm sure he can do me no harm.—Udsflesh! if he comes, the dog shan't know whether I believe him or not—I'll try if the old put can bamboozle him or no.

Hyp. 'Egad, sir, you're in the right on't; knock him down with his own weapon.

Trap. And, when he's down, I have a trick to keep him so.

Flo. The devil's in it, if we don't maul this rascal among us.

D. Man. A son of a whore—I am sorry we let him go so soon, faith.

Flo. We might as well have held him a little.

Hyp. Really, sir, upon second thoughts, I wish we had—his excusing the challenge so abruptly, makes me fancy he is in hopes of carrying his point some other way—did not you observe your daughter's woman whisper him!

D. Man. Humh!

Flo. They seem very busy, that's certain.

Hyp. I cannot say about what—but it will be worth our while to be upon our guard.

D. Man. I am alarmed.

Hyp. Where is your daughter at this time?

D. Man. I think she's pretty safe—but I'll go make her sure.

Flo. 'Twill be no harm to look about ye, sir. Where's her woman?

D. Man. I'll be upon her presently—she shall be searched for intelligence—you'll excuse me, gentlemen.

Hyp. Sir, the occasion presses you.

D. Man. If I find all safe, I'll return immediately; and then, if you please, we'll run over some old stories of my good friend Fernando.—Your servant.

[Exit DON MANUEL.]

Hyp. Sir, your most humble servant—Trapanti, thou art a rare fellow! thou hast an admirable face, and, when thou diest, I'll have thy whole statue cast all in the same metal.

Flo. 'Twere pity the rogue was not bred to the law.

Trap. So 'tis, indeed, sir—a man should not praise himself; but if I had been bred to the gown, I dare venture to say I become a lie as well as any man that wears it.

Hyp. Nay, now, thou art modest—but, sirrah, we have more work for ye: you must get in with the servants, attack the lady's woman; there, there's ammunition, rogue!—[Gives him money.]
—Now, try if you can make a breach into the secrets of the family.

Trap. Ah, sir, I warrant you—I could never yet meet with a woman that was this sort of pistol-proof—I have known a handful of these do more than a barrel of gun-powder: the French charge all their cannon with them; the only weapon in the world, sir. I remember my old master's father used to say, the best thing in the Greek grammar was—Arguriois lonchasy machou, kai panta crateseis.

[Exit TRAPPANTI.]

Hyp. Well, dear Flora, let me kiss thee: thou hast done thy part to a miracle.

Flo. 'Egad, I think so: didn't I bear up briskly? Now, if Don Philip should come while my blood's up, let him look to himself.

Hyp. We shall find him a little tough, I believe: for, poor gentleman! he is like to meet with a very odd reception from his father-in-law.

Flo. Nay, we have done his business there, I believe.

Hyp. How glibly the old gentleman swallowed Trappanti's lie!

Flo. And how rarely the rogue told it!

Hyp. And how soon it worked with him! for, if you please, says he, we'll let him see that we have wit enough to do our business, and clap up the wedding to-morrow morning.

Flo. Ah, we have it all the way—well, what must we do next?

Hyp. Why, now for the lady—I'll be a little brisk upon her, and then—

Flo. Victoria!

[Exeunt.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Continued.

Enter VILETTA hastily, DON MANUEL, and TRAPPANTI behind, observing her.

Vil. So, with much ado, I have given the old Don the slip; he has dangled with me through every room in the house, high and low, up stairs and down, as close to my tail as a great boy hankering after one of his mother's maids. Well—now we will see what monsieur Octavio says.

[Takes a letter from her bosom.]

Trap. Hist! there she is, and alone. When the devil has any thing to do with a woman, sir, that's his time to take her. Stand close.

D. Man. Ah, he's at work already—there's a letter.

Trap. Leave her to me, sir; I'll read it.

Vil. Ha, two pistoles! well, I'll say that for him, the man knows his business; his letters always come post-paid.

[While she is reading, TRAPPANTI steals behind, and looks over her shoulder.]

'Dear Viletta, convey the inclosed immediately to your mistress, and, as you prize my life, use all possible means to keep the old gentleman from the closet, till you are sure she is safe out of the window. Your real friend.'

Trap. Octavio!

[Reading.]

Vil. Ah!

[Shrieking.]

Trap. Madam, your ladyship's most humble servant.

Vil. You're very impertinent, methinks, to look over other people's letters.

Trap. Why, I never read a letter in my life without looking it over.

Vil. I don't know any business you had to look upon this.

Trap. There's the thing—your not knowing that, has put you into this passion.

Vil. You may chance to have your bones broke, Mr Coxcomb.

Trap. Sweet honeycomb! don't be so waspish; or, if I keep your counsel, d'ye see, I don't know why my bones maynt keep their places; but if I peach, whose bones will pay for it, then?

Vil. Ha! the fool says true; I had better wheedle him.

[Aside.]
Trap. My dear queen! don't be frightened—I come as a friend; now, be serious.

Vil. Well, what would you have?

Trap. Don't you love money above any thing in the world—except one?

Vil. I except nothing.

Trap. Very good—and pray, how many letters do you expect to be paid for when Octavio has married your mistress, and has no occasion to write to her? Look you, child, though you are of counsel for him, use him like a lawyer; make difficulties where there are none, that he may fee you where he needs not. Dispatch is out of practice; delay makes long bills: stick to it; once get him his cause, there's no more advice to be paid for.

Vil. What do you mean?

Trap. Why, that, for the same reason, I have no mind to put an end to my own fces by marrying my master: while they are lovers, they will always have occasion for a confidant and a pimp; but when they marry—serviteur—good night vails; our harvest is over. What d'ye think of me, now?

Vil. Why, I like what you say very well; but I don't know, my friend—to me that same face of yours looks like the title-page to a whole volume of roguery—what is it you drive at?

Trap. Money, money, money! Don't you let your mistress marry Octavio: I'll do my best to hinder my master. Let you and I lay our heads together to keep them asunder, and so make a penny of them all three.

Vil. Look you, seignior, I'll meet you half way, and confess to you I had made a rough draught of this project myself: but say I should agree with you to go on upon't, what security can you give me for performance of articles?

Trap. More than bond or judgment—my person in custody.

Vil. Ah, that won't do.

Trap. No, my love! why, there's many a sweet bit in it—taste it.

[Offering to kiss her, she puts him away.]

Vil. No.

Trap. Faith, you must give me one.

Vil. Indeed, my friend, you are too ugly for me; though I am not handsome myself, I love to play with those that are.

Trap. And yet, methinks, an honest fellow, of my size and complexion, in a careless posture, playing the fool thus with his money——

[Tosses a purse, she catches it, and he kisses her.]

Vil. Pshaw! Well, if I must, come, then—to see how a woman may be deceived at first sight of a man!

Trap. Nay, then, take a second thought of me, child. [Again.]

D. Man. Ha! this is laying their heads together indeed!

[Behind.]

Vil. Well, now get you gone; I have a letter to give to my mistress. Slip into the garden—I'll come t'ye presently.

Trap. Is't from Octavio?

Vil. Pshaw! begone, I say.

[Snatches the letter.]

Trap. Hist!

[TRAPPANTI beckons DON MANUEL, who goes softly behind.]

Vil. Madam! madam! ha!

D. Man. Now, strumpet, give me the other letter, or I'll murder you.

[Draws.]

Vil. Ah lud! oh lud! there!

[Squeaking.]

D. Man. Now, we shall see what my gentleman would be at—[Reads.]—'My dear angel!—Ha! soft and impudent!—Depend upon me 'at the garden door, by seven this evening: pity 'my impatience, and believe you can never come 'too soon to the arms of your

'OCTAVIO.'

Ah! now would this rampant rogue make no more of debauching my gentlewoman, than the gentlewoman would of him, if he were to debauch her. Hold—let's see; what does he say here—um—um!

[Reads to himself.]

Vil. What a sot was I to believe this old fool durst do me any harm! but a fright's the devil. Would I had my letters again!—though 'tis no great matter: for, as my friend Trappanti says, delaying Octavio's business is doing my own.

D. Man. [Reading.] Um—um! sure she is safe out of the window. Oh, there the mine is to be sprung, then! The gentleman makes a warm siege on't, in troth, and, one would think, was in a fair way of carrying the place, while he has such an admirable spy in the middle of the town. Now, were I to act like a true Spaniard, I ought to rip up this jade for more intelligence; but I'll be wise; a bribe and a lie will do my business a great deal better. Now, gentlewoman, what do ye think, in your conscience, I ought to do to ye?

Vil. What I think in my conscience, you'll not do to me—make a friend of me—you see, sir, I dare be an enemy.

D. Man. Nay, thou dost not want courage; I'll say that for thee; but is it possible any thing can make thee honest?

Vil. What do you suppose would make me otherwise?

D. Man. Money.

Vil. You have nicked it.

D. Man. And would the same sum make thee surely one as t'other?

Vil. That I cannot say, neither; one must be heavier than t'other, or else the scale cannot turn.

D. Man. Say it be so, would that turn thee into my interest?

Vil. The very minute you turn into mine, sir: judge yourself—here stands Octavio with a letter, and two pieces to give it to my mistress—there stand you with a hem! and four pieces—where would the letter go, d'ye think?

D. Man. There needs no more—I'm convinced, and will trust thee—there's to encourage thee before-hand, and, when thou bringest me a letter of Octavio's, I'll double the sum.

Vil. Sir, I'll do it—and will take care he shall write presently.

[Aside.]

D. Man. Now, as you expect I should believe you, begone, and take no notice of what I have discovered.

Vil. I am dumb, sir——

[Exit VILETTA.]

D. Man. So, this was done like a wise general: and, now I have taken the counterscarp, there may be some hopes of making the town capitulate. Rosara!

[Unlocks the closet.]

Enter ROSARA.

Ros. Did you call me, sir?

D. Man. Ay, child. Come, be cheerful; what I have to say to you, I'm sure ought to make you so.

Ros. He has certainly made some discovery; Viletta did not cry out for nothing—What shall I do—dissemble?

[Aside.]

D. Man. In one word, set your heart at rest, for you shall marry Don Philip this very evening.

Ros. That's but short warning for the gentleman, as well as myself; for I don't know that we ever saw one another. How are you sure he will like me?

D. Man. Oh, as for that matter, he shall see you presently; and I have made it his interest to like you—but if you are still positively resolved upon Octavio, I'll make but few words—pull off your clothes, and go to him.

Ros. My clothes, sir!

D. Man. Ay, for the gentleman shan't have a rag with you.

Ros. I am not in haste to be starved, sir.

D. Man. Then let me see you put on your best airs, and receive Don Philip as you should do.

Ros. When do you expect him, sir?

D. Man. Expect him, sir!—he has been here this hour—I only staid to get you out of the sul-lens—He's none of your hum-drums—all life and mettle! 'Odzooks, he has the courage of a cock! a duel's but a dance to him: he has been at sa! sa!—sa! for you already.

Ros. Well, sir, I shan't be afraid of his courage, since I see you are resolved he shall be the man—He shall find me a woman, sir; let him win me and wear me as soon as you please.

D. Man. Ah, now, thou art my own girl! hold but in this humour one quarter of an hour, and I'll toss thee t'other bushel of doubloons into thy portion—Here, bid a—Come, I'll fetch him myself—She's in a rare cue i'faith! ah, if he does but nick her now! [Exit DON MAN.]

Ros. Now, I have but one card to play—if that don't hit, my hopes are crushed indeed: if this young spark be not a downright coxcomb, I may have a trick to turn all yet—Dear fortune! give him but common sense, I'll make it impossible for him to like me—Here they come—

[Walks carelessly, and sings.]
I'll rove and I'll range—

Enter DON MANUEL and HYPOLITA.

Hyp. I'll love and I'll change— [Sings with her.]

D. Man. Ah, he has her, he has her!

Hyp. Madam, I kiss your ladyship's hands: I find, by your gaiety, you are no stranger to my business. Perhaps you expected I should have come in, with a grave bow and a long speech; but my affairs are in a little more haste; therefore, if you please, madam, we'll cut the work short; be thoroughly intimate at the first sight, and see one another's humours in a quarter of an hour, as well as if we had been weary of them this twelvemonth.

D. Man. Ah!

Ros. Troth, sir, I think you are very much in the right. The sooner I see you, the sooner I shall know whether I like you or not.

Hyp. Psha! as for that matter, you'll find me a very fashionable husband; I shan't expect my wife to be very fond of me.

Ros. But I love to be in the fashion too, sir, in taking the man I have a mind to.

Hyp. Say you so? why, then, take me as soon as you please.

Ros. I only stay for my mind, sir: as soon as ever that comes to me, upon my word I'm ready to wait upon you.

Hyp. Well, madam, a quarter of an hour shall break no squares—Sir, if you'll find an occasion to leave us alone, I see we shall come to a right understanding presently.

D. Man. I'll do it, sir. Well, child, speak in thy conscience, is not he a pretty fellow?

Ros. The gentleman's very well, sir; but, methinks, he is a little too young for a husband.

D. Man. Young! a fiddle! you'll find him old enough for a wife, I warrant ye. Sir, I must beg your pardon for a moment: but if you please, in the mean time, I'll leave you my daughter, and so pray make your best of her.

[Exit DON MANUEL.]

Hyp. I thank ye, sir. [HYPOLITA stands some time mute, looks carelessly at ROSARA, and she smiles as in contempt of him.] Why, now, methinks, madam, you had as good put on a real smile, for I am doomed to be the happy man, you see.

Ros. So my father says, sir.

Hyp. I'll take his word.

Ros. A bold man—but he'll break it.

Hyp. He won't.

Ros. He must.

Hyp. Whether he will or no?

Ros. He can't help it now.

Hyp. How so, pray?

Ros. Because he has promised you, you shall marry me; and he has always promised me, I should marry the man I could love.

Hyp. Ay—that is, he would oblige you to love the man you should marry.

Ros. The man that I marry will be sure of my love; but for the man that marries me—mercy on him!

Hyp. No matter for that; I'll marry you.

Ros. Come, I don't believe you are so ill-natured.

Hyp. Why, dost thou not like me, child?

Ros. Um—No.

Hyp. What's the matter?

Ros. The old fault.

Hyp. What?

Ros. I don't like you.

Hyp. Is that all?

Ros. No.

Hyp. That's hard—the rest?

Ros. That you won't like.

Hyp. I'll stand it—try me.

Ros. Why, then, in short, I like another:—another man, sir, has got into my head, and has made such work there, you'll never be able to set me to rights as long as you live—What d'ye think of me now, sir? Won't this serve for a reason why you should not marry me?

Hyp. Um—the reason is a pretty smart sort of a reason, truly: but it won't do—To be short with ye, madam, I have reason to believe I shall be disinherited if I don't marry you.

Ros. And what have you reason to believe you shall be, if you do marry me?

Hyp. In the Spanish fashion, I suppose, jealous to a degree.

Ros. You may be in the English fashion, and something else to a degree.

Hyp. Oh, if I have not courage enough to prevent that, madam, let the world think me, in the English city fashion, content to a degree. Now, here in Spain, child, we have such things as back rooms, barred windows, hard fare, poison, daggers, bolts, chains, and so forth.

Ros. Ay, sir; and there are such things as bribes, plots, shams, letters, lies, walls, ladders, keys, confidants, and so forth.

Hyp. Hey! a very complete regiment indeed! what a world of service might these do in a quarter of an hour, with a woman's courage at the head of them! Really, madam, your dress and humour have the prettiest loose French air, something so quality, that, let me die, madam, I believe in a month I should be apt to poison ye.

Ros. So, it takes! [Aside.] And, let me die, sir, I believe I should be apt to deserve it of ye.

Hyp. I shall certainly do it.

Ros. It must be in my breakfast, then—for I should certainly run away before the wedding-dinner came up.

Hyp. That's over-acted; but I'll startle her. [Aside.] Then I must tell you, madam, a Spanish husband may be provoked as well as a wife.

Ros. My life on't, his revenge is not half so sweet! and if she's provoked, 'tis a thousand to one but she licks her lips before she's nailed in her coffin!

Hyp. You are very gay, madam.

Ros. I see nothing to fright me, sir, for I cannot believe you'll marry me now—I have told you my humour: if you like it, you have a good stomach.

Hyp. Why, truly, you may probably lie a little heavy upon it, but I can better digest you than poverty: As for your inclination, I'll keep your body honest, however; that shall be locked up; and if you don't love me, then—I'll stab you.

Ros. With what? your words? it must be those you say after the priest, then—You'll be able to do very little that will reach my heart, I assure ye.

Hyp. Well, well, madam, you need not give yourself half this trouble; I am heartily convinced you will make the damned'st wife that ever poor dog of a husband wished at the devil: but really, madam, you are very unfortunate; for, notwithstanding all the mighty pains you have taken, you have met with a positive coxcomb, that's still just fool and stout enough to marry you.

Ros. 'Twill be a proof of your courage, indeed.

Hyp. Madam, you rally very well, 'tis confessed: but now, if you please, we'll be a little serious.

Ros. I think I am—What does he mean?

[Aside.]
Hyp. Come, come, this humour is as much affected as my own: I could no more bear the qualities you say you have, than I know you are guilty of them: your pretty arts in striving to avoid, have charmed me. Had you been precisely coy, or over-modest, your virtue, then, might have been suspected: your shewing me what a man of sense should hate, convinces me you know, too, what he ought to love; and she, that's once so well acquainted with the charms of virtue, never can forsake it. I both admire and love you now; you have made, what only was my interest, my happiness. At my first view, I woo'd you only to secure a sordid fortune, which now I, overjoyed, could part with, nay, with my life, with any thing, to purchase your unrivalled heart.

Ros. Now I am plunged indeed! [Aside.] Well, sir, I own you have discovered me; and, since you have obliged me to be serious, I now, from my sincerity, protest my heart's already given, from whence no power nor interest shall recall it.

Hyp. I hate my interest, and would owe no power or title, but to love.

Ros. If, as you say, you think I find a charm in virtue, you'll know, too, there's a charm in constancy. You ought to scorn me, should I flatter you with hope, since now you are assured I must be false before I can be yours. If what I have said seems cold, or too neglectful of your merit, call it not ingratitude or scorn, but faith unmoved, and justice to the man I love.

Hyp. Death! I have fooled away my hopes: she must consent, and soon, or yet I'm lost.

[Aside.]
Ros. He seems a little thoughtful; if he has honour, there may yet be hopes. [Aside.]

Hyp. It must—it can be only so; that way I make her sure, and serve my brother, too. [Aside.] Well, madam, to let you see I'm a friend to love, though love's an enemy to me, give me but a seeming proof that Octavio is the undisputed master of your heart, and I'll forego the power your father's obligations give me, and throw my hopes into his arms with you.

Ros. Sir, you confound me with this goodness! A proof! is it possible? will that content ye? Command me to what proof you please; or, if you'll trust to my sincerity, let these tears of joy convince you. Here, on my knees, by all my hopes of peace, I swear—

Hyp. Hold! swear never to make a husband, but Octavio.

Ros. I swear, and Heaven befriend me as I keep this vow inviolate!

Hyp. Rise, madam; and now receive a secret which I need not charge you to be careful of, since, as well your quiet as my own depends upon it. A little common prudence between us, in all probability, before night, may make us happy in our secret wishes.

Ros. What mean you, sir? sure you are some angel sent to my deliverance.

Hyp. Truly, madam. I have been often told so; but, like most angels of my kind, there is a mortal man in the world, who, I have a great mind should know that I am—but a woman.

Ros. A woman! are not you Don Philip?

Hyp. His shadow, madam, no more; I just run before him—nay, and after him, too.

Ros. I am confounded—a woman!

Hyp. As arrant a woman, from top to toe, as ever man run mad for.

Ros. Nay, then, you are an angel.

Hyp. Perhaps, you'll think me little a kin to one at least. Octavio, madam, your lover, is my brother; my name Hypolita; my story you shall know at leisure.

Ros. Hypolita! nay, then, from what you've said, and what I have heard Octavio say of you, I guess your story: but this was so extravagant a thought.

Hyp. That's true, madam, it—it—it was a little round about, indeed; I might have found a nearer way to Don Philip; but these men are such testy things, they can never stay one's time; always in haste, just as they please; now we are to look kind, then grave; now soft, then sincere—Fiddlestick! when, may be, a woman has a new suit of knots on her head—so, if we happen not to be in their humour, forsooth, then we coquette, and are proud and vain, and then they are to turn to fools, and tell us so; then, one pouts and the other huffs; and you see there is such a plague, that—I don't know—one does not care to be rid of them neither.

Ros. A very generous confession!

Hyp. Well, madam, now you know me thoroughly, I hope you'll think me as fit for a husband as another woman.

Ros. Then I must marry ye?

Hyp. Aye, and speedily, too; for I expect Don Philip every moment, and, if we don't look about us, he will be apt to forbid the banns.

Ros. If he comes, what shall we do?

Hyp. I am provided for him—Here comes your father—he's secure. Come, put on a dumb, consenting air, and leave the rest to me.

Ros. Well, this getting the better of my wise papa won't be the least part of my satisfaction.

Enter DON MANUEL.

D. Man. So, son, how does the battle go now? Have you cannonaded stoutly? Does she cry quarter?

Hyp. My dear father! let me embrace your knees; my life's too poor to make you a return; you have given me an empire, sir; I would not change to be grand signior.

D. Man. Ah, rogue! he has done it, he has done it; he has her! ha! is't not so, my little champion?

Hyp. Victoria, sir! the town's my own. Look here! and here, sir! thus have I been plundering this half hour; and thus, and thus, and thus, till my lips ache again. [Kisses her.]

D. Man. Ah! give me the great chair—I cannot bear my joy—You rampant rogue!

could not ye give the poor girl a quarter of an hour's warning?

Hyp. My charmer! [Embracing ROSARA.]

D. Man. Ah, my cares are over!

Hyp. Oh, I told you, sir; hearts and towns are never too strong for a surprise.

D. Man. Prithee, be quiet, I hate the sight of ye—Rosara! come hither, you wicked thing; come hither, I say.

Ros. I am glad to see you well pleased, sir.

D. Man. Oh, I cannot live—I cannot live it; it pours upon me like a torrent; I am as full as a bumper—it runs over at my eyes; I shall choke—Answer me two questions, and kill me outright.

Ros. Any thing that will make you more pleased, sir.

D. Man. Are you positively resolved to marry this gentleman?

Ros. Sir, I am convinced 'tis the first match that can make me happy.

D. Man. I am the miserablest dog alive—and I warrant you are willing to marry him to-morrow morning, if I should ask you?

Ros. Sooner, sir, if you think it necessary.

D. Man. Oh, this malicious jade has a mind to destroy me all at once—Ye cursed toad! how did you do to get in with her so?

[To HYPOLITA.]

Ros. Come, sir, take heart; your joy won't be always so troublesome.

D. Man. You lie, hussy, I shall be plagued with it as long as I live.

Hyp. You must not live above two hours, then.

[Aside.]

D. Man. I warrant this raking rogue will get her with child, too—I shall have a young squab Spaniard upon my lap, that will so grandpapa me! Well, what want you, gloomy face?

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Sir, here's a gentleman desires to speak with you; he says he comes from Seville.

D. Man. From Seville! Ha! prithee, let him go thither again—tell him, I am a little busy about being overjoyed.

Hyp. My life on it, sir, this must be the fellow that my servant told you of, employed by Octavio.

D. Man. Very likely.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. Sir, sir—News, news!

D. Man. Aye, this fellow has a good merry face, now—I like him. Well, what dost thou say, lad?—But, hold, sirrah! has any body told thee how it is with me?

Trap. Sir?

D. Man. Do you know, puppy, that I am ready to cry?

Trap. Cry, sir! for what?

D. Man. Joy! joy! you whelp; my cares are over; madam's to marry your master, sirrah, and I am as wet with joy as if I had been thrown into a sea full of good-luck. Why don't you cry, dog?

Trap. Uh! Well, sir, I do—But now, if you please, let me tell you my business.

D. Man. Well, what's the matter, sirrah?

Trap. Nay, no great matter, sir; only—Slylooks is come, that's all.

D. Man. Slylooks! what, the bamboozler!—ha, ha!

Trap. He, sir, he.

D. Man. I'm glad of it, faith—now I shall have a little diversion to moderate my joy—I'll wait on the gentleman myself—Don't you be out of the way, son; I'll be with ye presently—Oh my jaws! this fit will carry me off. Ye dear toad! good-bye. [Exit.

Hyp. Ha, ha, ha! the old gentleman's as merry as a fiddle; how he'll start when a string snaps in the middle of his tune!

Ros. At least, we shall make him change it, I believe.

Hyp. That we shall; and here comes one that's to play upon him.

Enter FLORA, hastily.

Flo. Don Philip, where are you? I must needs speak with ye. Begging your ladyship's pardon, madam. [Whispers HYPOLITA.] Stand to your arms; the enemy's at the gate, faith:—but I've just thought of a sure card to win the lady into our party.

Ros. Who can this youth be she is so familiar with? he must certainly know her business here, and she is reduced to trust him. What odd things we women are! never to know our own minds. How very humble now has her pride made her!

Hyp. [To FLORA.] I like your advice so well, that, to tell you the truth, I have made bold to take it before you gave it me.

Flo. Is it possible?

Hyp. Come, I'll introduce ye.

Flo. Then, the business is done.

Hyp. Madam, if your ladyship pleases.

[To ROSA.]

Ros. Is this gentleman your friend, sir?

Hyp. This friend, madam, is my gentlewoman, at your service.

Ros. Gentlewoman! What, are we all going into breeches, then?

Flo. That used to be my post, madam, when I wore a needle; but, now I have got a sword by my side, I shall be proud to be your ladyship's humble servant.

Ros. Troth, I think it's a pity you should either of you ever part with your swords: I never saw a prettier couple of adroit cavaliers in my life.

Flo. Egad, I don't know how it is, madam; but, methinks, these breeches give me such a mettled air, I cannot help fancying but that I left my sex at home in my petticoats.

Hyp. Why, faith, for aught I know, hadst thou been born to breeches instead of a fille de chambre, fortune might have made thee a beau garçon at the head of a regiment—But hush! there's Don Philip and the old gentleman: we must not be seen yet. If you please to retire, madam, I'll tell you how we intend to deal with them.

Ros. With all my heart—Come, ladies—Gentlemen—I beg your pardon. [Exeunt.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—Continues.

Enter DON MANUEL and DON PHILIP.

D. Man. WELL, sir; and so you were robbed of your portmanteau, you say, at Toledo, in which are all your letters and writings relating to your marriage with my daughter, and that's the reason you are come without them.

D. Phi. I thought, sir, you might reasonably take it ill I should have lain a week or two in town, without paying you my duty. I was not robbed of the regard I owe my father's friend; that, sir, I have brought with me, and 'twould have been ill manners not to have paid it at my first arrival.

D. Man. Ah, how smooth the spark is!—[Aside.] Well, sir, I am pretty considerably glad to see you; but, I hope, you'll excuse me if, in a matter of this consequence, I seem a little cautious.

D. Phi. Sir, I sha'nt propose any immediate progress in my affair, till you receive fresh advice from my father; in the mean time, I shall think myself obliged by the bare freedom of your house, and such entertainment as you'd, at least, afford a common stranger.

D. Man. Impudent rogue! the freedom of my house! yes, that he may be always at hand to secure the main chance for my friend Octavio—But now I'll have a touch of the bamboozle with him. [Aside.] Look ye, sir, while I see nothing to contradict what you say you are, d'ye see, you shall find me a gentleman.

D. Phi. So my father told me, sir.

D. Man. But, then, on the other hand, d'ye see, a man's honesty is not always written in his face; and (begging your pardon) if you should prove a damned rogue now, d'ye see?

D. Phi. Sir, I cannot, in reason, take any thing ill, that proceeds only from your caution.

D. Man. Civil rascal! [Aside.] No, no, no.

you say, I hope you won't take it ill neither; for how do I know, you know, but what you tell me (begging your pardon again, sir,) may be all a lie!

D. Phi. Another man, indeed, might say the same to you; but I shall take it kindly, sir, if you suppose me a villain no oftener than you have occasion to suspect me.

D. Man. Sir, you speak like a man of honour, it is confessed; but (begging your pardon again, sir,) so may a rascal too, sometimes.

D. Phi. But a man of honour, sir, can never speak like a rascal.

D. Man. Why, then, with your honour's leave, sir, is there nobody here in Madrid that knows you?

D. Phi. Sir, I never saw Madrid till within these two hours, though there is a gentleman in town that knew me intimately at Seville. I met him by accident at the inn where I alighted; he's known here; if it will give you any present satisfaction, I believe I could easily produce him to vouch for me.

D. Man. At the inn, say ye, did you meet this gentleman? What's his name, pray?

D. Phi. Octavio Cruzado.

D. Man. Ha, my bully confessor! this agrees word for word with honest Trappanti's intelligence—[Aside.]—Well, sir, and pray what does he give you for this job?

D. Phi. Job, sir!

D. Man. Ay, that is, do you undertake it out of good fellowship, or are you to have a sort of fellow-feeling in the matter?

D. Phi. Sir, if you believe me to be the son of Don Fernando, I must tell ye, your manner of receiving me is what you ought not to suppose can please him, or I can thank you for; if you think me an impostor, I'll ease you of the trouble of suspecting me, and leave your house, till I can bring better proofs who I am.

D. Man. Do so, friend; and in the mean time, d'ye see, pray give my humble service to the politician, and tell him, that to your certain knowledge the old fellow, the old rogue, and the old put, d'ye see, knows how to bamboozle as well as himself.

D. Phi. Politician! and bamboozle! Pray, sir, let me understand you, that I may know how to answer you.

D. Man. Come, come, don't be discouraged, friend—sometimes, you know, the strongest wits must fail. You have an admirable head, it is confessed, with as able a face to it as ever stuck upon two shoulders; but who the devil can help ill luck? for it happens at this time, d'ye see, that it won't do.

D. Phi. Won't do, sir?

D. Man. Nay, if you won't understand me now, here comes an honest fellow that will speak you point blank to the matter.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Come hither, friend; dost thou know this gentleman?

Trap. Bless me, sir! is it you? Sir, this is my old master I lived with at Seville.

D. Phi. I remember thee; thy name's Trappanti; thou wert my servant when I first went to travel.

Trap. Ay, sir, and about twenty months after you came home, too.

D. Phi. You see, sir, this fellow knows me.

D. Man. Oh, I never questioned it in the least, sir! Prithee, what's this worthy gentleman's name, friend?

Trap. Sir, your honour has heard me talk of him a thousand times; his name, sir—his name is Guzman: his father, sir, old Don Guzman, is the most eminent lawyer in Seville, was the very person that drew up the settlement and articles of my master's marriage with your honour's daughter: this gentleman knows all the particulars as well as if he had drawn them up himself: but, sir, I hope there's no mistake in them that may defer the marriage.

D. Phi. Confusion!

D. Man. Now, sir, what sort of answer d'ye think fit to make me?

D. Phi. Now, sir? that I'm obliged, in honour, not to leave your house till I at least have seen the villain that calls himself Don Philip, that has robbed me of my portmanteau, and would you, sir, of your honour and your daughter—As for this rascal—

Trap. Sir, I demand protection.

[Runs behind DON MANUEL.]

D. Man. Hold, sir; since you are so brisk, and in my own house, too—call your master, friend: you'll find we have swords within can match you.

Trap. Ay, sir, I may chance to send you one will take down your courage.

[Exit TRAPPANTI.]

D. Phi. I ask your pardon, sir; I must confess the villany I saw designed against my father's friend had transported me beyond good manners; but be assured, sir, use me henceforward as you please, I will detect it though I lose my life. Nothing shall affront me, now, till I have proved myself your friend indeed, and Don Fernando's son.

D. Man. Nay, look ye, sir, I will be very civil, too—I won't say a word—you shall e'en squabble it out by yourselves; not but, at the same time, thou art to me the merriest fellow that ever I saw in my life.

Enter HYPOLITA, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.

Hyp. Who's this that dares usurp my name, and calls himself Don Philip de las Torres?

D. Phi. Ha! this is a young competitor indeed!

[Aside.]

Flo. Is this the gentleman, sir?

D. Man. Yes, yes; that's he: ha, ha!

D. Phi. Yes, sir, I'm the man who, but this morning, lost that name upon the road. I'm informed an impudent young rascal has picked it out of some writings in the portmanteau he robbed me of, and has brought it hither before me. D'ye know any such, sir?

Flo. The fellow really does it very well, sir.

D. Man. Oh, to a miracle! [Aside.

Hyp. Prithee, friend, how long dost thou expect thy impudence will keep thee out of gaol? Could not the coxcomb, that put thee upon this, inform thee, too, that this gentleman was a magistrate?

D. Man. Well said, my little champion.

D. Phi. Now, in my opinion, child, that might as well put thee in mind of thy own condition; for, suppose thy wit and impudence should so far succeed, as to let thee ruin this gentleman's family, by really marrying his daughter, thou canst not but know 'tis impossible thou shouldst enjoy her long; a very few days must unavoidably discover thee: in the mean time, if thou wilt spare me the trouble of exposing thee, and generously confess thy roguery, thus far I'll forgive thee; but, if thou still proceedest upon his credulity to a marriage with the lady, don't flatter thyself that all her fortune shall buy off my evidence; for I'm bound in honour, as well as law, to hang thee for the robbery.

Hyp. Sir, you are extremely kind.

Flo. Very civil, 'egad.

Hyp. But may not I presume, my dear friend, this wheedle was offered as a trial of this gentleman's credulity? Ha, ha, ha!

D. Man. Indeed, my friend, 'tis a very shallow one. Canst thou think I'm such a sot as to believe, that, if he knew 'twere in thy power to hang him, he would not have run away at the first sight of thee?

Trap. Aye, sir, he must be a dull rogue indeed, that would not run away from a halter—Ha, ha, ha!

[All laugh.

D. Phi. Sir, I ask your pardon; I begin now to be a little sensible of my folly—I perceive this gentleman has done his business with you effectually: however, sir, the duty I owe my father obliges me not to leave your cause, though I'll leave your house immediately. When you see me next, you'll know Don Philip from a rascal.

D. Man. Ah, 'twill be the same if I know a rascal from Don Philip! But, if you please, sir, never give yourself any further trouble in this business; for what you have done, d'ye see, is so far from interrupting my daughter's marriage, that, with this gentleman's leave, I'm resolved to finish it this very hour; so that, when you see your friend the politician, you must tell him you had cursed luck; that's all. Ha, ha, ha!

D. Phi. Very well, sir; I may have better when I see you next.

Hyp. Look ye, sir, since your undertaking (though you designed it otherwise) has promoted my happiness, thus far I pass it by; though I question if a man, that stoops to do such base injuries, dares defend them with his sword: however, now at least you're warned; but be assured, your next attempt—

D. Phi. Will startle you, my spark. I am afraid you'll be a little humbler when you are hand-cuffed. Though you won't take my word against him, sir, perhaps another magistrate may my oath, which, because I see his marriage is in haste, I am obliged to make immediately. If he can outface the law, too, I shall be content to be the coxcomb then you think me.

[Erit DON PHILIP.

D. Man. Ah, poor fellow! he's resolved to carry it off with a good face, however. Ha, ha, ha!

Trap. Aye, sir, that's all he has for't, indeed.

Hyp. Trappanti, follow him, and do as I directed.

[Aside to TRAPPANTI.

Trap. I warrant ye, sir.

[Erit TRAPPANTI.

D. Man. Ha! my little champion, let me kiss thee; thou hast carried the day like a hero.—Man, nor woman, nothing can stand before thee. I'll make thee monarch of my daughter immediately.

Hyp. That's the Indies, sir.

D. Man. Well said, my lad—Ah, my heart's going to dance again! Prithee, let's in before it gets the better of me, and give the bride an account of thy victory.

Hyp. Sir, if you please to prepare the way, I'll march after you in form, and lay my laurels at her feet like a conqueror.

D. Man. Say'st thou so, my little soldier? Why, then, I'll send for the priest, and thou shalt be married in triumph.

[Erit DON MANUEL.

Hyp. Now, Flora.

Flo. Aye, now, madam, who says we are not politicians? I'd fain see any turn of state managed with half this dexterity. But pray, what is Trappanti detached for?

Hyp. Only to interrupt the motions of the enemy, girl, till we are safe in our trenches; for, should Don Philip chance to rally upon us with an Alguazil and a warrant, before I am fast tied to the lady, we may be routed, for all this.

Flo. Trappanti knows his business, I hope.

Hyp. You'll see presently—but hush! here comes my brother: poor gentleman! he's upon thorns, too; I have made Rosara write him a most provoking letter.

Flo. Nay, you have an admirable genius to mischief. But what has poor Octavio done to you, that he must be plagued, too?

Hyp. Well, dear Flora, don't chide; indeed this shall be the last day of my reign. Come, now, let's in, keep up the old Don's humour, and laugh at him.

Flo. Aye, there, with all my heart!

[Exeunt.]

Enter OCTAVIO with a letter, and VILETTA.

Oct. Rosara false! distraction!

Vil. Nay, don't be in such a passion.

Oct. Confess it, too! so changed within an hour!

Vil. Ah, dear sir, if you had but seen how the young gentleman laid about him, you'd ha' wondered how she held out so long.

Oct. Death! 'tis impossible!

Vil. Common, sir, common. I have known a prouder lady as nimble as she. What will you lay, that, before the moon changes, she is not false to your rival?

Oct. Don't torture me, Viletta.

Vil. Come, sir, take heart; my life on't, you'll be the happy man at last.

Oct. Thou art mad. Does she not tell me here, in her letter, she has herself consented to marry another? nay, does not she, too, insult me with a——yet loves me better than the person she's to marry?

Vil. Insult! is that the best you can make on't? Ah, you men have such heads!

Oct. What dost thou mean?

Vil. Sir, to be free with you, my mistress is grown wise at last; my advice, I perceive, begins to work with her, and your business is done.

Oct. What was thy advice?

Vil. Why, to give the post of husband to your rival, and put you in for a deputy. You know the business of the place, sir, if you mind it: by the help of a few good stars, and a little moonshine, there's many a fair perquisite may fall in your way.

Oct. Thou ravest, Viletta! 'tis impossible she can fall so low.

Vil. Ah, sir, you cannot think how love will humble a body!

Oct. I'll believe nothing ill of her, till her own mouth confess it: she can never own this letter: she cannot but know I should stab her with reproaches: therefore, dear Viletta, ease me of my torments; go this moment, and tell her I'm upon the rack till I speak with her.

Vil. Sir, I dare not for the world! the old gentleman's with her; he'll knock my brains out.

Oct. I'll protect thee with my life.

Vil. Sir, I would not venture to do it for—for—yes, I would for a pistole.

Oct. Confound her!—There, there 'tis: dear Viletta, be my friend this time, and I'll be thine for ever.

Vil. Now, sir, you deserve a friend.

[Exit VILETTA.]

Oct. Sure this letter must be but artifice, a humour to try how far my love can bear—and yet, methinks, she cannot but know the impudence of my young rival, and her father's importunity, are too pressing to allow her any time to fool away: and, if she were really false, she could not take a pride in confessing it. Death! I know not what to think: the sex is all a riddle, and we are the fools that crack our brains to expound them.

Re-enter VILETTA.

Now, dear Viletta!

Vil. Sir, she begs your pardon; they have just sent for the priest; but they will be glad to see you about an hour hence, as soon as the wedding's over.

Oct. Viletta!

Vil. Sir, she says, in short, she cannot possibly speak with you now, for she is just going to be married.

Oct. Death! daggers! blood! confusion! and ten thousand furies!

Vil. Hey-day! what's all this for?

Oct. My brains are turned, Viletta.

Vil. Aye, by my troth, so one would think, if one could but believe you had any at all: if you have three grains, I'm sure you cannot but know her compliance with this match must give her a little liberty; and can you suppose she'd desire to see you an hour hence, if she did not design to make use of it?

Oct. Use of it! Death! When the wedding's over?

Vil. Dear sir, but the bedding won't be over, and, I presume, that's the ceremony you have a mind to be master of.

Oct. Don't flatter me, Viletta.

Vil. Faith, sir, I'll be very plain: you are, to me, the dullest person I ever saw in my life; but, if you have a mind, I'll tell her you won't come.

Oct. No, don't say so, Viletta.

Vil. Then pray, sir, do as she bids you: don't stay here to spoil your own sport; you'll have the old gentleman come thundering down upon ye by-and-by, and then we shall have ye at your ten thousand furies again. Hist! Here's company; good-bye to ye.

[Exit VILETTA.]

Oct. How now, what's the meaning of this?

Enter DON PHILIP, his sword drawn, and TRAPPANTI.

D. Phi. Come, sir, there's no retreating now; this you must justify.

Trap. Sir, I will, and a great deal more; but, pray, sir, give me leave to recover my courage—I protest, the keen looks of that instrument have quite frightened it away. Pray, put it up, sir.

D. Phi. Nay, to let thee see I had rather be thy friend than enemy, I'll bribe thee to be honest. Discharge thy conscience like a man, and I'll engage to make these five ten pieces.

Enter a Servant.

Trap. Sir, your business will be done effectually.

D. Phi. Here, friend, will ye tell your master I desire to speak with him?

Oct. Don Philip!

D. Phi. Octavio! this is fortunate indeed! the only place in the world I would have wished to have found ye in.

Oct. What's the matter?

D. Phi. You'll see presently. But, prithee, how stands your affair with your mistress?

Oct. The devil take me if I can tell ye!—I don't know what to make of her; about an hour ago, she was for scaling walls to come at me; and this minute—whip, she's going to marry the stranger I told you of; nay, confesses, too, 'tis with her own consent; and yet begs, by all means, to see me as soon as her wedding's over. Is it not very pretty?

Re-enter a Servant.

D. Phi. Something gay, indeed.

Ser. Sir, my master will wait on you presently.

Oct. But the plague on't is, my love cannot bear this jesting. Well, now, how stands your affair? have you seen your mistress yet?

D. Phi. No, I can't get admittance to her.

Oct. How so?

D. Phi. When I came to pay my duty here to the old gentleman—

Oct. Here!

D. Phi. Ay, I found an impudent young rascal here before me, that had taken my name upon him, robbed me of my portmanteau, and, by virtue of some papers there, knew all my concerns to a tittle: he has told a plausible tale to her father, faced him down that I'm an impostor, and, if I don't this minute prevent him, is going to marry the lady.

Oct. Death and hell! [Aside.] What sort of fellow was this rascal?

D. Phi. A little pert coxcomb: by his impudence and dress, I guess him to be some French page.

Oct. A white wig, red coat—

D. Phi. Right; the very picture of the little Englishman we knew at Paris.

Oct. Confusion! my friend at last my rival, too—Yet hold—my rival is my friend; he owns he has not seen her yet—

[Aside.]

D. Phi. You seem concerned.

Oct. Undone for ever, unless dear Philip's still my friend.

D. Phi. What's the matter?

Oct. Be generous, and tell me, have I ever yet deserved your friendship?

D. Phi. I hope my actions have confessed it.

Oct. Forgive my fears, and, since 'tis impossible you can feel the pain of loving her you are engaged to marry, not having (as you own) yet ever seen her, let me conjure you, by all the ties of honour, friendship, and pity, never to attempt her more.

D. Phi. You amaze me!

Oct. 'Tis the same dear creature I so passionately dote on.

D. Phi. Is it possible? Nay, then, be easy in thy thoughts, Octavio; and now I dare confess the folly of my own: I'm not sorry thou art my rival here. In spite of all my weak philosophy, I must own, the secret wishes of my soul are still Hypolita's. I know not why; but yet, methinks, the unaccountable repulses I have met with here, look like an omen of some new, though far distant, hope of her. I can't help thinking, that my fortune still resolves, spite of her cruelty, to make me one day happy.

Oct. Quit but Rosara, I'll engage she shall be yours.

D. Phi. Not only that, but will assist you, with my life, to gain her: I shall easily excuse myself to my father for not marrying the mistress of my dearest friend.

Oct. Dear Philip, let me embrace you! But how shall we manage the rascal of an impostor? Suppose you run immediately, and swear the robbery against him?

D. Phi. I was just going about it; but, accidentally meeting with this fellow, has luckily prevented me, who, you must know, has been chief engineer in the contrivance against me; but, between threats, bribes, and promises, has confessed the whole roguery, and is now ready to swear it against him: so, because I understand the spark is very near his marriage, I thought this would be the best and soonest way to detect him.

Oct. That's right; the least delay might have lost all: besides, I am here to strengthen his evidence; for I can swear that you are the true Don Philip.

D. Phi. Right.

Trap. Sir, with humble submission, that will be quite wrong.

Oct. Why so?

Trap. Because, sir, the old gentleman is substantially convinced, that 'tis you who have put Don Philip upon laying this pretended claim to his daughter, purely to defer the marriage, that, in the mean time, you might get an opportunity to run away with her; for which reason, sir, you'll find your evidence will but fly in your face, and hasten the match with your rival.

D. Phi. Ha! There's reason in that. All your endeavours will but confirm his jealousy of me.

Oct. What would you have me do?

Trap. Don't appear at the trial, sir.

D. Phi. By no means! rather wait a little in the street: be within call, and leave the management to me.

Oct. Be careful, dear Philip.

D. Phi. I always used to be more fortunate in serving my friend than myself.

Oct. But, hark ye, here lives an Alguazil at the next house; suppose I should send him to you to secure the spark in the mean time?

D. Phi. Do so: we must not lose a moment.

Oct. I won't stir from the door.

D. Phi. You'll soon hear of me: away.

[Exit Oct.]

Trap. So, now I have divided the enemy, there can be no great danger if it should come to a battle—Basta! here comes our party.

D. Phi. Stand aside till I call for you.

[TRAP. retires.]

Enter DON MANUEL.

D. Man. Well, sir, what service have you to command me now, pray?

D. Phi. Now, sir, I hope my credit will stand a little fairer with you: all I beg is but your patient hearing.

D. Man. Well, sir, you shall have it. But, then, I must beg one favour of you, too, which is, to make the business as short as you can; for to tell you the truth, I am not very willing to have any farther trouble about it.

D. Phi. Sir, if I don't now convince you of your error, believe and use me like a villain; in the mean time, sir, I hope you'll think of a proper punishment for the merry gentleman that hath imposed upon you.

D. Man. With all my heart; I'll leave him to thy mercy. Here he comes; bring him to trial as soon as you please.

Enter FLORA and HYPOLITA.

Flo. So! Trippanti has succeeded; he's come without the officers.

[To Hyp.]

Hyp. Hearing, sir, you were below, I did not care to disturb the family, by putting the officers to the trouble of a needless search: let me see your warrant; I'm ready to obey it.

D. Man. Ay, where's your officer?

Flo. I thought to have seen him march in state, with an Alguazil before him.

D. Phi. I was afraid, sir, upon second thoughts, your business would not stay for a warrant, though 'tis possible I may provide for you, for I think this gentleman's a magistrate: in the mean time—O! here, I have prevailed with an alguazil to wait upon ye.

Enter Alguazil.

Alg. Did you send for me, sir?

D. Phi. Ay, secure that gentleman.

D. Man. Hold, hold, sir! all things in order: this gentleman is yet my guest; let me be first acquainted with his crime, and then I shall better know how he deserves to be treated; and that we may have no hard words upon one another, if you please, sir, let me first talk with you in private.

[They whisper.]

Hyp. Undone! that fool Trappanti, or that villain, I know not which, has at least mistaken or betrayed me! Ruined past redemption!

Flo. Our affairs, methinks, begin to look with a very indifferent face. Ha! the old Don seems surprised—I don't like that—What shall we do?

Hyp. I am at my wit's end.

[Aside.]

Flo. Then we must either confess, or to gaol, that's positive.

Hyp. I'll rather starve there than be discovered. Should he at last marry with Rosara, the very shame of this attempt would kill me.

Flo. Death! what d'ye mean? that hanging look were enough to confirm a suspicion: bear up, for shame!

Hyp. Impossible! I am dashed, confounded: if thou hast any courage left, shew it quickly. Go, speak before my fears betray me.

[Aside.]

D. Man. If you can make this appear by any witness, sir, I confess 'twill surprize me indeed.

Flo. Ay, sir, if you have any witnesses, we desire you'd produce them.

D. Phi. Sir, I have a witness at your service, and a substantial one.—Hey! Trappanti!

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Now, sir, what think ye?

Hyp. Ha! the rogue winks—then there's life again. [Aside.] Is this your witness, sir?

D. Phi. Yes, sir; this poor fellow, at last, it seems, happens to be honest enough to confess himself a rogue, and your accomplice.

Hyp. Ha, ha!

D. Phi. Ha, ha! you are very merry, sir.

D. Man. Nay, there's a jest between ye, that's certain—But, come, friend, what say you to the business? have ye any proof to offer upon oath, that this gentleman is the true Don Philip, and consequently, this other an impostor?

D. Phi. Speak boldly.

Trap. Ay, sir; but shall I come to no harm, if I do speak?

D. Man. Let it be the truth, and I'll protect thee.

Trap. Are you sure I shall be safe, sir?

D. Man. I'll give you my word of honour: speak boldly to the question.

Trap. Well, sir, since I must speak, then, in the first place, I desire your honour would be pleased to command the officer to secure that gentleman.

D. Man. How, friend!

D. Phi. Secure me, rascal!

Trap. Sir, if I can't be protected, I shall never be able to speak.

D. Man. I warrant thee—What is it you say, friend?

Trap. Sir, as I was just now crossing the street, this gentleman, with a sneer in his face, takes me by the hands, claps five pistoles in my palm, (here they are) shuts my fist close upon them; my dear friend, says he, you must do me a piece of service; upon which, sir, I bows me to the ground, and desired him to open his case.

D. Phi. What means the rascal?

D. Man. Sir, I am as much amazed as you; but pray let's hear him, that we may know his meaning.

Trap. So, sir, upon this he runs me over a long story of a sham and a flam he had just contrived, he said, to defer my master's marriage only for two days.

D. Phi. Confusion!

Flo. Nay, pray, sir, let's hear the evidence.

Trap. Upon the close of the matter, sir, I found, at last, by his eloquence, that the whole business depended upon my bearing a little false witness against my master.

Hyp. Oh, ho!

Trap. Upon this, sir, I began to demur: sir, says I, this business will never hold water; don't let me undertake it; I must beg your pardon; gave him the negative shrug, and was for sneaking off with the fees in my pocket.

D. Man. Very Well!

D. Phi. Villain!

Flo. and Hyp. Ha, ha, ha!

Trap. Upon this, sir, he catches me fast hold by the collar, whips out his poker, claps it within half an inch of my guts; now, dog! says he, you shall do it, or, within two hours, stink upon the dunghill you came from.

D. Phi. Sir, if there be any faith in mortal man—

D. Man. Nay, nay, nay, one at a time; you shall be heard presently. Go on, friend.

Trap. Having me at this advantage, sir, I began to think my wit would do me more service than my courage; so, prudently pretended, out of fear, to comply with his threats, and swallow the perjury; but, now, sir, being under protection, and at liberty of conscience, I have honesty enough, you see, to tell you the whole truth of the matter.

D. Man. Ay, this is evidence, indeed!

Omn. Ha, ha, ha!

D. Phi. Dog! villain! did not you confess to me that this gentleman picked you up, not three hours ago, at the same inn where I alighted? that he had owned his stealing my portmanteau at Toledo? that, if he succeeded to marry the lady, you were to have a considerable sum for your pains; and these two were to share the rest of her fortune between them?

Trap. O lud! O lud! Sir, as I hope to die in my bed, these are the very words he threatened to stab me if I would not swear against my master—I told him at first, sir, I was not fit for his business; I was never good at a lie in my life.

Alg. Nay, sir, I saw this gentleman's sword at his breast, out of my window.

Trap. Look ye there, sir!

D. Phi. Damnation!

Omn. Ha, ha, ha!

D. Man. Really, my friend, thou art almost turned fool in this business: if thou hadst prevailed upon this wretch to perjure himself, couldst thou think I should not have detected him? But, poor man! you were a little hard put to it, indeed; any shift was better than none, it seems: you knew 'twould not be long to the wedding. You may go, friend. [Exit ALGUAZIL.]

Flo. Ha, ha!

D. Phi. Sir, by my eternal hopes of peace and happiness, you're imposed on! If you proceed thus rashly, your daughter is inevitably ruined. If what I have said be not true in fact, as hell or he is false, may Heaven brand me with the severest marks of perjury! Defer the marriage but an hour.

D. Man. Ay, and in half that time, I suppose, you are in hopes to defer it for altogether.

D. Phi. Perdition seize me, if I have any hope or thought but that of serving you!

D. Man. Nay, now, thou art a downright distracted man—Dost thou expect I should take thy bare word, when here were two honest fellows that have just proved thee in a lie to thy face?

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Sir, the priest is come.

D. Man. Is he so? then, sir, if you please, since you see you can do me no farther service, I believe it may be time for you to go.—Come, son, now let's wait upon the bride, and put an end to this gentleman's trouble altogether.

[Exit DON MANUEL.]

Hyp. Sir, I'll wait on ye.

D. Phi. Confusion! I've undone my friend.

[Walks about.]

Flo. [Aside.] Trappanti! rogue, this was a master-piece.

Trap. [Aside.] Sir, I believe it won't be mended in haste. [Exit FLO. and TRAP.]

Hyp. Sir,

D. Phi. Ha! alone! If I were not prevented now—Well, sir.

Hyp. I suppose you don't think the favours you have designed me are to be put up without satisfaction; therefore, I shall expect to see you early to-morrow, near the Prado, with your sword in your hand; in the mean time, sir, I'm a little more in haste to be the lady's humble servant than your's. [Going.]

D. Phi. Hold, sir!—you and I can't part upon such easy terms.

Hyp. Sir!

D. Phi. You are not so near the lady, sir, perhaps, as you imagine. [D. Phi. locks the door.]

Hyp. What d'ye mean?

D. Phi. Speak softly.

Hyp. Ha!

D. Phi. Come, sir—draw.

Hyp. My ruin has now caught me: my plots are yet unripe for execution; I must not, dare not, let him know me till I am sure at least he cannot be another's—This was the very spite of fortune. [Aside.]

D. Phi. Come, sir, my time's but short.

Hyp. And mine's too precious to be lost on any thing but love; besides, this is no proper place.

D. Phi. O! we'll make shift with it.

Hyp. To-morrow, sir, I shall find a better.

D. Phi. No, now, sir, if you please—Draw, villain! or expect such usage as I'm sure Don Philip would not bear.

Hyp. A lover, sir, may bear any thing to make sure of his mistress—You know it is not fear that—

D. Phi. No evasions, sir; either this moment confess your villany, your name and fortune, or expect no mercy.

Hyp. Nay, then—within there!

D. Phi. Move but a step, or dare to raise thy voice beyond a whisper, this minute is thy last.

[Seizes her, and holds his sword to her breast.]

Hyp. Sir!

[Trembling,]

D. Phi. Villain! be quick, confess, or—

Hyp. Hold, sir!—I own I dare not fight with you.

D. Phi. No, I see thou art too poor a villain—therefore, be speedy, as thou hopest I'll spare thy life.

Hyp. Give me but a moment's respite, sir.

D. Phi. Dog! do you trifle?

Hyp. Nay, then, sir—Mercy, mercy!

[Throws herself at his feet.]

And, since I must confess, have pity on my youth, have pity on my love!

D. Phi. Thy love! what art thou, speak?

Hyp. Unless your generous compassion spares me, sure the most wretched youth, that ever felt the pangs and torments of a successful passion.

D. Phi. Art thou indeed a lover, then?—tell me thy condition?

Hyp. Sir, I confess my fortune's much inferior to my pretences in this lady, though, indeed, I'm born a gentleman; and, bating this attempt against you, which even the last extremities of a ruined love have forced me to, ne'er yet was guilty of a deed, or thought, that could debase my birth: but, if you knew the torments I have borne from her disdainful pride, the anxious days, the long-watched winter nights I have endured, to gain of her, perhaps, at last a cold relentless look, indeed, you'd pity me. My heart was so entirely subdued, the more she slighted me, the more I loved; and, as my pains increased, grew farther from cure. Her beauty struck me with that submissive awe, that, when I dared to speak, my words and looks were softer than an infant's blushes; but, all these pangs of my persisting passion still were vain; nor showers of tears, nor storms of sighs, could melt or move the frozen hardness of her dead compassion!

D. Phi. How very near my condition! [Aside.]

Hyp. But yet so subtle is the flame of love, spite of her cruelty, I nourished still a secret living hope, till hearing, sir, at last she was designed your bride, despair compelled me to this bold attempt of personating you. Her father knew not me, or my unhappy love; I knew, too, you ne'er had seen her face; and, therefore, hoped, when I should offer to repair, with twice the worth, the value, sir, I robbed you of, begging thus low for your forgiveness; I say, I hoped, at least, your generous heart, if ever it was touched like mine, would pity my distress, and pardon the necessitated wrong.

D. Phi. Is't possible? hast thou then loved to this unfortunate degree?

Hyp. Unfortunate, indeed, if you are still my rival, sir; but, were you not, I'm sure you'd pity me.

D. Phi. Nay, then, I must forgive thee; [Raising her.] for I have known too well the misery, not to pity—any thing in love.

Hyp. Have you, sir, been unhappy there?

D. Phi. Oh! thou hast probed a wound that time or art can never heal.

Hyp. O joyful sound!—[Aside.] Cherish that generous thought, and hope, from my success, your mistress, or your fate, may make you blest like me.

D. Phi. Yet, hold—nor flatter thy fond hopes too far; for, though I pity and forgive thee, yet I am bound in honour to assist thy love no farther than the justice of thy cause permits.

Hyp. What mean you, sir?

D. Phi. You must defer your marriage with this lady.

Hyp. Defer it, sir! I hope it is not her you love!

D. Phi. I have a nearest friend that is beloved, and loves her with an equal flame to yours; to him, my friendship will oblige me to be just; and, yet, in pity of thy fortune, thus far I'll be a friend to thee; give up thy title to the lady, and if her choice pronounces thee the man, I here assure thee, on my honour, to resign my claim, and, not more partial to my friend than thee, promote thy happiness.

Hyp. Alas, sir! this is no relief, but certain ruin. I am too well assured she loves your friend.

D. Phi. Then, you confess his claim the fairer: her loving him is a proof that he deserves her; if so, you are bound in honour to resign her.

Hyp. Alas, sir! women have fantastic tastes, that love they know not what, and hate they know not why; else, sir, why are you unfortunate?

D. Phi. I am unfortunate, but would rather die so, than owe my happiness to any help but an enduring love.

Hyp. But, sir, I have endured, you see, in vain—

D. Phi. If thou'dst not have me think thy story false, thy soft pretence of love a cheat, to melt me into pity, and invade my justice, yield; submit thy passion to its merit, and own I have proposed thee like a friend.

Hyp. Sir, on my knees—

D. Phi. Expect no more from me; either comply this moment, or my sword shall force thee.

Hyp. Consider, sir—

D. Phi. Nay, then, discover quick; tell me thy name and family.

Hyp. Hold, sir.

D. Phi. Speak, or thou diest.

[A noise at the door.

Hyp. Sir, I will—Ha! they are entering—O, for a moment's courage! Come on, sir!

[She breaks from him, and draws, retiring, till DON MANUEL, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI, with servants, rush in, and part them.]

D. Man. Knock him down.

Flo. Part them.

Hyp. Away, rascal! [To TRAP. who holds her.

Trap. Hold, sir! dear sir! hold; you have given him enough.

Hyp. Dog! let me go; or I'll cut away thy hold.

D. Man. Nay, dear son! hold, we'll find a better way to punish him.

Hyp. Pray, sir, give me way—a villain, to assault me in the very moment of my happiness!

[Struggling.

D. Phi. By heaven, sir, he this moment has confessed his villany, and begged my pardon upon his knees.

Hyp. D'ye hear him, sir! I beg you let me go; this is beyond bearing.

D. Phi. Thou liest, villain! 'tis thy fear that holds thee.

Hyp. Ah! let me go, I say.

Trap. Help, ho! I'm not able to hold him.

D. Man. Force him out of the room there; call an officer; in the mean time, secure him in the cellar.

D. Phi. Hear me but one word, sir.

D. Man. Stop his mouth—Out with him.

[They hurry him off.

Come, dear son! be pacified.

Hyp. A villain!

[Walking in a heat.

Flo. Why should he be concerned, now he's secure? such a rascal would but contaminate the sword of a man of honour.

D. Man. Ay, son, leave him to me and the law.

Hyp. I am sorry, sir, such a fellow should have it in his power to disturb me—But—

Enter ROSARA.

D. Man. Look; here's my daughter in a fright to see for you.

Hyp. Then, I'm composed again.

[Runs to ROSARA.

Ros. I heard fighting here; I hope you are not wounded, sir?

Hyp. I have no wound but what the priest can heal!

D. Man. Ay! well said, my little champion!

Hyp. Oh, madam, I have such a terrible escape to tell you!

[Aside.

Ros. Truly, I began to be afraid I should lose my little husband!

[Aside.

Hyp. Husband, quotha! Get me but once safe out of these breeches, if ever I wear them again—

[Aside.

D. Man. Come, come, children, the priest stays for us.

Hyp. Sir, we wait on you.

[Exeunt.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Continues.

Enter TRAPPANTI.

Trap. WHAT, in the name of roguery, can this new master of mine be? he's either a fool or bewitched, that's positive.—First, he gives me fifty pieces for helping him to marry the lady, and, as soon as the wedding is over, claps me twenty more into the other hand, to help him to get rid of her—Nay, not only that, but gives me a strict charge to observe his directions in being evidence against him as an impostor, to refund all the lies I have told in his service; to sweep him clear out of my conscience; and, now, to swear the robbery against him. What the bottom of this can be, I must confess, does a little puzzle my wit—There's but one way in the world I can solve it—He must certainly have some reason to hang himself, that he's ashamed to own; and so was resolved first to be married, that his friends might not wonder at the occasion! But, here he comes, with his noose in his hand.

Enter HYPOLITA and ROSARA.

Hyp. Trappanti, go to Don Pedro; he has business with you.

Trap. Yes, sir.

[Exit TRAP.

Ros. Who's Don Pedro, pray?

Hyp. Flora, madam; he knows her yet by no other name.

Ros. Well, if Don Philip does not think you deserve him, I'm afraid he won't find another woman that will have him in haste. But this last escape of yours was such a master-piece !

Hyp. Nay, I confess, between fear and shame, I would have given my life for a ducat.

Ros. Though I wonder, when you perceived him so sensibly touched with his old passion, how you had patience to conceal yourself any longer.

Hyp. Indeed, I could not easily have resisted it, but that I knew, if I had been discovered before my marriage with you, your father, to be sure, would have insisted then upon his contract with him, which I did not know how far Don Philip might be carried in point of honour to keep ; I knew, too, his refusing it would but the more incense the old gentleman against my brother's happiness with you ; and I found myself obliged, in gratitude, not to build my own upon the ruin of yours.

Ros. This is an obligation I never could deserve.

Hyp. Your assistance, madam, in my affair has overpaid it.

Ros. What's become of Don Philip ? I hope you have not kept him prisoner all this while ?

Hyp. Oh, he'll be released presently ; Flora has her orders. Where's your father, madam ?

Ros. I saw him go towards his closet ; I believe he's gone to fetch you part of my fortune ; he seemed in mighty good humour.

Hyp. We must be sure to keep it up as high as we can, that he may be the more stunned when he falls.

Ros. With all my heart : methinks, I am possessed with the spirit of disobedience—Now, could I, in the humour I am in, consent to any mischief that would but heartily plague my old gentleman, for daring to be better than his word to Octavio.

Hyp. And if we don't plague him—But here he comes.

Enter DON MANUEL.

D. Man. Ah, my little conqueror ! let me embrace thee !—That ever I should see this day ! this most triumphant day ! this day of all days in my life !

Hyp. Aye, and of my life, too, sir.

[Embracing him.]

D. Man. Aye, and my cares are over—now, I have nothing to do but to think of the other world, for I've done all my business in this ; got as many children as I could ; and, now I'm grown old, have set a young couple to work that will do it better.

Hyp. I warrant ye, sir, you'll soon see whether your daughter has married a man or no.

D. Man. Ah, well said ! and that you may never be out of humour with your business, look you here, children, I have brought you some trinkets that will make you merry as long as you live ; twelve thousand pistoles are the least value of them ; the rest of your fortune shall be paid in the best Barbary gold to-morrow morning.

Hyp. Aye, sir, this is speaking like a father ! this is encouragement, indeed !

D. Man. Much good may do thy heart and soul with them—and Heaven bless you together ! I have had a great deal of care and trouble to bring it about, children ; but thank my stars 'tis over—'tis over now—now, I may sleep with my doors open, and never have my slumbers broken with the fear of rogues and rivals.

Ros. Don't interrupt him, and see how far his humour will carry him.

[To HYPOLITA.]

D. Man. But there is no joy lasting in this world ; we must all die, when we have done our best, sooner or later ; old or young, prince or peasant, high or low, kings, lords, and—common whores must die ! nothing certain ; we are forced to buy one comfort with the loss of another. Now I have married my child, I have lost my companion—I have parted with my girl—her heart's gone another way now—She'll forget her old father—I shall never have her wake me more, like a cheerful lark, with her pretty songs in a morning—I shall have nobody to chat at dinner with me now, or take up a godly book, and read me to sleep in an afternoon. Ah ! these comforters are all gone now ! [Weeps.]

Hyp. How very near the extreme of one passion is to another ! Now he is tired with joy, till he is downright melancholy.

Ros. What's the matter, sir ?

D. Man. Ay, my child ! now it comes to the test, methinks, I don't know how to part with thee.

Ros. Oh, sir ! we shall be better friends than ever.

D. Man. Uh, uh ! shall we ? wilt thou come and see the old man, now and then ? Well, Heaven bless thee ! give me a kiss—I must kiss thee at parting : be a good girl, use thy husband well, make an obedient wife, and I shall die contented.

Hyp. Die, sir ! Come, come, you have a great while to live—Hang these melancholy thoughts ! they are the worst company in the world at a wedding—Consider, sir, we are young ; if you would oblige us, let us have a little life and mirth, a jubilee to-day at least ; stir your servants ; call in your neighbours ; let me see your whole family mad for joy, sir.

D. Man. Ha ! shall we ! shall we be merry, then ?

Hyp. Merry, sir ! aye, as beggars at a feast. What ! shall a dull Spanish custom tell me, when I am the happiest man in the kingdom, I shan't be as mad as I have a mind to ? Let me see the face of nothing to-day but revels, friends, feasts, and music, sir.

D. Man. Ah ! thou shalt have thy humour—thou shalt have thy humour ! Hey, within there !

rogues! dogs! slaves! where are my rascals? Ah, my joy flows again—I can't bear it.

Enter several Servants.

Serv. Did you call, sir?

D. Man. Call, sir! aye, sir. What's the reason you are not all out of your wits, sir! don't you know that your young mistress is married, scoundrels?

1st Ser. Yes, sir; and we are all ready to be mad as soon as your honour will please to give any distracted orders.

Hyp. You see, sir, they only want a little encouragement.

D. Man. Ah, there shall be nothing wanting this day, if I were sure to beg for it all my life after—Here, sirrah, cook! look into the Roman history; see what Mark Antony had for supper when Cleopatra first treated him cher entire: rogue, let me have a repast that will be six times as expensive and provoking—Go.

2d Ser. It shall be done, sir.

D. Man. And d'ye hear? one of you step to Monsieur Vendevin, the king's butler, for the same wine that his majesty reserves for his own drinking; tell him he shall have his price for it.

1st Ser. How much will you please to have, sir?

D. Man. Too much, sir: I'll have every thing on the outside of enough to day. Go you, sirrah, run to the theatre, and detach me a regiment of fiddlers, and singers, and dancers; and you, sir, to my nephew, Don Lewis; give my service, and bring all his family along with him.

Hyp. Aye, sir, this is as it should be; now, it begins to look like a wedding.

D. Man. Ah, we'll make all the hair in the world stand an end at our joy.

Hyp. Here comes Flora—Now, madam, observe your cue.

Enter FLORA.

Flo. Your servant, gentlemen—I need not wish you joy—you have it, I see—Don Philip, I must needs speak with you.

Hyp. Pshaw! Prithce, don't plague me with business at such a time as this.

Flo. My business won't be deferred, sir.

Hyp. Sir?

Flo. I suppose you guess it, sir; and I must tell you, I take it ill it was not done before.

Hyp. What d'ye mean?

Flo. Your ear, sir.

[They whisper.]

D. Man. What's the matter now, trow?

Ros. The gentleman seems very free, methinks.

D. Man. Troth, I don't like it.

Ros. Don't disturb them, sir—we shall know all presently.

Hyp. But what have you done with Don Philip?

Flo. I drew the servants out of the way, while he made his escape; I saw him very busy in the street with Octavio and another gentleman; Trappanti dogged them, and brings me word they just now went into the Corrigidore's in the next street—therefore, what we do, we must do quickly. Come, come, put on your fighting face, and I'll be with them presently. [Aside.]

Hyp. [Aloud.] Sir, I have offered you very fair; if you don't think so, I have married the lady, and take your course.

Flo. Sir, our contract was a full third; a third part's my right, and I'll have it, sir.

D. Man. Hey!

Hyp. Then, I must tell you, sir, since you are pleased to call it your right, you shall not have it.

Flo. Not, sir!

Hyp. No, sir! Look ye, don't put on your pert airs to me—'egad I shall use you very scurvily.

Flo. Use me! You little son of a whore, draw.

Hyp. Oh, sir, I am for you.

[They fight, DON MANUEL interposes.]

Ros. Ah, help! murder!

[Runs out.]

D. Man. Within there! help! murder!—Why, gentlemen, are ye mad? pray, put up.

Hyp. A rascal!

D. Man. Friends, and quarrel? for shame!

Flo. Friends! I scorn his friendship; and since he does not know how to use a gentleman; I'll do a public piece of justice, and use him like a villain.

Hyp. Let me go.

D. Man. Better words, sir.

[To FLORA.]

Flo. Why, sir, d'ye take this fellow for Don Philip?

D. Man. What do you mean, sir?

Flo. That he has cheated me as well as you—but I'll have my revenge immediately.

[Exit FLORA.]

[HYPOLITA walks about, and DON MANUEL stares.]

D. Man. Hey! what's all this? what is it—my heart misgives me.

Hyp. Hey! who waits there? Here you!—[To a servant.] bid my servant run, and hire me a coach and four horses immediately.

Serv. Yes, sir.

[Exit Servant.]

D. Man. A coach!

Enter VILETTA.

Vil. Sir, sir! bless me! what's the matter, sir? are you not well?

D. Man. Yes, yes—I am—that is—ha!

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir.

D. Man. What business can he have for a coach?

Vil. I have brought you a letter, sir, from Octavio.

D. Man. To me?

Vil. No, sir, to my mistress—he charged me to deliver it immediately, for he said it concerned her life and fortune.

D. Man. How! let's see it—There's what I promised thee—begone. What can this be now !

[Reads.] 'The person whom your father ignorantly designs you to marry, is a known cheat, and an impostor ; the true Don Philip, who is my intimate friend, will immediately appear with the Corrigidore, and fresh evidence against him. I thought this advice, though from one you hate, would be well received, if it came time enough to prevent your ruin.'

'OCTAVIO.'

Oh, my heart ! this letter was not designed to fall into my hands—I am affrighted—I dare not think on't.

Re-enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, your man is not within.

Hyp. Careless rascal ! to be out of the way when my life's at stake—Prithee, do thou go and see if thou canst get me any post-horses.

D. Man. Post horses !

Enter ROSARA.

Ros. Oh, dear sir, what was the matter ?

D. Man. Hey !—

Ros. What made them quarrel, sir ?

D. Man. Child !—

Ros. What was it about, sir ? You look concerned.

D. Man. Concerned !

Ros. I hope you are not hurt, sir. [To Hyp. who minds her not.] What's the matter with him, sir ? he won't speak to me. [To D. Man.]

D. Man. A—speak !—a—go to him again—try what fair words will do, and see if you can pick out the meaning of all this.

Ros. Dear sir ! what's the matter ? [To Hyp.]

D. Man. Ay, sir, pray what's the matter ?

Hyp. I'm a little vexed at my servant's being out of the way, and the insolence of this other rascal.

D. Man. But what occasion have you for post-horses, sir ?

Hyp. Something happens a little cross, sir.

D. Man. Pray, what is it ?

Hyp. I'll tell you another time, sir.

D. Man. Another time, sir !—pray, satisfy me now.

Hyp. Lord, sir ! when you see a man out of humour.

D. Man. Sir, it may be I'm as much out of humour as you ; and I must tell ye, I don't like your behaviour, and I'm resolved to be satisfied.

Hyp. Sir, what is it you'd have ? [Peevishly.]

D. Man. Look ye, sir—in short—I—I have received a letter.

Hyp. Well, sir.

D. Man. I wish it may be well, sir.

Hyp. Bless me, sir ! what's the matter with you ?

D. Man. Matter, sir ! In troth, I'm almost afraid and ashamed to tell ye—but if you must needs know—there's the matter, sir.

[Gives the letter.]

Enter DON LOUIS.

D. Lou. Uncle, I am your humble servant.

D. Man. I am glad to see you, nephew.

D. Lou. I received your invitation, and am come to pay my duty : but here I met with the most surprizing news.

D. Man. Pray what is it ?

D. Lou. Why, first your servant told me my young cousin was to be married to-day to Don Philip de las Torres ; and, just as I was entering your doors, who should I meet but Don Philip, with the Corrigidore and several witnesses, to prove, it seems, that the person whom you were just going to marry my cousin to, has usurped his name, betrayed you, robbed him, and is, in short, a rank impostor !

Hyp. So, now, its come home to him.

D. Man. Dear nephew ! don't torture me. Are you sure you know Don Philip when you see him ?

D. Lou. Know him, sir ! were we not school-fellows, fellow-collegians, and fellow-travellers ?

D. Man. But are you sure you may not have forgot him, neither ?

D. Lou. You might as well ask me if I had not forgot you, sir.

D. Man. But one question more, and I am dumb for ever—is that he ?

D. Lou. That, sir ! no, nor in the least like him—But, pray, why this concern ? I hope we are not come too late to prevent the marriage ?

D. Man. Oh, oh, oh, oh ! my poor child !

Ros. Oh ! [Seems to faint.]

Enter VILETTA.

Vil. What's the matter, sir !

D. Man. Ah ! look to my child.

D. Lou. Is this the villain, then, that has imposed on you ?

Hyp. Sir, I'm this lady's husband, and, while I'm sure that name can't be taken from me, I shall be contented with laughing at any other you or your party dare give me.

D. Man. Oh !

D. Lou. Nay, then, within there—such a villain ought to be made an example.

Enter Corrigidore and Officers, with DON PHILIP, OCTAVIO, FLORA, and TRAPPANTI.

Oh, gentlemen, we're undone ! all comes too late ! my poor cousin's married to the impostor !

D. Phi. How !

Oct. Confusion !

D. Man. Oh, oh !

D. Phi. That's the person, sir, and I demand your justice.

Oct. And I.

Flo. And all of us.

D. Man. Will my cares never be over !

Cor. Well, gentlemen, let me rightly understand what 'tis you charge him with, and I'll commit him immediately—First, sir, you say these gentlemen all know you to be the true Don Philip ?

D. Lou. That, sir, I presume, my oath will prove.

Oct. Or mine,

Flo. And mine.

Trap. Ay, and mine, too, sir.

D. Man. Where shall I hide this shameful head?

Flo. And for the robbery, that I can prove upon him; he confessed to me at Toledo he stole this gentleman's portmanteau there to carry on his design upon this lady, and agreed to give me a third part of her fortune, for my assistance, which he refusing to pay as soon as the marriage was over, I thought myself obliged, in honour, to discover him.

Hyp. Well, gentlemen, you may insult me if you please; but, I presume, you'll hardly be able to prove that I'm not married to the lady, or have not the best part of her fortune in my pocket: so, do your worst; I own my ingenuity, and am proud on't.

D. Man. Ingenuity, abandoned villain!—But, sir, before you send him to gaol, I desire he may return the jewels I gave him as part of my daughter's portion.

Cor. That can't be, sir—since he has married the lady, her fortune is lawfully his. All we can do, is to prosecute him for robbing this gentleman.

D. Man. Oh, that ever I was born!

Hyp. Return the jewels, sir! If you don't pay me the rest of her fortune to-morrow morning, you may chance to go to gaol before me.

D. Man. Oh, that I were buried! will my cars never be over?

Hyp. They are pretty near it, sir; you can't have much more to trouble you.

Cor. Come, sir, if you please, I must desire to take your affidavit in writing.

[Goes to the table with FLORA.]

D. Phi. Now, sir, you see what your own rashness has brought ye to. How shall I be stared at when I give an account of this to my father, or your friends in Seville! you'll be the public jest; your understanding, or your folly, will be the mirth of every table.

D. Man. Pray forbear, sir.

Hyp. Keep it up, madam. [Aside to ROSARA.]

Ros. Oh, sir! how wretched have you made me! Is this the care you have taken of me, for my blind obedience to your commands? this my reward for filial duty?

D. Man. Ah, my poor child!

Ros. But I deserve it all for ever listening to your barbarous proposal, when my conscience might have told me my vows and person, in justice and honour, were the wronged Octavio's.

D. Man. Oh, oh!

Oct. Can she repent her falsehood then, at last! Is't possible! then I'm wounded, too! Oh, my poor, undone Rosara! [Goes to her.] Ungrateful! cruel! perjured man! how canst thou bear to see the light, after this heap of ruin thou hast raised, by tearing thus asunder the most solemn vows of plighted love!

D. Man. Oh, don't insult me; I deserve the worst you can say—I'm a miserable wretch, and I repent me.

Oct. Repent! canst thou believe whole years of sorrow will atone thy crime? No; groan on; sigh and weep away thy life to come, and, when the stings and horrors of thy conscience have laid thy tortured body in the grave—then, then—as thou dost me, when it is too late, I'll pity thee.

Vil. So! here's the lady in tears, the lover in rage, the old gentleman out of his senses, most of the company distracted, and the bridegroom in a fair way to be hanged—the merriest wedding that ever I saw in my life!

Cor. Well, sir, have you any thing to say, before I make your warrant? [To HYPOLITA.]

Hyp. A word or two, and I obey ye, sir—Gentlemen, I have reflected on the folly of my action, and foresee the disquiets I am like to undergo in being this lady's husband; therefore, as I own myself the author of all this seeming ruin and confusion, so I am willing (desiring first the officers may withdraw), to offer something to the general quiet.

Oct. What can this mean?

D. Phi. Psha! some new contrivance—Let's be gone.

D. Lou. Stay a moment; it can be no harm to hear him—Sir, will you oblige us?

Cor. Wait without— [Exeunt Officers.]

Vil. What's to be done now, trow?

Trap. Some smart thing, I warrant ye: the little gentleman hath a notable head, faith!

Flo. Nay, gentlemen, thus much I know of him, that if you can but persuade him to be honest, 'tis still in his power to make you all amends, and, in my opinion, 'tis high time he should propose it.

D. Man. Ay, 'tis time he were hanged, indeed, for I know no other amends he can make us.

Hyp. Then, I must tell you, sir, I owe you no reparation; the injuries which you complain of, your sordid avarice, and breach of promise here, have justly brought upon you—Had you, as you were obliged, in conscience and in nature, first given your daughter with your heart, she had now been honourably happy; and, if any, I the only miserable person here.

D. Lou. He talks reason.

D. Phi. I don't think him in the wrong there, indeed.

Hyp. Therefore, sir, if you are injured, you may thank yourself for it.

D. Man. Nay, dear sir—I do confess my blindness, and could heartily wish your eyes, or mine, had dropped out of our heads before ever we saw one another.

Hyp. Well, sir, (however little you have deserved it) yet, for your daughter's sake, if you'll oblige yourself, by signing this paper, to keep your first promise, and give her, with her full fortune, to this gentleman, I'm still content, on that condition, to disannul my own pretences, and resign her.

Oct. Ha! what says he?

D. Lou. This is strange!

D. Man. Sir, I don't know how to answer you; for I can never believe you'll have good-nature enough to hang yourself out of the way, to make room for him.

Hyp. Then, sir, to let you see I have not only an honest meaning, but an immediate power, to make good my word, I first renounce all title to her fortune; these jewels, which I received from you, I give him free possession of; and now, sir, the rest of her fortune you owe him with her person.

Oct. I am all amazement!

D. Lou. What can this end in?

D. Phi. I am surprized, indeed!

D. Man. This is unaccountable, I must confess—But still, sir, if you disannul your pretences, how you'll persuade that gentleman, to whom I am obliged by contract, to part with his—

D. Phi. That, sir, shall be no let; I am too well acquainted with the virtue of my friend's title, to entertain a thought that can disturb it.

Hyp. Then my fears are over.—[Aside.]—Now, sir, it only stops at you.

D. Man. Well, sir, I see the paper is only conditional, and, since the general welfare is concerned, I won't refuse to lend you my helping hand to it; but, if you should not make your words good, sir, I hope you won't take it ill if a man should poison you?

D. Phi. And, sir, let me, too, warn you how you execute this promise; your flattery and dissembled penitence have deceived me once already, which makes me, I confess, a little slow in my belief; therefore, take heed! expect no second mercy; for, be assured of this, I never can forgive a villain.

Hyp. If I am proved one, spare me not—I ask but this—Use me as you find me.

D. Phi. That you may depend on.

D. Man. There, sir.

[Gives HYPOLITA the writing signed.]

Ros. Now, I tremble for her.

[Aside.]

Hyp. And now, Don Philip, I confess you are the only injured person here.

D. Phi. I know not that—do my friend right, and I shall easily forgive thee.

Hyp. His pardon, with his thanks, I am sure I shall deserve; but how shall I forgive myself? Is there, in nature, left a means that can repair the shameful slights, the insults, and the long disquiets you have known from love?

D. Phi. Let me understand thee!

Hyp. Examine well your heart; and, if the fierce resentment of its wrongs has not extinguished quite the usual soft compassion there, revive at least one spark, in pity of my woman's weakness.

D. Man. How! a woman!

D. Phi. Whither wouldst thou carry me?

Hyp. Not but I know you generous as the heart of love; yet let me doubt if even this low submission can deserve your pardon—don't look on me: I cannot bear that you should know me yet. The extravagant attempt I have this day run through, to meet you thus, justly may subject me to your contempt and scorn, unless the same forgiving goodness that used to overlook the failings of Hypolita prove still my friend, and soften all with the excuse of love.

Oct. My sister! Oh, Rosara! Philip!

[All seem amazed.]

D. Phi. Oh, stop this vast effusion of my transported thoughts! ere my offending wishes break their prison through my eyes, and surfeit on forbidden hopes again: or, if my tears are false, if your relenting heart is touched at last in pity of my enduring love, be kind at once, speak on, and awake me to the joy, while I have sense to hear you.

Hyp. Nay, then I am subdued indeed! Is it possible, spite of my follies, still your generous heart can love? 'Tis so! Your eyes confess it, and my fears are dead. Why, then, should I blush, to let at once the honest fulness of my heart gush forth?

Oh, Philip! Hypolita is—yours for ever!

[They advance slowly, and at last rush into one another's arms.]

D. Phi. Oh, ecstasy! Distracting joy! Do I then live to call you mine? Is there an end, at last, of my repeated pangs, my sighs, my torments, and my rejected vows? Is it possible—is it she? Oh, let me view thee thus with aching eyes, and feed my eager sense upon the transport of thy love confessed! What, kind! and yet—it is, it is Hypolita! and yet 'tis she! I know her by the busy pulses at my heart, which only love like mine can feel, and she alone can give.

[Eagerly embracing her.]

Hyp. Now, Philip, you may insult our sex's pride, for I confess you have subdued it all in me; I plead no merit but my knowing yours; I own the weakness of my boasted power, and now am only proud of my humility.

D. Phi. Oh, never! never shall thy empire cease! 'Tis not in thy power to give thy power away: this last surprise of generous love has bound me to thy heart, a poor indebted wretch, for ever.

Hyp. No more; the rest the priest should say—but now our joys grow rude—here are our friends, that must be happy, too.

D. Phi. Louis! Octavio! my brother now! oh, forgive the hurry of a transported heart!

D. Man. A woman! and Octavio's sister!

Oct. That heart that does not feel, as 'twere its own, a joy like this, ne'er yet confessed the power of friendship nor of love.

[Embracing him.]

D. Man. Have I then been pleased, and plagued, and frightened out of my wits by a woman all this while? Odsbud, she is a notable contriver! Stand clear, ho! for if I have not a fair brush at her lips—nay, if she does not give me the hearty smack, too, odswinds and thunder! she is not the good-humoured girl I took her for.

Hyp. Come, sir, I won't baulk your good humour.—[He kisses her.—And now I have a favour to beg of you: you remember your promise; only your blessing here, sir.

[OCTAVIO and ROSARA kneel.]

D. Man. Ah! I can deny thee nothing; and, since I find thou art not fit for my girl's business thyself, odzooks! it shall never be done out of the family—and so, children, Heaven bless you together! Come, I'll give you her hand myself, you know the way to her heart; and, as soon as the priest has said grace, he shall toss you the rest of her body into the bargain. And now my cares are over again.

Oct. We'll study to deserve your love, sir.—Oh, Rosara!

Ros. Now, Octavio, do you believe I loved you better than the person I was to marry?

Oct. Kind creature! you were in her secret, then?

Ros. I was, and she in mine.

Oct. Sister! what words can thank you?

Hyp. Any that tell me of Octavio's happiness.

D. Phi. My friend successful too! Then, my joys are double. But how this generous attempt was started first; how it has been pursued, and carried with this kind surprise at last, gives me wonder equal to my joy.

Hyp. Here is one, that, at more leisure, shall inform you all: she was ever a friend to your love, has had a hearty share in the fatigue, and now I am bound in honour to give her part of the garland, too.

D. Phi. How! she?

Flo. Trusty Flora, sir, at your service. I have had many a battle with my lady upon your account; but I always told her we should do her business at last.

D. Man. Another metamorphosis! Brave girls, faith! Odzooks, we shall have them make campaigns shortly!

D. Phi. Take this as an earnest of my thanks; in Seville, I'll provide for thee.

Hyp. Nay, here's another accomplice, too—confederate I cannot say; for honest Trappanti did not know but that I was as great a rogue as himself.

Trap. 'Tis a folly to lie; I did not indeed, madam—But the world cannot say I have been a rogue to your ladyship—and, if you had not parted with your money—

Hyp. Thou hadst not parted with thy honesty.

Trap. Right, madam; but how should a poor naked fellow resist, when he had so many pistoles held against him?

[Shows money.]

D. Man. Aye, aye; well said, lad.

Vil. La! a tempting bait, indeed! let him offer to marry me again, if he dares.

[Aside.]

D. Phi. Well, Trappanti, thou hast been serviceable, however, and I'll think of thee.

Oct. Nay, I am his debtor, too.

Trap. Ah, there's a very easy way, gentlemen, to reward me; and, since you partly owe your happiness to my roguery, I should be very proud to owe mine only to your generosity.

Oct. As how, pray?

Trap. Why, sir, I find, by my constitution, that it is as natural to be in love as an hungry, and that I ha'n't a jot less stomach than the best of my betters; and, though I have often thought a wife but dining every day upon the same dish, yet, methinks, it's better than no dinner at all: and, for my part, I had rather have no stomach to my meat, than no meat to my stomach: upon which consideration, gentlemen and ladies, I desire you'll use your interest with Madona here—to let me dine at her ordinary.

D. Man. A pleasant rogue, faith! Odzooks! the jade shall have him. Come, hussy, he's an ingenious person.

Vil. Sir, I don't understand his stuff; when he speaks plain, I know what to say to him.

Trap. Why, then, in plain terms, let me a lease of your tenement—marry me.

Vil. Aye, now you say something—I was afraid, by what you said in the garden, you had only a mind to be a wicked tenant at will.

Trap. No, no, child; I have no mind to be turned out at a quarter's warning.

Vil. Well, there's my hand—and now meet me as soon as you will with a canonical lawyer, and I'll give you possession of the rest of the premises.

D. Man. Odzooks! and well thought of! I'll send for one presently. Hear you, sirrah! run to Father Benedict again, tell him his work don't hold here; his last marriage is broke to pieces; but now we have got better tackle, he must come and stitch two or three fresh couple together, as fast as he can.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, the music's come.

D. Man. Ah, they could never take us in a better time—let them enter—Ladies, and sons and daughters, for I think you are all akin to me now, will you be pleased to sit?

[After the entertainment]

S E

D. Man. Come, gentlemen, now our collation waits.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, the priest's come.

D. Man. That's well; we'll dispatch him presently.

D. Phi. Now, my Hypolita,
Let our example teach mankind to love,

From thine the fair their favours may improve;

To the quick pains you give our joys we owe,
Till those we feel, these we can never know.

But warned with honest hope from my success,

Even in the height of all its miseries,

Oh, never let a virtuous mind despair,

For constant hearts are love's peculiar care.

Scene—Windsor.

ACT I.

SCENE I.—SIR CHARLES EASY'S lodgings.

Enter LADY EASY.

Lady Easy. WAS ever woman's spirit, by an injurious husband, broke like mine? A vile licentious man! must he bring home his follies, too? Wrong me with my very servant! O! how tedious a relief is patience! and yet, in my condition, 'tis the only remedy: for to reproach him with my wrongs, is taking on myself the means of a redress, bidding defiance to his falsehood, and naturally but provokes him to undo me. The uneasy thought of my continual jealousy may tease him to a fixed aversion; and hitherto, though he neglects, I cannot think he hates me. It must be so: since I want power to please him, he never shall upbraid me with an attempt of making him uneasy—My eyes and tongue shall yet be blind and silent to my wrongs; nor would I have him think my virtue could suspect him, till, by some gross, apparent proof of his misdoing, he forces me to see—and to forgive it.

Enter EDGING, hastily.

Edg. O madam!

Lady Easy. What's the matter?

Edg. I have the strangest thing to shew your ladyship—such a discovery——

Lady Easy. You are resolved to make it without much ceremony, I find. What's the business, pray?

Edg. The business, madam! I have not patience to tell you; I am out of breath at the very thoughts on't; I shall not be able to speak this half hour.

Lady Easy. Not to the purpose, I believe! but, methinks, you talk impertinently with a great deal of ease.

Edg. Nay, madam, perhaps not so impertinent as your ladyship thinks; there is that will speak to the purpose, I am sure—A base man—

[Gives a letter.]

Lady Easy. What is this? An open letter! Whence comes it?

Edg. Nay, read it, madam; you will soon guess—If these are the tricks of husbands, keep me a maid still, say I.

Lady Easy. [Looking on the superscription.] To Sir Charles Easy! Ha! Too well I know this hateful hand. O my heart! but I must veil my jealousy, which 'tis not fit this creature should suppose I am acquainted with. [Aside.] This direction is to your master; how came you by it?

Edg. Why, madam, as my master was lying down, after he came in from hunting, he sent me into his dressing-room, to fetch his snuff-box out of his waistcoat pocket; and so, as I was searching for the box, madam, there I found this wicked letter from a mistress; which I had no sooner read, but, I declare it, my very blood rose at him again; methought I could have torn him and her to pieces.

Lady Easy. Intolerable! This odious thing's jealous of him herself, and wants me to join with her in a revenge upon him—Sure I am fallen, indeed! But 'twere to make me lower yet, to let her think I understand her. [Aside.]

Edg. Nay, pray, madam, read it; you will be out of patience at it.

Lady Easy. You are bold, mistress; has my indulgence, or your master's good humour, flattered you into the assurance of reading his letters? a liberty I never gave myself—Here—lay it where you had it immediately—Should he know of your sauciness, 'twould not be my favour could protect you. [Exit LADY EASY.]

Edg. Your favour! marry come up! sure I don't depend upon your favour! It's not come to that, I hope. Poor creature!—don't you think I am my master's mistress for nothing—You shall find, madam, I won't be snapt up as I have been—Not but it vexes me to think she should not be as uneasy as I. I am sure he is a base man to me, and I could cry my eyes out that she should not think him as bad to her every jot. If I am wronged, sure she may very well expect it, that is but his wife—A conceited thing—she need not be so easy, neither—I am as handsome as she, I hope—Here's my master—I'll try whether I am to be huffed by her or no. [Walks behind.]

Enter SIR CHARLES EASY.

Sir Cha. So! The day is come again!—Life but rises to another stage, and the same dull journey is before us. How like children do we judge of happiness! When I was stinted in my fortune, almost every thing was a pleasure to me, because most things then being out of my reach, I had always the pleasure of hoping for them; now, fortune's in my hand, she is as insipid as an old acquaintance—It is mighty silly faith! Just the same thing by my wife, too; I am told she is extremely handsome—nay, and have heard a great many people say, she is certainly the best woman in the world—Why, I don't know but she may; yet I could never find that her person or good qualities gave me any concern. In my eye, the woman has no more charms than my mother.

Edg. Hum! he takes no notice of me yet—I'll let him see I can take as little notice of him. [She walks by him gravely; he turns her about and holds her; she struggles.] Pray, sir!

Sir Cha. A pretty pert air, that—I'll humour it—What's the matter, child? Are not you well? Kiss me, hussy.

Edg. No, the deuce fetch me if I do!

Sir Cha. Has any thing put thee out of humour, love?

Edg. No, sir, 'tis not worth my being out of humour at—though, if ever you have any thing to say to me again, I'll be burned.

Sir Cha. Somebody has belied me to thee.

Edg. No, sir, 'tis you have belied yourself to me—Did not I ask you, when you first made a fool of me, if you would be always constant to me? and did not you say, I might be sure you would? And here, instead of that, you are going on in your old intrigue with my lady Graveairs.

Sir Cha. So——

Edg. Beside, don't you suffer my lady to huff me every day as if I were her dog, or had no more concern with you—I declare I won't bear it, and she shan't think to huff me—for aught I know, I am as agreeable as she: and though she dares not take any notice of your baseness to her, you shan't think to use me so—and so, pray, take your nasty letter—I know the hand well enough—for my part, I won't stay in the family to be abused at this rate: I that have refused lords and dukes for your sake. I'd have you to know, sir, I have had as many blue and green ribbons after me, for aught I know, as would have made me a falbala apron.

Sir Cha. My lady Graveairs! my nasty letter! and I won't stay in the family! Death! I'm in a pretty condition!—What an unlimited privilege has this jade got from being a whore!

Edg. I suppose, sir, you think to use every body as you do your wife.

Sir Cha. My wife! hah! Come hither, Mrs Edging; hark you, drab.

[Seizing her by the shoulder.]

Edg. Oh!

Sir Cha. When you speak of my wife, you are to say your lady, and you are never to speak of your lady to me in any regard of her being my wife—for, look you, child, you are not her strumpet, but mine; therefore, I only give you leave to be saucy with me. In the next place, you are never to suppose there is any such person as my lady Graveairs; and lastly, my pretty one, how came you by this letter?

Edg. It's no matter, perhaps.

Sir Cha. Aye, but if you should not tell me quickly, how are you sure I won't take a great piece of flesh out of your shoulder?—My dear.

[Shakes her.]

Edg. O lud! O lud! I will tell you, sir.

Sir Cha. Quickly then.

Edg. Oh! I took it out of your pocket, sir.

Sir Cha. When?

Edg. Oh! this morning, when you sent me for your snuff-box.

Sir Cha. And your ladyship's pretty curiosity has looked it over, I presume—ha?

[Shakes her again.]

Edg. O lud! dear sir, don't be angry—indeed I'll never touch one again.

Sir Cha. I don't believe you will, and I'll tell you how you shall be sure you never will.

Edg. Yes, sir.

Sir Cha. By stedfastly believing, that the next time you offer it, you will have your pretty white neck twisted behind you.

Edg. Yes, sir.

[Curt'sying.]

Sir Cha. And you will be sure to remember every thing I have said to you?

Edg. Yes, sir.

Sir Cha. And now, child, I was not angry with your person, but your follies; which, since I find you are a little sensible of—don't be wholly discouraged—for I believe I—I shall have occasion for you again—

Edg. Yes, sir.

Sir Cha. In the mean time, let me hear no more of your lady, child.

Edg. No, sir.

Sir Cha. Here she comes: begone!

Edg. Yes, sir—Oh! I was never so frightened in my life.

[Exit.]

Sir Cha. So! good discipline makes good soldiers—It often puzzles me to think, from my own carelessness, and my wife's continual good humour, whether she really knows any thing of the strength of my forces—I'll sift her a little.

Enter LADY EASY.

My dear, how do you do? You are dressed very early to-day: are you going out?

Lady Easy. Only to church, my dear.

Sir Cha. Is it so late, then?

Lady Easy. The bell has just rung.

Sir Cha. Well, child, how does Windsor air agree with you? Do you find yourself any better yet? or have you a mind to go to London again?

Lady Easy. No, indeed, my dear; the air is so very pleasant, that if it were a place of less company, I could be content to end my days here.

Sir Cha. Prithee, my dear, what sort of company would most please you?

Lady Easy. When business would permit it, yours; and, in your absence, a sincere friend, that were truly happy in an honest husband, to sit a cheerful hour, and talk in mutual praise of our condition.

Sir Cha. Are you then really very happy, my dear?

Lady Easy. Why should you question it?

[Smiling on him.]

Sir Cha. Because I fancy I am not so good to you as I should be.

Lady Easy. Pshaw!

Sir Cha. Nay, the deuce take me if I don't really confess myself so bad, that I have often wondered how any woman of your sense, rank, and person, could think it worth her while to have so many useless good qualities.

Lady Easy. Fie, my dear!

Sir Cha. By my soul, I am serious!

Lady Easy. I cannot boast of my good qualities, nor, if I could, do I believe you think them useless.

Sir Cha. Nay, I submit to you—Don't you find them so? Do you perceive that I am one tittle the better husband for your being so good a wife?

Lady Easy. Pshaw! you jest with me.

Sir Cha. Upon my life I don't—Tell me truly, was you never jealous of me?

Lady Easy. Did I ever give you any sign of it?

Sir Cha. Um—that's true—but do you really think I never gave you occasion?

Lady Easy. That's an odd question—but suppose you had?

Sir Cha. Why then, what good has your virtue done you, since all the good qualities of it could not keep me to yourself?

Lady Easy. What occasion have you given me to suppose I have not kept you to myself?

Sir Cha. I given you occasion—Fie! My dear—you may be sure—I—look you, that is not the thing, but still a—(death! what a blunder have I made?)—a—still, I say, madam, you shan't make me believe you have never been jealous of me; not that you ever had any real cause, but I know women of your principles have more pride than those that have no principles at all; and where there is pride, there must be some jealousy—so that, if you are jealous, my dear, you know you wrong me, and—

Lady Easy. Why, then, upon my word, my dear, I don't know that ever I wronged you that way in my life.

Sir Cha. But suppose I had given a real cause to be jealous, how would you do then?

Lady Easy. It must be a very substantial one that makes me jealous.

Sir Cha. Say it were a substantial one; suppose, now, I were well with a woman of your own acquaintance, that, under pretence of frequent visits to you, should only come to carry on an affair with me—suppose, now, my lady Graveairs and I were great?

Lady Easy. Would I could not suppose it!

[Aside.]

Sir Cha. If I come off here, I believe I am pretty safe. [Aside.—Suppose, I say, my lady Graveairs and I were so very familiar, that not only yourself, but half the town should see it?

Lady Easy. Then I should cry myself sick in some dark closet, and forget my tears when you spoke kindly to me.

Sir Cha. The most convenient piece of virtue, sure, that ever wife was mistress of. [Aside.

Lady Easy. But pray, my dear, did you ever think that I had any ill thoughts of my lady Graveairs?

Sir Cha. O fie, child! only you know she and I used to be a little free sometimes; so I had a mind to see if you thought there was any harm in it; but since I find you very easy, I think myself obliged to tell you, that, upon my soul, my dear, I have so little regard to her person, that the deuce take me, if I would not as soon have an affair with thy woman.

Lady Easy. Indeed, my dear, I should as soon suspect you with one as t'other.

Sir Cha. Poor dear—should'st thou—give me a kiss.

Lady Easy. Pshaw! you don't care to kiss me.

Sir Cha. By my soul, I do!——I wish I may die, if I don't think you a very fine woman!

Lady Easy. I only wish you would think me a good wife. [Kisses her.] But pray, my dear, what has made you so strangely inquisitive?

Sir Cha. Inquisitive!—Why—a—I don't know, one is always saying one foolish thing or another—Toll le roll! [Sings and talks.] My dear, what! are we never to have any ball here! Toll le roll! I fancy I could recover my dancing again, if I would but practise. Toll loll loll!

Lady Easy. This excess of carelessness to me excuses half his vices. If I can make him once think seriously—Time yet may be my friend.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Sir, lord Morelove gives his service—

Sir Cha. Lord Morelove? where is he?—

Ser. At the Chocolate-house; he called me to him as I went by, and bid me tell your honour he'll wait upon you presently.

Lady Easy. I thought you had not expected him here again this season, my dear.

Sir Cha. I thought so, too; but you see there's no depending upon the resolution of a man that's in love.

Lady Easy. Is there a chair?

Ser. Yes, madam. [Exit Servant.

Lady Easy. I suppose lady Betty Modish has drawn him hither.

Sir Cha. Aye, poor soul, for all his bravery, I am afraid so.

Lady Easy. Well, my dear, I ha'nt time to ask my lord how he does now; you'll excuse me to him, but I hope you'll make him dine with us.

Sir Cha. I'll ask him. If you see lady Betty at prayers, make her dine, too; but don't take any notice of my lord's being in town.

Lady Easy. Very well! if I should not meet her there, I'll call at her lodgings.

Sir Cha. Do so.

Lady Easy. My dear, your servant.

[Exit LADY EASY.]

Sir Cha. My dear, I'm yours.——Well! one way or other, this woman will certainly bring about her business with me at last; for though she cannot make me happy in her own person, she lets me be so intolerably easy with the women that can, that she has at least brought me into a fair way of being as weary of them, too.

Enter Servant and LORD MORELOVE.

Ser. Sir, my lord's come.

Lord Mor. Dear Charles!

Sir Cha. My dear lord! this is an happiness undreamt of; I little thought to have seen you at Windsor again this season! I concluded, of course, that books and solitude had secured you 'till winter.

Lord Mor. Nay, I did not think of coming myself, but I found myself not very well in London; so I thought—a—little hunting, and this air——

Sir Cha. Ha! ha! ha!

Lord Mor. What do you laugh at?

Sir Cha. Only because you should not go on with your story: if you did but see how silly a man fumbles for an excuse, when he is a little ashamed of being in love, you would not wonder what I laugh at; ha, ha, ha!

Lord Mor. Thou art a very happy fellow——nothing touches thee—always easy—Then you conclude I follow lady Betty again?

Sir Cha. Yes, faith do I: and, to make you easy, my lord, I cannot see why a man, that can ride fifty miles after a poor stag, should be ashamed of running twenty in chase of a fine woman, that, in all probability, will show him so much the better sport, too. [Embracing.

Lord Mor. Dear Charles, don't flatter my distemper; I own I still follow her: do you think her charms have power to excuse me to the world?

Sir Cha. Aye! aye! a fine woman's an excuse for any thing, and the scandal of our being in jest, is a jest itself; we are all forced to be their fools, before we can be their favourites.

Lord Mor. You are willing to give me hope; but I can't believe she has the least degree of inclination for me.

Sir Cha. I don't know that—I am sure her pride likes you, and that's generally your fine ladies' darling passion.

Lord Mor. Do you suppose, if I could grow indifferent, it would touch her?

Sir Cha. Sting her to the heart——Will you take my advice?

Lord Mor. I have no relief but that. Had I not thee now and then to talk an hour, my life were insupportable.

Sir Cha. I am sorry for that, my lord;—but mind what I say to you—but hold, first let me know the particulars of your quarrel with her.

Lord Mor. Why—about three weeks ago, when I was last here at Windsor, she had for some days treated me with a little more reserve, and another with more freedom, than I found myself easy at.

Sir Cha. Who was that other?

Lord Mor. One of my lord Foppington's gang—the pert coxcomb that's just come to a small estate and a great periwig—he that sings himself among the women—What do you call him?—He won't speak to a commoner when a lord is in company—you always see him with a cane dangling at his button, his breast open, no gloves, one eye tucked under his hat, and a tooth-pick—Startup, that's his name.

Sir Cha. O! I have met him in a visit—but pray go on.

Lord Mor. So, disputing with her about the conduct of women, I took the liberty to tell her how far I thought she erred in hers. She told me I was rude, and that she would never believe any man could love a woman, that thought her in the wrong in any thing she had a mind to, at least if he dared to tell her so. This provoked me into her whole character, with so much spirit and civil malice, as I have seen her bestow upon a woman of true beauty, when the men first toasted her; so, in the middle of my wisdom, she told me, she desired to be alone, that I would take my odious proud heart along with me, and trouble her no more—I—bowed very low, and, as I left the room, vowed I never would, and that my proud heart should never be humbled by the outside of a fine woman—About an hour after, I whipped into my chaise for London, and have never seen her since.

Sir Cha. Very well; and how did you find your proud heart by that time you got to Hounslow?

Lord Mor. I am almost ashamed to tell you—I found her so much in the right, that I cursed my pride for contradicting her at all, and began to think, according to her maxim, that no woman could be in the wrong to a man that she had in her power.

Sir Cha. Ha, ha! Well, I'll tell you what you shall do. You can see her without trembling, I hope?

Lord Mor. Not if she receives me well.

Sir Cha. If she receives you well, you will have no occasion for what I am going to say to you—first you shall dine with her.

Lord Mor. How! where! when!

Sir Cha. Here! here! at two o'clock.

Lord Mor. Dear Charles!

Sir Cha. My wife is gone to invite her; when you see her first, be neither too humble, nor too stubborn; let her see, by the ease in your behaviour, you are still pleased in being near her, while she is upon reasonable terms with you. This will either open the door of an eclaircissement, or quite shut it against you—and if she is still resolved to keep you out—

Lord Mor. Nay, if she insults me, then, perhaps, I may recover pride enough to rally her by an overacted submission.

Sir Cha. Why, you improve, my lord! this is the very thing I was going to propose to you.

Lord Mor. Was it, faith! hark you, dare you stand by me?

Sir Cha. Dare I! aye, to my last drop of assurance, against all the insolent airs of the proudest beauty in Christendom.

Lord Mor. Nay, then, defiance to her—We two—Thou hast inspired me—I find myself as valiant as a flattered coward.

Sir Cha. Courage, my lord; I'll warrant we beat her.

Lord Mor. My blood stirs at the very thought on't: I long to be engaged.

Sir Cha. She will certainly give ground, when she once sees you are thoroughly provoked.

Lord Mor. Dear Charles, thou art a friend, indeed!

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Sir, my lord Foppington gives his service, and, if your honour's at leisure, he'll wait on you as soon as he is dressed.

Lord Mor. Lord Foppington! Is he in town?

Sir Cha. Yes; I heard last night he was come. Give my service to his lordship, and tell him I should be glad he will do me the honour of his company here at dinner. [Exit Servant.] We may have occasion for him in our design upon Lady Betty.

Lord Mor. What use can we make of him?

Sir Cha. We'll see when he comes; at least, there is no danger in him; but I suppose you know he is your rival.

Lord Mor. Pshaw! a coxcomb.

Sir Cha. Nay, don't despise him neither—he is able to give you advice; for, though he is in love with the same woman, yet, to him, she has not charms enough to give a minute's pain.

Lord Mor. Prithee, what sense has he of love?

Sir Cha. Faith, very near as much as a man of sense ought to have; I grant you he knows not how to value a woman truly deserving, but he has a pretty just esteem for most ladies about town.

Lord Mor. That he follows, I grant you—for he seldom visits any of extraordinary reputation.

Sir Cha. Have a care! I have seen him at lady Betty Modish's.

Lord Mor. To be laughed at.

Sir Cha. Don't be too confident of that; the women now begin to laugh with him, not at him: for he really sometimes rallies his own humour with so much ease and pleasantry, that a great many women begin to think he has no follies at all, and those he has, have been as much owing to his youth, and a great estate, as want of natural wit: 'tis true, he often is a bubble to his pleasures, but he has always been wisely vain enough to keep himself from being too much the ladies' humble servant in love.

Lord Mor. There, indeed, I almost envy him.

Sir Cha. The easiness of his opinion upon the sex, will go near to pique him—We must have him.

Lord Mor. As you please—but what shall we do with ourselves till dinner?

Sir Cha. What think you of a party at picquet?

Lord Mor. O! you are too hard for me.

Sir Cha. Fie! fie! when you play with his grace?

Lord Mor. Upon my honour, he gives me three points.

Sir Cha. Does he? Why, then, you shall give me but two—Here, fellow, get cards. Allons!

[Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—LADY BETTY MODISH'S lodgings.

Enter LADY BETTY, and LADY EASY, meeting.

Lady Bet. Oh, my dear! I am overjoyed to see you! I am strangely happy to-day! I have just received my new scarf from London, and you are most critically come to give me your opinion of it.

Lady Easy. Oh, your servant, madam; I am a very indifferent judge, you know. What, is it with sleeves?

Lady Bet. Oh, 'tis impossible to tell you what it is!—'Tis all extravagance, both in mode and fancy, my dear. I believe there's six thousand yards of edging in it—Then, such an enchanting slope from the elbow—something so new, so lively, so noble, so coquette and charming—but you shall see it, my dear——

Lady Easy. Indeed, I won't, my dear; I am resolved to mortify you for being so wrongfully fond of a trifle.

Lady Bet. Nay, now, my dear, you are ill-natured.

Lady Easy. Why, truly, I'm half angry to see a woman of your sense so warmly concerned in the care of her outside; for, when we have taken our best pains about it, 'tis the beauty of the mind alone that gives us lasting virtue.

Lady Bet. Ah, my dear! my dear! you have been a married woman to a fine purpose, indeed, that know so little of the taste of mankind. Take my word, a new fashion upon a fine woman is often a greater proof of her value, than you are aware of.

Lady Easy. That I can't comprehend; for you see among the men, nothing's more ridiculous than a new fashion. Those of the first sense are always the last that come into them.

Lady Bet. That is, because the only merit of a man is his sense; but, doubtless, the greatest value of woman is her beauty. An homely woman, at the head of a fashion, would not be allowed in it by the men, and consequently not followed by the women: so that, to be successful in one's fancy, is an evident sign of one's being admired; and I always take admiration for the best proof of beauty, and beauty certainly is the source of power, as power, in all creatures, is the height of happiness.

Lady Easy. At this rate, you would rather be thought beautiful than good?

Lady Bet. As I had rather command, than obey: the wisest homely woman can't make a man of sense of a fool; but the veriest fool of a beauty shall make an ass of a statesman; so that, in short, I can't see a woman of spirit has any business in this world but to dress—and make the men like her.

Lady Easy. Do you suppose this is a principle the men of sense will admire you for?

Lady Bet. I do suppose, that when I suffer any man to like my person, he shan't dare to find fault with my principle.

Lady Easy. But men of sense are not so easily humbled.

Lady Bet. The easiest of any; one has ten thousand times the trouble with a coxcomb.

Lady Easy. Nay, that may be; for I have seen you throw away more good humour, in hopes of a tendresse from my lord Foppington, who loves all women alike, than would have made my lord Morelove perfectly happy, who loves only you.

Lady Bet. The men of sense, my dear, make the best fools in the world: their sincerity and good breeding throws them so entirely into one's power, and gives one such an agreeable thirst of using them ill, to shew that power—'tis impossible not to quench it.

Lady Easy. But, methinks, my lord Morelove's manner to you might move any woman to a kinder sense of his merit.

Lady Bet. Aye, but would it not be hard, my dear, for a poor weak woman to have a man of his quality and reputation in her power, and not to let the world see him there? Would any creature sit new dressed all day in her closet? Could you bear to have a sweet-fancied suit, and never shew it at the play, or the drawing-room?

Lady Easy. But one would not ride in it, methinks, or harass it out, when there's no occasion.

Lady Bet. Pooh! my lord Morelove's a mere Indian damask, one can't wear him out; o' my conscience, I must give him to my woman at last; I begin to be known by him: had not I best leave him off, my dear? for, poor soul, I believe I have a little fretted him of late.

Lady Easy. Now, 'tis to me amazing, how a man of his spirit can bear to be used like a dog for four or five years together—but nothing's a wonder in love; yet pray, when you found you could not like him at first, why did you ever encourage him?

Lady Bet. Why, what would you have one do? for my part, I could no more choose a man by my eye, than a shoe; one must draw them on a little, to see if they are right to one's foot.

Lady Easy. But I'd no more fool on with a man I could not like, than I'd wear a shoe that pinched me.

Lady Bet. Aye, but then a poor wretch tells one, he'll widen them, or do any thing, and is so civil and silly, that one does not know how to turn such a trifle, as a pair of shoes, or an heart, upon a fellow's hands again.

Lady Easy. Well; I confess you are very happily distinguished among most women of fortune, to have a man of my lord Morelove's sense and quality so long and honourably in love with you; for, now-a-days, one hardly ever hears of such a thing as a man of quality in love with the woman he would marry. To be in love, now, is only to have a design upon a woman, a modish way of declaring war against her virtue, which they generally attack first, by toasting up her vanity.

Lady Bet. Aye, but the world knows, that is not the case between my lord and me.

Lady Easy. Therefore, I think you happy.

Lady Bet. Now, I don't see it; I'll swear I'm better pleased to know there are a great many foolish fellows of quality that take occasion to toast me frequently.

Lady Easy. I vow I should not thank any gentleman for toasting me, and I have often wondered how a woman of your spirit could bear a great many other freedoms I have seen some men take with you.

Lady Bet. As how, my dear? Come, prithee, be free with me, for, you must know, I love dearly to hear my faults—Who is't you have observed to be too free with me?

Lady Easy. Why, there's my lord Foppington; could any woman but you bear to see him with a respectful flier stare full in her face, draw up his breath, and cry—Gad, you're handsome?

Lady Bet. My dear, fine fruit will have flies about it; but, poor things, they do it no harm: for, if you observe, people are generally most apt to choose that the flies have been busy with, ha, ha, ha!

Lady Easy. Thou art a strange giddy creature!

Lady Bet. That may be from so much circulation of thought, my dear.

Lady Easy. But my lord Foppington's married, and one would not fool with him, for his lady's sake; it may make her uneasy, and——

Lady Bet. Poor creature! Her pride, indeed, makes her carry it off without taking any notice of it to me; though I know she hates me in her heart, and I cannot endure malicious people; so I used to dine with her once a week, purely to give her disorder; if you had but seen when my lord and I fooled a little, the creature looked so ugly!

Lady Easy. But I should not think my reputation safe; my lord Foppington's a man that talks often of his amours, but seldom speaks of favours that are refused him.

Lady Bet. Pshaw! will any thing a man says make a woman less agreeable? Will his talking spoil one's complexion, or put one's hair out of order? and for reputation—look you, my dear, take it for a rule, that, as amongst the lower rank of people, no woman wants beauty that has fortune; so, among people of fortune, no woman wants virtue, that has beauty: but an estate and beauty joined, are of an unlimited, nay, a power pontifical, make one not only absolute, but infallible—A fine woman's never in the wrong; or, if we were, 'tis not the strength of a poor creature's reason that can unfetter him. Oh, how I love to hear a wretch curse himself for loving on, or now and then coming out with a——

*Yet for the plague of human race,
This devil has an angel's face.*

Lady Easy. At this rate, I don't see you allow reputation to be at all essential to a fine woman?

Lady Bet. Just as much as honour to a great man. Power is always above scandal. Don't you hear people say the king of France owes most of his conquests to breaking his word, and would not the confederates have a fine time on't, if they were only to go to war with reproaches? Indeed, my dear, that jewel reputation is a very fanciful business! One shall not see a homely creature in town, but wears it in her mouth as monstrously as the Indians do bobs at their lips, and it really becomes them just alike.

Lady Easy. Have a care, my dear, of trusting too far to power alone: for nothing is more ridiculous than the fall of pride; and woman's pride, at best, may be suspected to be more a distrust, than a real contempt of mankind: for, when we have said all we can, a deserving husband is certainly our best happiness; and I don't question but my lord Morelove's merit, in a little time, will make you think so, too; for, whatever airs you give yourself to the world, I'm sure your heart don't want good-nature.

Lady Bet. You are mistaken; I am very ill-natured, though your good-humour won't let you see it.

Lady Easy. Then, to give me a proof on't, let me see you refuse to go immediately and dine with me, after I have promised sir Charles to bring you.

Lady Bet. Pray, don't ask me.

Lady Easy. Why?

Lady Bet. Because, to let you see I hate good-nature, I'll go without asking, that you mayn't have the malice to say I did you a favour.

Lady Easy. Thou art a mad creature.

[Exeunt arm in arm.]

SCENE II.—Changes to SIR CHARLES'S lodgings. LORD MORELOVE and SIR CHARLES at picquet.

Sir Cha. Come, my lord, one single game for the tout, and so have done.

Lord More. No, hang them, I have enough of them! ill cards are the dullest company in the world—How much is it?

Sir Cha. Three parties.

Lord More. Fifteen pounds—very well.

[While LORD MORELOVE counts out his money, a servant gives SIR CHARLES a letter, which he reads to himself.]

Sir Cha. [To the Servant.—Give my service; say I have company dines with me; if I have time I'll call there in the afternoon—ha, ha, ha!

[Exit Servant.]

Lord More. What's the matter? there—

[Paying the money.]

Sir Cha. The old affair—my lady Graveairs.

Lord More. Oh! Prithee, how does that go on?

Sir Cha. As agreeably as a chancery suit: for now it comes to the intolerable plague of my not being able to get rid on't; as you may see—

[Giving the letter.]

Lord More. [Reads.—'Your behaviour, since I came to Windsor, has convinced me of your villainy, without my being surprised, or angry at it. I desire you would let me see you at my lodgings immediately, where I shall have a better opportunity to convince you, that I never can, or positively will, be as I have been.—Yours, &c. A very whimsical letter! Faith, I think she has hard luck with you: if a man were obliged to have a mistress, her person and condition seem to be cut out for the ease of a lover: for she's a young, handsome, wild, well-jointed widow—But what's your quarrel?'

Sir Cha. Nothing—She sees the coolness happens to be first on my side, and her business with me now, I suppose, is to convince me how heartily she's vexed that she was not before-hand with me.

Lord More. Her pride, and your indifference, must occasion a pleasant scene, sure; what do you intend to do?

Sir Cha. Treat her with a cold familiar air, till I pique her to forbid me her sight, and then take her at her word.

Lord More. Very gallant and provoking.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Sir, my lord Foppington—

[Exit Servant.]

Sir Cha. Oh—now, my lord, if you have a mind to be let into the mystery of making love without pain, here's one that's a master of the art, and shall declaim to you—

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

My dear lord Foppington!

Lord Fop. My dear agreeable! Que je t'embrasse! Pardi! Il y a cent ans que je ne t'ai vu—my lord, I am your lordship's most obedient humble servant.

Lord More. My lord, I kiss your hands—I hope we shall have you here some time; you seem to have laid in a stock of health to be in at the diversions of the place—You look extremely well.

Lord Fop. To see one's friends look so, my lord, may easily give a vermeille to one's complexion.

Sir Cha. Lovers in hope, my lord, always have a visible brilliant in their eyes and air.

Lord Fop. What dost thou mean, Charles?

Sir Cha. Come, come, confess what really brought you to Windsor, now you have no business there?

Lord Fop. Why, two hours, and six of the best nags in Christendom, or the devil drive me!

Lord More. You make haste, my lord.

Lord Fop. My lord, I always fly when I pursue—But they are all well kept, indeed—I love to have creatures go as I bid them. You have seen them, Charles; but so has all the world; Foppington's long tails are known on every road in England.

Sir Cha. Well, my lord, but how came they to bring you this road? You don't use to take these irregular jaunts, without some design in your head, of having more than nothing to do.

Lord Fop. Pshaw! Pox! Prithee, Charles, thou knowest I am a fellow sans consequence, be where I will.

Sir Cha. Nay, nay, this is too much among friends, my lord; come, come, we must have it; your real business here?

Lord Fop. Why, then, entre nous, there is a certain fille de joye about the court, here, that loves winning at cards better than all the things I have been able to say to her,—so I have brought an odd thousand bill in my pocket, that I design, tête-à-tête, to play off with her at picquet, or so; and now the business is out.

Sir Cha. Ah, and a very good business, too, my lord.

Lord Fop. If it be well done, Charles—

Sir Cha. That's as you manage your cards, my lord.

Lord More. This must be a woman of consequence, by the value you set upon her favours.

Sir Cha. Oh, nothing's above the price of a fine woman.

Lord Fop. Nay, look you, gentlemen, the price may not happen to be altogether so high, neither—For I fancy I know enough of the game, to make it an even bet, I get her for nothing.

Lord More. How so, my lord?

Lord Fop. Because, if she happen to lose a good sum to me, I shall buy her with her own money.

Lord More. That's new, I confess.

Lord Fop. You know, Charles, 'tis not impossible but I may be five hundred pounds deep with her—then, bills may fall short, and the devil's in't if I want assurance to ask her to pay some way or other.

Sir Cha. And a man must be a churl, indeed, that won't take a lady's personal security; ha, ha, ha!

Lord Fop. He, he, he! Thou art a devil, Charles!

Lord More. Death! How happy is this coxcomb?

[Aside.

Lord Fop. But, to tell you the truth, gentlemen, I had another pressing temptation that brought me hither, which was—my wife.

Lord More. That's kind, indeed; my lady has been here this month: she'll be glad to see you.

Lord Fop. That I don't know; for I design this afternoon to send her to London.

Lord More. What! the same day you come, my lord? that would be cruel.

Lord Fop. Aye, but it will be mighty convenient; for she is positively of no manner of use in my amours.

Lord More. That's your fault; the town thinks her a very deserving woman.

Lord Fop. If she were a woman of the town, perhaps I should think so, too; but she happens to be my wife, and, when a wife is once given to deserve more than her husband's inclinations can pay, in my mind she has no merit at all.

Lord More. She's extremely well-bred, and of a very prudent conduct.

Lord Fop. Um—aye—the woman's proud enough.

Lord More. Add to this, all the world allows her handsome.

Lord Fop. The world's extremely civil, my lord; and I should take it as a favour done me, if they could find an expedient to unmarry the poor woman from the only man in the world that cannot think her handsome.

Lord More. I believe there are a great many in the world that are sorry 'tis not in their power to unmarry her.

Lord Fop. I am a great many in the world's very humble servant; and, whenever they find it is in their power, their high and mighty wisdoms may command me at a quarter of an hour's warning.

Lord More. Pray, my lord, what did you marry for?

Lord Fop. To pay my debts at play, and disinherit my younger brother.

Lord More. But there are some things due to a wife.

Lord Fop. And there are some debts I don't care to pay—to both which I plead—husband, and—my lord.

Lord More. If I should do so, I should expect to have my own coach stopt in the street, and to meet my wife with the windows up in a hackney.

Lord Fop. Then would I put in bail, and order a separate maintenance.

Lord More. So, pay the double the sum of the debt, and be married for nothing.

Lord Fop. Now, I think deferring a dun, and getting rid of one's wife, are two the most agreeable sweets in the liberties of an English subject.

Lord More. If I were married, I would as soon part from my estate as my wife.

Lord Fop. Now, I would not; sun-burn me if I would!

Lord More. Death! but, since you are so indifferent, my lord, why would you needs marry a woman of so much merit? Could not you have laid out your spleen upon some ill-natured shrew, that wanted the plague of an ill husband, and have let her alone to some plain, honest man of quality, that would have deserved her?

Lord Fop. Why, faith, my lord, that might have been considered; but I really grew so passionately fond of her fortune, that, curse catch me, I was quite blind to the rest of her good qualities: for, to tell you the truth, if it had been possible the old put of a peer could have tossed me in t'other five thousand for them, by my consent, she should have relinquished her merit and virtues to any of her other sisters.

Sir Cha. Aye, aye, my lord; virtues in a wife are good for nothing but to make her proud, and put the world in mind of her husband's faults.

Lord Fop. Right, Charles: and, strike me blind, but the women of virtue are now grown such idiots in love, that they expect of a man, just as they do of a coach-horse, that's one appetite, like t'other's flesh, should increase by feeding.

Sir Cha. Right, my lord; and don't consider, that toujours chapons bouillis will never do with an English stomach.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha! To tell you the truth,

Charles, I have known so much of that sort of eating, that I now think, for an hearty meal, no wild fowl in Europe is comparable to a joint of Banstead mutton.

Lord Mor. How do you mean?

Lord Fop. Why that, for my part, I had rather have a plain slice of my wife's woman, than my guts full of e'er an Ortolan dutchess in Christendom.

Lord Mor. But, I thought, my lord, your chief business now at Windsor had been your design upon a woman of quality.

Lord Fop. That's true, my lord; though I don't think your fine lady the best dish myself, yet a man of quality can't be without such things at his table.

Lord Mor. Oh, then, you only desire the reputation of an affair with her?

Lord Fop. I think the reputation is the most inviting part of an amour with most women of quality.

Lord Mor. Why so, my lord?

Lord Fop. Why, who the devil would run through all the degrees of form and ceremony, that lead one up to the last favour, if it were not for the reputation of understanding the nearest way to get over the difficulty?

Lord Mor. But, my lord, does not the reputation of your being so general an undertaker frighten the women from engaging with you? For, they say, no man can love but one at a time.

Lord Fop. That's just one more than ever I came up to: for, stop my breath, if ever I loved in my life!

Lord Mor. How do you get them, then?

Lord Fop. Why, sometimes, as they get other people: I dress, and let them get me; or, if that won't do, as I got my title, I buy them.

Lord Mor. But, how can you, that profess indifference, think it worth your while to come so often up to the price of a woman of quality?

Lord Fop. Because, you must know, my lord, that most of them begin, now, to come down to reason; I mean those that are to be had; for some die fools: but, with the wiser sort, 'tis not, of late, so very expensive; now and then, a partie quarré, a jaunt or two in a hack to an Indian house, a little china, an odd thing for a gown, or so; and, in three days after, you meet her at the conveniency of trying it chez Mademoiselle d'Epingle.

Sir Cha. Aye, aye, my lord; and when you are there, you know, what between a little chat, a dish of tea, mademoiselle's good humour, and a petit chanson or two, the devil's in't if a man can't fool away the time, 'till he sees how it looks upon her by candle-light.

Lord Fop. Heh! heh! well said, Charles; egad, I fancy that and I have unlaced many a reputation there!—Your great lady is as soon undressed as her woman

Lord Mor. I could never find it so—the shame or scandal of a repulse always made me afraid of attempting women of condition.

Sir Cha. Ha, ha! egad, my lord, you deserve to be ill used; your modesty's enough to spoil any woman in the world. But my lord and I understand the sex a little better; we see plainly, that women are only cold, as some men are brave, from the modesty or fear of those that attack them.

Lord Fop. Right, Charles—a man should no more give up his heart to a woman, than his sword to a bully; they are both as insolent as the devil after it.

Sir Cha. How do you like that, my lord?

[Aside to LORD MORELOVE.]

Lord Mor. Faith, I envy him!—But, my lord, suppose your inclination should stumble upon a woman truly virtuous, would not a severe repulse from such an one put you strangely out of countenance?

Lord Fop. Not at all, my lord—for, if a man don't mind a box o' the ear in a fair struggle with a fresh country girl, why the deuce should he be concerned at an impertinent frown for an attack upon a woman of quality?

Lord Mor. Then, you have no notion of a lady's cruelty?

Lord Fop. Ha, ha! let me blood, if I think there's a greater jest in nature! I am ready to crack my guts with laughing, to see a senseless flirt, because the creature happens to have a little pride, that she calls virtue, about her, give herself all the insolent airs of resentment and disdain to an honest fellow, that, all the while, does not care three pinches of snuff if she and her virtue were to run, with their last favours, through the first regiment of guards!—Ha, ha! it puts me in mind of an affair of mine, so impertinent!—

Lord Mor. Oh, that's impossible, my lord!—Pray, let's hear it.

Lord Fop. Why, I happened once to be very well in a certain man of quality's family, and his wife liked me!

Lord Mor. How do you know she liked you?

Lord Fop. Why, from the very moment I told her I liked her, she never durst trust herself at the end of a room with me.

Lord Mor. That might be her not liking you.

Lord Fop. My lord—Women of quality don't use to speak the thing plain—but, to satisfy you I did not want encouragement, I never came there in my life, but she did immediately smile, and borrow my snuff-box.

Lord Mor. She liked your snuff, at least—Well, but how did she use you?

Lord Fop. By all that's infamous, she jilted me!

Lord Mor. How! Jilt you?

Lord Fop. Ay, death's curse, she jilted me!

Lord Mor. Pray, let's hear,

Lord Fop. For, when I was pretty well convinced she had a mind to me, I one day made her a hint of an appointment: upon which, with an insolent frown in her face (that made her look as ugly as the devil,) she told me, that, if ever I came thither again, her lord should know that she had forbidden me the house before.—Did you ever hear of such a slut?

Sir Cha. Intolerable!

Lord Mor. But, how did her answer agree with you?

Lord Fop. Oh, passionately well! for I stared full in her face, and burst out a laughing; at which, she turned upon her heel, and gave a crack with her fan, like a coach-whip, and bridled out of the room with the air and complexion of an incensed Turkey-cock.

[A servant whispers SIR CHARLES.

Lord Mor. What did you, then?

Lord Fop. I—looked after her, gaped, threw up the sash, and fell a singing out of the window—so that, you see, my lord, while a man is not in love, there's no great affliction in missing one's way to a woman.

Sir Cha. Aye, aye, you talk this very well, my lord; but, now, let's see how you dare behave yourself upon action—dinner's served, and the ladies stay for us—There's one within, has been too hard for as brisk a man as yourself.

Lord Mor. I guess who you mean—Have a care, my lord; she'll prove your courage for you.

Lord Fop. Will she? then she's an undone creature. For, let me tell you, gentlemen, courage is the whole mystery of making love, and of more use than conduct is in war; for the bravest fellow in Europe may beat his brains out against the stubborn walls of a town—But —Women, born to be controlled,

Stoop to the forward, and the bold. [Exeunt.

ACT III.

SCENE I.—Continues.

Enter LORD MORELOVE, and SIR CHARLES.

Lord Mor. So! Did not I bear up bravely?

Sir Cha. Admirably! with the best bred insolence in nature; you insulted like a woman of quality, when her country-bred husband's jealous of her in the wrong place.

Lord Mor. Ha, ha! Did you observe, when I first came into the room, how carelessly she brushed her eyes over me; and, when the company saluted me, stood all the while with her face to the window? ha, ha!

Sir Cha. What astonished airs she gave herself, when you asked her, what made her so grave upon her old friends!

Lord Mor. And, whenever I offered any thing in talk, what affected care she took to direct her observations of it to a third person!

Sir Cha. I observed she did not eat above the rump of a pigeon all dinner time.

Lord Mor. And how she coloured when I told her her ladyship had lost her stomach!

Sir Cha. If you keep your temper, she's undone.

Lord Mor. Provided she sticks to her pride, I believe I may.

Sir Cha. Aye! never fear her; I warrant, in the humour she is in, she would as soon part with her sense of feeling.

Lord Mor. Well, what's to be done next?

Sir Cha. Only observe her motions: for, by her behaviour at dinner, I am sure she designs to gall you with my lord Foppington: if so, you must even stand her fire, and then play my lady Graveairs upon her, whom I'll immediately pique, and prepare for your purpose.

Lord Mor. I understand you—the proper-est woman in the world, too: for, she'll certainly encourage the least offer from me, in hopes of revenging her slights upon you.

Sir Cha. Right; and the very encouragement she gives you, at the same time, will give me a pretence to widen the breach of my quarrel with her.

Lord Mor. Besides, Charles, I own I am fond of any attempt that will forward a misunderstanding there, for your lady's sake. A woman, so truly good in her nature, ought to have something more from a man, than bare occasions to prove her goodness.

Sir Cha. Why, then, upon honour, my lord, to give you proof that I am positively the best husband in the world, my wife never yet found me out.

Lord Mor. That may be, by her being the best wife in the world: she, may be, won't find you out.

Sir Cha. Nay, if she won't tell a man of his faults, when she sees them, how the deuce should he mend them? But, however, you see I am going to leave them off as fast as I can.

Lord Mor. Being tired of a woman, is, indeed, a pretty tolerable assurance of a man's not designing to fool on with her—Here she comes; and, if I don't mistake, brimful of reproaches—You can't take her in a better time—I'll leave you.

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Your ladyship's most humble servant. Is the company broke up, pray?

Lady Grave. No, my lord, they are talking of basset; my lord Foppington has a mind to tally, if your lordship would encourage the table.

Lord Mor. Oh, madam, with all my heart!

But, sir Charles, I know, is hard to be got to it: I'll leave your ladyship to prevail with him.

[Erit LORD MORELOVE.

[SIR CHARLES and LADY GRAVEAIRS salute coldly, and trifle some time before they speak.]

Lady Grave. Sir Charles, I sent you a note this morning.

Sir Cha. Yes, madam; but there were some passages I did not expect from your ladyship. You seem to tax me with things that—

Lady Grave. Look you, sir, 'tis not at all material whether I taxed you with any thing or no; I don't desire you to clear yourself; upon my word, you may be very easy as to that matter; for my part, I am mighty well satisfied things are as they are; all I have to say to you is, that you need not give yourself the trouble to call at my lodgings this afternoon, if you should have time, as you were pleased to send me word—and so, your servant, sir, that's all— [Going.

Sir Cha. Hold, madam.

Lady Grave. Look you, sir Charles, 'tis not your calling me back that will signify any thing, I can assure you.

Sir Cha. Why this extraordinary haste, madam?

Lady Grave. In short, sir Charles, I have taken a great many things from you of late, that, you know, I have often told you, I would positively bear no longer. But, I see things are in vain, and the more people strive to oblige people, the less they are thanked for it: and, since there must be an end of one's ridiculousness one time or other, I don't see any time so proper as the present; and, therefore, sir, I desire you would think of things accordingly. Your servant.

[Going, he holds her.

Sir Cha. Nay, madam, let us start fair, however; you ought, at least, to stay till I am as ready as your ladyship; and, then, if we must part,

Adieu, ye silent grots, and shady groves;

Ye soft amusements of our growing loves;

Adieu, ye whispered sighs, that fanned the fire,
And all the thrilling joys of young desire!

[Affectedly.

Lady Grave. Oh, mighty well, sir! I am very glad we are at last come to a right understanding, the only way I have long wished for; not but I'd have you to know I see your design through all your painted ease of resignation: I know you'd give your soul to make me uneasy now.

Sir Cha. Oh, fie, madam! upon my word, I would not make you uneasy, if it were in my power.

Lady Grave. Oh, dear sir, you need not take such care, upon my word; you'll find I can part with you without the least disorder; I'll try, at least; and so, once more, and for ever, sir, your servant: not but you must give me leave to tell you, as my last thought of you, too, that I do think—you are a villain. [Erit hastily.

Sir Cha. Oh, your very humble servant, madam! [Bowing low.] What a charming quality is a woman's pride, that is strong enough to refuse a man her favours, when he's weary of them— Ah!

Re-enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lady Grave. Look you, sir Charles; don't presume upon the easiness of my temper; for, to convince you that I am positively in earnest in this matter, I desire you would let me have what letters you have had of mine since you came to Windsor; and I expect you'll return the rest, as I will yours, as soon as we come to London.

Sir Cha. Upon my faith, madam, I never keep any; I always put snuff in them, and so they wear out.

Lady Grave. Sir Charles, I must have them; for, positively, I won't stir without them.

Sir Cha. Ha! then, I must be civil, I see. [Aside.] Perhaps, madam, I have no mind to part with them—or you.

Lady Grave. Look you, sir, all those sort of things are in vain, now there's an end of every thing between us—If you say you won't give them, I must e'en get them as well as I can.

Sir Cha. Ha! that won't do then, I find.

[Aside.

Lady Grave. Who's there? Mrs Edging—Your keeping a letter, sir, won't keep me, I'll assure you.

Enter EDGING.

Edg. Did your ladyship call me, madam?

Lady Grave. Ay, child: pray, do me the favour to fetch my cloak out of the dining-room?

Edg. Yes, madam.

Sir Cha. Oh, then there's hope again. [Aside.

Edg. Ha! she looks as if my master had quarrelled with her; I hope she's going away in a huff—she shan't stay for her cloak, I warrant her—This is pure. [Aside. Erit smiling.

Lady Grave. Pray, sir Charles, before I go, give me leave now, after all, to ask you—why you have used me thus?

Sir Cha. What is it you call usage, madam?

Lady Grave. Why, then, since you will have it, how comes it you have been so grossly careless and neglectful of me of late? Only tell me, seriously, wherein I have deserved this?

Sir Cha. Why, then, seriously, madam—

Re-enter EDGING, with a cloak.

We are interrupted—

Edg. Here is your ladyship's cloak, madam.

Lady Grave. Thank you, Mrs Edging—Oh, la! pray will you let somebody get me a chair to the door?

Edg. Humph—She might have told me that before, if she had been in such haste to go.

[Aside. Erit.

Lady Grave. Now, sir.

Sir Cha. Then, seriously, I say I am of late grown so very lazy in my pleasures, that I had rather lose a woman, than go through the plague and trouble of having or keeping her; and, to be free, I have found so much, even in my acquaintance with you, whom I confess to be a mistress in the art of pleasing, that I am, from henceforth, resolved to follow no pleasure that rises above the degree of amusement—And that woman that expects I should make her my business, why—like my business, is then in a fair way of being forgot. When once she comes to reproach me with vows, and usage, and stuff—I had as lief hear her talk of bills, bonds, and ejectments: her passion becomes as troublesome as a law-suit, and I would as soon converse with my solicitor. In short, I shall never care sixpence for any woman that won't be obedient.

Lady Grave. I'll swear, sir, you have a very free way of treating people; I am glad I am so well acquainted with your principles, however—And you would have me obedient?

Sir Cha. Why not? My wife's so; and, I think, she has as much pretence to be proud as your ladyship.

Lady Grave. Lard! is there no chair to be had, I wonder?

Enter EDGING.

Edg. Here's a chair, madam.

Lady Grave. 'Tis very well, Mrs Edging:—pray, will you let somebody get me a glass of fair water?

Edg. Humph—her huff is almost over, I suppose—I see he's a villain still. [Aside. Exit.]

Lady Grave. Well, that was the prettiest fancy about obedience, sure, that ever was. Certainly, a woman of condition must be infinitely happy under the dominion of so generous a lover. But how came you to forget kicking and whipping all this while? Methinks, you should not have left so fashionable an article out of your scheme of government.

Sir Cha. Um—No, there is too much trouble in that; though I have known them of admirable use in reformation of some humoursome gentlewomen.

Lady Grave. But one thing more, and I have done—Pray, what degree of spirit must the lady have, that is to make herself happy under so much freedom, order, and tranquillity?

Sir Cha. Oh, she must at least have as much spirit as your ladyship, or she'd give me no pleasure in breaking it.

Lady Grave. No, that would be troublesome. You had better take one that's broken to your hand: there are such souls to be hired, I believe; things that will rub your temples in an evening, till you fall fast asleep in their laps; creatures, too, that think their wages their reward. I fancy, at last, that will be the best method for the lazy passion of a married man, that has outlived his any other sense of gratification.

Sir Cha. Look you, madam; I have loved you very well a great while; now you would have me love you better and longer, which is not in my power to do; and I don't think there is any plague upon earth, like a dun that comes for more money than one is ever likely to be able to pay.

Lady Grave. A dun! Do you take me for a dun, sir? Do I come a dunning to you?

[Walks in a heat.]

Sir Cha. Hist! don't expose yourself—here's company—

Lady Grave. I care not—A dun! you shall see, sir, I can revenge an affront, though I despise the wretch that offers it—A dun! Oh, I could die with laughing at the fancy! [Exit.]

Sir Cha. So—she's in admirable order—Here comes my lord; and, I'm afraid, in the very nick of his occasion for her.

Enter LORD MORELOVE.

Lord Mor. Oh, Charles, undone again! all is lost and ruined.

Sir Cha. What's the matter now?

Lord Mor. I have been playing the fool yonder, even to contempt; my senseless jealousy has confessed a weakness I never shall forgive myself. She has insulted on it to that degree, too—I can't bear the thought—Oh, Charles, this devil is mistress of my heart! and I could dash my brains out to think how grossly too I have let her know it.

Sir Cha. Ah, how it would tickle her if she saw you in this condition! ha, ha, ha!

Lord Mor. Prithee don't torture me: think of some present ease, or I shall burst.

Sir Cha. Well, well; let's hear, pray—What has she done to you? Ha, ha!

Lord Mor. Why, ever since I left you, she has treated me with so much coolness and ill nature, and that thing of a lord, with so much laughing ease, such an acquainted, such a spiteful familiarity, that, at the last, she saw and triumphed in my uneasiness.

Sir Cha. Well, and so you left the room in a pet? Ha!

Lord Mor. Oh, worse, worse still! for, at last, with half shame and anger in my looks, I thrust myself between my lord and her, pressed her by the hand, and, in a whisper, trembling, begged her, in pity of herself and me, to shew her good humour, only where she knew it was truly valued: at which, she broke from me, with a cold smile, sat her down by the peer, whispered him, and burst into a loud laughter in my face.

Sir Cha. Ha, ha! then would I have given fifty pounds to have seen your face. Why, what in the name of common sense had you to do with humility? Will you never have enough on't? Death! 'twas setting a lighted match to gunpowder, to blow yourself up.

Lord Mor. I see my folly now, Charles. But what shall I do with the remains of life that she has left me?

Sir Cha. Oh, throw it at her feet, by all means! put on your tragedy-face, catch fast hold of her petticoat, whip out your handkerchief, and, in point blank verse, desire her, one way or other, to make an end of the business.

[In a whining tone.]

Lord Mor. What a fool dost thou make me!

Sir Cha. I only can shew you as you came out of her hands, my lord.

Lord Mor. How contemptibly have I behaved myself!

Sir Cha. That's according as you bear her behaviour.

Lord Mor. Bear it! no—I thank thee, Charles; thou hast waked me now: and, if I bear it—What have you done with my lady Graveairs?

Sir Cha. Your business, I believe—She's ready for you; she's just gone down stairs, and, if you don't make haste after her, I expect her hack again, with a knife or a pistol presently.

Lord Mor. I'll go this minute.

Sir Cha. No, stay a little: here comes my lord; we'll see what we can get out of him first.

Lord Mor. Methinks, now, I could laugh at her.

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

Lord Fop. Nay, prithee, Sir Charles, let's have a little of thee—We have been so chagrin without thee, that, stop my breath, the ladies are gone half asleep to church for want of thy company.

Sir Cha. That's hard, indeed, while your lordship was among them. Is lady Betty gone, too?

Lord Fop. She was just upon the wing; but I caught her by the snuff-box, and she pretends to stay, to see if I'll give it her again, or no.

Lord Mor. Death! 'tis that I gave her, and the only present she would ever receive from me—Ask him how he came by it.

[Aside to SIR CHARLES.]

Sir Cha. Prithee don't be uneasy—Did she give it you, my lord?

Lord Fop. Faith, Charles, I can't say she did, or she did not; but we were playing the fool, and I took it—à la—Pshaw! I can't tell thee in French neither; but Horace touches it to a nicety—'twas pignus direptum malè pertinaci.

Lord Mor. So—but I must bear it—If your lordship has a mind to the box, I'll stand by you in keeping of it.

Lord Fop. My lord, I am passionately obliged to you; but I am afraid I cannot answer your hazarding so much of the lady's favour.

Lord Mor. Not at all, my lord: 'tis possible I may not have the same regard to her frown that your lordship has.

Lord Fop. That's a bite, I am sure—he'd give a joint of his little finger to be as well with her as I am. [Aside.] But here she comes—Charles, stand by me—Must not a man be a vain coxcomb, now, to think this creature followed one?

Sir Cha. Nothing so plain, my lord.

Lord Fop. Flattering devil!

Enter LADY BETTY.

Lady Bet. Pshaw, my lord Foppington! prithee, don't play the fool now, but give me my snuff-box—Sir Charles, help me to take it from him.

Sir Cha. You know I hate trouble, madam.

Lady Bet. Pooh! you'll make me stay till prayers are half over now.

Lord Fop. If you'll promise me not to go to church, I'll give it you.

Lady Bet. I'll promise nothing at all; for positively, I will have it. [Struggling with him.]

Lord Fop. Then, comparatively, I won't part with it. Ha, ha! [Struggles with her.]

Lady Bet. Oh, you devil, you have killed my arm! Oh!—Well, if you'll let me have it, I'll give you a better.

Lord Mor. Oh, Charles! that has a view of distant kindness in it. [Aside to SIR CHARLES.]

Lord Fop. Nay, now, I keep it superlatively—I find there's a secret value in it.

Lady Bet. Oh, dismal! Upon my word, I am only ashamed to give it to you. Do you think I would offer such an odious fancied thing to any body I had the least value for?

Sir Cha. Now it comes a little nearer, methinks it does not seem to be any kindness at all.

[Aside to LORD MORELOVE.]

Lord Fop. Why, really, madam, upon second view, it has not extremely the mode of a lady's utensil. Are you sure it never held any thing but snuff?

Lady Bet. Oh, you monster!

Lord Fop. Nay, I only ask, because it seems to me to have very much the air and fancy of Monsieur Smoakandsot's tobacco-box.

Lord More. I can bear no more.

Sir Cha. Why, don't, then; I'll step in to the company, and return to your relief immediately.

[Exit SIR CHA.]

Lord More. [To LADY BET.] Come, madam, will your ladyship give me leave to end the difference? Since the slightness of the thing may let you bestow it without any mark of favour, shall I beg it of your ladyship.

Lady Bet. Oh, my lord, nobody sooner—I beg you give it, my lord. [Looking earnestly on LORD FOP. who, smiling, gives it to LORD MORE. and then bows gravely to her.]

Lord More. Only to have the honour of restoring it to your lordship; and if there be any other trifle of mine your lordship has a fancy to, though it were a mistress, I don't know any person in the world that has so good a claim to my resignation.

Lord Fop. Oh, my lord, this generosity will distract me!

Lord More. My lord, I do you but common justice. But, from your conversation, I had never known the true value of the sex. You positively understand them the best of any man breathing; therefore, I think every one of common prudence ought to resign to you.

Lord Fop. Then, positively, your lordship is the most obliging person in the world; for I'm sure your judgment can never like any woman that is not the finest creature in the universe.

[Bowing to LADY BET.

Lord More. Oh, your lordship does me too much honour! I have the worst judgment in the world; no man has been more deceived in it.

Lord Fop. Then your lordship, I presume, has been apt to chuse in a mask, or by candle-light?

Lord More. In a mask, indeed, my lord, and, of all masks, the most dangerous.

Lord Fop. Pray, what's that, my lord?

Lord More. A bare face.

Lord Fop. Your lordship will pardon me, if I don't so readily comprehend how a woman's bare face can hide her face.

Lord More. It often hides her heart, my lord; and therefore I think it sometimes a more dangerous mask than a piece of velvet: that's rather a mark, than a disguise, of an ill woman. But the mischief's skulking behind a beauteous form give no warning; they are always sure, fatal, and innumerable.

Lady Bet. Oh, barbarous aspersion! My lord Foppington, have you nothing to say for the poor women?

Lord Fop. I must confess, madam, nothing of this nature ever happened in my course of amours. I always judge the beauteous part of a woman to be the most agreeable part of her composition; and when once a lady does me the honour to toss that into my arms, I think myself obliged, in good nature, not to quarrel about the rest of her equipage.

Lady Bet. Why, ay, my lord, there's some good humour in that, now.

Lord More. He's happy in a plain English stomach, madam; I could recommend a dish that's perfectly to your lordship's goût, where beauty is the only sauce to it.

Lady Bet. So——

Lord Fop. My lord, when my wine's right, I never care it should be zested.

Lord More. I know some ladies would thank you for that opinion.

Lady Bet. My lord Morelove is really grown such a churl to the women, I don't only think he is not, but can't conceive how he ever could be, in love.

Lord More. Upon my word, madam, I once thought I was.

[Smiling.

Lady Bet. Fie, fie! how could you think so? I fancy now you had only a mind to domineer over some poor creature, and so you thought you were in love, ha, ha!

Lord More. The lady I loved, madam, grew so unfortunate in her conduct, that, at last, she brought me to treat her with the same indifference and civility as I now pay your ladyship.

Lady Bet. And, ten to one, just at that time she never thought you such tolerable company.

Lord More. That I can't say, madam; for, at that time, she grew so affected, there was no judging of her thoughts at all.

[Mimicking her.

Lady Bet. What, and so you left the poor lady! Oh, you inconstant creature!

Lord More. No, madam, to have loved her on had been inconstancy; for she was never two hours together the same woman.

[LADY BET. and LORD MORE. seem to talk.

Lord Fop. [Aside.] Ha, ha, ha! I see he has a mind to abuse her; so I'll even give him an opportunity of doing his business with her at once for ever—My lord, I perceive your lordship is going to be good company to the lady; and, for her sake, I don't think it good manners in me to disturb you——

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir Cha. My lord Foppington——

Lord Fop. Oh, Charles! I was just wanting thee——Hark thee—I have three thousand secrets for thee—I have made such discoveries! to tell thee all in one word, Morelove's as jealous of me as the devil, he, he, he!

Sir Cha. Is it possible? Has she given him any occasion?

Lord Fop. Only rallied him to death upon my account; she told me, within, just now, she'd use him like a dog, and begged me to draw off for an opportunity.

Sir Cha. Oh, keep in, while the scent lies, and she is your own, my lord.

Lord Fop. I can't tell that, Charles; but I am sure she is fairly unharboured; and when once I throw off my inclinations, I usually follow them till the game has enough on't: and, between thee and I, she is pretty well blown, too; she can't stand long, I believe; for, curse catch me, if I have not rid down half a thousand pounds after her already.

Sir Cha. What do you mean?

Lord Fop. I have lost five hundred to her at piquet since dinner.

Sir Cha. You are a fortunate man, faith! you are resolved not to be thrown out, I see.

Lord Fop. Hang it, what should a man come out for, if he does not keep up to the sport?

Sir Cha. Well pushed, my lord.

Lord Fop. Tayo! have at her——

Sir Cha. Down, down, my lord——ah! 'ware haunches!

Lord Fop. Ah, Charles! [Embracing him.] Prithce, let's observe a little: there's a foolish cur, now I have run her to a stand, has a mind to be at her by himself, and thou shalt see, she won't stir out of her way for him.

[They stand aside.

Lord More. Ha, ha! your ladyship is very grave of a sudden; you look as if your lover had insolently recovered his common sense.

Lady Bet. And your lordship is so very gay, and unlike yourself, one would swear you were just come from the pleasure of making your mistress afraid of you.

Lord More. No, faith, quite contrary; for, do you know, madam, I have just found out, that, upon your account, I have made myself one of the most ridiculous puppies upon the face of the earth—I have, upon my faith—nay, and so extravagantly such, ha, ha, ha! that it is at last become a jest even to myself; and I can't help laughing at it for the soul of me, ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. I want to cure him of that laugh, now. [Aside.] My lord, since you are so generous, I'll tell you another secret—Do you know, too, that I still find, (spite of all your great wisdom, and my contemptible qualities, as you are pleased, now and then, to call them) do you know, I say, that I see, under all this, that you still love me with the same helpless passion? and can your vast foresight imagine I won't use you accordingly for these extraordinary airs you are pleased to give yourself?

Lord More. Oh, by all means, madam! 'tis fit you should; and I expect it, whenever it is in your power—Confusion! [Aside.]

Lady Bet. My lord, you have talked to me this half hour, without confessing pain. [Pauses, and affects to gape.] Only remember it.

Lord More. Hell and tortures!

Lady Bet. What did you say, my lord?

Lord More. Fire and furies!

Lady Bet. Ha, ha! he's disordered—Now I am easy—My lord Foppington, have you a mind to your revenge at piquet?

Lord Fop. I have always a mind to an opportunity of entertaining your ladyship, madam.

[LADY BET. coquettes with LORD FOP.]

Lord More. Oh, Charles! the insolence of woman might furnish out a thousand devils.

Sir Cha. And your temper is enough to furnish out a thousand such women. Come away; I have business for you upon the terrace.

Lord More. Let me but speak one word to her.

Sir Cha. Not a syllable. The tongue's a weapon you'll always have the worst at; for I see you have no guard, and she carries a devilish edge.

Lady Bet. My lord, don't let any thing I have said frighten you away; for, if you have the least inclination to stay and rail, you know the old conditions; 'tis but your asking me pardon the next day, and you may give your passion any liberty you think fit.

Lord More. Daggers and death!

Sir Cha. Is the man distracted?

Lord More. Let me speak to her now, or I shall burst.

Sir Cha. Upon condition you'll speak no more of her to me; my lord, do as you please.

Lord More. Prithee, pardon me—I know not what to do.

Sir Cha. Come along; I'll set you to work, I warrant you—Nay, nay, none of your parting ogles—Will you go?

Lord More. Yes—and I hope for ever—

[Exit SIR CHA. pulling away LORD MORE.]

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha! Did ever mortal monster set up for a lover with such unfortunate qualifications?

Lady Bet. Indeed, my lord Morelove has something strangely singular in his manner.

Lord Fop. I thought I should have burst to see the creature pretend to rally, and give himself the airs of one of us—But, run me through, madam, your ladyship pushed like a fencing master! that last thrust was a coup de grace, I believe: I'm afraid his honour will hardly meet your ladyship in haste again.

Lady Bet. Not unless his second, sir Charles, keeps him better in practice, perhaps—Well, the humour of this creature has done me signal service to-day. I must keep it up, for fear of a second engagement. [Aside.]

Lord Fop. Never was poor wit so foiled at his own weapon, sure!

Lady Bet. Wit! had he ever any pretence to it?

Lord Fop. Ha, ha! he has not much in love, I think, though he wears the reputation of a very pretty young fellow among some sort of people; but strike me stupid if ever I could discover common sense in all the progress of his amours: he expects a woman should like him for endeavouring to convince her, that she has not one good quality belonging to the whole composition of her soul and body.

Lady Bet. That, I suppose, is only in a modest hope, that she'll mend her faults, to qualify herself for his vast merit, ha, ha!

Lord Fop. Poor Morelove! I see she can't endure him. [Aside.]

Lady Bet. Or if one really had all those faults, he does not consider, that sincerity in love is as much out of fashion as sweet snuff; nobody takes it now.

Lord Fop. Oh, no mortal, madam, unless it be here and there a squire, that's making his lawful court to the cherry-cheek charms of my lord bishop's great fat daughter in the country.

Lady Bet. O what a surfeiting couple has he put together!—

[Throwing her hand carelessly upon his.]

Lord Fop. Fond of me, by all that's tender!—Poor fool! I'll give thee ease immediately. [Aside.] But, madam, you were pleased just now to offer me my revenge at piquet—Now, here's nobody within, and I think we can't make use of a better opportunity.

Lady Bet. O! no: not now, my lord!—I have a favour I would fain beg of you first.

Lord Fop. But time, madam, is very precious in this place, and I shall not easily forgive myself if I don't take him by the forelock.

Lady Bet. But I have a great mind to have a little more sport with my lord Morelove first, and would fain beg your assistance.

Lord Fop. O! with all my heart; and, upon second thoughts, I don't know but piquing a rival in public may be as good sport as being well with a mistress in private: for, after all, the pleasure of a fine woman is like that of her virtue, not so much in the thing, as the reputation of having it. [Aside.] Well, madam, but how can I serve you in this affair?

Lady Bet. Why, methought, as my lord Morelove went out, he shewed a stern resentment in his look, that seemed to threaten me with rebellion, and downright defiance. Now, I have a great fancy that you and I should follow him to the Terrace, and laugh at his resolution before he has time to put it in practice.

Lord Fop. And so punish his fault before he commits it! ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. Nay, we won't give him time, if his courage should fail, to repent it.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha! let me blood, if I don't long to be at it, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. O! 'twill be such diversion to see him bite his lips, and broil within, only with seeing us ready to split our sides in laughing at nothing! ha, ha!

Lord Fop. Ha, ha! I see the creature does really like me. [Aside.] And, then, madam, to hear him hum a broken piece of a tune, in affectation of his not minding us—'twill be so foolish, when we know he loves us to death all the while, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. And if, at last, his sage mouth should open in surly contradiction of our humour, then will we, in pure opposition to his, immediately fall foul upon every thing that is not gallant and fashionable: constancy shall be the mark of age and ugliness, virtue a jest, we'll rally discretion out of doors, lay gravity at our feet, and only love, free love, disorder, liberty, and pleasure, be our standing principles.

Lord Fop. Madam, you transport me! for if ever I was obliged to nature for any one tolerable qualification, 'twas positively the talent of being exuberantly pleasant upon this subject—I am impatient—my fancy's upon the wing already—let's fly to him.

Lady Bet. No, no; stay till I am just got out; our going together won't be so proper.

Lord Fop. As your ladyship pleases, madam; but, when this affair is over, you won't forget that I have a certain revenge due.

Lady Bet. Aye, aye! after supper I am for you—Nay, you shan't stir a step, my lord!—

[Seeing her to the door.]

Lord Fop. Only to tell you, you have fixed me yours to the last existence of my soul's eternal entity.—

Lady Bet. O, your servant. [Exit.]

Lord Fop. Ha, ha! stark mad for me, by all that's handsome! Poor Morelove! That a fellow, who has ever been abroad, should think a woman of her spirit is to be taken by a regular siege, as the confederates do towns, when so many of the French successes might have shewn him, the surest way is to whisper the governor. How can a coxcomb give himself the fatigue of bombarding a woman's understanding, when he may with so much ease make a friend of her constitution. I'll see if I can shew him a little French play with lady Betty—let me see—aye, I'll make an end of it the old way, get her into piquet at her own lodgings—not mind one tittle of my play—give her every game before she's half up, that she may judge of the strength of my inclination by my haste of losing up to her price; then, of a sudden, with a familiar leer, cry—rat piquet—sweep counters, cards, and money all upon the floor, and donc—l'affaire est faite. [Exit.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—The Castle Terrace.

Enter LADY BETTY, and LADY EASY.

Lady Easy. My dear, you really talk to me as if I were your lover and not your friend: or else I am so dull, that by all you've said I can't make the least guess at your real thoughts—Can you be serious for a moment?

Lady Bet. Not easily; but I would do more to oblige you.

Lady Easy. Then, pray, deal ingenuously, and tell me, without reserve, are you sure you don't love my lord Morelove?

Lady Bet. Then seriously—I think not—But because I won't be positive, you shall judge by the worst of my symptoms—First, I own I like his conversation—his person has neither fault, nor beauty—well enough—I don't remember I ever secretly wished myself married to him, or—that I ever seriously resolved against it.

Lady Easy. Well, so far you are tolerably safe: But come; as to his manner of addressing you, what effect has that had?

Lady Bet. I am not a little pleased to observe few men follow a woman with the same fatigue and spirit that he does me—am more pleased when he lets me use him ill; and if ever I have a favourable thought of him, 'tis when I see he can't bear that usage.

Lady Easy. Have a care; that last is a dangerous symptom—he pleases your pride, I find.

Lady Bet. Oh! perfectly: in that, I own no mortal ever can come up to him.

Lady Easy. But now, my dear! now comes the main point—jealousy! Are you sure you have never been touched with it? Tell me that, with a safe conscience, and then I pronounce you clear.

Lady Bet. Nay, then, I defy him; for, positively, I was never jealous in my life.

Lady Easy. How, madam! you have never been stirred enough, to think a woman strangely forward for being a little familiar in talk with him? Or, are you sure his gallantry to another never gave you the least disorder? Were you never, upon no accident, in an apprehension of losing him?

Lady Bet. Ha! Why, madam—Bless me! wh—wh—why sure you don't call this jealousy, my dear?

Lady Easy. Nay, nay, that is not the business—Have you ever felt any thing of this nature, madam?

Lady Bet. Lord! don't be so hasty, my dear—any thing of this nature—O Lud! I swear I don't like it: dear creature, bring me off here; for I am half frightened out of my wits!

Lady Easy. Nay, if you can rally upon it, your wound is not over deep, I'm afraid.

Lady Bet. Well, that's comfortably said, however.

Lady Easy. But come to the point—How far have you been jealous?

Lady Bet. Why, O, bless me! He gave the music one night to my lady Languish here upon the terrace: and (though she and I were very great friends) I remember I could not speak to her in a week for't—Oh!

Lady Easy. Nay, now, you may laugh if you can: for, take my word, the marks are upon you—But come, what else?

Lady Bet. O, nothing else, upon my word, my dear!

Lady Easy. Well, one word more, and then I give sentence: suppose you were heartily convinced, that he actually followed another woman?

Lady Bet. But, pray, my dear, what occasion is there to suppose any such a thing at all?

Lady Easy. Guilty, upon my honour!

Lady Bet. Pshaw! I defy him to say, that ever I owned any inclination for him.

Lady Easy. No, but you have given him terrible leave to guess it.

Lady Bet. If ever you see us meet again, you'll have but little reason to think so, I can assure you.

Lady Easy. That I shall see presently; for here comes Sir Charles, and I'm sure my lord cannot be far off.

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir Cha. Servant, lady Betty—my dear, how do you do?

Lady Easy. At your service, my dear—But, pray, what have you done with my lord More-love?

Lady Bet. Aye, sir Charles; pray, how does your pupil do? Have you any hopes of him? Is he docible?

Sir Cha. Well, madam, to confess your triumph over me, as well as him, I own my hopes of him are lost. I offered what I could to his instruction, but he is incorrigibly yours, and undone—and the news, I presume, does not displease your ladyship.

Lady Bet. Fye, fye, sir Charles, you disparage your friend; I am afraid you don't take pains with him.

Sir Cha. Ha! I fancy, lady Betty, your good-nature won't let you sleep a nights: don't you love dearly to hurt people?

Lady Bet. O! your servant: then, without a jest, the man is so unfortunate in his want of patience, that, let me die, if I don't often pity him.

Sir Cha. Ha! Strange goodness—O that I were your lover for a month or two!

Lady Bet. What then?

Sir Cha. I would make that pretty heart's blood of yours ache in a fortnight.

Lady Bet. Huh! I should hate you: your assurance would make your address intolerable.

Sir Cha. I believe it would, for I'd never address you at all.

Lady Betty. O! you clown you!

[Hitting him with her fan.]

Sir Cha. Why, what to do? to feed a diseased pride, that's eternally breaking out in the affectation of an ill-nature, that—in my conscience I believe is but affectation.

Lady Bet. You, or your friend, have no great reason to complain of my fondness, I believe.—Ha, ha, ha!

Sir Cha. [looking earnestly at her.] Thou insolent creature! How can you make a jest of a man, whose whole life's but one continued torment, from your want of common gratitude?

Lady Bet. Torment! for my part I really believe him as easy as you are.

Sir Cha. Poor intolerable affectation! You know the contrary; you know him blindly yours; you know your power, and the whole pleasure of your life's the poor and low abuse of it.

Lady Bet. Pray, how do I abuse it—if I have any power.

Sir Cha. You drive him to extremes that make him mad, then punish him for acting against his reason: you've almost turned his brain, his common judgment fails him; he is now, at this very moment, driven by his despair upon a project, in hopes to free him from your power, that I am sensible, and so must every one be that has his sense, of course must ruin him with you for ever. I almost blush to think of it; yet your unreasonable disdain has forced him to do it; and should he now suspect I offered but a hint of it to you, and in contempt of his design, I know he'd call my life to answer it: but I have no regard to men in madness; I rather choose, for once, to trust in your good-nature, in hopes the man, whom your unwary beauty had made miserable, your generosity would scorn to make ridiculous.

Lady Bet. Sir Charles, you charge me very home; I never had it in my inclination to make any thing ridiculous that did not deserve it.—Pray, what is this business you think so extravagant in him?

Sir Cha. Something so absurdly rash and bold, you'll hardly forgive even me that tell it you.

Lady Bet. O fie! If it be a fault, sir Charles, I shall consider it as his, not yours. Pray, what is it?

Lady Easy. I long to know, methinks.

Sir Cha. You may be sure he did not want my dissuasions from it.

Lady Bet. Let us hear it.

Sir Cha. Why this man, whom I have known to love you with such excess of generous desire, whom I have heard, in his ecstatic praises of your beauty, talk, till, from the soft heat of his distilling thoughts, the tears have fallen—

Lady Bet. O! sir Charles— [Blushing.

Sir Cha. Nay, grudge not, since 'tis past, to hear what was (though you contemned it) once his merit: but now, I own, that merit ought to be forgotten.

Lady Bet. Pray, sir, be plain.

Sir Cha. This man, I say, whose unhappy passion has so ill succeeded with you, at last has forfeited all his hopes (into which, pardon me, I confess my friendship had lately flattered him) his hopes of even deserving now your lowest pity or regard.

Lady Bet. You amaze me! For I can't suppose his utmost malice dares assault my reputation—and what—

Sir Cha. No, but he maliciously presumes the world will do it for him; and, indeed, he has taken no unlikely means to make them busy with their tongues; for he is this moment upon the open terrace, in the highest public gallantry with my lady Graveairs. And to convince the world and me, he said, he was not the tame lover we fancied him, he'd venture to give her music to-night: nay, I heard him, before my face, speak to one of the hautboys to engage the rest, and desired they would all take their directions only from my lady Graveairs.

Lady Bet. My lady Graveairs! truly I think my lord's very much in the right on't—for my part, sir Charles, I don't see any thing in this that's so very ridiculous, nor indeed that ought to make me think either the better or the worse of him for't.

Sir Cha. Pshaw! pshaw! madam, you and I know 'tis not in his power to renounce you; this is but the poor disguise of a resenting passion, vainly ruffled to a storm, which the least gentle look from you can reconcile at will, and laugh into a calm again.

Lady Bet. Indeed, Sir Charles, I shan't give myself that trouble, I believe.

Sir Cha. So I told him, madam: are not all your complaints, said I, already owing to her pride? and can you suppose this public defiance of it (which you know you can't make good, too) won't incense her more against you?—That's what I'd have, said he, staring wildly; I care not what becomes of me, so I but live to see her piqued at it.

Lady Bet. Upon my word! I fancy my lord will find himself mistaken—I shan't be piqued, I believe—I must first have a value for the thing I lose, before it piques me: piqued! ha, ha, ha!

[Disordered.

Sir Cha. Madam, you've said the very thing I urged to him. I know her temper so well, said I, that though she doated on you, if you once stood out against her, she'd sooner burst, than shew the least motion of uneasiness.

Lady Bet. I can assure you, sir Charles, my lord won't find himself deceived in your opinion—piqued!

Sir Cha. She has it.

[Aside.

Lady Easy. Alas, poor woman! how little do our passions make us!

Lady Bet. Not but I would advise him to have a little regard to my reputation in this business; I would have him take heed of publicly affronting me.

Sir Cha. Right, madam; that's what I strictly warned him of; for, among friends, whenever the world sees him follow another woman, the malicious tea-tables will be very apt to be free with your ladyship.

Lady Bet. I'd have him consider that, methinks.

Sir Cha. But, alas! madam, 'tis not in his power to think with reason; his mad resentment has destroyed even his principles of common honesty: he considers nothing but a senseless proud revenge, which, in his fit of lunacy, 'tis impossible that either threats or danger can dissuade him from.

Lady Bet. What! does he defy me, threaten me! then he shall see, that I have passions, too, and know, as well as he, to stir my heart against any pride that dares insult me. Does he suppose I fear him? Fear the little malice of a slighted passion, that my own scorn has stung into a despised resentment! Fear him! O! it provokes me to think he dare have such a thought!

Lady Easy. Dear creature, don't disorder yourself so.

Lady Bet. Let me but live to see him once more within my power, and I'll forgive the rest of fortune.

Lady Easy. Well, I am certainly very ill-natured ; for though I see this news has disturbed my friend, I can't help being pleased with my hopes of my lady Graveairs being otherwise disposed of. [Aside.] My dear, I am afraid you have provoked her a little too far.

Sir Cha. Oh ! not at all——You shall see—I'll sweeten her, and she'll cool like a dish of tea.

Lady Bet. I may see him with his complaining face again—

Sir Cha. I am sorry, madam, you so wrongly judge of what I've told you ; I was in hopes to have stirred your pity, not your anger : I little thought your generosity would punish him for faults, which you yourself resolved he should commit——Yonder he comes, and all the world with him : might I advise you, madam, you should not resent the thing at all——I would not so much as stay to see him in his fault ; nay, I'd be the last that heard of it : nothing can sting him more, or so justly punish his folly, as your utter neglect of it.

Lady Easy. Come, dear creature, be persuaded, and go home with me ? Indeed it will shew more indifference to avoid him.

Lady Bet. No, madam, I'll oblige his vanity for once, and stay to let him see how strongly he has piqued me.

Sir Cha. [Aside.] O not at all to speak of ; you had as good part with a little of that pride of yours, or I shall yet make it a very troublesome companion to you.

[Goes from them, and whispers LORD MORELOVE.]

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON ; a little after, LORD MORELOVE, and LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lord Fop. Ladies, your servant——O ! we have wanted you beyond reparation——such diversion !

Lady Bet. Well ! my lord ! have you seen my lord Morelove ?

Lord Fop. Seen him ! ha, ha, ha !——O ! I have such things to tell you, madam——you'll die—

Lady Bet. O, pray let's hear them ! I was never in a better humour to receive them.

Lord Fop. Hark you. [They whisper.]

Lord Mor. So, she's engaged already.

[To SIR CHA.]

Sir Cha. So much the better ; make but a just advantage of my success, and she's undone.

Lord Fop. } Ha, ha, ha !

Lady Bet. } Ha, ha, ha !

Sir Cha. You see already what ridiculous pains she is taking to stir your jealousy, and cover her own.

Lord Fop. } Ha, ha, ha !

Lady Bet. } Ha, ha, ha !

Lord Mor. O, never fear me : for, upon my word, it now appears ridiculous even to me.

Sir Cha. And, hark you—

[Whispers LORD MOR.]

Lady Bet. And so the widow was as full of airs as his lordship ?

Sir Cha. Only observe that, and it is impossible you can fail. [Aside.]

Lord Mor. Dear Charles, you have convinced me, and I thank you.

Lady Grave. My lord Morelove ! What, do you leave us ?

Lord Mor. Ten thousand pardons, madam ! I was but just—

Lady Grave. Nay, nay, no excuses, my lord, so you will but let us have you again.

Sir Cha. [Aside to LADY GRAVEAIRS.]—I see you have good humour, madam, when you like your company.

Lady Grave. And you, I see, for all your mighty thirst of dominion, could stoop to be obedient, if one thought it worth one's while to make you so.

Sir Cha. Ha ! power would make her an admirable tyrant.

[Aside.]

Lady Easy. [Observing SIR CHARLES and LADY GRAVEAIRS.]—So ! there's another couple have quarrelled, too, I find—Those airs to my lord Morelove look as if designed to recover sir Charles into jealousy : I'll endeavour to join the company, and, it may be, that will let me into the secret.—[Aside.]—My lord Foppington, I vow this is very uncomplaisant, to engross so agreeable a part of the company to yourself.

Sir Cha. Nay, my lord, this is not fair, indeed, to enter into secrets among friends ! Ladies, what say you ? I think we ought to declare against it.

Lady Bet. Well, ladies, I ought only to ask your pardon : my lord's excuseable, for I would haul him into a corner.

Lord Fop. I swear 'tis very hard ; ho ! I observe, two people of extreme condition can no sooner grow particular, but the multitude of both sexes are immediately up, and think their properties invaded——

Lady Bet. Odious multitude !——

Lord Fop. Perish the canaille !

Lady Grave. Oh, my lord, we women have all reason to be jealous of lady Betty Modish's power.

Lord More. [To LADY BETTY.]—As the men, madam, all have of my lord Foppington ; besides, favourites of great merit discourage those of an inferior class for their prince's service ; he has already lost you one of your retinue, madam.

Lady Bet. Not at all, my lord ; he has only made room for another : one must sometimes make vacancies, or there could be no preferments.

Lady Easy. Ha, ha, ha ! Ladies' favours, my lord, like places at court, are not always held for life, you know.

Lady Bet. No, indeed ! if they were, the poor fine women would be always used like their wives, and no more minded than the business of the nation.

Lady Easy. Have a care, madam: an undeserving favourite has been the ruin of many a prince's empire.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my soul, lady Betty, we must grow more discreet; for, positively, if we go on at this rate, we shall have the world throw you under the scandal of constancy; and I shall have all the swords of condition at my throat for a monopolist.

Lord More. Oh! there's no great fear of that, my lord; though the men of sense give it over, there will be always some idle fellows vain enough to believe their merit may succeed as well as your lordship's.

Lady Bet. Or, if they should not, my lord, cast-lovers, you know, need not fear being long out of employment, while there are so many well-disposed people in the world—There are generally neglected wives, stale maids, or charitable widows, always ready to relieve the necessities of a disappointed passion—And, by the way, hark you, sir Charles—

Lord More. [Aside.]—So! she's stirred, I see; for all her pains to hide it—She would hardly have glanced an affront at a woman she was not piqued at.

Lady Grave. [Aside.]—That wit was thrown at me, I suppose; but I'll return it.

Lady Bet. [Softly to SIR CHARLES.]—Pray, how come you all this while to trust your mistress so easily?

Sir Cha. One is not so apt, madam, to be alarmed at the liberties of an old acquaintance, as perhaps your ladyship ought to be at the resentment of an hard-used, honourable lover.

Lady Bet. Suppose I were alarmed, how does that make you easy?

Sir Cha. Come, come, be wise at last; my trusting them together may easily convince you, that (as I told you before) I know his addresses to her are only outward, and it will be your fault now, if you let him go on till the world thinks him in earnest; and a thousand busy tongues are set upon malicious enquiries into your reputation.

Lady Bet. Why, sir Charles, do you suppose, while he behaves himself as he does, that I won't convince him of my indifference?

Sir Cha. But hear me, madam—

Lady Grave. [Aside.]—The air of that whisper looks as if the lady had a mind to be making her peace again: and, 'tis possible, his worship's being so busy in the matter, too, may proceed as much from his jealousy of my lord with me, as friendship to her; at least I fancy so; therefore, I'm resolved to keep her still piqued, and prevent it, though it be only to gall him—Sir Charles, that is not fair to take a privilege you just now declared against in my lord Foppington.

Lord More. Well observed, madam.

Lady Grave. Besides, it looks so affected to whisper, when every body guesses the secret.

Lord More. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. Oh! madam, your pardon in particular: but it is possible you may be mistaken: the secrets of people, that have any regard to their actions, are not so soon guessed, as theirs that have made a confidant of the whole town.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Grave. A coquette, in her affected airs of disdain to a revolted lover, I'm afraid, must exceed your ladyship in prudence, not to let the world see, at the same time, she'd give her eyes to make her peace with him: ha, ha, ha!

Lord More. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. 'Twould be a mortification, indeed, if it were in the power of a fading widow's charms to prevent it; and the man must be miserably reduced, sure, that could bear to live buried in woollen, or take up with the motherly comforts of a swan-skin petticoat. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Grave. Widows, it seems, are not so squeamish to their interest; they know their own minds, and take the man they like, though it happens to be one that a froward, vain girl has disoblged, and is pining to be friends with.

Lord More. Nay, though it happens to be one that confesses he once was fond of a piece of folly, and afterwards ashamed on't.

Lady Bet. Nay, my lord, there's no standing against two of you.

Lord Fop. No, faith, that's odds at tennis, my lord: not but, if your ladyship pleases, I'll endeavour to keep your back-hand a little; though, upon my soul, you may safely set me up at the line: for, knock me down if ever I saw a rest of wit better played, than that last, in my life. What say you, madam? shall we engage?

Lady Bet. As you please, my lord.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha! Allons! tout de bon jouer, milor.

Lord More. Oh, pardon me, sir, I shall never think myself in any thing a match for the lady.

Lord Fop. To you, madam.

Lady Bet. That's much, my lord, when the world knows you have been so many years teasing me to play the fool with you.

Lord Fop. Ah, bien-joué—Ha, ha, ha!

Lord More. At that game, I confess, your ladyship has chosen a much properer person to improve your hand with.

Lord Fop. To me, madam—My lord, I presume, whoever the lady thinks fit to play the fool with, will at least be able to give as much envy as the wise person that had not wit enough to keep well with her when he was so.

Lady Grave. O! my lord! Both parties must needs be greatly happy; for, I dare swear, neither will have any rivals to disturb them.

Lord More. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. None that will disturb them, I dare swear.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha, ha !

Lord More.

Lady Grave. } Ha, ha, ha !

Lady Bet.

Sir Cha. I don't know, gentlefolks—but you are all in extreme good-humour, methinks; I hope there's none of it affected.

Lady Easy. I should be loth to answer for any but my lord Foppington.

[Aside.

Lady Bet. Mine is not, I'll swear.

Lord More. Nor mine, I'm sure.

Lady Grave. Mine's sincere, depend upon't.

Lord Fop. And may the eternal frowns of the whole sex doubly demme, if mine is not.

Lady Easy. Well, good people, I am mighty glad to hear it. You have all performed extremely well: but, if you please, you shall even give over your wit now, while it is well.

Lady Bet. [To herself.—Now, I see his humour, I'll stand it out, if I were sure to die for't.

Sir Cha. You should not have proceeded so far with my lord Foppington, after what I had told you.

[Aside to LADY BETTY.

Lady Bet. Pray, sir Charles, give me leave to understand myself a little.

Sir Cha. Your pardon, madam. I thought a right understanding would have been for both your interest and reputation.

Lady Bet. For his, perhaps.

Sir Cha. Nay, then, madam, its time for me to take care of my friend.

Lady Bet. I never, in the least, doubted your friendship to him, in any thing that was to shew yourself my enemy.

Sir Cha. Since I see, madam, you have so ungrateful a sense of my lord Morelove's merit, and my service, I shall never be ashamed of using my power henceforth to keep him entirely out of your ladyship's.

Lady Bet. Was ever any thing so insolent ! I could find in my heart to run the hazard of a downright compliance, if it were only to convince him, that my power, perhaps, is not inferior to his.

[To herself.

Lady Easy. My lord Foppington, I think you generally lead the company upon these occasions. Pray, will you think of some prettier sort of diversion for us than parties and whispers ?

Lord Fop. What say you, ladies ? shall we step and see what's done at the basset-table ?

Lady Bet. With all my heart : lady Easy——

Lady Easy. I think 'tis the best thing we can do, and, because we won't part to-night, you shall all sup where you dined—What say you, my lord ?

Lord Mor. Your ladyship may be sure of me, madam.

Lord Fop. Aye ! aye ! we'll all come.

Lady Easy. Then, pray, let's change parties a little. My lord Foppington, you shall 'squire me.

Lord Fop. O ! you do me honour, madam.

Lady Bet. My lord Morelove, pray let me speak with you ?

Lord Mor. Me, madam ?

Lady Bet. If you please, my lord.

Lord Mor. Ha ! that look shot through me. What can this mean ?

[Aside.

Lady Bet. This is no proper place to tell you what it is, but there is one thing I'd fain be truly answered in : I suppose you'll be at my lady Easy's by and by, and if you'll give me leave there——

Lord Mor. If you please to do me that honour, madam, I shall certainly be there.

Lady Bet. That's all, my lord.

Lord Mor. Is not your ladyship for walking ?

Lady Bet. If your lordship dares venture with me.

Lord Mor. O ! madam ! [Taking her hand.] How my heart dances ! what heavenly music's in her voice, when softened into kindness.

[Aside.

Lady Bet. Ha ! his hand trembles——Sir Charles may be mistaken.

Lord Fop. My lady Graveairs, you won't let sir Charles leave us ?

[Exeunt.

[Manent SIR CHARLES and LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Lady Grave. No, my lord, we'll follow you—stay a little.

[To SIR CHARLES.

Sir Cha. I thought your ladyship designed to follow them.

Lady Grave. Perhaps I'd speak with you.

Sir Cha. But, madam, consider ; we shall certainly be observed.

Lady Grave. Lord, sir, if you think it such a favour.

[Exit hastily.

Sir Cha. Is she gone ? let her go, &c.

[Exit singing.

ACT V.

SCENE I.—Continues.

Enter SIR CHARLES and LORD MORELOVE.

Sir Cha. COME a little this way—My lady Graveairs had an eye upon me, as I stole off, and, I'm apprehensive, will make use of any opportunity to talk with me.

Lord More. O! we are pretty safe here—Well, you were speaking of lady Betty.

Sir Cha. Aye, my lord—I say, notwithstanding all this sudden change of her behaviour, I would not have you yet be too secure of her: for, between you and I, since I told you, I have professed myself an open enemy to her power with you—'tis not impossible but this new air of good humour may very much proceed from a little woman's pride, of convincing me you are not yet out of her power.

Lord More. Not unlikely. But still, can we make no advantage of it?

Sir Cha. That's what I have been thinking of—look you—Death! my lady Graveairs!

Lord More. Ha! she will have audience, I find.

Sir Cha. There's no avoiding her—the truth is, I have owed her a little good nature a great while—I see there's but one way of getting rid of her—I must even appoint her a day of payment at last. If you'll step into my lodgings, my lord, I'll just give her an answer, and be with you in a moment.

Lord More. Very well, I'll stay there for you.
[Exit LORD MORELOVE.]

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS on the other side.

Lady Grave. Sir Charles!

Sir Cha. Come, come, no more of these reproachful looks; you'll find, madam, I have deserved better of you than your jealousy imagines—Is it a fault to be tender of your reputation?—fy, fy—This may be a proper time to talk, and of my contriving, too—you see I just now shook off my lord Morelove on purpose.

Lady Grave. May I believe you?

Sir Cha. Still doubting my fidelity, and mistaking my discretion for want of good nature!

Lady Grave. Don't think me troublesome—For I confess 'tis death to think of parting with you: since the world sees for you I have neglected friends and reputation, have stood the little insults of disdainful prudes, that envied me perhaps your friendship; have borne the freezing looks of near and general acquaintance—Since this is so—don't let them ridicule me, too, and say my foolish vanity undid me! Don't let them point at me as a cast mistress!

Sir Cha. You wrong me, to suppose the thought: you'll have better of me when we meet: When shall you be at leisure?

Lady Grave. I confess I would see you once again; if what I have more to say prove ineffectual, perhaps it may convince me then, 'tis my interest to part with you—Can you come to-night?

Sir Cha. You know we have company, and I'm afraid they'll stay too late—Can't it be before supper?—What's o'clock now?

Lady Grave. It's almost six.

Sir Cha. At seven, then, be sure of me; till when, I'd have you go back to the ladies, to avoid suspicion, and about that time have the vapours.

Lady Grave. May I depend upon you? [Exit.]

Sir Cha. Depend on every thing—A very troublesome business this—Send me once fairly rid on't—if ever I'm caught in an honourable affair again!—A debt, now, that a little ready civility, and away, would satisfy, a man might hear with; but to have a rent-charge upon one's good-nature, with an unconscionable long scroll of arrears, too, that would eat out the profits of the best estate in Christendom—ah—intolerable! Well! I'll even to my lord, and shake off the thoughts on't. [Exit.]

Enter LADY BETTY and LADY EASY.

Lady Bet. I observe, my dear, you have usually this great fortune at play; it were enough to make one suspect your good luck with an husband.

Lady Easy. Truly, I don't complain of my fortune either way.

Lady Bet. Præthee tell me, you are often advising me to it; are there those real comfortable advantages in marriage, that our old aunts and grandmothers would persuade us of?

Lady Easy. Upon my word, if I had the worst husband in the world, I should still think so.

Lady Bet. Ay, but then the hazard of not having a good one, my dear.

Lady Easy. You may have a good one, I dare say, if you don't give airs till you spoil him.

Lady Bet. Can there be the same dear, full delight, in giving ease as pain? Oh, my dear, the thought of parting with one's power is insupportable!

Lady Easy. And the keeping it, till it dwindles into no power at all, is most ruefully foolish.

Lady Bet. But still, to marry before one's heartily in love—

Lady Easy. Is not half so formidable a calamity—but if I have any eyes, my dear, you'll run no great hazard of that in venturing on my lord Morelove—You don't know, perhaps, that within this half hour, the tone of your voice is strangely softened to him: ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. My dear, you are positively, one or other, the most censorious creature in the world.

—and so I see its in vain to talk with you—
Pray, will you go back to the company?

Lady Easy. Ah! poor lady Betty! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Changes to SIR CHARLES'S lodgings.

Enter SIR CHARLES and LORD MORELOVE.

Lord Mor. Charles, you have transported me! you have made my part in the scene so very easy, too, 'tis impossible I should fail in it.

Sir Cha. That's what I considered; for, now, the more you throw yourself into her power, the more I shall be able to force her into yours.

Lord Mor. After all, (begging the ladies' pardon) your fine women, like bullies, are only stout when they know their men: a man of an honest courage may fright them into any thing! Well, I am fully instructed, and will about it instantly—Won't you go along with me?

Sir Cha. That may not be so proper—besides, I have a little business upon my hands.

Lord Mor. Oh, your servant, sir—Good bye to you—you shan't stir.

Sir Cha. My lord, your servant—[Exit LORD MOR.] So! now to dispose myself 'till 'tis time to think of my lady Graveairs—Umph! I have no great maw to that business, methinks—I don't find myself in humour enough to come up to the civil things that are usually expected in the making up of an old quarrel—[EDGING crosses the stage.] There goes a warmer temptation by half—Ha! into my wife's bed-chamber, too—I question if the jade has any great business there!—I have a fancy she has only a mind to be taking the opportunity of nobody's being at home, to make her peace with me—let me see—aye, I shall have time enough to go to her ladyship afterwards—Besides, I want a little sleep, I find—Your young fops may talk of their women of quality—but, to me now, there's a strange agreeable convenience in a creature one is not obliged to say much to upon these occasions.

[Going.]

Enter EDGING.

Edg. Did you call me, sir?

Sir Cha. Ha! all's right—[Aside.]—Yes, madam, I did call you. [Sits down.]

Edg. What would you please to have, sir?

Sir Cha. Have! Why, I would have you grow a good girl, and know when you are well used, hussy.

Edg. Sir, I don't complain of any thing, not I.

Sir Cha. Well, don't be uneasy—I am not angry with you now—Come and kiss me.

Edg. Lard, sir!

Sir Cha. Don't be a fool, now—Come hither.

Edg. Pshaw— [Goes to him.]

Sir Cha. No wry face—so—sit down. I won't have you look grave neither; let me see you smile, you jade, you.

Edg. Ha, ha!

[Laughs and blushes.]

Sir Cha. Ah, you melting rogue!

Edg. Come, don't you be at your tricks now—Lard, can't you sit still and talk with one! I am sure there's ten times more love in that, and fifty times the satisfaction, people may say what they will.

Sir Cha. Well! now you're good, you shall have your own way—I am going to lie down in the next room; and, since you love a little chat, come and throw my night-gown over me, and you shall talk me to sleep. [Exit SIR CHARLES.]

Edg. Yes, sir,—for all his way, I see he likes me still. [Exit after him.]

SCENE III.—Changes to the Terrace.

Enter LADY BETTY, LADY EASY, and LORD MORELOVE.

Lord Mor. Nay, madam, there you are too severe upon him; for, bating now and then a little vanity, my lord Foppington does not want wit sometimes to make him a very tolerable woman's man.

Lady Bet. But such eternal vanity grows tiresome.

Lady Easy. Come, if he were not so loose in his morals, his vanity, methinks, might be easily excused, considering how much 'tis in fashion: for, pray observe what's half the conversation of most of the fine young people about town, but a perpetual affectation of appearing foremost in the knowledge of manners, new modes, and scandal? and, in that, I don't see any body comes up to him.

Lord Mor. Nor I, indeed—and here he comes—Pray, madam, let's have a little more of him; nobody shews him to more advantage than your ladyship.

Lady Bet. Nay, with all my heart; you'll second me, my lord.

Lord Mor. Upon occasion, madam—

Lady Easy. Engaging upon parties, my lord? [Aside, and smiling to LORD MOR.]

Enter LORD FOPPINGTON.

Lord Fop. So, ladies! what's the affair now?

Lady Bet. Why, you were, my lord! I was allowing you a great many good qualities; but lady Easy says you are a perfect hypocrite; and that, whatever airs you give yourself to the women, she's confident you value no woman in the world equal to your own lady.

Lord Fop. You see, madam, how I am scandalized upon your account. But, it is so natural for a prude to be malicious, when a man endeavours to be well with any body but herself—did you ever observe she was piqued at that before? ha, ha!

Lady Bet. I'll swear you are a provoking creature.

Lord Fop. Let's be more familiar upon't, and give her disorder! ha, ha!

Lady Bet. Ha, ha, ha!

Lord Fop. Stop my breath, but lady Easy is an admirable discoverer!—Marriage is indeed a prodigious security of one's inclination; a man's likely to take a world of pains in an employment, where he can't be turned out for his idleness.

Lady Bet. I vow, my lord, that's vastly generous to all the fine women; you are for giving them a despotic power in love, I see, to reward and punish as they think fit.

Lord Fop. Ha, ha! Right, madam; what signifies beauty without power? And a fine woman, when she's married, makes as ridiculous a figure, as a beaten general marching out of a garrison.

Lady Easy. I'm afraid, lady Betty, the greatest danger in your use of power, would be from a too heedless liberality; you would more mind the man than his merit.

Lord Fop. Piqued again, by all that's fretful!—Well, certainly, to give envy is a pleasure inexpressible.

[To LADY BETTY.]

Lady Bet. Ha, ha!

Lady Easy. Does not she show him well, my lord?

[Aside to LORD MOR.]

Lord Mor. Perfectly, and me to myself—For now, I almost blush to think I ever was uneasy at him.

[To LADY EASY.]

Lord Fop. Lady Easy, I ask ten thousand pardons; I'm afraid I am rude all this while.

Lady Easy. Oh, not at all, my lord; you are always good company, when you please: not but in some things, indeed, you are apt to be like other fine gentlemen, a little too loose in your principles.

Lord Fop. Oh, madam, never to the offence of the ladies; I agree in any community with them; nobody is a more constant churchman, when the fine women are there.

Lady Easy. Oh fy, my lord! you ought not to go for their sakes at all! And I wonder, you that are for being such a good husband of your virtues, are not afraid of bringing your prudence into a lampoon, or a play.

Lady Bet. Lampoons and plays, madam, are only things to be laughed at.

Lord Fop. Odso! ladies, the court's coming home, I see; shall not we make our bows?

Lady Bet. Oh, by all means!

Lady Easy. Lady Betty, I must leave you; for I am obliged to write letters; and I know you won't give me time after supper.

Lady Bet. Well, my dear, I'll make a short visit, and be with you. [Exit LADY EASY.] Pray, what's become of my lady Graveairs?

Lord Mor. Oh, I believe she's gone home, madam; she seemed not to be very well.

Lord Fop. And where's sir Charles, my lord?

Lord Mor. I left him at his own lodgings.

Lady Bet. He's upon some ramble, I'm afraid.

Lord Fop. Nay, as for that matter, a man may ramble at home sometimes—But, here come the chaises; we must make a little more haste, madam. [Exit.]

SCENE IV.—Changes to SIR CHARLES'S lodgings.

Enter LADY EASY, and a Servant.

Lady Easy. Is your master come home?

Ser. Yes, madam.

Lady Easy. Where is he?

Ser. I believe, madam, he's laid down to sleep.

Lady Easy. Where's Edging? Bid her get me some wax and paper—stay, it's no matter, now I think on it—there's some above upon my toilette. [Exit severally.]

SCENE V.

Opens, and discovers SIR CHARLES without his periwig, and EDGING by him, both asleep, in two easy chairs. Then enters LADY EASY, who starts and trembles, some time unable to speak.

Lady Easy. Ha! protect me, virtue, patience, reason!

Teach me to bear this killing sight, or let Me think my dreaming senses are deceived!
For sure, a sight like this might raise the arm
Of duty, even to the breast of love! At least,
I'll throw this vizard of my patience off:
Now wake him in his guilt,
And, barefaced, front him with my wrongs.
I'll talk to him till he blushes, nay, till he—
Frowns on me, perhaps—and then
I'm lost again—The ease of a few tears
Is all that's left to me—
And duty, too, forbids me to insult,
When I have vowed obedience—Perhaps
The fault's in me, and nature has not formed
Me with the thousand little requisites
That warm the heart to love—
Somewhere there is a fault—
But Heaven best knows what both of us deserve:
Ha! bare-headed, and in so sound a sleep!
Who knows, while thus exposed to the unwholesome air,
But Heaven offended may o'ertake his crime,
And, in some languishing distemper, leave him
A severe example of its violated laws—
Forbid it mercy, and forbid it love!
This may prevent it.

[Takes a steinkirk off her neck, and lays it gently on his head.]

And, if he should wake offended at my too busy care, let my heart-breaking patience, duty, and my fond affection, plead my pardon. [Exit.]

[After she has been out some time, a bell rings; EDGING wakes, and stirs SIR CHARLES.]

Edg. Oh!

Sir Cha. How now! what's the matter?

Edg. Oh, bless my soul! my lady's come home.

Sir Cha. Go, go, then.

[Bell rings.]

Edg. Oh, lud! my head's in such a condition, too. [Runs to the glass.] I am coming, madam—Oh, lud! here's no powder, neither—Here, madam.

[Exit.]

Sir Cha. How now? [Feeling the steinkirk upon his head.] What's this? How came it here? [Puts on his wig.] Did not I see my wife wear this to-day?—Death! she can't have been here, sure—It could not be jealousy that brought her home—for my coming was accidental—so, too, I fear, was hers—How careless have I been?—not to secure the door, neither—'Twas foolish—It must be so! She certainly has seen me here sleeping with her woman: if so, how low an hypocrite to her must that sight have proved me! The thought has made me despicable, even to myself—How mean a vice is lying, and how often have these empty pleasures lulled my honour and my conscience to lethargy, while I grossly have abused her, poorly skulking behind a thousand falsehoods!—Now I reflect, this has not been the first of her discoveries—How contemptible a figure must I have made to her! A crowd of recollected circumstances confirms me now, she has been long acquainted with my follies; and yet, with what amazing prudence has she borne the secret pangs of injured love, and wore an everlasting smile to me! This asks a little thinking—something should be done—I'll see her instantly, and be resolved from her behaviour.

[Exit.]

SCENE VI.—Changes to another room.

Enter LADY EASY, and EDGING.

Lady Easy. Where have you been, Edging?

Edg. Been, madam! I—I—I—I came as soon as I heard you ring, madam.

Lady Easy. How guilt confounds her! but she's below my thought—Fetch my last new sack hither—I have a mind to alter it a little—make haste Edg. Yes, madam—I see she does not suspect any thing.

[Exit.]

Lady Easy. Heigh ho! [Sitting down.] I had forgot—but I'm unfit for writing now—'Twas an hard conflict—yet it's a joy to think it over: a secret pride, to tell my heart my conduct has been just—How low are vicious minds, that offer injuries! how much superior innocence, that bears them! Still there's a pleasure, even in the melancholy of a quiet conscience—Away, my fears, it is not yet impossible—for, while his human nature is not quite shook off, I ought not to despair.

Re-enter EDGING, with a Sack.

Edg. Here's the sack, madam.

Lady Easy. So, sit down there—and, let me see—here—rip off all that silver.

Edg. Indeed, I always thought it would become your ladyship better without it—But, now, suppose, madam, you carried another row of gold round the scollops, and then you take and lay this silver plain all along the gathers, and your ladyship will perfectly see, it will give the thing ten thousand times another air.

Lady Easy. Prithee, don't be impertinent; do as I bid you.

Edg. Nay, madam, with all my heart; your ladyship may do as you please.

Lady Easy. This creature grows so confident; and I dare not part with her, lest he should think it jealousy.

[Aside.]

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir Cha. So, my dear! What, at work! how are you employed, pray?

Lady Easy. I was thinking to alter this sack here.

Sir Cha. What's amiss? Methinks it's very pretty.

Edg. Yes, sir, it's pretty enough for that matter; but my lady has a mind it should be proper, too.

Sir Cha. Indeed!

Lady Easy. I fancy plain gold and black would become me better.

Sir Cha. That's a grave thought, my dear.

Edg. O, dear sir, not at all; my lady's much in the right; I am sure, as it is, it's fit for nothing but a girl.

Sir Cha. Leave the room.

Edg. Lord, sir! I can't stir—I must stay to—

Sir Cha. Go—

[Angrily.]

Edg. [Throwing down the work hastily, and crying, aside.] If ever I speak to him again, I'll be burned!

[Exit EDGING.]

Sir Cha. Sit still, my dear—I came to talk with you—and, which you well may wonder at, what I have to say is of importance, too; but it is in order to my hereafter always talking kindly to you.

Lady Easy. Your words were never disobliging, nor can I charge you with a look that ever had the appearance of being unkind.

Sir Cha. The perpetual spring of your good humour lets me draw no merit from what I have appeared to be, which makes me curious now to know your thoughts of what I really am: and never having asked you this before, it puzzles me: nor can I (my strange negligence considered) reconcile to reason your first thought of venturing upon marriage with me.

Lady Easy. I never thought it such a hazard.

Sir Cha. How could a woman of your restraint in principles, sedateness, sense, and tender disposition, propose to lead an happy life with one (now I reflect) that hardly took an hour's pains, even before marriage, to appear but what I am: a loose, unheeded wretch, absent in all I do, civil, and as often rude, without design, unseasonably thoughtful, easy to a fault, and, in my best of praise, but carelessly good-natured? How shall I reconcile your temper with having made so strange a choice?

Lady Easy. Your own words may answer you—Your having never seemed to be but what you really were; and, through that carelessness of temper, there still shone forth to me an undesigning honesty, I always doubted of in smoother faces: thus, while I saw you took least pains to win me, you pleased and wooed me most: nay, I have thought, that such a temper could never be deliberately unkind: or, at the worst, I knew that errors, from the want of thinking, might be borne; at least, when, probably, one moment's serious thought might end them: these were my worst of fears; and these, when weighed by growing love, against my solid hopes, were nothing.

Sir Cha. My dear, your understanding startles me, and justly calls my own in question: I blush to think I've worn so bright a jewel in my bosom, and, till this hour, have scarce been curious once to look upon its lustre.

Lady Easy. You set too high a value on the common qualities of an easy wife.

Sir Cha. Virtues, like benefits, are double, when concealed: and, I confess, I yet suspect you of an higher value far than I have spoke you.

Lady Easy. I understand you not.

Sir Cha. I'll speak more plainly to you—be free, and tell me—Where did you leave this handkerchief?

Lady Easy. Ha!

Sir Cha. What is it you start at? You hear the question.

Lady Easy. What shall I say? my fears confound me. [Aside.]

Sir Cha. Be not concerned, my dear; be easy in the truth, and tell me.

Lady Easy. I cannot speak—and I could wish you'd not oblige me to it—'tis the only thing I ever yet refused you; and, though I want reason for my will, let me not answer you.

Sir Cha. Your will, then, be a reason; and since I see you are so generously tender of reproaching me, it is fit I should be easy in my gratitude, and make, what ought to be my shame, my joy. Let me be therefore pleased to tell you now, your wondrous conduct has waked me to a sense of your disquiet past, and resolution never to disturb it more—And (not that I offer it as a merit, but yet in blind compliance to my will) let me beg you would immediately discharge your woman.

Lady Easy. Alas! I think not of her—O, my dear, distract me not with this excess of goodness. [Weeping.]

Sir Cha. Nay, praise me not, lest I reflect how little I have deserved it; I see you are in pain to give me this confusion. Come, I will not shock your softness by my untimely blush for what is past, but rather sooth you to a pleasure at my sense of joy for my recovered happiness to come. Give, then, to my new-born love what name you please; it cannot, shall not, be too kind: O! it cannot be too soft for what my soul swells up with emulation to deserve—Receive me, then, entire at last, and take, what yet no woman ever truly had, my conquered heart!

Lady Easy. O, the soft treasure! O, the dear reward of long-deserving love!—Now am I blest indeed, to see you kind without the expence of pain in being so, to make you mine with easiness: thus! thus to have you mine, is something more than happiness; 'tis double life, and madness of abounding joy. But it was a pain intolerable to give you a confusion.

Sir Cha. O thou engaging virtue! But I am too slow in doing justice to thy love: I know thy softness will refuse me; but remember, I insist upon it—let thy woman be discharged this minute.

Lady Easy. No, my dear; think me not so low in faith, to fear, that, after what you have said, it will ever be in her power to do me future injury. When I can conveniently provide for her, I'll think on it: but to discharge her now, might let her guess at the occasion; and methinks I would have our difference, like our endearments, be equally a secret to our servants.

Sir Cha. Still my superior every way!—be it as you have better thought—Well, my dear, now I'll confess a thing that was not in your power to accuse me of; to be short, I own this creature is not the only one I have been to blame with.

Lady Easy. I know she is not, and was always less concerned to find it so; for constancy in errors might have been fatal to me.

Sir Cha. What is it you know, my dear?

[Surprised.]

Lady Easy. Come, I'm not afraid to accuse you now—my lady Graveairs—Your carelessness, my dear, let all the world know it; and it would have been hard indeed, had it been only to me a secret.

Sir Cha. My dear, I will ask no more questions, for fear of being more ridiculous; I do confess, I thought my discretion there had been a master-piece—How contemptible must I have looked all this while!

Lady Easy. You shan't say so.

Sir Cha. Well, to let you see I had some shame, as well as nature in me, I had writ this to my lady Graveairs upon my first discovering that you knew I had wronged you: read it.

Lady Easy. [Reads.] 'Something has happened that prevents the visit I intended you; and I could gladly wish, you never would reproach me if I tell you, 'tis utterly inconvenient that I should ever see you more.'

This, indeed, was more than I had merited.

Enter a Servant.

Sir Cha. Who is there? Here—Step with this to lady Graveairs.

[Seals the letter, and gives it the servant.]

Ser. Yes, sir—Madam, my lady Betty's come.

Lady Easy. I'll wait on her.

Sir Cha. My dear, I am thinking there may be other things my negligence may have wronged you in; but be assured as I discover, all shall be corrected.—Is there any part or circumstance in your fortune that I can change or yet make easier to you?

Lady Easy. None, my dear; your good-nature never stinted me in that; and now, methinks, I have less occasion there than ever.

Re-enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, my lord Morelove's come.

Sir Cha. I am coming—I think I told you of the design we had laid against lady Betty.

Lady Easy. You did, and I should be pleased to be myself concerned in it.

Sir Cha. I believe we may employ you: I know he waits for me with impatience. But, my dear, won't you think me tasteless to the joy you have given me, to suffer, at this time, any concern but you to employ my thoughts?

Lady Easy. Seasons must be obeyed; and since I know your friend's happiness depending, I could not taste my own, should you neglect it.

Sir Cha. Thou easy sweetness!—O! what a waste of thy neglected love has my unthinking brain committed! but time, and future thrift of tenderness, shall yet repair it all. The hours will come when this soft gliding stream, that swells my heart, uninterrupted shall renew its course—

And, like the ocean after ebb, shall move
With constant force of due returning love.

[Exit.]

SCENE VII.—Changes to another room.

Re-enter LADY EASY and LADY BETTY.

Lady Bet. You have been in tears, my dear, and yet you look pleased, too.

Lady Easy. You will pardon me, If I cannot let you into circumstances: but be satisfied, sir Charles has made me happy, even to a pain of joy.

Lady Bet. Indeed, I am truly glad of it; though I am sorry to find, that any one who has generosity enough to do you justice, should, unprovoked, be so great an enemy to me.

Lady Easy. Sir Charles your enemy!

Lady Bet. My dear, you will pardon me if I always thought him so, but now I am convinced of it.

Lady Easy. In what, pray? I cannot think you will find him so.

Lady Bet. O! madam, it has been his whole business, of late, to make an utter breach between my lord Morelove and me.

Lady Easy. That may be owing to your usage of my lord: perhaps, he thought it would not disoblige you. I am confident you are mistaken in him.

Lady Bet. O! I don't use to be out in things of this nature; I can see well enough: but I shall be able to tell you more when I have talked with my lord.

Lady Easy. Here he comes; and because you shall talk with him—No excuses—for positively I will leave you together.

Lady Bet. Indeed, my dear, I desire you will stay, then; for I know you think now, that I have a mind to——

Lady Easy. To—to——ha, ha, ha!

[Going.]

Lady Bet. Well! I'll remember this.

Enter LORD MORELOVE.

Lord Mor. I hope I don't fright you away, madam?

Lady Easy. Not at all, my lord; but I must beg your pardon for a moment; I will wait upon you immediately.

[Exit.]

Lady Bet. My lady Easy gone?

Lord Mor. Perhaps, madam, in friendship to you; she thinks I may have deserved the coldness you of late have shewn to me, and was willing to give you this opportunity to convince me you have not done it without just grounds and reason.

Lady Bet. How handsomely does he reproach me! but I cannot bear that he should think I know it—[Aside.] My lord, whatever has passed between you and me, I dare swear that could not be her thoughts at this time: for, when two people have appeared professed enemies, she cannot but think one will as little care to give, as the other receive, a justification of their actions.

Lord Mor. Passion, indeed, often does repeated injuries on both sides; but I don't remember, in my heat of error, I ever yet professed myself your enemy.

Lady Bet. My lord, I shall be very free with you—I confess, I do not think, now, I have a greater enemy in the world.

Lord Mor. If having loved you to my own disquiet, be injurious, I am contented then to stand the foremost of your enemies.

Lady Bet. O! my lord, there's no great fear of your being my enemy that way, I dare say—

Lord Mor. There is no other way my heart can bear to offend you now; and I foresee in that it will persist to my undoing.

Lady Bet. Fy, fy, my lord! we know where your heart is well enough.

Lord Mor. My conduct has, indeed, deserved this scorn; and therefore, 'tis but just I should submit to your resentment, and beg (though I am assured in vain) for pardon. [Kneels.]

Enter SIR CHARLES.

Sir Cha. How, my lord!

[LORD MORELOVE rises.]

Lady Bet. Ha! He here! This was unlucky.

[Aside.]

Lord Mor. O, pity my confusion!

[To LADY BETTY.]

Sir Cha. I am sorry to see you can so soon forget yourself: methinks the insults you have borne from that lady, by this time should have warned you into a disgust of her regardless principles.

Lord Mor. Hold, sir Charles, while you and I are friends! I desire you would speak with honour of this lady—'Tis sufficient I have no complaint against her, and—

Lady Bet. My lord, I beg you would resent this thing no farther: an injury like this is better punished with our contempt; apparent malice should only be laughed at.

Sir Cha. Ha, ha! the old resource. Offers of any hopes to delude him from his resentment, and then as the Grand Monarque did with Cavalier: and then you are sure to keep your word with him.

Lady Bet. Sir Charles, to let you know how far I am above your little spleen, my lord, your hand! from this hour—

Sir Cha. Pshaw! pshaw! all design! all pique! mere artifice and disappointed woman.

Lady Bet. Look you, sir, not that I doubt my lord's opinion of me; yet—

Sir Cha. Look you, madam, in short, your word has been too often taken, to let you make up quarrels, as you used to do, with a soft look, and a fair promise you never intended to keep.

Lady Bet. Was ever such insolence! He won't give me leave to speak.

Lord Mor. Sir Charles!

Lady Bet. No, pray, my lord, have patience; and since his malice seems to grow particular, I dare his worst, and urge him to the proof on't: Pray, sir, wherein can you charge me with breach of promise to my lord?

Sir Cha. Death! you won't deny it? How often, to piece up a quarrel, have you appointed him to visit you alone; and, though you have promised to see no other company the whole day, when he was come he has found you among the laugh of noisy fops, coquettes, and coxcombs, dissolutely gay, while your full eyes ran over with transport at their flattery, and your own vain power of pleasing? How often, I say, have you been known to throw away, at least, four hours of your good humour upon such wretches, and, the minute they were gone, grew only dull to him, sunk into a distasteful spleen, complained you had talked yourself into the head-ache, and then indulged upon the dear delight of seeing him in pain, and, by that time you had stretched and gaped him heartily out of patience, of a sudden most importantly remember you had outsat your appointment with my lady Fiddle-faddle, and immediately order your coach to the park?

Lady Bet. Yet, sir, have you done?

Sir Cha. No—though this might serve to shew the nature of your principles: but the noble conquest you have gained at last over defeated sense of reputation, too, has made your fame immortal.

Lord Mor. How, sir?

Lady Bet. My reputation?

Sir Cha. Aye, madam, your reputation—My lord, if I advance a falsehood, then resent it. I say your reputation—It has been your life's whole pride of late to be the common toast of every public table, vain even in the infamous addresses of a married man, my lord Foppington; let that be reconciled with reputation, I will now shake hands with shame, and bow me to the low contempt which you deserve from him; not but I suppose you will yet endeavour to recover him. Now, you find ill usage in danger of losing your conquest, 'tis possible you will stop at nothing to preserve it.

Lady Bet. Sir Charles—

[Walks disordered, and he after her.]

Sir Cha. I know your vanity is so voracious, it will even wound itself to feed itself; offer him a blank, perhaps, to fill up with hopes of what nature he pleases, and part even with your pride to keep him.

Lady Bet. Sir Charles, I have not deserved this of you.

[Bursting into tears.]

Sir Cha. Ah! true woman! drop him a soft dissembling tear, and then his just resentment must be hushed of course.

Lord Mor. O Charles! I can bear no more; those tears are so reproaching.

Sir Cha. Hist, for your life! [Aside, and then aloud.] My lord, if you believe her, you are undone; the very next sight of my lord Foppington would make her yet forswear all that she can promise.

Lady Bet. My lord Foppington! Is that the mighty crime that must condemn me, then? You know I used him but as a tool of my resentment, which you yourself, by a pretended friendship to us both, most artfully provoked me to—

Lord Mor. Hold, I conjure you, madam; I want not this conviction.

Lady Bet. Send for him this minute, and you and he shall both be witnesses of the contempt and detestation I have for any forward hopes his vanity may have given him, or your malice would insinuate.

Sir Cha. Death! you would as soon eat fire—as soon part with your luxurious taste of folly, as dare to own the half of this before his face, or any one, that would make you blush to deny it to—Here comes my wife now, we shall see—

Ha! and my lord Foppington with her—Now! now, we shall see this mighty proof of your sincerity—Now! my lord, you'll have a warning sure, and henceforth know me for your friend, indeed.

Enter LADY EASY, and LORD FOPPINGTON.

Lady Easy. In tears, my dear! what's the matter?

Lady Bet. O, my dear, all I told you is true: Sir Charles has shewn himself so inveterately my enemy, that, if I believed I deserved but half his hate, 'twould make me hate myself.

Lord Fop. Hark you, Charles; prithee what is this business?

Sir Cha. Why, yours, my lord, for aught I know—I have made such a breach betwixt them—I cannot promise much for the courage of a woman; but if hers holds, I am sure it is wide enough; you may enter ten abreast, my lord.

Lord Fop. Say'st thou so, Charles? Then, I hold six to four, I am the first man in the town.

Lady Easy. Sure there must be some mistake in this: I hope he has not made my lord your enemy.

Lady Bet. I know not what he has done.

Lord More. Far be that thought! Alas! I am too much in fear myself, that what I have this day committed, advised by his mistaken friendship, may have done my love irreparable prejudice.

Lady Bet. No, my lord; since I perceive his little arts have not prevailed upon your good nature to my prejudice, I am bound in gratitude, in duty to myself, and to the confession you have made, my lord, to acknowledge now, I have been to blame, too.

Lord More. Ha! is it possible? can you own so much? O my transported heart!

Lady Bet. He says I have taken pleasure in seeing you uneasy—I own it—but 'twas when that uneasiness I thought proceeded from your love; and if you did love—'twill not be much to pardon it.

Lord More. O let my soul, thus bending to your power, adore this soft descending goodness!

Lady Bet. And, since the giddy woman's slights I have shewn you too often, have been public, 'tis fit, at last, the amends and reparation should be so: therefore, what I offered to Sir Charles, I now repeat before this company, my utter detestation of any past, or future gallantry, that has, or shall be offered by me, to your uneasiness.

Lord More. Oh! be less generous, or teach me to deserve it—Now blush, sir Charles, at your injurious accusation.

Lord Fop. Ah! Pardi, Voila quelque chose d'extraordinaire!

Lady Bet. As for my lord Foppington, I owe him thanks for having been so friendly an instrument of our reconciliation; for though, in the little outward gallantry I received from him, I did not immediately trust him with my design in it, yet I have a better opinion of his understanding, than to suppose he could mistake it.

Lord Fop. I am struck dumb with the deliberation of her assurance! and do not positively remember, that the nonchalance of my temper ever had so bright an occasion to shew itself before.

Lady Bet. My lord, I hope you will pardon the freedom I have taken with you.

Lord Fop. Oh, madam, do not be under the confusion of an apology upon my account; for, in cases of this nature, I am never disappointed, but when I find a lady of the same mind two hours together—Madam, I have lost a thousand fine women in my time; but never had the ill manners to be out of humour with any one for refusing me, since I was born.

Lady Bet. My lord, that's a very prudent temper.

Lord Fop. Madam, to convince you that I am in an universal peace with mankind, since you own I have so far contributed to your happiness, give me leave to have the honour of completing it, by joining your hand, where you have already offered up your inclination.

Lady Bet. My lord, that's a favour I cannot refuse you.

Lord More. Generous, indeed, my lord!

[LORD FOPPINGTON joins their hands.]

Lord Fop. And, stop my breath, if ever I was better pleased since my first entrance into human nature!

Sir Cha. How now, my lord! what? throw up the cards before you have lost the game?

Lord Fop. Look you, Charles, 'tis true, I did design to have played with her alone: but he that will keep well with the ladies, must sometimes be content to make one at a pool with them; and, since I know I must engage her in my turn, I don't see any great odds in letting him take the first game with her.

Sir Cha. Wisely considered, my lord!

Lady Bet. And now, sir Charles—

Sir Cha. And now, madam, I'll save you the trouble of a long speech; and, in one word, confess that every thing I have done in regard to you this day, was purely artificial—I saw there was no way to secure you to my lord Morelove, but by alarming your pride with the danger of losing him: and, since the success must have by this time convinced you, that in love nothing is more ridiculous than an over-acted aversion, I am sure you won't take it ill, if we at last congratulate your good-nature, by heartily laughing at the fright we had put you in: ha, ha, ha!

Lady Easy. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. Why—Well, I declare it now, I hate you worse than ever.

Sir Cha. Ha, ha, ha! And was it afraid they would take away it's love from it?—Poor lady Betty! Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Easy. My dear, I beg your pardon; but it is impossible not to laugh when one is so heartily pleased.

Lord Top. Really, madam, I am afraid the humour of the company will draw me into your displeasure, too; but, if I were to expire this moment, my last breath would positively go out with a laugh. Ha, ha, ha!

Lady Bet. Nay, I have deserved it all, that's the truth on't—but I hope, my lord, you were not in this design against me.

Lord More. As a proof, madam, I am inclined never to deceive you more—I do confess I had my share in it.

Lady Bet. You do, my lord—then I declare it was a design, one or other—the best carried on that ever I knew in my life; and (to my shame I own it) for aught I know, the only thing that could have prevailed upon my temper; 'twas a foolish pride that has cost me many a bitten lip to support it—I wish we don't both repent, my lord.

Lord More. Don't you repent with me, and we never shall.

Sir Cha. Well, madam, now the worst that the world can say of your past conduct, is, that my lord had constancy, and you had tried it.

Enter a Servant to LORD MORELOVE.

Ser. My lord, Mr Lefevre's below, and desires to know what time your lordship will please to have the music begin.

Lord More. Sir Charles, what say you? will you give me leave to bring them hither?

Sir Cha. As the ladies think fit, my lord.

Lady Bet. Oh! by all means; 'twill be better here, unless we could have the terrace to ourselves.

Lord More. Then, pray desire them to come hither immediately.

Ser. Yes, my lord.

[Exit Servant.]

Enter LADY GRAVEAIRS.

Sir Cha. Lady Graveairs!

Lady Grave. Yes, you may well start! But don't suppose I am now come, like a poor tame fool, to upbraid your guilt; but, if I could, to blast you with a look.

Sir Cha. Come, come, you have sense—don't expose yourself—you are unhappy, and I own myself the cause. The only satisfaction I can offer you, is to protest, no new engagement takes me from you; but a sincere reflection of the long neglect, and injuries I have done the best of wives; for whose amends, and only sake, I now must part with you, and all the inconvenient pleasures of my life.

Lady Grave. Have you then fallen into the low contempt of exposing me, and to your wife, too?

Sir Cha. 'Twas impossible; without it, I could never be sincere in my conversion.

Lady Grave. Despicable!

Sir Cha. Do not think so—for my sake I know she'll not reproach you—nor, by her carriage, ever let the world perceive you have wronged her. My dear—

Lady Easy. Lady Graveairs, I hope you will sup with us?

Lady Grave. I cannot refuse so much good company, madam.

Sir Cha. You see the worst of her resentment—In the mean time, don't endeavour to be her friend, and she'll never be your enemy.

Lady Grave. I am unfortunate—'tis what my folly has deserved, and I submit to it.

Lord More. So! here is the music.

Lady Easy. Come, ladies, shall we sit?

SONG.

*Sabina, with an angel's face,
By love ordained for joy;
Seems of the siren's cruel race,
To charm and then destroy.
With all the arts of look and dress,
She fans the fatal fire;
Through pride, mistaken oft for grace,
She bids the swains expire.
The god of love, enraged to see
The nymph defy his flame,
Pronounced his merciless decree
Against the haughty dame.
Let age with double speed o'ertake her,
Let love the room of pride supply;
And, when the lovers all forsake her,
A spotless virgin let her die.*

SIR CHARLES comes forward with LADY EASY.

Sir Cha. Now, my dear, I find my happiness grow fast upon me; in all my past experience of the sex, I found, even among the better sort, so much of folly, pride, malice, passion, and irresolute desire, that I concluded thee but of the foremost rank, and, therefore, scarce worthy my concern; but thou hast stirred me with so severe a proof of thy exalted virtue, it gives me wonder equal to my love—If, then, the unkindly thought of what I have been, hereafter shall intrude upon thy growing quiet, let this reflection teach thee to be easy:

Thy wrongs, when greatest, most thy virtue proved;
And, from that virtue found, I blushed, and truly loved,

ACT I.

SCENE I.—The Park.

Enter CLERIMONT and ATALL.

Cle. MR ATALL, your very humble servant.

Atall. O, Clerimont, such an adventure! I was just going to your lodgings; such a transporting accident! in short, I am now positively in love for altogether!

Cle. All the sex together, I believe!

Atall. Nay, if thou dost not believe me, and stand my friend, I am ruined past redemption.

Cle. Dear sir, if I stand your friend without believing you, won't that do as well? But, why should you think I don't believe you? I have seen you twice in love within this fortnight; and it would be hard, indeed, to suppose a heart of so much mettle could not hold out a third engagement.

Atall. Then, to be serious, in one word, I am honourably in love; and, if she proves the woman I am sure she must, will positively marry her.

Cle. Marry! O degenerate virtue!

Atall. Now, will you help me?

Cle. Sir, you may depend upon me. Pray, give me leave first to ask a question or two. What is this honourable lady's name?

Atall. Faith, I don't know.

Cle. What are her parents?

Atall. I can't tell.

Cle. What fortune has she?

Atall. I don't know.

Cle. Where does she live?

Atall. I can't tell.

Cle. A very concise account of the person you design to marry! Pray, sir, what is it you do know of her?

Atall. That I'll tell you. Coming yesterday from Greenwich by water, I overtook a pair of oars, whose lovely freight was one single lady, and a fellow in a handsome livery in the stern. When I came up, I had at first resolved to use the privilege of the element, and bait her with waterman's wit, till I came to the bridge; but, as soon as she saw me, she very prudently prevented my design; and, as I passed, bowed to me with an humble blush, that spoke at once such sense, so just a fear, and modesty, as put the loosest of my thoughts to rout. And, when she found her fears had moved me into manners, the cautious gloom, that sat upon her beauties, disappeared; her sparkling eyes resumed their native fire; she looked, she smiled, she talked, while her diffusive charms new fired my heart, and gave my soul a softness it never felt before. To be brief, her conversation was as charming as her person, both easy, unconstrained, and sprightly; but, then, her limbs! O rapturous thought! The snowy down upon the wings of unfledged love had never half that softness.

Cle. Raptures, indeed! Pray, sir, how came you so well acquainted with her limbs?

Atall. By the most fortunate misfortune sure that ever was: for, as we were shooting the bridge, her boat, by the negligence of the waterman, running against the piles, was upset; out jumps the footman, to take care of a single rogue, and down went the poor lady to the bottom. My boat being before her, the stream drove her, by the help of her clothes, toward me; at sight of her, I plunged in, caught her in my arms, and, with much ado, supported her till my waterman pulled in to save us. But the charming difficulty of her getting into the boat, gave me a transport that all the wide water in the Thames had not power to cool; for, sir, while I was giving her a lift into the boat, I found the floating of her clothes had left her lovely limbs beneath as bare as a new-born Venus rising from the sea.

Cle. What an impudent happiness art thou capable of!

Atall. When she was a little recovered from her fright, she began to enquire my name, abode, and circumstances, that she might know to whom she owed her life and preservation. Now, to tell you the truth, I durst not trust her with my real name, lest she should from thence have discovered that my father was now actually under bonds to marry me to another woman; so, faith, I even told her my name was Freeman, a Gloucestershire gentleman, of a good estate, just come to town about a chancery suit. Besides, I was unwilling any accident should let my father know of my being yet in England, lest he should find me out, and force me to marry the woman I never saw (for which, you know, he commanded me home) before I have time to prevent it.

Cle. Well, but could you not learn the lady's name all this while?

Atall. No, faith, she was inexorable to all intreaties; only told me in general terms, that if what I vowed to her was sincere, she would give me a proof in a few days what hazards she would run to requite my services; so, after having told her where she might hear of me, I saw her into a chair, pressed her by the cold rosy fingers, kissed them warm, and parted.

Cle. What, then, you are quite off with the lady, I suppose, that you made an acquaintance with in the Park last week?

Atall. No, no; not so, neither: one's my Juno, all pride and beauty; but this my Venus, all life, love, and softness. Now, what I beg of thee, dear Clerimont, is this: Mrs Juno, as I told you, having done me the honour of a civil visit or two at my own lodgings, I must needs borrow thine to entertain Mrs Venus in; for, if the rival goddesses should meet and clash, you know there would be the devil to do between them.

Cle. Well, sir, my lodgings are at your service:—but you must be very private and sober, I can tell you; for my landlady's a Presbyterian; if she suspects your design, you're blown up, depend upon it.

Atall. Don't fear: I'll be as careful as a guilty conscience: but, I want immediate possession: for I expect to hear from her every moment, and have already directed her to send thither. Prithee, come with me.

Cle. Faith, you must excuse me; I expect some ladies in the Park that I would not miss for an empire: but yonder's my servant, he shall conduct you.

Atall. Very good! that will do as well, then. I'll send my man along with him to expect her commands, and call me if she sends: and, in the mean time, I'll e'en go home to my own lodgings; for, to tell you the truth, I expect a small message there from my goddess imperial. And I am not so much in love with my new bird in the bush, as to let t'other fly out of my hand for her.

Cle. And, pray, sir, what name does your goddess imperial, as you call her, know you by?

Atall. O, sir, with her I pass for a man of arms, and am called colonel Standfast; with my new face, John Freeman of Flatland-Hall, esq.—But time flies: I must leave you.

Cle. Well, dear Atall, I'm yours—Good luck to you ! [Erit ATALL.—What a happy fellow is this, that owes his success with the women purely to his inconstancy ! Here comes another, too, almost as happy as he, a fellow that's wise enough to be but half in love, and make his whole life a studied idleness.

Enter CARELESS.

So, Careless ! you're constant, I see, to your morning's saunter.—Well, how stand matters ?—I hear strange things of thee ; that, after having railed at marriage all thy life, thou hast resolved to fall into the noose at last.

Care. I don't see any great terror in the noose, as you call it, when a man's weary of liberty : the liberty of playing the fool, when one's turned of thirty, is not of much value.

Cle. Hey-day ! Then, you begin to have nothing in your head now, but settlements, children, and the main chance !

Care. Even so, faith ! but in hopes to come at them, too, I am forced very often to make my way through pills, elixirs, bolus's, ptisana, and gallipots.

Cle. What, is your mistress an apothecary's widow ?

Care. No, but she is an apothecary's shop, and keeps as many drugs in her bed-chamber ; she has her physic for every hour of the day and night—for 'tis vulgar, she says, to be a moment in rude and perfect health. Her bed lined with poppies ; the black boys at the feet, that the healthy employ to bear flowers in their arms, she loads with diascordium, and other sleepy potions : her sweet bags, instead of the common and offensive smells of musk and amber, breathe nothing but the more modish and salubrious scents of hartshorn, rue, and assafoetida.

Cle. Why, at this rate, she's only fit to be the consort of Hippocrates. But, pray, what other charms has this extraordinary lady ?

Care. She has one, Tom, that a man may relish without being so deep a physician.

Cle. What's that ?

Care. Why, two thousand pounds a year.

Cle. No vulgar beauty, I confess, sir. But canst thou, for any consideration, throw thyself into this hospital, this box of physic, and lie all night like leaf-gold upon a pill ?

Care. O, dear sir, this is not half the evil ; her humour is as fantastic as her diet ; nothing that is English must come near her ; all her delight is in foreign impertinencies : her rooms are all of Japan or Persia, her dress Indian, and her equipage are all monsters : the coachman came over with his horses, both from Russia, Flanders are too common ; the rest of her trim are a motley crowd of blacks, tawny, olives, feulamots, and pale blues : in short, she's for any thing that comes from beyond sea ; her greatest monsters are those of her own country ; and she's in love with nothing o' this side the line, but the apothecaries.

Cle. Apothecaries quotha ! why your fine lady, for aught I see, is a perfect dose of folly and physic ; in a month's time she'll grow like an antimonial cup, and a kiss will be able to work with you.

Care. But to prevent that, Tom, I design, upon the wedding-day, to break all her gallipots, kick the doctor down stairs, and force her, instead of physic, to take a hearty meal of a swinging rump of boiled beef and carrots ; and so 'faith I have told her.

Cle. That's something familiar : are you so near man and wife ?

Care. O nearer ; for I sometimes plague her till she hates the very sight of me.

Cle. Ha, ha ! very good ! So, being a very troublesome lover, you pretend to cure her of her physic by a counter poison.

Care. Right ; I intend to fee a doctor to prescribe to her an hour of my conversation to be taken every night and morning ; and this to be continued till her fever of aversion's over.

Cle. An admirable recipe !

Care. Well, Tom, but how stands thy own affair ? Is Clarinda kind yet ?

Cle. Faith, I cannot say she's absolutely kind, but she's pretty near it : for she's grown so ridiculously ill-humoured to me of late, that, if she keeps the same airs a week longer, I am in hopes to find as much ease from her folly, as my constancy would from her good-nature.—But to be plain, I'm afraid I have some secret rival in the case ; for women's vanity seldom gives them courage enough to use an old lover heartily ill, till they are first sure of a new one, that they intend to use better.

Care. What says sir Solomon ? He is your friend, I presume ?

Cle. Yes ; at least I can make him so when I please. There is an odd five hundred pound in her fortune, that he has a great mind should stick to his fingers, when he pays in the rest on't, which I am afraid I must comply with ; for she can't easily marry without his consent.—And yet she's so altered in her behaviour of late, that I scarce know what to do.—Prithee, take a turn and advise me.

Care. With all my heart.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.—Changes to SIR SOLOMON SADLIFE'S house.

Enter SIR SOLOMON, and SUPPLE his man.

Sir Sol. Supple, dost not thou perceive I put a great confidence in thee ?—I trust thee with my bosom secrets.

Sup. Yes, sir.

Sir Sol. Ah, Supple ! I begin to hate my wife—but be secret—

Sup. I'll never tell while I live, sir.

Sir Sol. Nay, then, I'll trust thee further. Between thee and I, Supple, I have reason to believe my wife hates me, too.

Sup. Ah, dear sir! I doubt that's no secret; for, to say the truth, my lady's bitter young, and gamesome.

Sir Sol. But can she have the impudence, think'st thou, to make a cuckold of a knight, one that was dubbed by the royal sword?

Sup. Alas, sir, I warrant she has the courage of a countess; if she's once provoked, she cares not what she does in her passion; if you were ten times a knight she'd give you dub for dub, sir.

Sir Sol. Ah! Supple, when her blood's up, I confess she's the devil; and I question if the whole conclave of cardinals could lay her. But suppose she should resolve to give me a sample of her sex, and make me a cuckold in cool blood?

Sup. Why, if she should, sir, don't take it so to heart; cuckolds are no such monsters now-a-days: in the city, you know, sir, it's so many honest men's fortune, that no body minds it there; and, at this end of the town, a cuckold has as much respect as his wife, for aught I see; for gentlemen don't know but it may be their own case another day, and so people are willing to do as they would be done by.

Sir Sol. And yet I do not think but my spouse is honest—and think she is not——would I were satisfied!

Sup. Troth, sir, I don't know what to think; but, in my conscience, I believe good looking after her can do her no harm.

Sir Sol. Right, Supple; and in order to it, I'll first demolish her visiting days. For how do I know but they may be so many private clubs for cuckoldom?

Sup. Ah, sir! your worship knows I was always against your coming to this end of the town.

Sir Sol. Thou wert indeed, my honest Supple: but woman! fair and faithless woman, wormed and worked me to her wishes;—like fond Mark Antony, I let my empire moulder from my hands, and gave up all for love.—I must have a young wife, with a murrain to me—I hate her, too—and yet the devil on't is, I'm still jealous of her.—Stay! let me reckon up all the fashionable virtues she has that can make a man happy. In the first place—I think her very ugly.

Sup. Ah, that's because you are married to her, sir.

Sir Sol. As for her expences, no arithmetic can reach them; she's always longing for something dear and useless; she will certainly ruin me in china, silks, ribbands, fans, laces, perfumes, washes, powder, patches, jessamine, gloves, and ratifia.

Sup. Ah, sir, that's a cruel liquor with them.

Sir Sol. To sum up all would run me mad.—The only way to put a stop to her career, must be to put off my coach, turn away her chairmen, lock out her Swiss portor, bar up the doors, keep out all visitors, and then she'll be less expensive.

Sup. Ay, sir, for few women think it worth their while to dress for their husbands.

Sir Sol. Then we shan't be plagued with my old lady Tittle-tattle's howd'ye's in a morning, nor my lady Dainty's spleen, or the sudden indisposition of that grim beast her horrible Dutch mastiff.

Sup. No, sir, nor the impertinence of that great fat creature, my lady Swill-Tea.

Sir Sol. And her squinting daughter.—No, Supple, after this night, nothing in petticoats shall come within ten yards of my doors.

Sup. Nor in breeches neither.

Sir Sol. Only Mr Clerimont; for I expect him to sign articles with me for the five hundred pounds he is to give me, for that ungovernable jade, my niece Clarinda.—But now to my own affairs. I'll step into the Park, and see if I can meet with my hopeful spouse there. I warrant, engaged in some innocent freedom, as she calls it, as walking in a mask, to laugh at the impertinencies of fops that don't know her; but 'tis more likely, I'm afraid, a plot to intrigue with those that do. Oh, how many torments lie in the small circle of a wedding-ring! [Exeunt.]

ACT II.

SCENE I.—CLARINDA'S apartment.

Enter CLARINDA and SYLVIA.

Cla. Ha, ha! poor Sylvia!

Syl. Nay, prithee, don't laugh at me. There's no accounting for inclination: for if there were, you know, why should it be a greater folly in me, to fall in love with a man I never saw but once in my life, than it is in you to resist an honest gentleman, whose fidelity has deserved your heart an hundred times over.

Cla. Ah, but an utter stranger, cousin, and one that, for aught you know, may be no gentleman.

Syl. That's impossible: his conversation could not be counterfeit. An elevated wit, and good breeding, have a natural lustre that's inimitable. Beside, he saved my life at the hazard of his own; so that part of what I give him, is but gratitude.

Cla. But suppose now he is married, and has three or four children?

Syl. Psha! prithee don't tease me with so many ill-natured objections. I tell you he is not married! I am sure he is not: for I never saw a face look more in humour in my life. Beside, he told me himself, he was a country gentleman, just come to town upon business: and I am resolved to believe him.

Cla. Well, well; I'll suppose you both as fit for one another as a couple of tallies. But, still, my dear, you know there's a surly old father's command against you; he is in articles to marry you to another: and, though I know love is a notable contriver, I can't see how you'll get over that difficulty.

Syl. 'Tis a terrible one, I own; but, with a little of your assistance, dear Clarinda, I am still in hopes to bring it to an even wager, I prove as wise as my father.

Cla. Nay, you may be sure of me; you may see, by the management of my own amours, I have so natural a compassion for disobedience, I shan't be able to refuse you any thing in distress—There's my hand; tell me how I can serve you?

Syl. Why, thus:—because I would not wholly discover myself to him at once, I have sent him a note to visit me here, as if these lodgings were my own.

Cla. Hither! to my lodgings! 'Twas well I sent Colonel Standfast word I should not be at home. [Aside.]

Syl. I hope you'll pardon my freedom, since one end of my taking it, too, was to have your opinion of him before I engage any farther.

Cla. Oh, it needs no apology; any thing of mine is at your service—I am only afraid my troublesome lover, Mr Clerimont, should happen to see him, who is of late so impertinently jealous of a rival, though from what cause I know not—not but I lie too—[Aside.] I say, should he see him, your country gentleman would be in danger, I can tell you.

Syl. Oh, there's no fear of that; for I have ordered him to be brought in the back way: when I have talked with him a little alone, I'll find an occasion to leave him with you; and then we'll compare our opinions of him.

Enter a Servant to CLARINDA.

Ser. Madam, my lady Sadlife. [Exit.]

Syl. Psha! she here!

Cla. Don't be uneasy; she shan't disturb you: I'll take care of her.

Enter LADY SADLIFE.

Lady Sad. Oh, my dears, you have lost the sweetest morning, sure, that ever peeped out of the firmament. The park was never in such perfection.

Cla. 'Tis always so when your ladyship's there.

Lady Sad. 'Tis never so without my dear Clarinda!

Syl. How civilly we women hate one another!

[Aside.] Was there a good deal of company, madam?

Lady Sad. Abundance! and the best I have seen this season: for 'twas between twelve and one, the very hour, you know, when the mob are violently hungry. Oh, the air was so inspiring! so amorous! And, to complete the pleasure, I was attacked in conversation by the most charming, modest, agreeably insinuating young fellow, sure, that ever woman played the fool with.

Cla. Who was it?

Lady Sad. Nay, Heaven knows; his face is as entirely new as his conversation. What wretches our young fellows are to him!

Syl. What sort of a person?

Lady Sad. Tall, straight, well-limbed, walked firm, and a look as cheerful as a May-day morning.

Syl. The picture's very like: pray Heaven it is not my gentleman's! [Aside.]

Cla. I wish this don't prove my colonel. [Aside.]

Syl. How came you to part with him so soon?

Lady Sad. Oh, name it not! that eternal damper of all pleasure, my husband, sir Solomon, came into the Mall in the very crisis of our conversation—I saw him at a distance, and complained that the air grew tainted, that I was sick o' th' sudden, and left him in such abruptness and confusion, as if he had been himself my husband.

Cla. A melancholy disappointment, indeed!

Lady Sad. Oh, 'tis a husband's nature to give them.

A Servant enters, and whispers SYLVIA.

Syl. Desire him to walk in—Cousin, you'll be at hand?

Cla. In the next room—Come, madam, Sylvia has a little business: I'll shew you some of the sweetest, prettiest figured china.

Lady Sad. My dear, I wait on you.

[Exeunt LADY SAD. and CLAR.]

Enter ATALL, as MR FREEMAN.

Syl. You find, sir, I have kept my word in seeing you; 'tis all you yet have asked of me; and when I know 'tis in my power to be more obliging, there's nothing you can command in honour I shall refuse you.

Atall. This generous offer, madam, is so high an obligation, that it were almost mean in me to ask a farther favour. But 'tis a lover's merit to be a miser in his wishes, and grasp at all occasions to enrich them. I own I feel your charms too sensibly prevail, but dare not give a loose to my ambitious thoughts, till I have passed one dreadful doubt that shakes them.

Syl. If 'tis in my power to clear it, ask me freely.

Atall. I tremble at the trial; and yet, methinks, my fears are vain: but yet to kill or cure them once for ever, be just and tell me—are you married?

Syl. If that can make you easy, no.

Atall. 'Tis ease, indeed—nor are you promised, nor your heart engaged?

Syl. That's hard to tell you: but to be just, I own my father has engaged my person to one I never saw; and my heart, I fear, is inclining to one he never saw.

Atall. Oh, yet be merciful, and ease my doubt; tell me the happy man that has deserved so exquisite a blessing.

Syl. That, sir, requires some pause: first, tell me why you're so inquisitive, without letting me know the condition of your own heart?

Atall. In every circumstance my heart's the same with yours; 'tis promised to one I never saw, by a commanding father, who, by my firm hopes of happiness, I am resolved to disobey, unless your cruelty prevents it.

Syl. But my disobedience would beggar me.

Atall. Banish that fear. I'm heir to a fortune will support you like yourself. May I not know your family?

Syl. Yet you must not.

Atall. Why that nicety? Is not it in my power to enquire whose house this is when I am gone?

Syl. And be never the wiser. These lodgings are a friend's, and are only borrowed on this occasion: but to save you the trouble of any further needless questions, I will make you one proposal. I have a young lady here within, who is the only confident of my engagements to you:—on her opinion I rely; nor can you take it ill, if I take no farther steps without it: 'twould be miserable, indeed, should we both meet beggars. I own your actions and appearance merit all you can desire; let her be as well satisfied of your pretensions and condition, and you shall find it shan't be a little fortune shall make me ungrateful.

Atall. So generous an offer exceeds my hopes!

Syl. Who's there?

Enter a Servant.

Desire my cousin Clarinda to walk in.

Atall. Ha! Clarinda! If it should be my Clarinda now, I'm in a sweet condition—by all that's terrible, the very she! this was finely contrived of fortune. [Aside.]

Enter CLARINDA.

Cla. Defend me! Colonel Standfast! She has certainly discovered my affair with him, and has a mind to insult me by an affected resignation of her pretensions to him. I'll disappoint her—I won't know him. [Aside.]

Syl. Cousin, pray, come forward; this is the gentleman I am so much obliged to—sir, this lady is a relation of mine, and the person we were speaking of.

Atall. I shall be proud to be better known among any of your friends. [Salutes her.]

Cla. Soh! he takes the hint, I see, and seems not to know me neither: I know not what to think—I am confounded! I hate both him and her. How unconcerned he looks! Confusion! he addresses her before my face.

LADY SADLIFE peeping in.

Lady Sad. What do I see? The pleasant young fellow that talked with me in the park just now! This is the luckiest accident! I must know a little more of him. [Retires.]

Syl. Cousin, and Mr Freeman, I think I need not make any apology—you both know the occasion of my leaving you together—in a quarter of an hour I'll wait on you again. [Exit SYLVIA.]

Atall. So! I'm in a hopeful way now, faith; but buff's the word: I'll stand it.

Cla. Mr Freeman! So, my gentleman has changed his name, too! How harmless he looks! I have my senses sure, and yet the demureness of that face looks as if he had a mind to persuade me out of them. I could find in my heart to humour his assurance, and see how far he'll carry it—Will you please to sit, sir? [They sit.]

Atall. What the devil can this mean? Sure she has a mind to counterface me, and not know me, too—With all my heart: if her ladyship won't know me, I'm sure 'tis not my business, at this time, to know her. [Aside.]

Cla. Certainly that face is cannon proof. [Aside.]

Atall. Now for a formal speech, as if I had never seen her in my life before. [Aside.] Madam—a-hem! Madam—I—a-hem!

Cla. Curse of that steady face! [Aside.]

Atall. I say, madam, since I am an utter stranger to you, I am afraid it will be very difficult for me to offer you more arguments than one to do me a friendship with your cousin; but if you are, as she seems to own you, her real friend, I presume you can't give her a better proof of your being so, than pleading the cause of a sincere and humble lover, whose tender wishes never can propose to taste of peace in life without her.

Cla. Umph! I'm choaked. [Aside.]

Atall. She gave me hopes, that when I had satisfied you of my birth and fortune, you would do me the honour to let me know her name and family.

Cla. Sir, I must own you are the most perfect master of your art, that ever entered the lists of assurance.

Atall. Madam!

Cla. And I don't doubt but you will find it a much easier task to impose upon my cousin, than me.

Atall. Impose, madam! I should be sorry any thing I have said could disoblige you into such hard thoughts of me. Sure, madam, you are under some misinformation.

Cla. I was indeed; but now my eyes are open; for, till this minute, I never knew that the gay colonel Standfast was the demure Mr Freeman.

Atall. Colonel Standfast! This is extremely dark, madam.

Cla. This jest is tedious, sir—impudence grows dull, when 'tis so very extravagant.

Atall. Madam, I am a gentleman—but not yet wise enough, I find, to account for the humours of a fine lady.

Cla. Troth, sir, on second thoughts, I begin to be a little better reconciled to your assurance; 'tis, in some sort, modesty to deny yourself; for to own your perjuries to my face, had been an insolence transcendently provoking.

Atall. Really, madam, my not being able to apprehend one word of all this, is a great inconvenience to my affair with your cousin: but if you will first do me the honour to make me acquainted with her name and family, I don't much care if I do take a little pains afterwards to come to a right understanding with you.

Cla. Come, come, since you see this assurance will do you no good, you had better put on a simple look, and generously confess your frailties: the same slyness, that deceived me first, will still find me woman enough to pardon you.

Atall. That bite won't do. [Aside.] Sure, madam, you mistake me for some other person.

Cla. Insolent, audacious villain! I am not to have my senses, then!

Atall. No. [Aside.]

Cla. And you are resolved to stand it to the last!

Atall. The last extremity. [Aside.]

Cla. Well, sir, since you are so much a stranger to colonel Standfast, I'll tell you where to find him, and tell him this from me. I hate him, scorn, detest, and loath him: I never meant him but at best for my diversion; and, should he ever renew his dull addresses to me, I'll have him used as his vain insolence deserves. Now, sir, I have no more to say, and I desire you would leave the house immediately.

Atall. I would not willingly disoblige you, madam; but 'tis impossible to stir 'till I have seen your cousin, and cleared myself of these strange aspersions.

Cla. Don't flatter yourself, sir, with so vain a hope; for I must tell you, once for all, you've seen the last of her; and if you won't be gone, you'll oblige me to have you forced away.

Atall. I'll be even with you. [Aside.] Well, madam, since I find nothing can prevail upon your cruelty, I'll take my leave: but, as you hope for justice on the man that wrongs you, at least be faithful to your lovely friend. And when you have named to her my utmost guilt, yet paint my passion, as it is, sincere. Tell her what tortures I endured in this severe exclusion from her sight, that, till my innocence is clear to her, and she again receives me into mercy,

A madman's frenzy's heaven to what I feel;
The wounds you give 'tis she alone can heal.

[Exit ATALL.]

Cla. Most abandoned impudence! And yet I know not which vexes me most, his out-facing my senses, or his insolent owning his passion for my cousin to my face: 'tis impossible she could put him upon this; it must be all his own; but, be it as it will, by all that's woman, I'll have revenge!

[Exit CLA.]

Re-enter ATALL and LADY SADLIFE at the other side.

Atall. Hey-day! is there no way down stairs here? Death! I can't find my way out! This is the oddest house—

Lady Sad. Here he is—I'll venture to pass by him.

Atall. Pray, madam, which is the nearest way out?

Lady Sad. Sir, out—a—

Atall. Oh, my stars! is't you, madam? this is fortunate indeed—I beg you'll tell me, do you live here, madam?

Lady Sad. Not very far off, sir: but this is no place to talk with you alone—indeed I must beg your pardon.

Atall. By all those kindling charms that fire my soul, no consequence on earth shall make me quit my hold, till you've given me some kind assurance that I shall see you again, and speedily! egad I'll have one out of the family at least.

Lady Sad. Oh, good, here's company!

Atall. Oh, do not rack me with delays, but quick, before this dear, short-lived opportunity's lost, inform me where you live, or kill me: to part with this soft white hand is ten thousand daggers to my heart. [Kissing it eagerly.]

Lady Sad. Oh, lud! I am going home this minute; and if you should offer to dog my chair, I protest I—was ever such usage—Lord—sure! Oh—follow me down, then. [Exeunt.]

Re-enter CLARINDA and SYLVIA.

Syl. Ha, ha, ha!

Cla. Nay, you may laugh, madam, but what I tell you is true.

Syl. Ha, ha, ha!

Cla. You don't believe, then?

Syl. I do believe, that when some women are inclined to like a man, nothing more palpably discovers it, than their railing at him; ha, ha!—Your pardon, cousin; you know you laughed at me just now upon the same occasion.

Cla. The occasion's quite different, madam; I hate him. And, once more I tell you, he's a villain; you're imposed on. He's a colonel of foot, his regiment's now in Spain, and his name's Standfast.

Syl. But, pray, good cousin, whence had you this intelligence of him?

Cla. From the same place that you had your false account, madam; his own mouth.

Syl. What was his business with you?

Cla. Much about the same, as his business with you—love.

Syl. Love! to you!

Cla. Me, madam! Lord, what am I? Old, or a monster! Is it so prodigious that a man should like me?

Syl. No! but I'm amazed to think, if he had liked you, he should leave you so soon, for me!

Cla. For you! leave me for you! No, madam, I did not tell you that, neither! Ha, ha, ha!

Syl. No! What made you so violently angry with him, then? Indeed, cousin, you had better take some other fairer way; this artifice is much too weak to make me break with him. But, however, to let you see I can be still a friend, prove him to be what you say he is, and my engagements with him shall soon be over.

Cla. Look you, madam, not but I slight the tenderest of his addresses; but, to convince you that my vanity was not mistaken in him, I'll write to him by the name of Colonel Standfast, and do you the same by that of Freeman; and let's each appoint him to meet us at my lady Sadlife's at the same time: if these appear two different men, I think our dispute's easily at an end; if but one, and he does not own all I have said of him to your face, I'll make you a very humble curtesy, and beg your pardon.

Syl. And, if he does own it, I'll make your ladyship the same reverence, and beg yours.

Enter CLERIMONT.

Cla. Pshaw! he here!

Cle. I am glad to find you in such good company, madam.

Cla. One's seldom long in good company, sir.

Cle. I am sorry mine has been so troublesome of late; but I value your ease at too high a rate to disturb it. [Going.]

Syl. Nay, Mr Clerimont, upon my word you shan't stir. Hark you—[Whispers.]—Your pardon, cousin,

Cle. I must not lose him, neither—Mr Cleri-mont's way is, to be severe in his construction of people's meaning.

Syl. I'll write my letter, and be with you, cousin. [Exit SYLVIA.]

Cla. It was always my principle, madam, to have an humble opinion of my merit; when a woman of sense frowns upon me, I ought to think I deserve it.

Cla. But to expect to be always received with a smile, I think, is having a very extraordinary opinion of one's merit.

Cle. We differ a little as to fact, madam: for these ten days past, I have had no distinction, but a severe reservedness. You did not use to be so sparing of your good-humour; and, while I see you gay to all the world but me, I cannot but be a little concerned at the change.

Cla. If he has discovered the colonel now, I'm undone! he could not meet him, sure. I must humour him a little.—[Aside.]—Men of your sincere temper, Mr Clerimont, I own, don't always meet with the usage they deserve: but women are giddy things, and, had we no errors to answer for, the use of good-nature in a lover would be lost. Vanity is our inherent weakness: you must not chide, if we are sometimes fonder of your passions than your prudence.

Cle. This friendly condescension makes me more your slave than ever. Oh, yet be kind, and tell me, have I been tortured with a groundless jealousy?

Cla. Let your own heart be judge—But don't take it ill if I leave you now—I have some earnest business with my cousin Sylvia: But to-night, at my lady Dainty's, I'll make you amends: you'll be there?

Cla. I need not promise you.

Cla. Your servant. Ah, how easily is poor sincerity imposed on! Now for the colonel.—[Aside.] [Exit CLERIMONT.]

Cle. This unexpected change of humour more stirs my jealousy than all her late severity. I'll watch her close:

For she, that from a just reproach is kind,
Gives more suspicion of her guilty mind,
And throws her smiles, like dust, to strike the lover blind.

[Exit.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.—LADY DAINTY'S apartment: a table, with phials, gallipots, glasses, &c. LADY DAINTY and SITUP, her woman.

Lady Dain. SITUP! Situp!

Sit. Madam!

Lady Dain. Thou art strangely slow; I told thee the hartshorn; I have the vapours to that degree!

Sit. If your ladyship would take my advice, you should e'en fling your physic out of the window: if you were not in perfect health in three days, I'd be bound to be sick for you.

Lady Dain. Peace, good impertinence! I tell thee, no woman of quality is, or should be, in perfect health—Huh, huh!—[Coughs faintly.]—To be always in health is as vulgar as to be always in humour, and would equally betray one's want of wit and breeding: Where are the fellows?

Sit. Here, madam——

Enter two Footmen.

Lady Dain. Cæsar! Run to my lady Round-sides; desire to know now she rested; and tell her the violence of my cold is abated: huh, huh! Pompey, step you to my lady Killchairman's; give my service; say I have been so embarrassed with the spleen all this morning, that I am under the greatest uncertainty in the world, whether I shall be able to stir out or no—And, d'ye hear? desire to know how my lord does, and the new monkey——
[Exeunt footmen.]

Sit. In my conscience, these great ladies make themselves sick, to make themselves business; and are well or ill, only in ceremony to one another.
[Aside.]

Lady Dain. Where's t'other fellow?

Sit. He is not returned yet, madam.

Lady Dain. 'Tis indeed a strange lump, not fit to carry a disease to any body; I sent him t'other day to the dutchess of Diet-Drink, with the colic, and the brute put it into his own tramontane language, and called it the belly-ach.

Sit. I wish your ladyship had not occasion to send for any; for my part——

Lady Dain. Thy part! Prithee, thou wert made of the rough masculine kind; 'tis betraying our sex, not to be sickly and tender. All the families I visit, have something derived to them from the elegant nice state of indisposition; you see, even in the men, a genteel, as it were, stagger, or twine of the bodies; as if they were not yet confirmed enough for the rough, laborious exercise of walking. Nay, even most of their diseases, you see, are not prophaned by the crowd: the apoplexy, the gout, and vapours, are all peculiar to the nobility. Huh, huh! And I could almost wish, that colds were only ours; there's something in them so genteel, so agreeably disordering—Huh, huh!

Sit. That, I hope, I shall never be fit for them—Your ladyship forgot the spleen.

Lady Dain. Oh! my dear spleen—I grudge that even to some of us.

Sit. I knew an ironmonger's wife, in the city, that was mightily troubled with it.

Lady Dain. Foh! What a creature hast thou named! An ironmonger's wife have the spleen! Thou mightst as well have said her husband was a fine gentleman—Give me something!

Sit. Will your ladyship please to take any of the steel drops? Or the bolus? Or the electuary? Or——

Lady Dain. This wench will smother me with questions—Huh, huh! Bring any of them—these healthy sluts are so boisterous, they split one's brains: I fancy myself in an inn while she talks to me; I must have some decayed person of quality about me; for the commons of England are the strangest creatures——Huh, huh!

Enter Serrant.

Ser. Mrs Sylvia, madam, is come to wait on your ladyship.

Lady Dain. Desire her to walk in; let the physic alone: I'll take a little of her company; she's mighty good for the spleen.

Enter SYLVIA.

Syl. Dear lady Dainty!

Lady Dain. My good creature, I'm overjoyed to see you—huh, huh!

Syl. I am sorry to see your ladyship wrapt up thus; I was in hopes to have had your company to the India House.

Lady Dain. If any thing could tempt me abroad, 'twould be that place, and such agreeable company; but how came you, dear Sylvia, to be reconciled to any thing in an India House? you used to have a most barbarous inclination for our own odious manufactures.

Syl. Nay, madam, I am only going to recruit my tea-table: as to the rest of their trumpery, I am as much out of humour with it as ever.

Lady Dain. Well, thou art a pleasant creature, thy distaste is so diverting.

Syl. And your ladyship is so expensive, that really I am not able to come into it.

Lady Dain. Now it is to me prodigious, how some women can muddle away their money upon housewifery, children, books, and charities, when there are so many well-bred ways, and foreign curiosities, that more elegantly require it—I have every morning the rarities of all countries brought to me, and am in love with every new thing I see.—Are the people come yet, Situp?

Sit. They have been below, madam, this half hour.

Lady Dain. Dispose them in the parlour, and we'll be there presently.
[Exit SITUP.]

Syl. How can your ladyship take such pleasure in being cheated with the haubles of other countries?

Lady Dain. Thou art a very infidel to all finery.

Syl. And you are a very bigot—

Lady Dain. A person of all reason, and no complaisance.

Syl. And your ladyship all complaisance, and no reason.

Lady Dain. Follow me, and be converted.

[Exeunt.]

Re-enter SITUP, a woman with china ware; an Indian man with screens, tea, &c. a birdman, with a paroquet, monkey, &c.

Sit. Come, come into this room.

Chi. I hope your ladyship's lady won't be long in coming.

Sit. I don't care if she never comes to you.—It seems you trade with the ladies for old clothes, and give them china for their gowns and petticoats; I'm like to have a fine time on't with such creatures as you indeed!

Chi. Alas, madam, I'm but a poor woman, and am forced to do any thing to live. Will your ladyship be pleased to accept of a piece of china?

Sit. Puh! no.—I don't care.—Though I must needs say you look like an honest woman.

[Looking on it.

Chi. Thank you, good madam.

Sit. Our places are like to come to a fine pass indeed, if our ladies must buy their china with our perquisites. At this rate, my lady shu'n't have an old fan or a glove, but——

Chi. Pray, madam, take it.

Sit. No, not I; I won't have it, especially without a saucer to't. Here, take it again.

Chi. Indeed you shall accept of it.

Sit. Not I, truly—come, give it me, give it me;—here's my lady.

Enter LADY DAINTY and SYLVIA.

Lady Dain. Well, my dear, is not this a pretty sight now?

Syl. 'Tis better than so many doctors and apothecaries, indeed.

Lady Dain. All trades must live, you know; and those, no more than these, could subsist, if the world were all wise or healthy.

Syl. I am afraid our real diseases are but few to our imaginary, and doctors get more by the sound than the sickly.

Lady Dain. My dear, you're allowed to say any thing—but now I must talk with the people.—Have you got any thing new there?

Chi. Ind. and Bird. Yes, an't please your ladyship.

Lady Dain. One at once.—

Bird. I have brought your ladyship the finest monkey——

Syl. What a filthy thing it is!

Lady Dain. Now I think he looks very humorous and agreeable—I vow, in a white perriwig he might do mischief. Could he but talk and take snuff, there's ne'er a fop in town would go beyond him.

Syl. Most fops would go farther if they did not speak; but talking, indeed, makes them very often worse company than monkeys.

Lady Dain. Thou pretty little picture of man!—How very Indian he looks!—I could kiss the dear creature!

Syl. Ah, don't touch him! he'll bite!

Bird. No, madam, he is the tameest you ever saw, and the least mischievous.

Lady Dain. Then take him away, I won't have him; for mischief is the wit of a monkey; and I would not give a farthing for one that would not break me three or four pounds worth of china in a morning. Oh, I am in love with these Indian figures!—Do but observe what an innocent natural simplicity there is in all the actions of them!

Chi. These are pagods, madam, that the Indians worship.

Lady Dain. So far I am an Indian.

Syl. Now, to me, they are all monsters.

Lady Dain. Profane creature!

Chi. Is your ladyship for a piece of right Flanders lace?

Lady Dain. Um—no; I don't care for it, now, it is not prohibited.

Ind. Will your ladyship be pleased to have a pound of fine tea?

Lady Dain. What, filthy, odious Bohea, I suppose?

Ind. No, madam; right Kappakawawa.

Lady Dain. Well, there's something in the very sound of that name, that makes it irresistible.

—What is it a pound?

Ind. But six guineas, madam.

Lady Dain. How infinitely cheap! I'll buy it all.—Sit up, take the man in and pay him, and let the rest call again to-morrow.

Omn. Bless your ladyship!

[Exeunt SIT. Chi. Ind. and Bird.

Lady Dain. Lord, how feverish I am!—the least motion does so disorder me—do but feel me.

Syl. No, really, I think you are in very good temper.

Lady Dain. Burning, indeed, child.

Enter Servant, Doctor, and Apothecary.

Ser. Madam, here's Doctor Bolus and the apothecary. [Exit.

Lady Dain. Oh, doctor, I'm glad you're come; one is not sure of a moment's life without you.

Dr Bol. How did your ladyship rest, madam?

[Feels her pulse.

Lady Dain. Never worse, indeed, doctor: I once fell into a little slumber, indeed, but then was disturbed by the most odious, frightful dream, that if the fright had not wakened me, I had certainly perished in my sleep, with the apprehension.

Dr Bol. A certain sign of a disordered brain, madam; but I'll order something that shall compose your ladyship.

Lady Dain. Mr Rhubarb, I must quarrel with you—you don't disguise your medicines enough; they taste all physic.

Rhu. To alter it more might offend the operation, madam,

Lady Dain. I don't care what is offended, so my taste is not.

Dr Bol. Hark you, Mr Rhubarb, withdraw the medicine, rather than not make it pleasant: I'll find a reason for the want of its operation. [Aside.

Rhu. But, sir, if we don't look about us, she'll grow well upon our hands.

Dr Bol. Never fear that; she's too much a woman of quality to dare to be well without her doctor's opinion.

Rhu. Sir, we have drained the whole catalogue of diseases already; there's not another left to put in her head.

Dr Bol. Then, I'll make her go them over again.

Enter CARELESS.

Care. So, here's the old levee, doctor and apothecary in close consultation! Now will I demolish the quack and his medicines before her face. Mr Rhubarb, your servant. Pray, what have you got in your hand there?

Rhu. Only a julep and composing draught for my lady, sir.

Care. Have you so, sir? Pray, let me see—I'll prescribe to-day. Doctor, you may go—the lady shall take no physic at present but me.

Dr Bol. Sir——

Care. Nay, if you won't believe me——

[Breaks the phials.]

Lady Dain. Ah——

[Frighted, and leaning upon SYL.]

Dr Bol. Come away, Mr Rhubarb—he'll certainly put her out of order, and then she'll send for us again.

[Exit Dr Bol. and Rhu.]

Care. You see, madam, what pains I take to come into your favour.

Lady Dain. You take a very preposterous way, I can tell you, sir.

Care. I can't tell how I succeed, but I am sure I endeavour right; for I study every morning new impertinence to entertain you: for, since I find nothing but dogs, doctors, and monkeys are your favourites, it is very hard, if your ladyship won't admit me as one of the number.

Lady Dain. When I find you of an equal merit with my monkey, you shall be in the same state of favour. I confess, as a proof of your wit, you have done me as much mischief here. But you have not half pug's judgment, nor his spirit; for the creature will do a world of pleasant things, without caring whether one likes them or not.

Care. Why, truly, madam, the little gentleman, my rival, I believe, is much in the right on't: and, if you observe, I have taken as much pains of late to disoblige, as to please you.

Lady Dain. You succeed better in one than t'other, I can tell you, sir.

Care. I am glad on't; for, if you had not me now and then to plague you, what would you do for a pretence to be chagrined, to faint, have the spleen, the vapours, and all those modish disorders, that so nicely distinguish a woman of quality?

Lady Dain. I am perfectly confounded!—Certainly there are some people too impudent for our resentment.

Care. Modesty's a starving virtue, madam; an old threadbare fashion of the last age, and would sit as oddly on a lover now, as a picked beard and mustachios.

Lady Dain. Most astonishing!

Care. I have tried sighing and looking silly a great while, but 'twould not do—nay, had you had as little wit as good-nature, should have proceeded to dance and sing. Tell me but how, what face or form can worship you, and behold your votary.

Lady Dain. Not, sir, as the Persians do the sun, with your face towards me. The best proof you can give of your horrid devotion, is never to see me more. Come, my dear. [Exit LADY DAIN.]

Syl. I'm amazed so much assurance should not succeed. [Exit. SYL.]

Care. All this shan't make me out of love with my virtue. Impudence has ever been a successful quality, and 'twould be hard, indeed, if I should be the first that did not thrive by it.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.—CLERIMORT'S Lodgings.

Enter ATALL, and FINDER, his man.

Atall. You are sure you know the house again?

Fin. Ah, as well as I do the upper gallery, sir.—'Tis sir Solomon Sadlife's, at the two glass lanthorns, within three doors of my lord duke's.

Atall. Very well, sir—then take this letter, enquire for my lady Sadlife's woman, and stay for an answer.

Fin. Yes, sir.

[Exit. FIN.]

Atall. Well, I find 'tis as ridiculous to propose pleasure in love without variety of mistresses, as to pretend to be a keen sportsman without a good stable of horses. How this lady may prove, I can't tell; but, if she is not a reedy tit at the bottom, I'm no jockey.

Re-enter FINDER.

Fin. Sir, here are two letters for you.

Atall. Who brought them?

Fin. A couple of footmen, and they both desire an answer.

Atall. Bid them stay, and do you make haste where I ordered you.

Fin. Yes, sir.

[Exit.]

Atall. To col. Standfast—that's Clarinda's hand—To Mr Freeman—that must be my incognita. Ah, I have most mind to open this first;—but, if t'other malicious creature should have perverted her growing inclination to me, 'twould put my whole frame in a trembling—I hold, I'll guess my fate by degrees—this may give me a glimpse of it. [Reads CLARINDA'S letter.] Um—um—um—Ha! To meet her at my lady Sadlife's, at seven o'clock to-night, and take no manner of notice of my late disowning myself to her—Something's at the bottom of all this.—Now, to solve the riddle. [Reads the other letter.] 'My cousin Clarinda has told some things of you, that very much alarm me; but, I am willing to suspend my belief of them till I see you, which I desire may be at my lady Sadlife's, at seven this evening.'—The devil! the same place!—'As you value the real friendship of your

' INCOGNITA,

So, now the riddle's out—the rival queens are fairly come to a reference, and one or both of them I must lose, that's positive.—Hard!

Enter CLERIMONT.

Hard fortune! Now, poor Impudence, what will become of thee? Oh, Clerimont, such a complication of adventures since I saw thee! such sweet hopes, fears, and unaccountable difficulties, sure never poor dog was surrounded with!

Cle. Oh, you are an industrious person! you'll get over them. But, pray, let's hear.

Atall. To begin, then, in the climax of my misfortunes:—In the first place, the private lodgings, that my incognita appointed to receive me in, prove to be the very individual habitation of my other mistress, whom (to complete the blunder of my ill luck) she civilly introduced in person, to recommend me to her better acquaintance.

Cle. Ha, ha! Death! how could you stand them both together?

Atall. The old way—buff—I stuck like a burr to my name of Freeman, addressed my incognita before the other's face, and, with a most unmoved good-breeding, harmlessly faced her down I had never seen her in my life before.

Cle. The prettiest modesty I ever heard of! Well, but how did they discover you at last?

Atall. Why, faith, the matter's yet in suspense; and, I find, by both their letters, that they don't yet well know what to think: but, (to go on with my luck) you must know, they have since both appointed me, by several names, to meet them at one and the same place, at seven o'clock this evening.

Cle. Ah!

Atall. And, lastly, to crown my fortune (as if the devil himself most triumphantly rode a-straddle upon my ruin) the fatal place of their appointment happens to be the very house of a third lady, with whom I made an acquaintance since morning, and had just before sent word I would visit near the same hour this evening.

Cle. Oh, murder! Poor Atall, thou art really fallen under the last degree of compassion.

Atall. And, yet, with a little of thy assistance, in the middle of their small-shot, I don't still despair of holding my head above water.

Cle. Death! but you can't meet them both; you must lose one of them, unless you can split yourself.

Atall. Prithce, don't suspect my courage or my modesty; for, I'm resolved to go on, if you will stand by me.

Cle. Faith, my very curiosity would make me do that. But what can I do?

Atall. You must appear for me, upon occasion, in person.

Cle. With all my heart. What else?

Atall. I shall want a queen's messenger in my interest, or rather one that can personate one.

Cle. That's easily found—But what to do?

Atall. Come along, and I'll tell you; for, first, I must answer their letters.

Cle. Thou art an original, faith! [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.—Changes to SIR SOLOMON'S house.

Enter SIR SOLOMON leading LADY SADLIFE, and WISHWELL, her woman.

Sir Sol. There, madam, let me have no more of these airings.—No good, I am sure, can keep a woman five or six hours abroad in a morning.

Lady Sad. You deny me all the innocent freedoms of life.

Sir Sol. Ha! you have the modish cant of this end of the town, I see. Intriguing, gaming, gadding, and party-quarries, with a pox to them, are innocent freedoms, forsooth!

Lady Sad. I don't know what you mean; I'm sure I have not one acquaintance in the world, that does an ill thing.

Sir Sol. They must be better looked after than your ladyship then; but I'll mend my hands as fast as I can. Do you look to your reputation henceforward, and I'll take care of your person.

Lady Sad. You wrong my virtue with these unjust suspicions.

Sir Sol. Ay, it's no matter for that; better I wrong it than you. I'll secure my doors for this day at least. [Exit.]

Lady Sad. Oh, Wishwell! what shall I do?

Wish. What's the matter, madam?

Lady Sad. I expect a letter from a gentleman every minute; and if it should fall into sir Solomon's hands, I'm ruined past redemption.

Wish. He won't suspect it, madam, sure, if they are directed to me, as they used to be.

Lady Sad. But his jealousy's grown so violent of late, there's no trusting to it now. If he meets it, I shall be locked up for ever.

Wish. Oh, dear madam! I vow your ladyship frights me—Why, he'll kill me for keeping counsel.

Lady Sad. Run to the window, quick, and watch the messenger. [Exit WISH.] Ah, there's my ruin near!—I feel it—[A knocking at the door.]—What shall I do? Be very insolent, or very humble, and cry?—I have known some women, upon these occasions, outstrut their husbands' jealousy, and make them ask pardon for finding them out. Oh, lud! here he comes!—I can't do't; My courage fails me—I must e'en stick to my handkerchief, and trust to nature.

Re-enter SIR SOLOMON, taking a letter from FINDER.

Sir Sol. Sir, I shall make bold to read this letter; and if you have a mind to save your bones, there's your way out.

Fin. Oh, terrible! I shan't have a whole one in my skin, when I come home to my master.

[Erit.

Lady Sad. [Aside.] I'm lost for ever!

Sir Sol. [Reads.] 'Pardon, most divine creature, the impatience of my heart'—Very well! these are her innocent freedoms! Ah, cockatrice!—'which languishes for an opportunity to 'convince you of its sincerity;'—Oh, the tender son of a whore!—'which nothing could 'relieve, but the sweet hope of seeing you this 'evening'—Poor lady, whose virtue I have wronged with unjust suspicions!

Lady Sad. I'm ready to sink with apprehension.

Sir Sol. [Reads.] 'To-night, at seven, expect 'your dying Strephon'—Die, and be damned! for I'll remove your comforter, by cutting her throat. I could find in my heart to ram his impudent letter into her windpipe—Ha! what's this!—'To Mrs Wishwell, my lady Sadlife's 'woman.'—Ad, I'm glad of it! with all my heart! What a happy thing it is to have one's jealousy disappointed!—Now have I been cursing my poor wife for the mistaken wickedness of that trollop! 'Tis well I kept my thoughts to myself: for the virtue of a wife, when wrongfully accused, is most unmercifully insolent. Come, I'll do a great thing; I'll kiss her, and make her amends—What's the matter, my dear? Has any thing frightened you?

Lady Sad. Nothing but your hard usage.

Sir Sol. Come, come, dry thy tears; it shall be so no more. But, hark ye, I have made a discovery here—Your Wishwell, I'm afraid, is a slut; she has an intrigue.

Lady Sad. An intrigue! Heavens, in our family!

Sir Sol. Read there—I wish she be honest.

Lady Sad. How!—If there be the least ground to think it, sir Solomon, positively she shan't stay a minute in the house—Impudent creature!—have an affair with a man!

Sir Sol. But hold, my dear; don't let your virtue censure too severely neither.

Lady Sad. I shudder at the thoughts of her.

Sir Sol. Patience, I say—How do we know but his courtship may be honourable?

Lady Sad. That, indeed, requires some pause.

Wish. [Peeping in.] So, all's safe, I see—He thinks the letter's to me—Oh, good madam! that letter was to me, the fellow says. I wonder, sir, how you could serve one so! If my sweetheart should hear you had opened it, I know he would not have me, so he would not.

Sir Sol. Never fear that: for if he is in love with you, he's too much a fool to value being laughed at.

Lady Sad. If it be yours, here take your stuff; and next time, bid him take better care than to send his letter so publicly.

Wish. Yes, madam. But now your ladyship has read it, I'd fain beg the honour of sir Solomon to answer it for me; for I can't write.

Lady Sad. Not write!

Sir Sol. Nay, he thinks she's above that, I suppose; for he calls her divine creature—A pretty piece of divinity, truly!—But, come, my dear; 'egad, we'll answer it for her. Here's paper—you shall do it.

Lady Sad. I, sir Solomon! Lard, I won't write to fellows, not I—I hope he won't take me at my word.

[Aside.

Sir Sol. Nay, you shall do it. Come, it will get her a good husband.

Wish. Aye, pray, good madam, do.

Sir Sol. Ah, how eager the jade is!

Lady Sad. I cannot tell how to write to any body but you, my dear.

Sir Sol. Well, well, I'll dictate, then. Come, begin.

Lady Sad. Lard, this is the oddest fancy!

[Sits to write.

Sir Sol. Come, come—Dear sir—(for we'll be as loving as he, for his ears.)

Wish. No, pray madam, begin, Dear honey, or, My dearest angel.

Lady Sad. Out, you fool! You must not be so fond—Dear sir, is very well.

[Writes.

Sir Sol. Aye, aye, so 'tis; but these young fil- lies are for setting out at the top of their speed. But, prithee, Wishwell, what is thy lover? for the style of his letter may serve for a countess?

Wish. Sir, he's but a butler at present; but he's a good schollard, as you may see by his hand-writing; and, in time, may come to be a steward; and then we shan't be long without a coach, sir.

Lady Sad. Dear sir—What must I write next?

Sir Sol. Why—

[Musing.

Wish. Hoping you are in good health, as I am at this present writing.

Sir Sol. You puppy, he'll laugh at you.

Wish. I'm sure my mother used to begin all her letters so.

Sir Sol. And thou art every inch of thee her own daughter, that I'll say for thee.

Lady Sad. Come, I have done it.—[Reads.]—'Dear sir, she must have very little merit that is 'insensible of yours.'

Sir Sol. Very well, faith! Write all yourself.

Wish. Aye, good madam, do; that's better than mine. But, pray, dear madam, let it end with, 'So I rest your dearest loving friend, till death us do part.

Lady Sad. [Aside.]—This absurd slot will make me laugh out.

Sir Sol. But, hark you, hussy; suppose now you should be a little scornful and insolent to show your breeding, and a little ill-natured in it to shew your wit?

Wish. Aye, sir, that is, if I designed him for my gallant; but, since he is to be but my husband, I must be very good-natured and civil before I have him; and huff him, and shew my wit after.

Sir Sol. Here's a jade for you!—[Aside.]—But why must you huff your husband, hussy?

Wish. Oh, sir, that's to give him a good opinion of my virtue! for you know, sir, a husband cannot think one could be so very domineering, if one were not very honest.

Sir Sol. 'Sbud, this fool, on my conscience, speaks the sense of the whole sex!

[Aside.

Wish. Then, sir, I have been told, that a husband loves one the better, the more one hectors him; as a spaniel does, the more one beats him.

Sir Sol. Ha! Thy husband will have a blessed time on't.

Lady Sad. So—I have done.

Wish. Oh, pray, madam, read it!

Lady Sad. [Reads.]—'Dear sir—She must have very little merit that is insensible of yours; and, while you continue to love, and tell me so, expect whatever you can hope from so much wit, and such unfeigned sincerity—At the hour you mention, you will be truly welcome to your passionate—'

Wish. Oh, madam, it is not half kind enough. Pray, put in some more dears.

Sir Sol. Aye, aye, sweeten it well; let it be all syrup, with a pox to her!

Wish. Every line should have a dear sweet sir in it, so it should—He'll think I don't love him, else.

Sir Sol. Poor moppet!

Lady Sad. No, no; 'tis better now—Well, what must be at the bottom, to answer Strephon?

Sir Sol. Pray, let her divine ladyship sign Abigail.

Wish. No, pray, madam, put down Lipsamintha.

Sir Sol. Lipsamintha!

Lady Sad. No, come, I'll write Celia. Here, go in and seal it.

Sir Sol. Ay, come, I'll lend you a wafer, that he mayn't wait for your ladyship.

Wish. Pshaw! you always flout one.

[Ereunt SIR SOL. and WISH.

Lady Sad. So, this is luckily over—Well, I see, a woman should never be discouraged from coming off at the greatest plunge; for, though I was half dead with the fright, yet, now, I am a little recovered, I find—

That apprehension does the bliss endear;

The real danger's nothing to the fear.

[Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.—SIR SOLOMON'S.

Enter LADY SADLIFE, ATALL, and WISHWELL, with lights.

Lady Sad. THIS room, I think, is pleasanter; if you please, we'll sit here, sir—Wishwell, shut the door, and take the key o' the inside, and set chairs.

Wish. Yes, madam.

Lady Sad. Lard, sir, what a strange opinion you must have of me, for receiving your visits upon so slender an acquaintance!

Atall. I have a much stranger opinion, madam, of your ordering your servant to lock herself in with us.

Lady Sad. Oh, you would not have us wait upon ourselves?

Atall. Really, madam, I cannot conceive, that two lovers, alone, have much occasion for attendance.

[They sit.

Lady Sad. Lovers! Lard, how you talk!—Can't people converse without that stuff?

Atall. Um—Yes, madam, people may; but, without a little of that stuff, conversation is generally very apt to be insipid.

Lady Sad. Pooh! why, we can say any thing without her hearing, you see.

Atall. Aye; but if we should talk ourselves up to an occasion of being without her, it would look worse to send her out, than to have let her wait without, when she was without.

Lady Sad. You are pretty hard to please, I find, sir. Some men, I believe, would think themselves well used in so free a reception as yours.

Atall. Ha! I see this is like to come to nothing this time; so I'll e'en put her out of humour, that I may get off in time to my incognita.

[Aside.] Really, madam, I can never think myself free, where my hand and my tongue are tied.

[Pointing to WISHWELL.

Lady Sad. Your conversation, I find, is very different from what it was, sir.

Atall. With submission, madam, I think it very proper for the place we are in. If you had sent for me only to sip tea, to sit still, and be civil, with my hat under my arm, like a strange relation from Ireland, or so, why was I brought hither with so much caution and privacy?

[SIR SOLOMON knocks at the door.

Wish. Oh, Heavens! my master, madam!

Sir Sol. [Within.] Open the door there!

Lady Sad. What shall we do?

Atall. Nothing now, I'm sure.

Lady Sad. Open the door, and say the gentleman came to you.

Wish. Oh, lud, madam, I shall never be able to manage it at so short a warning! We had better shut the gentleman into the closet, and say he came to nobody at all.

Lady Sad. In, in, then, for mercy's sake, quickly, sir!

Atall. So—this is like to be a very pretty business! Oh, success and impudence, thou hast quite forsaken me! [Enters the closet.]

Wish. Do you step into your bed-chamber, madam, and leave my master to me.

[Exit LADY SADLIFE.]

WISHWELL opens the door, and SIR SOLOMON enters.

Sir Sol. What's the reason, mistress, I am to be locked out of my wife's apartment?

Wish. My lady was washing her—her—neck, sir, and I could not come any sooner.

Sir Sol. I'm sure I heard a man's voice.—
[Aside.] Bid your lady come hither.—[Exit WISHWELL.] He must be hereabouts—'tis so; all's out, all's over, now: the devil has done his worst, and I am a cuckold in spite of my wisdom. 'Sbud! now, an Italian would poison his wife for this, a Spaniard would stab her, and a Turk would cut off her head with a scymitar; but a poor dog of an English cuckold now can only squabble and call names—Hold, here she comes—I must smother my jealousy, that her guilt mayn't be upon its guard.

Enter LADY SADLIFE and WISHWELL.

Sir Sol. My dear, how do you do? Come hither, and kiss me.

Lady Sad. I did not expect you home so soon, my dear.

Sir Sol. Poor rogue! I don't believe you did, with a pox to you. [Aside.] Wishwell, go down; I have business with your lady.

Wish. Yes, sir—but I'll watch you; for I am afraid this good-humour has mischief at the bottom of it. [Retires.]

Lady Sad. I scarce know whether he is jealous or not. [Aside.]

Sir Sol. Now, dare not I go nearer that closet door, lest the murderous dog should poke a hole in my guts through the key-hole. Um—I have an odd thought in my head—aye, and that will discover the whole bottom of her affair.—'Tis better to seem not to know one's dishonour, when one has not courage enough to revenge it.

Lady Sad. I don't like his looks, methinks.

Sir Sol. Odeo! what have I forgot, now?—Prithee, my dear, step into my study—for I am so weary! and, in the uppermost parcel of letters, you'll find one that I received from Yorkshire to-day, in the scrutoir; bring it down, and some paper; I will answer it while I think on't.

Lady Sad. If you please to lend me your key—But had you not better write in your study, my dear?

Sir Sol. No, no; I tell you, I'm so tired, I am not able to walk. There, make haste.

Lady Sad. Would all were well over! [Exit.]

Sir Sol. 'Tis so, by her eagerness to be rid of me. Well, since I find I dare not behave myself like a man of honour in this business, I'll at least act like a person of prudence and penetration; for say, should I clap a brace of slugs now in the very bowels of this rascal, it may hang me; but if it does not, it can't divorce me. No, I'll e'en put out the candles, and in a soft, gentle whore's voice, desire the gentleman to walk about his business; and if I can't get him out before my wife returns, I'll fairly post myself in his room; and so, when she comes to set him at liberty, in the dark, I'll humour the cheat, till I draw her into some casual confession of the fact, and, then, this injured front shall bounce upon her like a thunderbolt. [Puts out the candles.]

Wish. [Behind.] Say you so, sir! I'll take care my lady shall be provided for you. [Exit.]

Sir Sol. Hist, hist, sir, sir!

Enter ATALL from the closet.

Atall. Is all clear? May I venture, madam?

Sir Sol. Aye, aye; quick, quick! make haste before sir Solomon returns. A strait-backed dog, I warrant him. [Aside.] But when shall I see you again?

Atall. Whenever you'll promise me to make a better use of an opportunity.

Sir Sol. Ha! then 'tis possible he mayn't yet have put the finishing stroke to me.

Atall. Is this the door?

Sir Sol. Aye, aye, away. [Exit ATALL.] So, now the danger of being murdered is over, I find my courage returns: and, if I catch my wife but inclining to be no better than she should be, I'm not sure that blood won't be the consequence.

He goes into the closet, and WISHWELL enters.

Wish. So—my lady has her cue; and if my wise master can give her no better proofs of his penetration than this, she'd be a greater fool than he, if she should not do what she has a mind to. Sir, sir, come; you may come out now; sir Solomon's gone.

Enter SIR SOLOMON, from the closet.

Sir Sol. So, now for a soft speech, to set her impudent blood in a ferment, and then let it out with my penknife. [Aside.] Come, dear creature, now let's make the kindest use of our opportunity.

Wish. Not for the world. If sir Solomon should come again, I should be ruined. Pray, begone—I'll send to you to-morrow.

Sir Sol. Nay, now you love me not; you would not let me part else thus unsatisfied.

Wish. Now you're unkind. You know I love you, or I should not run such hazards for you.

Sir Sol. Fond whore! [Aside.] But I'm afraid you love sir Solomon, and lay up your tenderness for him.

Wish. Oh, ridiculous! How can so sad a wretch give you the least uneasy thought? I loath the very sight of him.

Sir Sol. Damned, infernal strumpet!—I can bear no longer—Lights, lights, within there!

[Siezes her.]

Wish. Ah! [Shrieks] Who's this? Help!—murder!

Sir Sol. No, traitress, don't think to escape me; for, now I've trapped thee in thy guilt, I could find in my heart to have thee flead alive, thy skin stuffed, and hung up in the middle of Guildhall, as a terrible consequence of cuckoldom to the whole city—Lights there!

Enter LADY SADLIFE, with a light.

Lady Sad. Oh, Heavens! what's the matter?

[SIR SOLOMON looks astonished.]

Ha! what do I see? My servant on the floor, and sir Solomon offering rudeness to her! Oh, I I can't bear it! Oh!

[Falls into a chair.]

Sir Sol. What has the devil been doing here?

Lady Sad. This the reward of all my virtue! Oh, revenge, revenge!

Sir Sol. My dear, my good, virtuous, injured dear, be patient; for here has been such wicked doings—

Lady Sad. Oh, torture! Do you own it, too? 'Tis well my love protects you. But for this wretch, this monster, this sword shall do me justice on her.

[Runs at WISHWELL with SIR SOLOMON'S sword.]

Sir Sol. Oh, hold, my poor mistaken dear! This horrid jade, the gods can tell, is innocent for me; but she has had, it seems, a strong dog in the closet here; which I suspecting, put myself into his place, and had almost trapped her in the very impudence of her iniquity.

Lady Sad. How! I'm glad to find he dares not own 'twas his jealousy of me—

[Aside.]

Wish. [Kneeling.] Dear madam, I hope your ladyship will pardon the liberty I took in your absence, in bringing my lover into your ladyship's chamber; but I did not think you would come home from prayers so soon; and so I was forced to hide him in that closet: but my master suspecting the business, it seems, turned him out unknown to me, and then put himself there, and so had a mind to discover whether there was any harm between us; and so, because he fancied I had been naught with him—

Sir Sol. Ay, my dear; and the jade was so confoundedly fond of me, that I grew out of all patience, and fell upon her like a fury.

Lady Sad. Horrid creature! And does she think to stay a minute in the family after such impudence?

Sir Sol. Hold, my dear!—for, if this should be the man that is to marry her, you know there may be no harm done yet.

Wish. Yea, it was he indeed, madam.

Sir Sol. [Aside.] I must not let the jade be turned away, for fear she should put it in my wife's head that I hid myself to discover her ladyship, and then the devil would not be able to live in the house with her.

Wish. Now, sir, you know what I can tell of you.

[Aside to SIR SOL.]

Sir Sol. Mum—that's a good girl; there's a guinea for you.

Lady Sad. Well, upon your intercession, my dear, I'll pardon her this fault. But pray, mistress, let me hear of no more such doings. I am so disordered with this fright—Fetch my prayer-book; I'll endeavour to compose myself.

[Erit LADY SAD. and WISH.]

Sir Sol. Ay, do so; that's my good dear—What two blessed escapes have I had! to find myself no cuckold at last, and, (which had been equally terrible,) my wife not know I wrongfully suspected her!—Well, at length I am fully convinced of her virtue—and now, if I can but cut off the abominable expence, that attends some of her impertinent acquaintance, I shall shew myself a Machiavel.

Re-enter WISHWELL.

Wish. Sir, here's my lady Dainty come to wait upon my lady.

Sir Sol. I'm sorry for't, with all my heart—Why did you say she was within?

Wish. Sir, she did not ask, if she was; but she's never denied to her.

Sir Sol. Garso! why, then, if you please to leave her ladyship to me, I'll begin with her now.

WISHWELL brings in LADY DAINTY.

Lady Dain. Sir Solomon, your very humble servant.

Sir Sol. Yours, yours, madam.

Lady Dain. Where's my lady?

Sir Sol. Where your ladyship very seldom is—at prayers,

Enter LADY SADLIFE.

Lady Sad. My dear lady Dainty!

Lady Dain. Dear madam, I am the happiest person alive in finding your ladyship at home.

Sir Sol. So, now for a torrent of impertinence.

Lady Sad. Your ladyship does me a great deal of honour.

Lady Dain. I am sure I do myself a great deal of pleasure. I have made at least twenty visits to-day. Oh, I'm quite dead! not but my coach is very easy—yet so much perpetual motion, you know—

Sir Sol. Ah, pox of your disorder! If I had the providing your equipage, odzooks, you should rumble to your visits in a wheel-barrow. [Aside.]

Lady Sad. Was you at my lady dutchess's?

Lady Dain. A little while.

Lady Sad. Had she a great circle?

Lady Dain. Extreme—I was not able to bear the breath of so much company.

Lady Sad. You did not dine there?

Lady Dain. Oh, I can't touch any body's dinner but my own!—and I have almost killed myself this week, for want of my usual glass of Tokay, after my ortolans and Muscovy duck eggs.

Sir Sol. 'Sbud, if I had the feeding of you, I'd bring you, in a fortnight, to neck-beef, and a pot of plain bub. [Aside.

Lady Dain. Then I have been so surfeited with the sight of a hideous entertainment to-day, at my lady Cormorant's, who knows no other happiness, or way of making one welcome, than eating or drinking: for, though she saw I was just fainting at her vast limbs of butcher's meat, yet the civil savage forced me to sit down, and heaped enough upon my plate to victual a fleet for an East India voyage.

Lady Sad. How could you bear it? Ha, ha!—Does your ladyship never go to the play?

Lady Dain. Never, but when I bespeak it myself; and, then, not to mind the actors; for it's common to love sights. My great diversion is, in a reposed posture, to turn my eyes upon the galleries, and bless myself to hear the happy savages laugh; or when an awkward citizen crowds herself in among us, 'tis an unspeakable pleasure to contemplate her airs and dress: and they never 'scape me; for I am as apprehensive of such a creature's coming near me, as some people are when a cat is in the room. But the play is begun. I believe; and, if your ladyship has an inclination, I'll wait upon you.

Lady Sad. I think, madam, we can't do better: and here comes Mr Careless most opportunely to squire us.

Sir Sol. Careless! I don't know him; but my wife does, and that's as well.

Enter CARELESS.

Care. Ladies, your servant. Seeing your coach at the door, madam, made me not able to resist this opportunity to—to—you know, madam, there's no time to be lost in love. Sir Solomon, your servant.

Sir Sol. Oh, yours, yours, sir!—A very impudent fellow; and I'm in hopes will marry her. [Aside.

Lady Dain. The assurance of this creature almost grows diverting: all one can do, can't make him the least sensible of a discouragement.

Lady Sad. Try what compliance will do; perhaps that may fright him.

Lady Dain. If it were not too dear a remedy—One would almost do any thing to get rid of his company.

Care. Which you never will, madam, till you marry me, depend upon it. Do that, and I'll trouble you no more.

Sir Sol. This fellow's abominable! He'll certainly have her. [Aside.

Lady Dain. There's no depending upon your word, or else I might; for the last time I saw you, you told me then, you would trouble me no more.

Care. Ay, that's true, madam; but to keep one's word, you know, looks like a tradesman.

Sir Sol. Impudent rogue! But he'll have her. [Aside.

Care. And is as much below a gentleman as paying one's debts.

Sir Sol. If he is not hanged first. [Aside.

Care. Besides, madam, I considered that my absence might endanger your constitution, which is so very tender, that nothing but love can save it; and so I would e'en advise you to throw away your juleps, your cordials, and slops, and take me all at once.

Lady Dain. No, sir; bitter potions are not to be taken so suddenly.

Care. Oh, to choose, madam; for, if you stand making of faces, and kicking against it, you'll but increase your aversion, and delay the cure. Come, come; you must be advised.

[Pressing her.

Lady Dain. What mean you, sir?

Care. To banish all your ails, and be myself your universal medicine.

Sir Sol. Well said! he'll have her. [Aside.

Lady Dain. Impudent, robust man! I protest, did not I know his family, I should think his parents had not lived in chairs and coaches, but had used their limbs all their lives! Hu! hu! but I begin to be persuaded health is a great blessing.

[Aside.

Care. My limbs, madam, were conveyed to me before the use of chairs and coaches; and it might lessen the dignity of my ancestors, not to use them as they did.

Lady Dain. Was ever such a rude understanding, to value himself upon the barbarism of his forefathers! Indeed, I have heard of kings, that were bred to the plough, and, I fancy, you might descend from such a race; for you court as if you were behind one—Huh! huh! huh! To treat a woman of quality like an Exchange wench, and express your passion with your arms—unpolished man!

Care. I was willing, madam, to take from the vulgar the only desirable thing among them, and shew you—how they live so healthy—for they have no other remedy.

Lady Dain. A very rough medicine! huh! huh!

Care. To those that never took it, it may seem so—

Lady Dain. Abandoned ravisher! Oh!

[Struggling.

Sir Sol. He has her! he has her! [Aside.

Lady Dain. Leave the room, and see my face no more.

Care. [Bows, and is going.]

Lady Dain. And, hark ye, sir, no bribe; no mediations to my woman.

Care. [Bows, and sighs.]

Lady Dain. Thou profligate! to hug! to clasp! to embrace, and throw your robust arms about me, like a vulgar and indelicate—Oh, I faint with apprehension of so gross an address!

[She faints, and CARE. catches her.]

Care. Oh, my offended fair!

Lady Dain. Inhuman! ravisher! Oh!

[CARE. carries her off]

Sir Sol. He has her! he has her!

[Exeunt SIR SOL. and LADY DAIN.]

Enter CLARINDA and SYLVIA.

Cla. Well, cousin, what do you think of your gentleman now?

Syl. I fancy, madam, that would be as proper a question to ask you: for, really, I don't see any great reason to alter my opinion of him yet.

Cla. Now I could dash her at once, and shew it her, under his own hand, that his name's Standfast, and he'll be here in a quarter of an hour. [Aside.] I vow I don't think I ought to refuse you any service in my power; therefore, if you think it worth your while not to be out of countenance when the colonel comes, I would advise you to withdraw now; for, if you dare take his own word for it, he will be here in three minutes, as this may convince you. [Gives a letter.]

Syl. What's here? a letter from colonel Standfast?—Really, cousin, I have nothing to say to him—Mr Freeman's the person I'm concerned for, and I expect to see him here in a quarter of an hour.

Cla. Then you don't believe them both the same person?

Syl. Not by their hands or style, I can assure you, as this may convince you. [Gives a letter.]

Cla. Ha! the hand is different indeed—I scarce know what to think—and yet I'm sure my eyes were not deceived.

Syl. Come, cousin, let's be a little cooler; 'tis not impossible but we may have both laughed at one another to no purpose—for I am confident they are two persons.

Cla. I can't tell that, but I'm sure here comes one of them.

Enter ATALL as COLONEL STANDFAST.

Syl. Ha!

Atall. Hey! Bombard, (there they are, faith!) bid the chariot set up, and call again about one or two in the morning—You see, madam, what 'tis to give an impudent fellow the least encouragement: I'm resolved now to make a night on't with you.

Cla. I'm afraid, colonel, we shall have much ado to be good company, for we are two women to one man, you see; and if we should both have fancy to have you particular, I doubt you'd make but bungling work on't.

Atall. I warrant you we will pass our time like gods: two ladies and one man! the prettiest set for Ombre in the universe—Come, come! Cards, cards, cards! and tea—that I insist upon.

Cla. Well, sir, if my cousin will make one, I won't baulk your good humour.

[Turning SYL. to face him.]

Atall. Is the lady your relation, madam?—I beg the honour to be known to her.

Cla. Oh, sir, that I'm sure she can't refuse you—Cousin, this is colonel Standfast. [Laughs. Aside.] I hope now she's convinced.

Atall. Your pardon, madam, if I am a little particular in my desire to be known to any of this lady's relations. [Salutes.]

Syl. You'll certainly deserve mine, sir, by being always particular to that lady—

Atall. Oh, madam!—Tall, lall.

[Turns away, and sings.]

Syl. This assurance is beyond example. [Aside.]

Cla. How do you do, cousin?

Syl. Beyond bearing—but not incurable.

[Aside.]

Cla. [Aside.] Now can't I find in my heart to give him one angry word for his impudence to me this morning! the pleasure of seeing my rival mortified, makes me strangely good-natured.

Atall. [Turning familiarly to CLA.] Upon my soul, you are provokingly handsome to-day! Ay, Gad! why is not it high treason for any beautiful woman to marry?

Cla. What, would you have us lead apes?

Atall. Not one of you, by all that's lovely!—Do you think we could not find you better employment?—Death! what a hand is here?—Gad, I shall grow foolish!

Cla. Stick to your assurance, and you are in no danger.

Atall. Why, then, in obedience to your commands, prithee, answer me sincerely one question: How long do you really design to make me dangle thus?

Cla. Why, really. I can't just set you a time; but when you are weary of your service, come to me with a sixpence and modesty, and I'll give you a discharge.

Atall. Thou insolent, provoking, handsome tyrant!

Cla. Come, let me go—this is not a very civil way of entertaining my cousin, methinks.

Atall. I beg her pardon indeed. [Bowing to SYL.] But lovers, you know, madam, may plead a sort of excuse for being singular, when the favourite fair's in company—But we were talking of cards, ladies.

Cla. Cousin, what say you?

Syl. I had rather you would excuse me; I am a little unfit for play at this time.

Atall. What a valuable virtue is assurance !
Now am I as intrepid as a lawyer at the bar.

[Aside.

Cla. Bless me ! you are not well ?

Syl. I shall be presently—Pray, sir, give me leave to ask you a question.

Atall. So, now its coming ! [Aside.] Freely, madam.

Syl. Look on me well :—ha e you never seen my face before ?

Atall. Upon my word, madam, I can't recollect that I have.

Syl. I am satisfied.

Atall. But pray, madam, why may you ask ?

Syl. I am too much disordered now to tell you. But, if I'm not deceived, I'm miserable ! [Weeps.

Atall. This is strange—How her concern transports me !

Cla. Her fears have touched me, and half persuade me to revenge them—Come, cousin, be easy : I see you are convinced he is the same, and now I'll prove myself a friend.

Syl. I know not what to think—my senses are confounded : their features are indeed the same ; and yet there's something in their air, their dress, and manner, strangely different : but, be it as it will, all right to him in presence I disclaim, and yield to you for ever.

Cla. No, cousin, believe it, both our senses cannot be deceived ; he's individually the same ; and, since he dares be base to you, he's miserable indeed, if flattered with a distant hope of me : I know his person and his falsehood both too well ; and you shall see I will, as becomes your friend, resent it.

Atall. What means this strangeness, madam ?

Cla. I'll tell you, sir ; and, to use few words, know then, this lady and myself have borne your faithless insolence and artifice too long : but that you may not think to impose on me, at least, I desire you would leave the house, and from this moment never see me more.

Atall. Madam ! What ! what is all this ?

Riddle me riddle me re ;

For the devil take me

For ever from thee,

If I can divine what this riddle can be !

Syl. Not moved ! I'm more amazed.

Atall. Pray, madam, in the name of common sense, let me know, in two words, what the real meaning of your last terrible speech was ; and if I don't make you a plain, honest, reasonable answer to it, be pleased, the next minute, to blot my name out of your table-book, never more to be enrolled in the senseless catalogue of those vain coxcombs, that impudently hope to come into your favour.

Cla. This insolence grows tedious : what end can you propose by this assurance ?

Atall. Hey-day !

Syl. Hold, cousin—one moment's patience : I'll send this minute again to Mr Freeman, and if he does not immediately appear, the dispute will need no farther argument.

Atall. Mr Freeman ! Who the devil's he ? What have I to do with him ?

Syl. I'll soon inform you, sir.

[Going, meets WISHWELL entering.

Wish. Madam, here's a footman mightily out of breath, says he belongs to Mr Freeman, and desires very earnestly to speak with you.

Syl. Mr Freeman ! Pray bid him come in—What can this mean ?

Atall. You'll see presently.

[Aside.

Re-enter WISHWELL with FINDER.

Cla. Ha !

Syl. Come hither, friend : do you belong to M Freeman ?

Fin. Yes, madam, and my poor master gives his humble service to your ladyship, and begs your pardon for not waiting on you, according to his promise ; which he would have done, but for an unfortunate accident.

Syl. What's the matter ?

Fin. As he was coming out of his lodgings to pay his duty to you, madam, a parcel of fellows set upon him, and said they had a warrant against him ; and so, because the rascals began to be saucy with him, and my master knowing that he did not owe a shilling in the world, he drew to defend himself, and, in the scuffle, the bloody villains run one of their swords quite through his arm ; but the best of the jest was, madam, that as soon as they got him into a house, and sent for a surgeon, he proved to be the wrong person ; for their warrant, it seems, was against a poor scoundrel, that happens, they say, to be very like him, one Colonel Standfast.

Atall. Say you so, Mr Dog ?—If your master had been here, I would have given him as much.

[Gives him a box on the ear.

Fin. Oh, Lord ! pray, madam, save me—I did not speak a word to the gentleman.—Oh, the devil ! this must be the devil in the likeness of my master.

Syl. Is this gentleman so very like him, say you ?

Fin. Like, madam ! ay, as one box on the ear is like to another ; only I think, madam, my master's nose is a little, little higher.

Atall. Now, ladies, I presume the riddle's solved.—Hark you, where is your master, rascal ?

Fin. Master, rascal ! Sir, my master's name's Freeman, and I'm a free-born Englishman ; and I must tell you, sir, that I don't use to take such arbitrary socks of the face from any man that does not pay me wages ; and so my master will tell you too, when he comes, sir.

Syl. Will he be here, then ?

Fin. This minute, madam ; he only stays to have his wound dressed.

Atall. I'm resolved I'll stay that minute out, if he does not come till midnight.

Fin. A pox of his mettle!—when his hand's in, he makes no difference between jest and earnest, I find.—If he does not pay me well for this, 'egad he shall tell the next for himself. [Aside.] Has your ladyship any commands to my master, madam?

Syl. Yes; pray give him my humble service; say I'm sorry for his misfortune; and if he thinks 'twill do his wound no harm, I beg, by all means, he may be brought hither immediately.

Fin. 'Shah! his wound, madam! I know he does not value it of a rush; for he'll have the devil and all of actions against the rogues for false imprisonment, and smart-money—Ladies, I kiss your hands—Sir, I—nothing at all—

[Exit.

At. [Aside.] The dog has done it rarely! for a lie upon the stretch, I don't know a better rascal in Europe.

Enter an Officer.

Offi. Ay! now I'm sure I'm right—Is not your name Colonel Standfast, sir?

At. Yes, sir; what then?

Offi. Then you are my prisoner, sir—

At. Your prisoner! who the devil are you? a bailiff? I don't owe a shilling.

Offi. I don't care if you don't, sir; I have a warrant against you for high treason, and I must have you away this minute.

At. Look you, sir, depend upon't, this is but some impertinent, malicious prosecution: you may venture to stay a quarter of an hour, I'm sure; I have some business here till then, that concerns me nearer than my life.

Cla. Have but so much patience, and I'll satisfy you for your civility.

Offi. I could not stay a quarter of an hour, madam, if you'd give me five hundred pounds.

Syl. Can't you take bail, sir?

Offi. Bail! no, no.

Cla. Whither must he be carried!

Offi. To my house, till he's examined before the council.

Cla. Where is your house?

Offi. Just by the secretary's office; every body knows Mr Lockum the messenger—Come, sir.

At. I can't stir yet, indeed, sir.

[Lays his hand on his sword.

Offi. Nay, look you, if you are for that play—Come in, gentlemen; away with him.

Enter Musqueteers, and force him off.

Syl. This is the strangest accident: I am extremely sorry for the colonel's misfortune; but I am heartily glad he is not Mr Freeman.

Cla. I'm afraid you'll find him so—I shall never change my opinion of him, till I see them face to face.

Syl. Well, cousin, let them be two or one, I'm resolved to stick to Mr Freeman; for, to tell you the truth, this last spark has too much of the confident rake in him to please me; but there is a modest sincerity in the other's conversation that's irresistible.

Cla. For my part, I'm almost tired with his impertinence either way, and could find in my heart to trouble myself no more about him; and yet, methinks, it provokes me to have a fellow out-face my senses.

Syl. Nay, they are strangely alike, I own; but yet, if you observe nicely, Mr Freeman's features are more pale and pensive than the colonel's.

Cla. When Mr Freeman comes, I'll be closer in my observation of him—in the mean time, let me consider what I really propose by all this rout I make about him: suppose (which I can never believe) they should prove two several men at last, I don't find that I'm fool enough to think of marrying either of them; nor (whatever airs I give myself) am I yet mad enough to do worse with them—Well, since I don't design to come to a close engagement myself, then why should I not generously stand out of the way, and make room for one that would? No, I can't do that, neither—I want, methinks, to convict him first of being one and the same person, and then to have him convince my cousin that he likes me better than her—Ay, that would do! and to confess my infirmity, I still find (though I don't care for this fellow) while she has assurance enough to nourish the least hope of getting him from me, I shall never be heartily easy till she's heartily mortified. [Aside.

Syl. You seem very much concerned for the colonel's misfortune, cousin.

Cla. His misfortunes seldom hold him long, as you may see; for here he comes.

Enter ATALL as MR FREEMAN.

Syl. Bless me!

At. I am sorry, madam, I could not be more punctual to your obliging commands; but the accident that prevented my coming sooner, will, I hope, now give me a pretence to a better welcome than my last; for now, madam, [To CLAR.] your mistake's set right, I presume, and, I hope, you won't expect Mr Freeman to answer for all the miscarriages of Colonel Standfast.

Cla. Not in the least, sir; the colonel's able to answer for himself, I find; ha, ha!

At. Was not my servant with you, madam?

[To SYL.

Syl. Yes, yes, sir, he has told us all. [Aside.] And I am sorry you have paid so dear for a proof of your innocence. Come, come, I'd advise you to set your heart at rest; for what I design, you'll find, I shall come to a speedy resolution in.

At. Oh, generous resolution!

Cla. Well, madam, since you are so tenacious of your conquest, I hope you'll give me the same liberty: and not expect, the next time you fall a crying at the colonel's gallantry to me, that my good nature should give you up my pretensions to him. And for you, sir, I shall only tell you, this last plot was not so closely laid, but that a woman of a very slender capacity, you'll find, has wit enough to discover it. [Exit CLA.]

At. So! she's gone to the messenger's, I suppose—but, poor soul, her intelligence there will be extremely small. [Aside.] Well, madam, I hope at last your scruples are over.

Syl. You cannot blame me, sir, if, now we are alone, I own myself a little more surprised at her positiveness, than my woman's pride would let me confess before her face; and yet, methinks, there's a native honesty in your looks, that tells me I am not mistaken, and may trust you with my heart.

At. Oh, for pity, still preserve that tender thought, and save me from despair!

Enter CLERIMONT.

Cle. Ha! Freeman again! Is it possible!

At. How now, Clerimont? what are you surprised at?

Cle. Why, to see thee almost in two places at one time; 'tis but this minute, I met the very image of thee with the mob about a coach, in the hands of a messenger, whom I had the curiosity to stop and call to, and had no other proof of his not being thee, but that the spark would not know me!

Syl. Strange! I almost think I'm really not deceived.

Cle. 'Twas certainly Clarinda I saw go out in a chair just now—it must be she—the circumstances are too strong for a mistake. [Aside.]

Syl. Well, sir, to ease you of your fears, now I dare own to you that mine are over.

[To ATALL.]

Cle. What a coxcomb have I made myself, to serve my rival even with my own mistress! But 'tis at least some ease to know him: all I have to hope is, that he does not know the ass he has made of me—that might indeed be fatal to him.

[Aside.]

Enter SYLVIA'S maid.

Maid. Oh, madam, I'm glad I've found you: your father and I have been hunting you all the town over.

Syl. My father in town!

Maid. He waits below in the coach for you: he must needs have you come away this minute; and talks of having you married this very night to the fine gentleman he spoke to you of.

Syl. What do I hear?

At. If ever soft compassion touch'd your soul, give me a word of comfort in this last distress, to save me from the horrors that surround me!

Syl. You see we are observed—but yet depend upon my faith as on my life.—In the mean time, I'll use my utmost power to avoid my father's hasty will: in two hours you shall know my fortune and my family—Now, don't follow me, as you'd preserve my friendship. Come— [Exit with maid.]

At. Death! how this news alarms me! I never felt the pains of love before.

Cle. Now, then, to ease, or to revenge, my fears—This sudden change of your countenance, Mr Atall, looks as if you had a mind to banter your friend into a belief of your being really in love with the lady that just now left you.

At. Faith, Clerimont, I have too much concern upon me at this time, to be capable of a banter.

Cle. Ha! he seems really touched, and I begin now only to fear Clarinda's conduct.—Well, sir, if it be so, I'm glad to see a convert of you; and now, in return to the little services I have done you, in helping you to carry on your affair with both these ladies at one time, give me leave to ask a favour of you—Be still sincere, and we may still be friends.

At. You surprise me—but use me as you find me.

Cle. Have you no acquaintance with a certain lady, whom you have lately heard me own I was unfortunately in love with?

At. Not that I know of; I'm sure not as the lady you are in love with: but, pray, why do you ask?

Cle. Come, I'll be sincere with you, too: because I have strong circumstances that convince me 'tis one of those two you have been so busy about.

At. Not she you saw with me, I hope?

Cle. No; I mean the other—But, to clear the doubt at once, is her name Clarinda?

At. I own it is: but had I the least been warned of your pretences—

Cle. Sir, I dare believe you; and though you may have prevailed even against her honour, your ignorance of my passion for her makes you stand at least excused to me.

At. No; by all the solemn protestations tongue can utter, her honour is untainted yet for me; nay, even unattempted.

Cle. You own she has received your gallantries at least?

At. Faith, not to be vain, she has indeed taken some pains to pique her cousin about me; and if her beautiful cousin had not fallen in my way at the same time, I must own, 'tis very possible I might have endeavoured to push my fortune with her; but since I know your heart, put my friendship to a trial.

Cle. Only this—if I should be reduced to ask it of you, promise to confess your imposture, and your passion to her cousin, before her face.

At. There's my hand—I'll do't, to right my friend and mistress. But, dear Clerimont, you'll pardon me if I leave you here; for my poor incognita's affairs at this time are in a very critical condition.

Cle. No ceremony—I release you.

At. Adieu!

[Exit.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Enter CLERIMONT and CARELESS.

Cle. AND so you took the opportunity of her fainting to carry her off! Pray, how long did her fit last?

Care. Why, faith, I so humoured her affectation, that 'tis hardly over yet; for I told her, her life was in danger, and swore, if she would not let me send for a parson to marry her before she died, I'd that minute send for a shroud, and be buried alive with her in the same coffin: But at the apprehension of so terrible a thought, she pretended to be frightened into her right senses again; and forbid me her sight for ever. So that, in short, my impudence is almost exhausted, her affectation is as insurmountable as another's real virtue, and I must e'en catch her that way, or die without her at last.

Cle. How do you mean?

Care. Why, if I find I cannot impose upon her by humility, which I'll try, I'll even turn rival to myself in a very fantastical figure, that I'm sure she won't be able to resist. You must know, she has of late been flattered that the Muscovite Prince, Alexander, is dying for her, though he never spoke to her in his life.

Cle. I understand you: so you'd first venture to pique her against you, and then let her marry you in another person, to be revenged of you.

Care. One of the two ways I am pretty sure to succeed.

Cle. Extravagant enough! Prithee, is sir Solomon in the next room?

Care. What! You want his assistance? Clarinda's in her airs again!

Cle. Faith, Careless, I am almost ashamed to tell you, but I must needs speak with him.

Care. Come along, then. [Exeunt.]

Enter LADY DAIN, LADY SADLIFE, and CARELESS.

Lady Dain. This rude, boisterous man, has given me a thousand disorders; the colic, the spleen, the palpitation of the heart, and convulsions all over—Huh! huh! I must send for the doctor.

Lady Sad. Come, come, madam, e'en pardon him, and let him be your physician—Do but observe his penitence, so humble he dares not speak to you.

Care. [Folds his arms, and sighs.]—Oh!

Lady Sad. How can you hear him sigh so?

Lady Dain. Nay, let him groan—for nothing but his pangs can ease me.

Care. [Kneels, and presents her his drawn sword; opening his breast.]—Be then at once most barbarously just, and take your vengeance here!

Lady Dain. No, I give thee life, to make thee miserable; live, that my resenting eyes may kill thee every hour.

Care. Nay, then there's no relief—but this—

[Offering at his sword, LADY SADLIFE holds him.]

Lady Sad. Ah! for mercy's sake!—barbarous creature, how can you see him thus?

Lady Dain. Why, I did not bid him kill himself: but do you really think he would have done it?

Lady Sad. Certainly, if I had not prevented it.

Lady Dain. Strange passion! But 'tis its nature to be violent, when one makes it despair.

Lady Sad. Won't you speak to him?

Lady Dain. No, but if your—is enough concerned to be his friend, you may tell him—not that it really is so—but you may say—you believe I pity him.

Lady Sad. Sure love was never more ridiculous on both sides.

Enter WISHWELL.

Wish. Madam, here's a page from prince Alexander desires to give a letter into your ladyship's own hands.

Lady Dain. Prince Alexander! What means my heart? I come to him.

Lady Sad. By no means, madam; pray let him come in.

Care. Ha! Prince Alexander! Nay, then, I have found out the secret of this coldness, madam.

Enter Page.

Page. Madam, his royal highness prince Alexander, my master, has commanded me, on pain of death, thus—[Kneeling.]—to deliver this, the burning secret of his heart.

Lady Dain. Where is the prince?

Page. Reposed, in private, on a mourning pallet, till your commands vouchsafe to raise him.

Lady Sad. By all means, receive him here immediately. I have the honour to be a little known to his highness.

Lady Dain. The favour, madam, is too great to be resisted; pray, tell his highness, then, the honour of the visit he designs me, makes me thankful and impatient! Huh! Huh!

[Exit Page.]

Care. Are my sufferings, madam, so soon forgot, then! Was I but flattered with the hope of pity?

Lady Dain. The happy have whole days, and those they choose.—[Resenting.]—The unhappy have but hours, and those they lose.

[Exit repeating.]

Lady Sad. Don't you lose a minute, then.

Cara. I'll warrant you—ten thousand thanks, dear madam, I'll be transformed in a second — [Exeunt severally.]

Enter CLARINDA in a man's habit.

Cla. So! I'm in for't now! how I shall come off, I cannot tell: 'twas but a bare saving game I made with Clerimont; his resentment had brought my pride to its last legs, dissembling; and, if the poor man had not loved me too well, I had made but a dismal humble figure—I have used him ill, that's certain, and he may e'en thank himself for't—he would be sincere—well, (begging my sex's pardon) we do make the silliest tyrants—we had better be reasonable; for (to do them right) we don't run half the hazard in obeying the good sense of a lover; at least, I'm reduced now to make the experiment——Here they come.

Enter SIR SOLOMON and CLERIMONT.

Sir Sol. What have we here! another captain? If I were sure he were a coward now, I'd kick him before he speaks——Is your business with me, sir?

Cla. If your name be sir Solomon Sadlife.

Sir Sol. Yes, sir, it is; and I'll maintain it as ancient as any, and related to most of the families in England.

Cla. My business will convince you, sir, that I think well of it.

Sir Sol. And what is your business, sir?

Cla. Why, sir——You have a pretty kinswoman, called Clarinda.

Cle. Ha!

Sir Sol. And what then, sir?——Such a rogue as t'other. [Aside.]

Cla. Now, sir, I have seen her, and am in love with her.

Cle. Say you so, sir?——I may chance to cure you of it. [Aside.]

Cla. And to back my pretensions, sir, I have a good fifteen hundred pounds a-year estate, and am, as you see, a pretty fellow into the bargain.

Sir Sol. She that marries you, sir, will have a choice bargain, indeed!

Cla. In short, sir, I'll give you a thousand guineas to make up the match.

Sir Sol. Hum——[Aside.]——But, sir, my niece is provided for.

Cle. That's well! [Aside.]

Sir Sol. But if she were not, sir, I must tell you, she is not to be caught with a smock-face and a feather, sir——And——and——let me see you an hour hence. [Aside.]

Cla. Well said, uncle! [Aside.]——But, sir, I'm in love with her, and positively will have her.

Sir Sol. Whether she likes you or no, sir?

Cla. Like me! ha, ha! I'd fain see a woman that dislikes a pretty fellow, with fifteen hundred pounds a-year, a white wig, and black eyebrows.

Cle. Hark, you, young gentleman, there must go more than all this to the gaining of that lady.

[Takes CLARINDA aside.]

Sir Sol. [Aside.] A thousand guineas—that's five hundred more than I proposed to get of Mr Clerimont——But my honour is engaged——Ay, but then here's a thousand pounds to release it. Now, shall I take the money?——It must be so—Coin will carry it.

Cla. Oh, sir, if that be all, I'll soon remove your doubts and pretensions! Come, sir, I'll try your courage.

Cle. I'm afraid you won't, young gentleman.

Cla. As young as I am, sir, you shall find I scorn to turn my back to any man.

[Exeunt CLARINDA and CLERIMONT.]

Sir Sol. Ha! they are gone to fight——with all my heart—a fair chance, at least, for a better bargain: for if the young spark should let the air into my friend Clerimont's midriff now, it may possibly cool his love, too, and then there's my honour safe, and a thousand guineas snug. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—Changes to a field.

Enter CLARINDA and CLERIMONT.

Cle. Come, sir, we are far enough.

Cla. I only wish the lady were by, sir, that the conqueror might carry her off the spot——I warrant she'd be mine.

Cle. That, my talking hero, we shall soon determine.

Cla. Not that I think her handsome, or care a rush for her.

Cle. You are very mettled, sir, to fight for a woman you don't value.

Cla. Sir, I value the reputation of a gentleman; and I don't think any young fellow ought to pretend to it, till he has talked himself into a lampoon, lost his two or three thousand pounds at play, kept his miss, and killed his man.

Cle. Very gallant, indeed, sir! but, if you please to handle your sword, you'll soon go through your course.

Cla. Come on, sir——I believe I shall give your mistress a truer account of your heart than you have done. I have had her heart long enough, and now will have yours.

Cle. Ha! does she love you, then?

[Endeavouring to draw.]

Cla. I leave you to judge that, sir. But I have lain with her a thousand times; in short, so long, till I'm tired of it.

Cle. Villain, thou liest! Draw, or I'll use you as you deserve, and stab you.

Cla. Take this with you first: Clarinda will never marry him, that murders me.

Cle. She may the man, that vindicates her honour——therefore, be quick, or I'll keep my word——I find your sword is not for doing things in haste.

Cla. It sticks to the scabbard so—I believe I did not wipe off the blood of the last man I fought with.

Cle. Come, sir, this trifling sha'nt serve your turn—Here, give me yours, and take mine.

Cla. With all my heart, sir.—Now have at you!

[CLER. draws, and finds only a hilt in his hand.]

Cle. Death! you villain, do you serve me so!

Cla. In love and war, sir, all advantages are fair: so we conquer, no matter whether by force or stratagem.—Come, quick, sir—your life or mistress.

Cle. Neither. Death! you shall have both; or none! Here drive your sword; for only through this heart you reach Clarinda.

Cla. Death, sir! can you be mad enough to die for a woman that hates you?

Cle. If that were true, 'twere greater madness, then, to live.

Cla. Why, to my knowledge, sir, she has used you basely, falsely, ill, and for no reason.

Cle. No matter; no usage can be worse than the contempt of poorly, tamely parting with her. She may abuse her heart by happy infidelities; but, 'tis the pride of mine to be even miserably constant.

Cla. Generous passion! You almost tempt me to resign her to you.

Cle. You cannot, if you would. I would indeed have won her fairly from you with my sword; but scorn to take her as your gift. Be quick, and end your insolence.

Cla. Yes, thus—Most generous Clerimont, you now, indeed, have fairly vanquished me! [Runs to him.] My woman's follies, and my shame, be buried ever here.

Cle. Ha, Clarinda! Is it possible? My wonder rises with my joy!—How came you in this habit?

Cla. Now you indeed recall my blushes; but I had no other veil to hide them, while I confessed the injuries I had done your heart, in fooling with a man I never meant, on any terms, to engage with. Beside, I knew, from our late parting, your fear of losing me would reduce you to comply with sir Solomon's demands, for his interest in your favour. Therefore, as you saw, I was resolved to ruin his market, by seeming to raise it; for he secretly took the offer I made him.

Cle. 'Twas generously and timely offered; for it really prevented my signing articles to him. But, if you would heartily convince me that I shall never more have need of his interest, even let us steal to the next priest, and honestly put it out of his power ever to part us.

Cla. Why, truly, considering the trusts I have made you, 'twould be ridiculous now, I think, to deny you any thing: and if you should grow weary of me after such usage, I can't blame you.

VOL. II.

Cle. Banish that fear; my flame can never waste,

For love sincere refines upon the taste.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter SIR SOLOMON, with old MR WILFUL; LADY SADLIFE, and SYLVIA weeping.

Sir Sol. Troth, my old friend, this is a bad business, indeed; you have bound yourself in a thousand pounds bond, you say, to marry your daughter to a fine gentleman, and she, in the mean time, it seems, is fallen in love with a stranger.

Wil. Look you, sir Solomon, it does not trouble me o' this; for, I'll make her do as I please, or I'll starve her.

Lady Sad. But, sir, your daughter tells me that the gentleman she loves is in every degree in as good circumstances as the person you design her for; and, if he does not prove himself so before to-morrow morning, she will cheerfully submit to whatever you'll impose on her.

Wil. All sham! all sham! only to gain time. I expect my friend and his son here immediately to demand performance of articles; and if her ladyship's nice stomach does not immediately comply with them, as I told you before, I'll starve her.

Lady Sad. But, consider, sir, what a perpetual discord must a forced marriage probably produce.

Wil. Discord! pshaw, waw! One man makes as good a husband as another. A month's marriage will set all to rights, I warrant you. You know the old saying, sir Solomon—lying together makes pigs love, Lady Sad. [To Syl.] What shall we do for you? There's no altering him. Did your lover promise to come to your assistance?

Syl. I expect him every minute; but can't foresee, from him, the least hope of my redemption.—This is he.

Enter ATALL, undisguised.

Atall. My Sylvia, dry those tender eyes; for while there's life, there's hope.

Lady Sad. Ha! is't he? but I must smother my confusion. [Aside.]

Wil. How now, sir! pray, who gave you commission to be so familiar with my daughter?

Atall. Your pardon, sir; but when you know me right, you'll neither think my freedom or my pretensions familiar or dishonourable.

Wil. Why, sir, what pretensions have you to her?

Atall. Sir, I saved her life at the hazard of my own: that gave me a pretence to know her; knowing her made me love, and gratitude made her receive it.

Wil. Ay, sir! And some very good reasons, best known to myself, make me refuse it. Now, what will you do?

S M

Atall. I can't tell yet, sir; but if you'll do me the favour to let me know those reasons——

Wil. Sir, I don't think myself obliged to do either;—but I'll tell you what I'll do for you: since you say you love my daughter, and she loves you, I'll put you in the nearest way to get her.

Atall. Don't flatter me, I beg you, sir.

Wil. Not I, upon my soul, sir! for, look you, 'tis only this——get my consent, and you shall have her.

Atall. I beg your pardon, sir, for endeavouring to talk reason to you. But, to return your raillery, give me leave to tell you, when any man marries her but myself, he must extremely ask my consent.

Wil. Before George, thou art a very pretty impudent fellow! and I'm sorry I can't punish her disobedience, by throwing her away upon thee.

Atall. You'll have a great deal of plague about this business, sir; for I shall be mighty difficult to give up my pretensions to her.

Wil. Ha! 'tis a thousand pities I can't comply with thee. Thou wilt certainly be a thriving fellow; for thou dost really set the best face upon a bad cause, that ever I saw since I was born.

Atall. Come, sir, once more, raillery apart; suppose I prove myself of equal birth and fortune to deserve her?

Wil. Sir, if you were eldest son to the Cham of Tartary, and had the dominions of the Great Mogul entailed upon you and your heirs for ever, it would signify no more than the bite of my thumb. The girl's disposed of; I have matched her already, upon a thousand pounds forfeit; and, faith, she shall fairly run for't, though she's yerked and fled from the crest to the crupper.

Atall. Confusion!

Syl. What will become of me?

Wil. And if you don't think me in earnest now, here comes one that will convince you of my sincerity.

Atall. My father! Nay, then my ruin is inevitable.

Enter SIR HARRY ATALL.

Sir Har. [To ATALL.] Oh, sweet sir! have I found you at last? Your very humble servant. What's the reason, pray, that you have had the assurance to be almost a fortnight in town, and never come near me, especially when I sent you word I had business of such consequence with you?

Atall. I understood your business was to marry me, sir, to a woman I never saw: and, to confess the truth, I durst not come near you, because I was at the same time in love with one you never saw.

Sir Har. Was you so, sir? Why, then, sir,

I'll find a speedy cure for your passion—Brother Wilful—Hey, fiddles there!

Atall. Sir, you may treat me with what severity you please; but my engagements to that lady are too powerful and fixed to let the utmost misery dissolve them.

Sir Har. What does the fool mean?

Atall. That I can sooner die than part with her.

Wil. Hey!——Why, is this your son, sir Harry?

Sir Har. Hey-day!—Why, did not you know that before?

Atall. Oh, earth, and all ye stars! is this the lady you designed me, sir?

Syl. Oh, fortune! is it possible?

Sir Har. And is this the lady, sir, you have been making such a bustle about?

Atall. Not life, health, or happiness are half so dear to me.

Sir Sol. [Joining ATALL and SYLVIA's hands.] Loll, loll, leroll!

Atall. Oh, transporting joy!

[Embracing SYLVIA.]

Sir Har. and Wil. Loll! loll! [Joining in the tune, and dancing about them.]

Sir Sol. Hey! within there! [Calls the fiddles.] By jingo, we'll make a night on't!

Enter CLARINDA and CLERIMONT.

Cla. Save you, save you, good people!—I'm glad, uncle, to hear you call so cheerfully for the fiddles; it looks as if you had a husband ready for me.
